

The Complete Ovid Stories

by

The Professor

The Complete Ovid Stories

©2017 The Professor

Compilation created by John Mead

Individual stories copyrighted as of initial publication, as noted.

All Rights Reserved

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution -
Noncommercial - No Derivative Works 3.0
United States License

<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-nd/3.0/us/>

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Product names, brands, and other trademarks referred to within this book are the property of their respective trademark holders. Unless otherwise specified, no association between the author and any trademark holder is expressed or implied. Use of a term in this book should not be regarded as affecting the validity of any trademark, registered trademark, or service mark.

Permission is given to freely redistribute this compilation so long as it is not changed in any particular.

If you paid a fee to obtain this copy, it was done so against the express wishes of The Professor and the compiler.

Table of Contents

Ovid I: Shortcut Through Ovid	4
Ovid II: Return to Ovid: The Lawyer	57
Ovid III: The Road Crew	143
Ovid IV: The Bank Robbers	224
Ovid V: The Jet Jockey	302
Ovid VI: The Developer	386
Ovid VII: The Director	475
Ovid VIII: The Team	555
Ovid IX: The Private Eye	650
Ovid X: The Academician	726
Ovid XI: The Bigot	796
Ovid XII: The Rescuer	889
Ovid XIII: The Agent	972
Ovid XIV: The Band	1042
Ovid XV: The Politician	1132
Ovid XVI: The Derelict	1217
Ovid XVII: The Talking Head	1305
Ovid XVIII: The SEALs	1400
Ovid XIX: The Sleeper	1504
Ovid XX: The Whiz Kid	1583
Ovid XXI: The Answers	1684
Where to find stories by The Professor:	1793
About this compilation:	1793
Project Gutenberg:	1793

Ovid I: Shortcut Through Ovid

©1998 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

“Do you have any fucking idea where we are?”

“Can it, Steve,” I said calmly as I watched mile after mile of gently sloping farmland cruise by at eighty miles an hour. “Randy knows where he’s going.”

‘I hope Randy knows where he’s going,’ I thought. For the last ten miles, I hadn’t seen a road sign of any kind. I didn’t know if we were in Missouri, Arkansas, Oklahoma, or the dark side of the moon.

We had left South Bend on Wednesday, blowing off nearly a week of classes. Some of our fraternity brothers were taking notes for us, so we wouldn’t be totally lost when we got back. It would mean we’d miss a lot of classes, though, but what the hell? How often does Texas play Notre Dame? Besides, South Bend was getting cold and gray as October slipped away, and the forecast for the weekend in Austin was lots of sunshine and temperatures in the seventies. In fact, as we had travelled south from Kansas City, the temperatures had risen into the mid seventies, causing me to wish I had worn shorts instead of jeans.

The trip had been my idea; I’ll admit that. I had a cousin in Austin who’d agreed to put us up, and he had even promised to find some girls for us. It was a once in a lifetime opportunity. This was a one game only series, and who knew how long it would be again before Notre Dame and Texas played against each other? Both had national title aspirations, so it should be a great game, I reasoned. I approached Randy with the idea. Randy had always been my best friend in the fraternity. He and I had pledged as freshmen and had roomed together ever since. Also, Randy had a car—a fiery red Trans-Am that looked like it was going ninety even when it was standing still. His folks had given it to him for getting a 4.0 his junior year.

Steve and Carl were two more guys who had been in our pledge class three years before. Unlike Randy and I, who both took school pretty seriously, Steve and Carl floated by with 2.5 averages. They were smart enough, but to them, every day was party day. When they heard we were headed for Austin, they tagged along somewhat uninvited. At least, I thought, they would share expenses with us. Unlike Randy and I, they hadn't worried about picking up class assignments. They figured they could catch up when we got back—if they felt like it.

We got as far as Kansas City by Wednesday night. It was late, but we took a little time to party before holing up in a Motel 6 for the night. Kansas City isn't a great college town, but the bars and clubs in the Plaza district proved to be a great source of action. Nobody managed to get laid, but a lot of heavy petting went on in one of the clubs. By Thursday morning, we were all a little under the weather. Randy was driving. He wouldn't trust anyone else but me to drive his car, and I had begged off with a dull headache. Steve and Carl had gotten pretty well wasted, so they slept in the back seat while Randy drove and I navigated.

"Head straight south out of Kansas City on US 69," I told Randy.

"Hey, sixty-nine, mighty fine," Carl managed weakly from the back seat.

"Don't we want to head out I-70 to catch I-35?" Randy asked.

"We could," I agreed, "but this way, we avoid the turnpike. It will be cheaper, and we can cut across on two-lane roads and hook back onto I-35 in Oklahoma. Less cops, too, I would imagine, so we can cruise."

It had been good advice at first. We didn't see a cop all morning and were able to cruise along at eighty. We stopped off for lunch in some little no-name town and hit the road again, after Steve and Carl had dived into a liquor store next to the cafe and picked up a fifth of bourbon. "A little hair of the dog that bit us," Steve explained, twisting off the top in the back seat. I don't know how those two managed to drink again. It would be Friday before I could face the thought of another drink.

Steve and Carl nipped at the bourbon while Randy and I tried to figure out where to go next. "You should be coming to the road we need in about ten miles," I told him.

It was at that moment that a battered red farm truck chose to pull out from an unmarked side road, directly in our path.

"Jesus! Look out!" I screamed, but my voice was drowned out by the squeal of the Z-rated tires on the Trans-Am as we skidded sideways directly into...

"God, that was close!" Randy breathed.

Close? I couldn't think of any way we could have missed the truck. We had been headed directly toward it. The last thing I had seen before closing my eyes and bracing for impact was one of the big external gas tanks slung under the frame of the truck. We were going to hit it with no chance of escape.

But we had escaped. I looked around to see what had happened to the truck, but to my surprise, there was nothing on the road. He must have gone directly across the highway, I reasoned. Perhaps there was another little unmarked farm road on the other side.

"Where did he go?" I asked.

"I don't know," Randy admitted, screwing with the rear-view mirror to try to see the truck. "Wherever he went, I'm glad it wasn't into this car."

"This calls for another drink!" Steve shouted with bravado from the back seat. It was met by Carl's childish giggling.

"I think that's it up ahead, Matt," Randy told me, changing the subject.

I looked ahead about a quarter of a mile at a green highway sign which said 'Ovid 20 Miles.'

"There's no Ovid on my map," I said. "And besides, this road can't be the right one. It's too soon. The road you want has to be at least three miles further."

"Well, it looks like it's going the right way," Randy argued. Without further discussion, Randy turned onto the road to Ovid.

I looked carefully at my map. It was a good one, although not highly detailed, but I was sure that a road as good as this one should have been on it. And there was no sign of a town called Ovid. I mentioned this to Randy, only to be interrupted by Steve with a childish drunken “Are we there yet?” Carl gave out a sound halfway between a snort and a giggle. He was equally drunk.

“Quiet, guys,” I scolded.

“Who are you?” Steve asked sarcastically. “Our mother?”

Carl chortled again.

“Maybe it’s a new road,” Randy suggested. “It might not be on the map yet. And as for the town, maybe it’s too small to be on a map like that.”

He had a point. The map was a couple of years old, and the road was smooth, seamless blacktop stretching to the horizon. Also, if Ovid was very small, it might not qualify to appear on the map. At least we were travelling in the right direction, and I knew that eventually, we would run into I-35, so no damage was done. Still, I would have felt more comfortable if we had taken the road we had originally decided upon. But I was too relieved having narrowly avoided death to argue.

Randy was a safe driver, but a fast one. Eighty was nothing in a Trans-Am, and the newly harvested fields and groves of trees shot by with alarming speed. Randy’s confidence and speed increased as we encountered no traffic in either direction on the road. The speedometer had begun to hover around ninety.

It was then that we heard the siren.

“Shit!” Randy cursed. I looked around away from the afternoon sun to see the familiar flashing blue and red lights of a police cruiser.

“Where did he come from?” I asked. I had been watching the road for speed traps but had seen nothing since we had turned off onto the road to Ovid. But then again, I hadn’t spotted the farm truck either.

"I don't know," Randy replied. "I've been watching, too, and I never saw him. Hell, there hasn't even been a turnoff on this road, so I don't know where he was hiding."

"Outrun him, man!" Carl called out. "You got a Trans-Am."

"Right, Carl, and the cop's got a radio," I said with disgust. It was hard to believe Carl was my age since he usually acted like a kid and Steve wasn't much better. Some people never seemed to grow up.

Randy brought the Trans-Am to a smooth stop on the gravel shoulder, and the police cruiser pulled up behind him, lights on but siren off. Turning around, I could see that there appeared to be only one officer in the cruiser. He looked to be a pro, tall in gray-blue uniform shirts. He was wearing the mirrored sunglasses which always seemed popular in law enforcement.

The officer got out of the car. He was hatless and about six foot three. Unlike the stereotype of local law enforcement officers, he appeared to not have an ounce of fat on him. His movements were almost graceful, and there was a purposeful quickness to his movements which made me think he could probably outrun a jackrabbit. He looked big and intimidating as he strode toward our car.

"Is he state or county?" Randy asked, watching him approach in the mirror.

"I don't know," I replied. "I haven't seen any state highway markers, so he's probably county."

The officer stopped a few feet away from and slightly behind Randy's door. "Could you step out of the car, sir?"

Randy slowly opened his door while I watched. Carl and Steve giggled in the back seat.

"Hide that bottle, you idiots," I whispered to them, hoping the cop couldn't hear.

"I need your license and registration," the officer told Randy, almost as if it were a mantra. I pulled the registration slip off the visor and put it on the driver's seat while Randy fished out his license. The officer studied it carefully for a minute through his mirrored glasses, then handed them back to Randy. "Do you have any idea how fast you were going?"

"Um, sixty-five?" Randy guessed, knowing full well that he had topped eighty.

"You were going eighty-nine miles an hour," the officer said precisely. "I'm going to have to take you in to see the Judge."

"Take me in?" Randy protested. "But can't you just write me a ticket? I mean, we're on our way to Austin for the game Saturday and..."

"I have to take you in," the officer insisted. "The speed limit through here is still only fifty-five. You were more than twenty miles an hour over that, so I'm required to take you in to see the Judge. Wait right here and Officer Mercer will ride over with you."

"But there's no room," Randy argued. Besides, I wondered, who was Officer Mercer? I could swear there had been only one cop in that patrol car.

"Your two backseat passengers can ride with me. They appear to be drinking, so I'll need some ID on them, too."

Carl and Steve sullenly piled themselves out of the backseat, fishing into their pockets for wallets. Fortunately, I thought, all of us were twenty-one, so they couldn't get us on any underage drinking or contributing to the delinquency of a minor charges. The officer checked their IDs, grunted, and returned them.

"I'm Officer Mercer," a voice said next to my window. "Please get out of the car and I'll climb in back."

"Would you like to...?" My voice trailed off. Officer Mercer looked identical to the officer who had come up to the car first. I don't just mean the uniform. I mean they were as identical as twins.

"Would I like to what?"

"Uh... would you like to ride up front?"

"I'll ride in back," he said. Of course, I thought. If I were in back, I could get the drop on him. He wanted to be behind both Randy and me.

“OK.” I climbed out of the car. “Are you and the other officer related?”

“Not exactly,” was all he replied as I got out of his way to allow him to crawl into the back seat.

I wanted to press him on his relation to the other cop. I know the uniform and the sunglasses helped to make them look alike, but they appeared absolutely identical to me. There was something odd about this, but I couldn't put my finger on it.

“This is illegal in the state of Oklahoma,” the officer said behind me.

“What?” I asked, turning around to see the officer holding the bourbon bottle Steve and Carl had been nipping from.

“This bottle,” he said. “It's against state law to have an open bottle in your vehicle.”

“I'm sorry,” I managed. “We didn't know.”

“Has the driver been drinking?”

“No, sir,” I replied. “Neither Randy, nor I were drinking.”

The officer just grunted and put the bottle next to him.

Shortly, our two cars were caravanning into town, the cruiser in front. I noticed as it passed us that the logo on the side read ‘Ovid Municipal Police.’ I had an idea. It was a long shot, but I decided to try it.

“Officer,” I began, “you and your partner are town cop...er...police?”

“That's right, son.”

Aha! “Well then, aren't you a little out of your jurisdiction out here in the country?”

I couldn't turn around, but I swear I could feel him smile. “You crossed into Ovid the minute you turned off the main highway.”

“Oh.” I had heard of small towns that had done that sort of thing. They would annex land several miles from the actual town for any number of reasons, but I had never heard of a town annexing twenty miles of open farmland. I thought about mentioning this, but something in my gut said it wouldn't do any of us any good. I didn't want to piss these guys off.

Randy was a model driver, following the lead officer at a respectful distance. Soon, we crested a tree-lined hill and I could look down into a pleasant little valley where a town had grown. From the top of the hill, I could see that Ovid was larger than I had expected. It appeared to be about the size of my hometown, which was about fifteen thousand people. I could see the well-kept tree-lined residential streets, broken occasionally by wider business streets which converged on a downtown business district with a collection of office buildings and retail stores, none of which were taller than three stories.

We entered town on what appeared to be the widest of the business streets. Its curbsides were populated with gas stations, fast food restaurants, and a small strip shopping center. The only business which I was surprised to see was a place called Randy Andy's, which appeared to be a small strip club. Although it was only mid-afternoon, there were half a dozen cars and pickup trucks parked in front of the place. I hadn't expected to see a strip club in a small town in the middle of the Bible Belt.

We proceeded on down the main drag. Ovid was a typical small town with diagonal parking in front of the stores and a few of the local residents strolling casually in front of the shops. At first glance, it appeared to be the main street of a small farming community, populated by the usual casual folks you would expect to see in any small town from coast-to-coast. But it was here on the main street (which I later learned was actually called 'Main Street') that I first noticed something odd about Ovid.

The first odd thing I noticed—the first of many odd things about Ovid I was to notice as time passed—was the people. They seemed normal enough, but it was as if they were extras in a movie. They seemed somehow to be acting their parts rather than being real small-town folks. They went through all the motions, but they did so in a somewhat stilted manner. And they seemed somehow... transparent. I couldn't exactly see through them, but it was as if they weren't really there. I passed it off as travel fatigue.

We turned off the main street about halfway through the business district. A block west of Main Street, we came upon a gray granite building with Doric columns in front. The words 'City Hall' were carved into the granite above the columns. As small town city halls went, it was reasonably impressive, but except for the Oklahoma flag flying next to the US flag in the grassy area in front of the building, it could have been the city hall of almost any small town in America.

"Pull in that driveway," Officer Mercer told Randy. Randy followed the police cruiser into the driveway which bore a sign which said 'Police Business Only.' We parked next to the police car and got out of the Trans-Am.

The other officer was opening the back door of the cruiser, motioning for Steve and Carl to get out. I was relieved to see they were behaving themselves. With those two, you just never knew. They were, however, a little unsteady on their feet. The effects of the alcohol were still apparent, and I was certain that the other officer had smelled the liquor on their breath.

"I got a bad feeling about this," Randy muttered to me.

"Me too," I muttered back. "Let's just hope they agree to a fine and let us go."

"You don't think they'll put us in jail?" Randy asked, suddenly becoming even more worried.

"I don't know," I said truthfully. Then, I asked Randy, "Do you notice how much these two cops look alike?"

Randy scowled the little 'what are you talking about?' scowl I had seen from him ever since our freshman year. "Matt, have you been hitting the bottle with Steve and Carl?"

I looked at him seriously. "Of course not. Are you saying you don't think they look alike?"

“Well of course they don’t look alike.”

I didn’t get a chance to continue the conversation, because Officer Mercer was suddenly at my side.

“Okay, boys,” Officer Mercer said. “It’s time to go see the Judge.”

Although our discussion had been interrupted, I continued to think about what Randy had said as we were led down a short corridor to a room with a brass nameplate declaring it to be ‘Court Room A.’ How could Randy have missed the similarity between the two officers? He was usually much more observant than I was. Yet he saw nothing unusual about the two officers. I shuddered suddenly. I had a bad feeling about Ovid, Oklahoma. I only hoped we would be fined and quickly sent on our way. I didn’t want to be in Ovid after the sun went down. I had seen too many horror movies.

I had also seen The Dukes of Hazard, and I will admit that I expected something out of that for a courtroom (and Judge). I was wrong, though. The courtroom was well appointed, with fairly new walnut wainscoting and matching furniture. The Judge’s bench had a crest in gold in the center. I couldn’t quite make out the picture on it, but it appeared to be a bird of some sort. Whatever the bird was, it did not look familiar.

“All rise,” Officer Mercer intoned needlessly, as we were all standing at the defendant’s table already. The door to the Judge’s chambers opened and the Judge appeared.

The Judge was also different from what I had imagined. Instead of the tobacco-chewing good ol’ boy I had expected, he was middle aged—perhaps mid-fifties—with dark hair that was fading to give promise of future graying. He had a neatly trimmed beard which was still dark but flecked with gray giving him a distinguished look. He wore gold-rimmed glasses which somehow made him look more scholarly. His black robe was impeccably neat and pressed to the point that it looked as if you could cut yourself on one of the pleats.

My only surprise was that we were the only people in the courtroom. Granted, I only wanted to be a lawyer at this point, so I really didn’t know much about actual court procedure. Still, I thought it was customary to have a court stenographer there to transcribe the proceedings of the court. But, I thought, this was a small town, and they might be lax about such things. Then another thought crossed my mind. If there was no one in the courtroom to transcribe the proceedings, what was to stop Officer Mercer, who appeared to be acting as bailiff, and the Judge from fining Randy and pocketing the take? I knew there were such 'speed traps' scattered across the country.

"Is something wrong, son?" the Judge asked, and I suddenly realized he was asking the question of me.

"Huh?" I replied, embarrassed. "Oh, I was just wondering..."

"Where the court reporter was," he finished for me.

"Well, yes," I admitted. How had he known? It was if... as if he had read my mind.

Now, I grew up on old Twilight Zone reruns, and I could almost imagine Rod Serling standing in the corner of the courtroom ("Imagine, if you will, four college boys, on their way to the big game..."). It was one thing for a town to have two cops who looked enough alike to be twins, but add that to a town full of residents who appeared to be semi-transparent zombies and a Judge who finished sentences for you, I was ready to leave. I looked at Randy, Steve and Carl. They were all tense at the idea of being in court, but I could tell they had noticed nothing out of the ordinary.

"Well," the Judge began with a hint of a Southern drawl which I was later to realize was an Oklahoma twang, "we like to keep things informal down here. But I am planning to get a new court reporter in here real soon. In the meantime, we've just got to make do with what we've got. Do you understand?"

"Yes, Your Honor," I said respectfully. I supposed if things went badly, Randy could always get a lawyer and appeal any decision the Judge would make.

“Well, now,” the Judge said, looking down through gold rimmed glasses at the paperwork Officer Mercer had put in front of him, “it says here that you boys were speeding. Eighty-nine miles an hour in a fifty-five mile per hour zone. That sounds pretty fast to me.”

“Yes, sir,” Randy said respectfully.

“Lots of folks get killed doing that kind of speed around here,” the Judge said, his eyes burning into Randy. “You’re just lucky our police officers caught you before you got hurt. Or hurt somebody else.”

He stopped for a moment, looking at Steve and Carl. “You boys been drinking?”

Steve and Carl both turned pale and said nothing.

“You might as well admit it,” the Judge said at last. “I can smell it up here. Now how much have you boys had to drink?”

“Just a few,” Steve managed to say nervously.

“Yeah, just a few,” Carl echoed unconvincingly.

“Well,” the Judge said, casting a harsh gaze at both of them, “it smells like you’ve had more than a few. You boys are too old for that sort of behavior. How about you other two? Have you been drinking?”

“Not today, no sir,” I managed to say and saw Randy nod his head in agreement.

“Well, then you’re the smart ones,” he said. “I’ll keep that in mind. Now, though, it’s time for your sentence.”

Sentence? What was he talking about? There hadn’t even been a trial. I looked at my friends to gauge their reaction, but to my shock, they were calmly staring at the Judge as if nothing was wrong.

“Excuse me,” I ventured. “Your Honor, may I approach the bench?”

The Judge squinted at me. “You’re a little young to be a lawyer, son.”

“Yes, sir,” I replied in agreement. “But I plan to be one someday.”

“Well,” the Judge drawled thoughtfully, “given that you have an interest in the law, and given that we like to keep things informal here as I've mentioned, go ahead and approach the bench."

I looked at my friends. Their calm stares continued. I was on my own here. Slowly, I walked forward to face the Judge. "Your Honor," I began, "I don't know that much about the law, but shouldn't you ask how we plead and then hear evidence?"

The Judge stared at me as if sizing me up. "So you don't think this is proper courtroom procedure?"

"Uh, no, sir. I'm sorry, but I don't."

To my great surprise, he smiled. "It sounds as if I need someone like you around here to help me out. I wouldn't want to be guilty of improper courtroom procedure."

The irony was lost on me. "I just thought, Your Honor, that..."

His gavel came down suddenly causing me to jump. "That's enough, son. You were speeding and that's all there is to it. Now step back so I can pronounce sentence."

I obeyed at once. There was nothing further to be gained by arguing with him.

Suddenly, the Judge stood up. He raised his hands over his head like a television evangelist and closed his eyes. I was so surprised, I didn't know what to do. This didn't seem to be standard court procedure. I looked over at Officer Mercer. He was watching the proceedings as if nothing were wrong. Then I looked at Randy, Steve, and Carl. Each of them stood rigidly, their eyes staring blindly forward as if they were in a trance. What was going on here?

The Judge began speaking in a language I had never heard before. Then the courtroom actually darkened slightly, and I felt a soft breeze flow through the room. My body gave an involuntary shiver, as if I had experienced something frightening. I thought I could hear voices whispering to me on the breeze. Then, as quickly as it had begun, the breeze stopped and the lights returned to normal. There was a sudden crack of wood striking wood, and I realized at once that the Judge had resumed his seat and rapped his gavel. "Court is adjourned!" I heard him say.

“What?” I asked as the Judge rose and left the courtroom. As I looked around, everything seemed to have returned to normal.

Randy was all smiles. “Hey, man, do you believe it?”

“Believe what?” I asked.

“Matt, weren’t you paying any attention?” Randy asked. “He let us go with a warning.”

I looked in Randy’s innocent eyes with astonishment. He wasn’t pulling my leg. He really didn’t remember a thing that had happened in the courtroom. “Explain that to me,” I said, attempting to clarify what he believed.

“Bullshit!” Steve interjected suddenly, his old exuberance returning.

“We can talk about it later. I’m hungry.”

“Yeah,” Carl chimed in. “Let’s get outta this place. It gives me the creeps.”

It gave me the creeps, too, but I suspected for a different reason. Carl was creeped out by the fact that our little weekend party was almost ruined by a small town cop and Judge. I was creeped out because there was something weird going on and I seemed to be the only one to notice.

“The guys are right,” Randy told me. “Let’s get out of here. We’ll find someplace on the edge of town to grab a burger and then drive late tonight. We can be in Austin by afternoon if we get going now.”

I was outvoted, I realized. But maybe they were right, I thought. I had just watched a Judge do his Druid act, but no one else seemed to notice. Why not just ignore it and head out of town as quickly as possible. I certainly didn’t want to spend one more minute in Ovid.

Officer Mercer even seemed to agree. “Come on, boys,” he said to us. “I’ll walk you back to your car. You can be on the road in no time.”

We walked back to the parking lot as I silently tried to convince myself that nothing was really out of sorts. Just when I was starting to think that I was just imagining things, I got my next shock. Randy's car was missing! I turned to enlist Officer Mercer's help when Randy called, "Are you coming or not, Matt?"

I looked around at Randy and the other guys. They were piling into a car, but it wasn't Randy's red Trans-Am. Instead, it was a fairly new dark green Taurus station wagon. Now, I had known Randy for a long time, and I knew he would never have a Taurus wagon. He'd die first.

"Are you okay?" Randy called.

"Not really," I muttered, but only Officer Mercer could hear me.

"Don't worry," he told me. "It's not as bad as you think."

"What?" I asked, as puzzled as ever.

Ignoring my question, he opened the front passenger door of the wagon for me and gently herded me in. "You drive carefully now. I'll see you later."

Later? I didn't plan to see him ever again, but once more, I was the only one to notice. I decided it wasn't worth discussing.

"You kids buckle up now, okay?" This was from Randy. What was he talking about? But I heard the distinct click of seat belts in the back seat. It wasn't like Carl and Steve to take the admonition without comment. But rather than their usual crude comments, all I heard from the back seat was soft, childish giggling.

"Randy, what the hell is going on?" I asked as he started the engine and pulled out of the municipal parking lot.

"What do you mean... Matt?" he said, almost as if he was having trouble remembering my name. There was a distant look on his face.

"I mean where is your Trans-Am? And do you mean to tell me you didn't see the Judge's little high priest imitation?"

"I don't know what you're talking about," Randy said, shaking his head. As his head turned slightly toward me, I saw his upper lip had the beginnings of a moustache. Randy had never had a moustache before. In fact, he had never liked them, even convincing me to shave off the one I had grown during our junior year.

"I'm hungry!" Steve yelled again, but there was something not quite right about the way he said it. He sounded almost petulant.

"Me, too!" Carl yelled, equally petulant.

"Okay now," Randy said in a soothing voice. "Don't worry. Rusty's Burger Barn is just up the road. We all like Rusty's, don't we?"

"You bet!" came two voices from the back seat.

I started to ask Randy how he knew there was a place called Rusty's Burger Barn and how he knew its location, but I was sure I wouldn't get a meaningful response. I was starting to think I was the only person in the car who hadn't lost his wits. It was as if they had all been in a trance since we left the courtroom.

Suddenly, I hear more giggling in the back seat. There was something wrong back there. I turned around sharply and got yet another shock. Carl and Steve were both smaller, younger looking. They each appeared to be about fifteen or so, and their jeans had been replaced by blue shorts. In addition, Carl's face actually looked somehow softer than it had before. Both of them had childish grins on their faces, and neither of them acted as if there was anything even remotely wrong. What the hell was happening to them?

Then, with a sudden chill, I realized if something was happening to them, it was probably happening to me as well. With trepidation, I pulled down the visor. The vanity mirror was lighted, so I could see myself clearly. Whereas Steve and Carl looked younger, I looked somehow more mature, and my brown hair was now a dark blonde and growing longer as I watched it.

"Jerry, stop the car!" I exclaimed. Jerry? Who the hell was Jerry? But Randy did stop the car.

"What's wrong, hon?" he asked.

Oh my God, I thought. Somehow, I knew what was happening to us. Not the specifics, but I knew we were changing, and if I had to guess, we were changing from four college students into the stereotypical American family. That meant Randy was dad, Steve and Carl were the kids, and I was...

"We've got to go back to the city hall. I have to see the Judge," I told him in a voice that suddenly didn't seem quite right. It was as if my voice had been shifted half an octave higher.

"What did you forget?" Randy asked with irritation in his voice.

"Just turn around!" I pleaded. Yes, my voice definitely didn't sound right. It was pitching itself higher and higher. It was a full octave higher now and there was a soft Oklahoma twang in it. I could feel an odd tingling sensation spreading throughout my body.

"Okay," Randy said, "but I don't know why you can't wait 'til tomorrow." There was a soft twang in his voice, too.

As we drove back to the municipal complex, I began to fear that we wouldn't be in time. I watched in silent horror as my body seemed to ripple under my clothes. I fought back with all my conscious will, but I knew instinctively that I wouldn't be able to hold off the changes forever.

It took only a few minutes to return to the municipal complex, but I saw with concern that there were no lights in the area that housed the courtrooms. The only lights were from the police offices in another wing. I thought about demanding to see the police, but something told me that wouldn't do any good. Only the Judge had the power to stop what I feared was happening, and he was nowhere to be seen. Still, in desperation, I sprinted from the car and rattled to door to the court wing, but to no avail.

Randy joined me on the steps, and to my horror, put an arm around me. "Don't worry, sugar," he said. "Whatever you forgot, you can get when you go to work tomorrow."

I actually jumped a little when Randy put his arm around me. I knew what was happening to me. My hair was longer, touching my shoulders now, and my voice was higher, and I noticed I was perhaps four inches shorter than Randy. He and I had been the same height before the changes started. And other things about my body would be changing shortly, I knew. I don't know what bothered me more, the fact that my best friend had put an arm around me as if I were a girl who needed to be comforted, or the fact that it actually felt pretty good. I was becoming very confused.

I actually began to cry softly to myself. I don't even think Randy noticed. Even if he had, he wouldn't have understood what I was crying about. Everything seemed normal to him. Steve and Carl didn't see anything unusual either. They sat quietly in the back seat of the Taurus wagon like the good little children I knew they were becoming. Each looked to be about eleven or twelve now, and Carl was starting to look quite feminine with a softer face and dark blonde hair perhaps five inches long. Their clothing had changed almost completely to reflect their new status as children. In addition to their blue shorts, each wore brown sandals and matching Six Flags Over Texas T-shirts.

I had let Randy lead me back to the car, knowing that in his mind, he was leading his wife back to her seat at his side. That's what I was becoming, I realized. I could already feel indications of what was about to happen. I could feel my hair getting longer. I had never liked long hair, so its feel was unusual to me. Also, I was starting to feel my skin moving around, particularly around my nipples and my groin. There was nothing definite happening yet, but I was bracing myself for the changes I knew were about to occur.

As I stepped back into the car, I unconsciously slid in as demurely as any girl I had ever seen. It seemed even I was to be affected somewhat mentally by the spell as well. But it wasn't just mental, I knew. I had worn jeans that day, in spite of the surprising heat of the day. But now, I was wearing denim shorts that were much shorter than any I would have normally worn. Also, I was wearing sandals, I could see, with a small heel on them unlike anything a man would wear.

As we drove away from the municipal building, I heard soft giggling in the back seat, rising in octave each block we travelled. I looked at Randy. He had changed the least of any of us, I knew. He was a little taller and a little broader through the shoulders, as if he had once played football. He was handsome (where had that thought come from?) and appeared to be about twenty-five. The moustache he had suddenly grown had filled out, and I couldn't help but think it looked a little... sexy? No! Yes. No.

I looked down at myself. My bare legs were now hairless, and my feet had been reduced in size. To add to my humiliation, I could see through the straps of the sandals that my toenails were now a frosted pink. I looked in fear at my fingernails, suspecting what I would find. And yes, they were the same frosted pink color now, and filed to a feminine point nearly half an inch beyond the tips of my now-slender fingers.

These changes were nothing, though, compared to the changes which were occurring over the rest of my body. I felt an odd twitching in my crotch and abdomen. It was as if my internal organs were being rearranged. I had little doubt that ovaries and a womb would be there in no time. As if to confirm that thought, I felt my testicles shrink and retract into my body. I gave a small gasp as I felt a sudden void between my legs as my penis shrank to nearly nothing. . I knew I now had a feminine slit between my legs. The slit actually moistened slightly at the thought.

On my chest, breasts were beginning to develop and began poking up into the soft white cotton top which clung to me like a second skin. My hair was continuing to get longer, and I could feel its weight on my head. There was a sudden pinprick at the lobe of each ear, and then I felt the small weight of earrings. I reached up to touch one, realizing as I touched it with my long frosted pink fingernail that it was a loop about an inch in diameter.

"Cindy, you got any money in your purse?"

So that was to be my name. It wasn't a bad name, I supposed. I looked down near my feet and saw a purse. There was nothing I could do but play the role, at least until I saw the Judge again. If I suddenly started claiming I was a guy, I would find myself on a one-way trip to Ovid's version of the funny farm. I looked in the purse and pulled out a wallet. There were two twenties in it. "It looks like forty dollars," I said in a voice that was now firmly alto.

"That should be enough," Randy said. "I don't want to put it on a credit card."

I felt something trying to get into my mind. It was as if there were a thousand voices whispering at me. Instinctively (woman's intuition?), I knew the voices were trying to change my mind as they had changed my body. They would make me believe that I was Cindy, just as they had made Randy, Steve, and Carl believe they were not themselves. I tried to shut the voices out, and for the most part, I knew I had succeeded. I was still Matt O'Hara, regardless of what my body looked like.

I finally dared to look in the back seat, feeling the sweep of long hair as I turned. There, where Carl and Steve had been minutes before, were two young children, each about six years old. They appeared to be twins with dark blonde hair similar to my own, each dressed in white T-shirts, dark blue shorts, and sandals. But I knew they were fraternal twins, not identical, since Steve was now a young boy and Carl was obviously a young girl.

"Are we almost there, Mommy?" the girl Carl now was asked in a sweet, innocent voice.

What could I do but answer... her? "Almost, sweetheart."

I don't know where the 'sweetheart' came from. Apparently, I wasn't completely successful in keeping out the information the small voices had tried to whisper to me. I felt an odd link to the children, which I recognized as what is commonly called 'maternal instinct.' I didn't even know their names, but I knew they were mine.

"Mike, are you gonna get a Rusty Burger?" Randy asked, settling into his new role as the children's father. Randy, now Jerry, I realized, was dressed like us, in shorts, T-shirt, and sandals. He was a good-looking guy, I realized, unable to shut the thought out of my mind. I felt as if I were suddenly gay even though I realized that the new plumbing between my legs made my thought about Jerry's looks completely heterosexual.

“You bet, Dad,” Steve, now Mike, replied.

“Me, too,” the little girl said.

“I don’t know, Michelle,” Randy said slowly. “You don’t seem to be able to eat as much as Mike. That’s how your mom and I will be able to tell you apart when you’re older. Mike will be the fat one and you’ll be the skinny one.”

Carl, now Michelle, giggled so girlishly that I nearly shuddered.

I almost envied the three of them. They thought they had always been the people they were now. Only I seemed to remember who I really was. But I knew that wouldn’t do me any good. Until I could find the Judge, I would have to be Cindy Whoever, wife and mother, or I would probably find myself on the receiving end of whatever passed for psychiatric care in Ovid, Oklahoma.

We pulled up at a brightly-lit building with a large smiling neon bull under which in neon was written ‘Rusty’s Best Burgers.’ I got out of the car, trying to play my role, but feeling like a man in unwilling drag. As I shut the door, Randy called, “Honey, you forgot your purse.”

Well, that was my first mistake. I wasn’t used to carrying a purse. I wondered for a few seconds why women didn’t carry wallets like men, but the feeling of denim tight against my now-prominent ass told me why. I grabbed the purse and slung the strap over one of my newly-narrowed shoulders, embarrassed at the feminine look it must have given me.

The children Steve and Carl had become piled out of the back seat as if there was nothing out of the ordinary. “Mom?” the girl who had been Carl asked, sending a weird chill up my spine with the realization that in this warped reality, I was her mother. “Can I have a sundae?”

“We’ll see,” I said in the best motherly tone I could muster. I have to play the role, I told myself.

As we walked into the restaurant, I felt for the first time the sway of large breasts and ample hips. It was the strangest, most alien feeling I had ever experienced. I could feel Randy, or rather the man he had become, taking my body in with his eyes. I imagined I was quite a sexy sight, with my long bare legs and short denim shorts. I halfway expected him to ravish me in the parking lot, but he stopped short by slipping his arm around my newly narrow waist while the children skipped ahead of us, oblivious to both what had happened to them and the attentions their 'father' was giving their 'mother.'

Once inside the restaurant, I felt a new surge of embarrassment as every male eye in the place turned to look at me. Again, I felt as if I were in drag. But I knew there was nothing unfeminine about me. I hadn't seen my face yet, but I could taste the lipstick which had suddenly appeared there, and I was sure my face matched the rest of my body. Every man in the place saw an attractive young woman.

I quickly rushed the kids to a booth, taking Michelle on my side while Mike and Jerry sat across from us. I nearly shuddered upon realizing how glibly their new names had come to me.

"Hi, Jerry, Cindy," a perky young waitress greeted us. She was perhaps eighteen, brunette, and quite attractive. Again, I realized I could almost see through her.

"Hi, Maxine," Randy, or rather, Jerry said nonchalantly. I just smiled and hoped it looked friendly. "I think it's gonna be Rusty Burgers all around, except Michelle will have a Rusty Junior."

"Aw, dad!" My new daughter whined.

"Don't worry," I said in my best soothing mother's voice, "you can have some of mine if you're still hungry." God knew I wasn't going to be very hungry. The thought of what I had become was enough to ruin my appetite.

"Cheese?"

"Sure. On all of them," Jerry said without asking. I was a little incensed. I was used to ordering my own food.

"How about drinks?"

"Choc malt," both kids said at once.

“I’ll take a vanilla malt,” Jerry said. Then, to me. “Your usual, hon?”

“Sure,” I said noncommittally. Whatever my usual was, I supposed this body would like it.

“A Diet Coke for Cindy,” he said.

Diet Coke?

If I was going to drink Coke, I never drank Diet Coke. Still, I reasoned, this female body had borne two children. It wouldn’t be a good idea to let it get fat. If, perish the thought, I was stuck in it for the rest of my life, I certainly didn’t want to be a fat chick. While I could see that my body was well proportioned, I wasn’t exactly model slim even at that.

“I’ve got to go to the restroom,” I announced at once. I didn’t really need to, but I wanted to get a better view of what I had become. Also, I didn’t want to have to keep up my end of the conversation with my ‘family.’ They seemed to be comfortable with their new situation, but I was not.

“Me, too, mom!” my ‘daughter’ declared. It seemed as if going to the restroom in packs was normal, even for girls as young as—what—six?

“Okay,” I sighed, resigned to having to play the new role even in the restroom. Together, we marched off to the restroom.

“Where are you going, mom?”

Thank god she had gone with me. I nearly blundered into the men’s room. “Sorry, honey. I just made a wrong turn.”

“Are you okay, mom?”

Was I okay? I couldn’t say for sure. “Yeah, I’m fine,” I lied.

My first impression of the women’s restroom was how much cleaner it was than the typical men’s room. Well, I didn’t object. If I had to use one, I wanted everything to be clean since I could no longer stand to do my business. As long as I remained a woman, I wanted to be able to sit down on a clean toilet seat. I realized with a pang of sadness that I was going to miss the ability to piss standing up. You never realize how much the little things mean until something comes along to take them away.

Michelle marched nonchalantly into one of the stalls, and I could see her shorts fall around her ankles as she sat down, her short legs causing her feet to rise up off the floor. I was beginning to think of her as being Michelle now. It was not part of the spell, I realized. It was simply too difficult to think of that darling little girl having ever been a male twenty-one year old.

Darling? I thought. I had never used that word in that context in my entire life. I supposed I would now start saying things like “Isn’t that precious?” and “He’s so sweet.” How could I survive this experience without dying of embarrassment?

While Michelle was in the stall, I used the time to quickly examine myself in the mirror. I was, I guessed, about five-four or five-five. My hair was a fairly dark blonde, slightly curled, falling naturally over my narrowed shoulders. My face was cute, for lack of a better word. I wouldn’t win the Miss America Pageant with it, but it was certainly attractive. It looked a little like Meg Ryan’s face, I thought, but perhaps I was just being generous with myself.

My new breasts seemed enormous to me. I couldn’t tell for sure, but I guessed them to be about a 36C. Later, when I confirmed this size by examining the label in the bra, I took no joy in being right. My hips were wide, about a 38, I thought (again, I later was proven correct). My waist was a little disappointing. It wasn’t as narrow as I thought it should be. While it wasn’t bad, it had probably spread a little with the birth of twins. Don’t get me wrong—I was an attractive woman, but I was the type of woman who would have to watch her weight if she was going to stay attractive. I resolved next time to order a salad instead of a Rusty Burger.

All in all, I was attractive. I wasn’t model or TV star attractive, but I would probably turn a few male heads in a shopping center parking lot, particularly if I were wearing the tight T-shirt and shorts combination I now had on. If I were still my male self, I would be interested in this woman.

Damn it, I suddenly thought. I should have brought the purse into the women's room. Then I could have found out who I was besides just Cindy. If I stayed in this body long, I would have to develop the habit of carrying it with me. Men had it easier. All I had to do as a man was stuff a wallet in my rear pocket. But I realized sadly once more that my new ass was far too large to allow me to stick a wallet in the tiny pocket which rested there.

"Ready, mom?" Michelle asked. I hadn't noticed she had finished.

"I guess so," I sighed. I was as ready as I could be.

The meal was relatively uneventful. It reminded me of many a meal I had enjoyed with my family when I was younger. Mike and Michelle were fairly well behaved and offered up only an occasional barbed comment to his or her sibling. Ironically, as Mike and Michelle, they seemed better behaved than they had as Steve and Carl. At least some good had come from the transformation.

Jerry, as Randy had now become, was not too unlike Randy. He was a little on the quiet side but polite and calm. I found myself comfortable around his new persona, at least as long as he didn't call me 'honey' or 'sweetheart.'

The Rusty Burger was actually pretty good, but I found I wasn't able to eat the entire thing. Part of the reason for my lack of appetite was, I was my newly diminished size, but a larger part, I realized, was my desire to not become Cindy the Human Blimp. I left nearly half of my sandwich and all of my fries.

After we had finished, the kids and Jerry ordered ice cream cones, but I demurred. As much as I liked ice cream, I knew I couldn't afford the calories. I began to suspect that my shorts were a little tight not just to be sexy but because I needed to lose a pound or two as well.

Everyone seemed to be having a good time except me. I thought I saw an occasional look of panic on Mike's face a time or two, but it quickly faded away into the face of the happy six year old boy he had become. Michelle daintily licked at her cone as if she had been a girl all her life. As Carl, I had seen him—her—eat like a pig, stuffing half an ice cream cone down at one gulp. Now, as a young girl, she was as careful about how she ate as a devotee of Emily Post. Jerry, my new 'husband' ate in manly silence, watching his little family enjoy their treats much as a proud wolf watching his pack.

I tried to look happy as well. It would have served no purpose for me to act out of character. If I were suddenly to yell, "What is wrong with all of you? Can't you see we're not ourselves? I'm supposed to be a man!" I would be locked up within the hour. I had to play my role as best I could until I could see the Judge in the morning.

When my 'family' had finished eating the ice cream cones, we went back to the car. The other three were laughing and talking. For them, it was a perfect ending to another day. I smiled and played my part as best I could, but I felt as if I were miscast in some bizarre play as I walked back to the car. At least it was a relief not to be in public anymore. Every male over the age of puberty who walked into Rusty's as we ate took a moment to look at my breasts. I felt as if I had been put on display.

The ride 'home' was uneventful. We had turned away from the brightly-lit business streets of the town and down a quiet residential street, flanked by large oak trees and stately houses. Soon, though, we were past the big houses to an area where the trees were smaller and the houses were newer but more modest. We seemed to be in Ovid's smaller version of a subdivision, the happy home for middle class Americans everywhere.

We pulled into the driveway of an attractive two-story house with a well-manicured lawn. The garage door rose automatically and we pulled into a two-stall garage. A dark blue Ford Ranger truck was parked on the other side of the garage. Great, I thought. My choices for driving would be a soccer-mom station wagon or a redneck pickup. How small town could we be?

The kids bolted for what looked like the den, and it wasn't long before I heard the sounds of a television spewing the cheap music and bad acting of some cartoon show. It was probably the Cartoon Network, I thought. Well, at least we had cable. Great, I could watch Lifetime, the women's channel.

"Hey, kids," Jerry (for I was now thinking of him as 'Jerry') called, "you guys get ready for bed. Tomorrow's a school day."

"Aw!" two voices chorused.

"Now!" he said sternly.

"Okay," came the chorused reply.

He turned to me. "What's wrong, hon?"

I suddenly realized I was just standing there by the entrance to the garage. This was supposed to be my house. I was Cindy Whatever and this was my home and this was my family. My problem was that none of it was real, or at least none of it felt real. I just didn't know what to do.

"Cindy?"

"I'm okay, Jerry," I managed to say.

"You don't look okay. Your parents are fine. That was the reason we went out to their farm today, wasn't it?"

Was it? That explained why the family was on an outing on a school/work day. In this reality, my parents apparently lived on a farm and I must have been worried about them, so we had taken the day to go see them. Or at least, we had taken the afternoon. I tried to visualize my parents, but all I could see were the parents Matt O'Hara had left behind in Pennsylvania at the beginning of the school term.

"Yes," I said mechanically. "They're fine."

Jerry looked a little uncertain, but he let it drop.

Fortunately, the 'kids' knew the routine for getting ready for bed and did so with a minimum of fuss. I was duly thankful of this, for I had no idea what I would need to do to get them ready. By eight thirty, they were in their pajamas and off to bed in their separate rooms. It was with a sigh of relief that I turned off the lights in their rooms.

Jerry was waiting for me in the den. We hadn't spoken since I had gotten the kids ready for bed. I saw with trepidation that his look of concern was back.

“Feeling better?” he asked.

“I feel fine,” I lied. I just wanted to get off to bed and forget this whole experience. With any luck at all, I would wake up in the morning to find this had all been a long nightmare, the result of a hard night of drinking in Kansas City. It would be Thursday morning again, and I would navigate Randy around the entire state of Oklahoma. I wanted to be as far away from Ovid as possible.

Jerry rose from his chair and, to my alarm, slipped his arms around my waist, pressing me to his chest. I felt the not exactly unpleasant sensation of having my new boobs pressed against his chest. Then I felt with alarm something growing in his groin, pressing against my abdomen. Good god, he was getting a hard-on over me!

“You need to relax,” he said, his voice soothing.

Oh, I did need to relax, I thought, but not the way he had in mind. I had been on the other side of this scene enough times to know where this was leading. No amount of soothing talk was going to get me on my back with my legs spread wide.

But my new body had other ideas. Those nipples flattened against his chest were trying to get hard, and there was a feeling of pain mixed with pleasure coursing through them. Down south, I could feel my new vagina starting to moisten, and there was a tingling sensation in about the spot I suspected my clitoris lay.

“Jerry,” I began, surprised at how throaty my voice had suddenly become, “I don’t think this is a good idea.”

“It isn’t,” he agreed, bending to kiss me on the neck. “It’s a great idea.”

I could feel my heart beating faster. In my mind, I was a normal, heterosexual male with all the normal drives. I still found women attractive, at least on an intellectual level. The last thing in the world my male mind wanted was to have a man kissing my body. But my male mind was now attached to a very female body, and as repugnant as the thought of making love was to Matt, Cindy was beginning to respond.

Involuntarily, my own hands came up to grip Jerry's ass. It was rock hard, unlike the soft female asses I was used to holding. And instead of my large male hands, I was gripping Jerry's ass with small, delicate hands crowned with long, feminine nails. As if to contrast the feeling I was experiencing, I felt Jerry's large, strong hands grip my own fleshy ass, and I felt a little shudder of pleasure.

There was still time for my male mind to assert itself, I realized. All I had to do was say 'no.' Just say no, I thought. Just say it...

But before I could say it, my lips were covered by his. I felt his tongue pressing past my lips and into my own mouth. The time to say no had passed. I had begun to feel dizzy as my breathing became more rapid. No matter what my mind wanted, my body wanted something different.

With almost no effort, I was able to shift my mind into neutral. I felt everything normally, and even reacted as a normal woman would react, but I no longer reasoned in the usual sense of the word. Cindy was now in full control, only I was Cindy.

Still holding on to each other, we strolled into our darkened bedroom. Then, with a hunger too intense to describe, we pulled at each other's clothing until we were sprawled out nude across the bed.

My body was on fire, anxious for the touch of my man. Our hands moved over each other's body's in a random frenzy. Then, suddenly, Jerry's hand rested between my legs, and for the first time in my life, I learned what it really meant to have a clitoris. I returned the favor, grasping his penis without thinking.

In moments, he was inside me, sending tiny surges of pleasure through my entire groin. My male mind tried to resurface and stop the action, but my female body held any rational thoughts back. Then, without warning, there was a surge of intense pleasure which seemed to wash through my entire body. This was followed by a sudden moan from Jerry, and I felt something warm and wet coursing into my body...

I awakened about half an hour later, disoriented and shocked to find my body both naked and female, held in place by a large, hairy arm. Then, it all flooded back into my mind. I was someone named Cindy, mother of two, wife of Jerry and... And that was about all I knew. Wasn't I something? I didn't even know who I was, and yet I had just slept with a man. Slept? We did a lot more than sleep, I realized.

I carefully moved Jerry's arm away without waking him, got up, and went to the bathroom. Turning on the light, I saw I was no worse for the wear of the evening. My hair was a mess and my crotch looked a little sticky, but other than that, I was about normal, if being a woman after twenty-one years of being male could be considered normal.

I washed myself off, paying special attention to the sticky substance. My god, I realized, I had just had sex with a man. I could get pregnant. Apparently this Cindy had done so twice before. What could I do?

Then, I spied a little silver container, circular in shape. I had seen this type of container before. Sure enough, I thought as I opened the case. It contained birth control pills in little slots labelled with the days of the week. It was Thursday, so I looked at the slot for that day. There was no pill in the slot, I realized with relief.

When I got back into the bedroom, I saw Jerry had gotten up, put on some pajamas and gone back to bed without cleaning up. Just like a man, I found myself thinking. What an odd thought, I mused. After all, I was a man, or at least I had been. Yet I knew what to do as a woman after sex, almost as if everything I needed to know was buried somewhere in my mind. As if to prove this point, I realized I had absently gone over to 'my' dresser, pulled out a short nightie, and slipped it over my head without giving it a second thought. It was like an autonomic response, like breathing in and out.

I slipped gracefully into bed. Thank god it was a king size. The way Jerry was sprawled out, my small body wouldn't have had a chance in a standard bed.

I lay there thinking about what had happened the last few hours. The day had started normally enough, but from the moment we had approached Ovid, my life had changed radically. Ovid. Where had I heard that name before? He was an ancient poet, I realized, either Greek or Roman, I couldn't recall which. I remembered a history teacher way back in high school talking about him. Yes, he was Roman, and he had written... the Odyssey? No, that was Homer. Let me see... right, love poems and something else. What was it?

Then I remembered. It was called Metamorphosis, or something like that, and it dealt with stories of transformation from Greek and Roman myths. Had there been a sex change in it? I didn't really know. My reading tastes revolved around the techno-thrillers such as Tom Clancy. I resolved to read it sometime since I now could be an entire chapter in the book. Apparently someone in this little spot of Oklahoma (or was it the Twilight Zone?) had a sense of humor.

Okay, so what was to be done? I thought before sleep claimed me. I needed to get back first thing Friday and see the Judge. He was obviously the key to all of this. I would try to get him to change me back into my normal male self and my friends back as well. At least, the rest of my 'family' thought everything was normal. They weren't going through what I was experiencing. But I began to realize the longer I was Cindy, the more I would begin to think like and become her. Already I had given in to the sexual needs of this female body, something that I would have never imagined only a few hours before. As sick as that made me feel in retrospect, it had seemed normal at the time. It was as if I were an airplane on autopilot. If I just let myself go, I could act like a normal woman. How long would it be before being female and a wife and mother felt absolutely normal even off autopilot? I had to act quickly, I thought, as I drifted off to sleep.

I awakened the next morning to the sound of water running in the shower. For a moment, I forgot what had happened to me and thought I was back at Notre Dame, getting ready for another day of classes. Then I realized not only did I not have my frequent morning hard-on, but that there was nothing between my legs, and the weight on my chest and hips reminded me that I wasn't my usual self. I absently brushed a lock of hair out of my eyes and sat up, feeling the weight of my breasts shift. I bit my lip softly, tasting the lipstick which was there. It seemed as if every sensation was designed to remind me of my new identity.

I got up, feeling the odd sensation of my nightie on my thighs and headed for the toilet to relieve a most insistent urge to void. Sitting on the stool, I once again regretted the loss of being able to pee standing up. This was most inconvenient. On autopilot once more, I wiped myself and flushed.

I padded back into the bedroom where Jerry had just finished his shower. He was standing in front of me in the buff, and I was embarrassed to realize that I was admiring his body. He smiled and grabbed me by the waist, planting a big kiss on my lips.

"Too bad we've both got to go to work," he said.

Work? I worked? Where? Thank god we both worked though, I thought. Otherwise, it would be back to bed for more bang bang.

"I got the kids up already," he told me. "I'll get them fed while you shower. Then I'll take them to school but you'll have to pick them up from day care."

"Sure," I muttered, not having the foggiest idea where Jerry or I worked or where the kids went to school or day care. How was I going to fake my way through an entire day? I still hadn't looked in my wallet to see what my last name was.

He gave me another kiss. "You'd better get your shower or you'll be late," he admonished me.

"Okay," I agreed.

Where to start? I had no idea what to wear, or for that matter, even where my clothes were. The only women I ever lived around were my mother and younger sister, but I never paid a lot of attention to what they did since I was a kid and that was 'girl stuff.' Perhaps if I had been married I might have a clue, but I was at a total loss.

I knew enough to recognize which dresser was mine from the array of cosmetics arranged on its top. Then I remembered that I had managed to find a nightie there the night before without knowing where to look. That had been in the dark, too. I tried to reach the same mental state I had been in then (minus the sex, of course). On autopilot again to my relief, I went directly to the right drawer and pulled out a tan bra and matching panties. Okay, I was on a roll...

Jerry was downstairs fixing cereal for the kids, so I didn't have to worry about stripping in front of him for my shower. I imagined that seeing me in the nude might lead to complications.

I had been tired and confused the previous night, and we had made love in the dark, so this was my first time to really examine my new body closely. It was certainly an attractive body with large but firm breasts with alert pink nipples and areolae. My hips were, I thought, a little wider than I would have liked, and my waist was showing signs of being not as narrow as I would have hoped. Probably the result of birthing twins, I thought. My legs were terrific, though, long and well shaped with well-defined ankles. I would look great in heels, I realized with some discomfort.

Before stepping into the shower, I took a moment to examine my face again since I hadn't had much time to look at it at Rusty's. It was a pretty face, but again, not beautiful. I could have been a cheerleader in school, but I would have fallen way short of being a movie star. Or maybe I could be in movies, I thought mischievously. I could dye my hair light blonde, wear a push up bra, and be lounging by the pool in some insipid B-movie. The thought was enough to almost make me laugh or cry, but I wasn't sure which.

My shower was sensuous without being provocative. I resisted with ease the temptation to rub myself all over like they do in the late night movies on cable. Maybe later, I thought. I had too many other things to worry about this morning. Finding the Judge was the most important order of the day.

But what was I going to say to him, I thought as I absently soaped my new body. Anyone who had the power of transformation was not someone to cross. What could I say? Change me back or I'll... Or I'll what? Stomp my foot? Cry? No, I would have to appeal to his better nature, assuming he had one.

Perhaps the first question I should ask was why? Oh, sure, I had seen movies where the hero's sex was changed, but that was usually as a punishment for mistreating women. Had I done that? Not that I could remember. I was just your normal every day college guy, looking for your normal every day college co-ed. I had managed to get laid once in a while, but I never forced myself on anyone. So why me? If I had to be changed, why was I the mommy instead of the daddy?

Deep in thought, my autopilot had taken over again, and I found myself standing outside the shower, dry, with my bra and panties on while I rolled on deodorant. Well, at least the autopilot seemed to work well enough for me that I would look normal. I shuddered at the thought of putting on makeup all by myself.

Next, I had to decide on an outfit to wear. Where did I work and what sort of job did I do? Did I work someplace where casual attire was the order of the day, or did I have to get dressed in a skirt and heels? I decided on the latter since it would be more explainable to be overdressed than underdressed. Besides, a little voice inside me told me it was the natural thing to do. Between the autopilot and the little voice, I might just make it through this yet, I thought.

I selected a conservative white blouse, silky but not overtly frilly and feminine and a navy skirt and matching jacket. I needed heels, so I selected a pair of black ones with about an inch heel. No sense in getting on three-inch heels and falling over. Given the weight on my chest, that was a real possibility. Pantyhose proved no problem, as Cindy had a drawer full of them, mostly the same neutral taupe color.

I didn't even need any help to finish getting dressed. I had seen enough women put on pantyhose to know how to do it properly. Still, I began to realize why women shave their legs. Other than the obvious reason of appearance, even the slightest stubble would probably be enough to run the hose. Now I understood why you see so many pantyhose ads on TV. These wouldn't last more than a few wearings. I had to admit, though, that they looked good on me. They were a perfect fit.

The blouse was a little difficult, since it buttoned up the back. Still, my arms proved to be quite limber, so I was able to get it buttoned without too much trouble. The skirt was even easier than pants. All you had to do was step into it. It seemed terribly short, but at three inches above the knee, it was stylish. Still, I felt terribly overexposed. However when in Rome (or Ovid as the case might be)... The jacket was tailored differently than a man's jacket, but it served the same function, so it proved no trouble at all.

Next came the makeup. I sighed in resignation and let the autopilot engage again. There was no sense in attempting this exercise without help, unless I wanted to try out for the circus. I watched with amazement as my hands deftly applied eye shadow, eye liner and mascara. I was astounded at the change it gave my eyes. They seemed bigger and deeper. They made me look more sophisticated.

Less time was spent applying a little blush and lipstick, but the finished product was a work of art. I looked good enough to eat. But I began to notice there was something missing... In a few moments, I realized I wasn't wearing any jewelry. No woman was fully dressed without the right accessories. I expertly picked out a conservative gold necklace, a gold bracelet, and two small gold hoops for my ears. Attaching them, I took another look at myself and decided I was ready to face the day.

"Bye, Mommy!" two young voices chorused, and my reverie was interrupted by two small children attached to my hips.

"Bye, kids," I managed to say, playing my role well, I thought.

"Later, hon," Jerry said, his arm around me as he planted a small kiss on my cheek. I guess he knew better than to screw up my makeup. "I'll see you at five."

Suddenly, I was alone. I began to realize how normal this entire morning had felt. I wondered suddenly if we were all just playing our roles. Perhaps Jerry knew he was really Randy, and Mike and Michelle knew they were really Steve and Carl. Maybe they were just as frightened as I was and playing their parts until something could be done. I doubted it, though. They seemed too comfortable with the parts they were playing.

I went downstairs and made some toast (no butter—must lose weight) and poured a glass of juice. It was about seven thirty. The offices at city hall should be open at eight, I thought. That meant I would probably be late for work, wherever work was. Maybe my wallet would answer the question.

I broke it open and looked at my ID's. My full name was Cindy Mae Patton. Not a bad name, I thought. It could have been something long and hard to pronounce. Patton would do for now. I was twenty-five years old. Given the age of the twins, I must have had them right after high school. I wondered if I had had to get married. My height was listed as five four, so I had guessed almost right, and my weight was... well, let's just say that I vowed to lose five pounds in a hurry and ten pounds over time if I remained as Cindy.

There was nothing in the wallet to tell me where I worked. There were no company badges or insurance cards or business cards. After I finished at the city hall, I would have to go back on autopilot and drive myself to work.

I looked at the clock on the kitchen wall. It was a quarter until eight, so I figured I would be able to be in the Judge's office by eight. Ovid was a small enough town that I was sure I'd have no trouble the city hall again. All I had to do was backtrack until I reached the business district. It would be easy from there.

In the morning sun, Ovid appeared to be the pleasant small town of my youth. It was clean and bright, and showed the signs of small town prosperity. The only thing wrong with it was the people. Most of them still appeared almost transparent. I could see them, but I could also see right through them. But their actions appeared normal as they went about their business.

As expected, I had no trouble finding city hall. A police car was just pulling out, and the driver looked like Officer Mercer. I parked the

Taurus in the adjoining lot and walked nervously into city hall. I expected to have to give a lengthy explanation to someone, but the receptionist on duty (mostly transparent) just looked up at me and smiled. "Morning, Cindy. You guys have a fun day at your folks' farm?"

This was probably the most unexpected thing she could have said to me. "Uh, sure," I managed to say.

"Good, because the mayor has been looking for you already."

"The mayor?"

She frowned. "Cindy, are you okay, honey? You didn't get bad news at your folks' place, did you?"

"Huh? Oh, no. They're fine. Everything's fine." I almost added 'How are you?' in imitation of the Star Wars line, but I held myself back. "I'll check in with... the mayor right now," I promised, starting down the corridor to my right toward the courtrooms.

"Then don't you think you should go the right direction?" she asked.

"Oops," I said with a smile and changed direction, nearly losing my balance when my weight shifted in the heels.

I was met suddenly by a man in a suit. He was partially bald with a small moustache. He appeared to be about fifty or so and significantly overweight. Like the receptionist and most of the people I had seen in Ovid, he was somewhat transparent. "Oh, there you are, Cindy," he said. "I wanted to go over the speeding citations issued last week."

I didn't know what to say. I just stared at him. I had no idea what he was talking about.

When I didn't answer, he said, "Let's go down to the Judge's office. We can look at them there."

That was a great idea, I thought. He was going to take me right to the Judge. "Sure," I agreed, following him to an office near the end of the corridor.

I could tell as we stepped in the office that no one was there. The office suite consisted of an empty secretarial station which was situated by the entrance to a larger, more opulent office, also deserted.

“Ah, here they are,” he said, lifting a report off the secretarial desk. As he leafed through the report, my eyes rested on the nameplate on the secretary’s desk. ‘Cindy Patton’ it read. Well, at least I didn’t have to figure out where I worked. I was there. This was the best break I could have hoped for, I realized. Now all I had to do was wait for the Judge to come to work.

“If you talk to the Judge today, tell him I’d like to go over this report with him,” the man said, heading for the door. “And tell him to enjoy his stay in Tulsa. I wish I could take a long weekend there.”

Tulsa? Long weekend? Oh no, I thought. That meant the Judge wouldn’t be back until Monday at the earliest. I was going to be stuck as a woman for the entire weekend. Well, at least I had access to the Judge’s office. Maybe I could learn what was going on.

If I was the Judge’s secretary, I assumed I would have full access to his office, and that seemed to be the case. Several people came into the outer office during the morning, and none of them seemed to give a second thought to the fact that I was systematically going through the Judge’s files.

At first, I found very little of interest. Most of the paperwork on and in his desk was the sort of thing you would expect on a municipal Judge’s desk. There were court briefs, recent rulings in other courts, and a number of professional journals. The only interesting aspect of his desk was the lack of personal paraphernalia. Everyone I’ve ever known had some personal items on his desk. Usually, it’s family pictures or coffee mugs that say ‘World’s Greatest Golfer,’ but in the Judge’s case, there was nothing. It was almost as if the Judge was as transparent in his own way as the other residents of Ovid.

The file that finally interested me was one tucked in the back of one of his desk drawers. It was a list of names with no explanation of its meaning. The list consisted of about five hundred names, one of the last of which was mine, or at least the name I now had. The rest of my family appeared on that list as well. I decided to make a copy of it. I suspected that the list was the roster of people the Judge had created in Ovid. Again, no one questioned me as I made the copy.

Once I had gone through the Judge's desk, I decided it was time to go through my own desk. As I already pointed out, a good deal can be learned about a person by observing what is on or in their desk. There was the obligatory family picture, showing me in a nice off-white dress and Jerry in a stylish suit. The kids were dressed in their Sunday best, and we all looked happy and content. The only problem was we never posed for that picture.

There was another picture of me with an attractive older couple standing outside what appeared to be a well-kept farm house. The receptionist had said something about my folk's farm. My guess was that this couple was my nonexistent parents. Or were they nonexistent? Perhaps they really were out there on the farm, thinking about their daughter and her family. I shuddered. It was all too weird.

The side drawers of the desk were filled with files and forms which looked like the files and forms anyone would expect in an office, but the center drawer held more clues about me and my new life. There was a list of emergency phone numbers, one for my 'parents,' two for the kids (one for school and one for afterschool day-care), and one for Jerry.

I had to pick up the kids after school, so I decided I'd better find out where to go. I dialled the number.

"Northside Elementary," a voice answered.

"Yes," I began. "My family just moved to town." No lie there. "Could you tell me where your school is located?"

The directions were simple enough. I copied them down and then asked what time school was out. I was told three thirty. I did the same with the day care center, making sure that they picked up kids from Northside at three thirty. At least that situation was under control. All I would need to do after work was pick them up.

Next, I called Jerry.

“Duggan’s IGA,” a voice said.

“Yes, this is Cindy Patton. Is Jerry there?” I was a little tentative in my request. To be honest, I was surprised to learn that Jerry worked in a supermarket. I had seen several IGA stores on our trip, so I knew what they were. We seemed to live pretty well on a secretary’s salary and the earnings of a grocery clerk.

“Hey, hon,” Jerry’s voice came through, “I was just going to call you. Mr Duggan is coming in from Oklahoma City tonight. He wants to meet with me in the morning and then play a round of golf with Jack and I. Then, he’s going to take you, me, Jack and Sherry over to Winston’s for dinner. It sounds like it may mean a promotion to Store Manager. Jack’s in line to move up. Plan on meeting them about six tomorrow. Since the kids will be at church camp Saturday night, we won’t even need a sitter.”

“Gee, that’s great,” I replied, not really thinking it was great at all.

“Okay see you after work. What’s for dinner?”

Dinner? I had to cook dinner? “It’s a surprise,” I said. And it would be too—a surprise for me. I couldn’t cook worth a damn. At school, I had depended upon microwave dinners and fast food. At home, I always left cooking to my mother and sister. After all, that was women’s work. Well, guess what I was now?

“Sounds interesting. See you tonight about six thirty.”

I slumped down in my chair. This was getting more complicated than I could ever imagine.

At about noon, an interesting person came into my office. She was about my height, black with long black hair, and a body that would have stopped traffic. If I had thought my skirt was short, I looked like I was wearing a peasant skirt compared to this girl. I knew I was attractive, but I couldn’t hold a candle to this girl. But I haven’t mentioned the most interesting thing about her yet: she wasn’t transparent.

“Want to grab some lunch, Cindy?” she asked.

I looked at my tiny women’s watch. I could barely read the numbers, but I could see that it was lunchtime. “Okay,” I replied firmly. If this girl was real, I needed to talk to her.

“I’m Dinah Moon,” she told me with a smile. Her words surprised me for she obviously knew my name. There was something about her, too. It was as if she could walk through a rainstorm and not get wet. I knew instinctively that Dinah could tell me what was going on in Ovid—if she would.

“What’s going on here, Dinah?” I asked bluntly as we walked out of the building and headed toward the business district. No sense in delaying my questions. I felt like Alice in Wonderland (even down to the right sex), and something told me Dinah was my Cheshire cat. I didn’t want her to disappear before I got my answers.

“Let’s wait until we’re at lunch to discuss it, okay?”

“Sure,” I agreed, trying clumsily to keep up with her brisk pace. “But would you mind slowing down a bit?”

She stopped and looked at me. “A little new in heels, are we?”

Oh god! She did know! “No, I... I mean...”

“Don’t worry,” she laughed. “I’m the only one who’s noticed.” She slowed her pace to accommodate me.

We walked wordlessly for about a block when we came to a little cafe with a small painted sign in front which said ‘The Greenhouse.’

Dinah gave me a wicked smile and said, “Nothing but soup and salad for us chicks, eh?”

I didn’t bother to answer. Dinah seemed to be having enough fun for the both of us.

The cafe was only about half full. I guess Ovid wasn’t much of a town for soup and salad. It was probably more of a steak and potatoes place, I thought. Still, the Greenhouse was a pleasant enough place with lots of hanging plants and cozy little booths that afforded a fair degree of privacy. I wondered if that wasn't the real reason Dinah had chosen it for lunch.

We were seated quickly, and each of us ordered a small chef's salad. I ordered a glass of white wine while Dinah ordered an iced tea. "I have to watch my weight," she told me with a wink, "so no booze for Dinah."

"Uh, right," I agreed, stopping the waiter. "Make mine iced tea, too." No sense in tempting the God of Fat. I was going to have to be more careful.

"So how do you like Ovid?" Dinah asked.

"I thought I was a life-long resident," I responded coyly. If she wasn't going to tell me anything, why should I open up to her?

She laughed and patted my slender wrist. "Oh, that is really rich! You sure, are, honey. You've lived here all your life. So let me ask it another way. Is everything going well for you and Jerry?"

"I suppose as well as can be expected under the circumstances," I said evasively. "I'm learning the ropes. Now, how about you? You know what's happening here, don't you?"

"Well," she said with false modesty, "I suppose I do know more than most people around here."

"Then tell me what's going on," I demanded.

She said nothing for a moment as our tea was delivered. I cursed the waiter's timing, for now she would have time to consider her remarks more carefully.

"I really can't tell you everything I know," she said after the waiter left. "But I'll try to answer some of your questions."

"Okay," I agreed, "here's the first question. Why is it you and I know I wasn't Cindy until yesterday?"

"Oh, more people than that know," she said. "When the Judge changes someone—you had figured out it was the Judge, hadn't you?"

I nodded.

“Well, when he changes you, you have about a one in four chance of remembering your past life. If you think about it, your family is right on the mark. You remembered, but Jerry and the twins don’t have a clue, right?”

“That’s right.”

“Well, there’s about five hundred changees in town right now, so that means about a hundred and twenty-five or so remember. Then there’s maybe another fifty or so who remember some of the time. Usually, they just chalk it up to a dream or fantasy, but every now and then, someone sort of ‘wakes up’ and remembers everything. Some of them remember from then on, and with some of them, the memory fades. Of course, that’s just the people. I don’t know about the animals.”

“Animals?” I asked, sipping my tea. It was good with some sort of berry flavor.

“Oh, sure. The Judge can make you into an animal, too. One guy a couple of weeks ago even got made into a tree. He’s that big oak tree down at Sooner Park by the playground.”

“What did he do to piss off the Judge that much?” I asked, horrified.

“I think he was some kind of child molester. I think the Judge thought if he liked kids so much, he’d put him where he could be around them all the time but never do them any harm. He has a unique sense of justice.”

“Who is he?” I asked.

“The Tree Man? I don’t know his name, but...”

“No,” I interrupted. “Not the Tree Man. The Judge. Who is he?”

She grinned a wicked grin at me. “I don’t think he wants you to know—at least not yet.”

We paused for a moment as our salads were delivered. Ovid might have been a small town in farming country, but the chef’s salad would have been a hit in Chicago. After only toast that morning, I was hungrier than I realized. I dug in, stopping for only a moment to ask, "So who were you before? I mean, were you a guy, too?"

Her smile this time was forced. "That's not a proper question to ask in Ovid."

"But you know about me," I argued. "Why shouldn't I know about you?"

"Oh, you'll know some day," she promised. "I think the Judge has some interesting things in store for you. After you've worked with him awhile, you'll learn about me."

I hoped he didn't have anything else in store for me. What he had done to me already was bad enough. But on the other hand, at least I was still human. I didn't think I could cope with being turned into an animal or, worse yet, a tree.

"At least tell me about Ovid," I urged. "Anything you can tell me might be of great help later."

"Well, I suppose there's no harm in telling you," she mused. "After all, a lot of what you want to know is probably available at the library. What would you like to know?"

"First, where did it come from? It's not even on the map."

"Well," Dinah said looking up as if reading a book in her mind, "I believe the town was incorporated in 1908, the year after Oklahoma became a state and..."

"I thought you were going to level with me," I said, showing my irritation. "I had a map of the state in the car before we came here, and there was no Ovid on it. The town isn't so small that it wouldn't be on the map."

"Well," she said slowly with a grin, "we did have lot of growth last year. We went from zero to about fifteen thousand."

"Including the ghosts," I prompted.

"Ghosts? Oh, you mean the shades. Yes, including them."

“So where were you before Ovid?” I had asked her before if she had been a guy and she hadn’t answered, but I figured I might as well ask again in a little different fashion. It couldn’t hurt, and I didn’t really expect a straight answer. After all, Ovid seemed short on straight answers.

The question actually caught her by surprise. Her eyes widened for a moment before she said, “That’s not a good question. Don’t ever ask that of anyone. If they want you to know, they’ll tell you—quietly, of course.”

“But you haven’t always been Dinah Moon,” I prompted.

She shook her head, letting her silky black curls drift over her shoulder. “No, I suppose I haven’t, but then again, I suppose I have.”

“You’re talking in riddles,” I pointed out.

She patted my hand again. “Oh, I like you, Cindy. You’ll try to hunt the truth no matter what the cost. I think we’ll be good friends. But come on, let’s go now. Lunch is my treat.”

We walked back to the office together, discussing innocuous things, the weather and so on. I wanted to know more about what had happened to me, but every time I asked a penetrating question, she would deflect it with another innocuous remark. Finally, Dinah waived good-bye to me at the receptionist’s desk and I started back toward my office. Then, I remembered suddenly that Dinah had never stopped to pay for our lunches. She had apparently forgotten, I thought. I’d better run back to her office and remind her. Then I realized that I didn’t know where her office was.

I walked back to the receptionist and asked, “Where is Dinah’s office?”

“Who?” I got a blank stare from the shade (Dinah had called them) at the desk.

“Dinah,” I repeated. “Dinah Moon, the woman who came in here with me a few minutes ago.”

I had a sudden bad feeling about this. I half expected her to say “but you came in here alone,” but she didn’t. What she did say, though, was almost as bad. "She doesn't work here. I've never seen her before."

Well, what was one more mystery added to all the others? I went back to my office and pulled out the Ovid phone directory. As I anticipated, the book listed no Dinah Moon or D Moon or anything else to them. At least she said she liked me. In this Alice in Wonderland town, that might be important some day.

The rest of the afternoon I used to acquaint myself with my job, whatever that might be. I figured if I was going to be stuck this way for awhile, I needed to follow my job description. The afternoon passed without incident, and soon, it was four thirty. I gathered my purse and locked up the office with a key I found attached to my key ring.

I had no trouble finding the kid's day care facility. I had studied a map of Ovid during my afternoon, and it wasn't hard to figure out where everything was. I suspected I could have put myself on autopilot and made it there, but I didn't want to do that too often. I was afraid of what might happen if I put myself on autopilot and couldn't pull myself back off. Then I would really be stuck, just like Jerry and the kids.

It was funny, I thought as I pulled into the day care parking lot, I was actually starting to think of them as my husband and my children. If they had been able to remember their previous lives as I had, I might have been able to continue to think of them as Randy, Carl, and Steve. But instead, they acted at all times like my husband and my children respectively, and I was forced to interact with them as a wife and mother. I wondered how long it would take before this life seemed completely natural to me. Not long, I was afraid. With no anchor from my previous life to hold on with, I would probably drift into Cindy Patton full time or end up a mental case.

The kids were happy to see me, as most six year olds would be happy to see their mother. Both bounced into the car, talking at ninety miles a minute about their day in first grade and the neat projects they were working on. It was coming at me so fast that I couldn't absorb any of it. I suppose it wasn't just the transformation, but rather the same inattention all working parents gave their children every now and again. And god knows, I had had a stressful day.

Damn! I was going to have a stressful night, too, if I didn't figure out what to do about dinner. Let's see, I thought, what could I cook? My culinary skills were severely limited, but I thought maybe I could handle a meatloaf and maybe some mashed potatoes. I had made them both before, so it was worth a shot. I knew the address of Duggan's IGA from my perusal of the Yellow Pages at the office and knew I would be expected to shop there. With my husband being, I assumed, the Assistant Manager, where else could I shop?

I was greeted at the store by one "Hi, Cindy" after another. I smiled and said "Hi" to each of them since I was expected to know them. Then a young boy about high school age who was spraying produce asked, "Are you looking for your husband, Mrs. Patton?"

"Uh, no," I replied. "I just have a little shopping to do."

"Okay," he said with a grin. "Anyway, Mr. Patton is in with Mr. Spencer and Mr. Duggan. He got in from Oklahoma City early."

"Thanks." Great, I thought. That meant he would probably be late for dinner. And here I was, gathering the ingredients of a nice meal, and I bet he wouldn't even bother to call to let me know he was going to be late. Just like a man...

What was I thinking? I was a man, at least mentally. Wasn't I? I was beginning to think more than just my body had been changed. Oh, I had memories of my past life which the others didn't have, but my thoughts seemed to be slowly coming into line with my body. This was not good. I only hoped there was enough of my male self left on Monday to demand a return to my old life.

I shopped quickly, brushing off the children's incessant attempts to get me to buy every product in the store with sugar in them. I picked up a couple of pounds of lean (must watch the fats) ground beef, some tomato sauce, a bagged salad and a small bag of potatoes. I also found a cookbook dedicated to quick, easy meals for working mothers and hoped there was a good selection of recipes in it for future meals. And finally, I gave in to the kids and let them pick out a pie for dessert.

I vowed to pass on that, or maybe just a small piece. After all, they picked cherry, which was my favorite.

I don't know if I unconsciously went on autopilot or was just a better cook than I thought, but making dinner proved easier than I thought. Michelle actually helped some, and Mike set the table. I was ready with my meal by six thirty, and to my surprise, Jerry was on time.

"Great!" he said when he saw the meatloaf. "I love meatloaf."

I found myself being oddly delighted by his praise. And, if I do say so myself, the meal was excellent. I took small portions, rewarding myself with a thin sliver of the pie. Still, my smaller body seemed satisfied with the smaller meal, so maybe losing a couple of pounds wouldn't be difficult after all.

The evening went much the same as evenings I remembered with my old family when I was a little boy. Mike and Michelle needed to pack for the weekend church camp. Fortunately, they had been given a list to help parents get them ready. I made the kids actually find the various required items since I had no idea how their clothing was organized. They seemed to be pleased that I would let them do it themselves. Then, before I knew it, they were in bed, leaving me alone with Jerry.

I had felt a gnawing fear rising in me since dinner. Jerry had surprised me with his sexual desires the previous evening, and confused and disoriented, I had given in. Although it had not been unpleasant, the part of my mind which was still Matt found the idea of sex with a man repugnant. It was enough to make me go to church and confess, but I had noted from the list for church camp that we were now all Baptists. In any case, I had to be strong and decline any sexual advances or risk losing Matt forever.

I nearly gasped when finally, about ten, Jerry turned off the TV, got up from his recliner, and came over to where I had been sitting on the couch. Then, to my surprise, he leaned over, gently kissed me on the lips, and said, "Well, good night."

Good night?

“You’re going to bed?” I asked, uncertain as to what his normal bedtime might be.

“Yeah. I’ve got an early meeting with Mr. Duggan and Jack, then a ten o’clock tee time, so I want to be rested. Mr. Duggan was really happy with everything at the store yesterday. I think there may be something good coming up for us.”

A transfer out of Ovid? That’s all I wanted. I wanted out of this town with my old life back. Did Mr. Duggan have that for me? I doubted it. Mr. Duggan was probably just one more shade, playing his part in the saga of Ovid.

“Okay,” I said. “I’ll see you tomorrow.”

“Oh, that reminds me, you’ll have to take the kids over for church camp tomorrow. They’re supposed to be there by ten.”

“Okay.”

My entire ‘family’ was in bed now, leaving me to my thoughts. I had expected a repeat of the previous night’s sexual performance and found myself relieved that it had not occurred. But on another deeper level, I found myself a little disappointed. I felt a deep twinge in my body, like an itch that needed to be scratched. Don’t go there, I thought to myself.

With a sigh, I tiptoed off to my bedroom, found a nightie that wasn’t too... well, sexy, and crawled into bed next to my sleeping ‘husband.’ In spite of his snoring, I was asleep within minutes.

Jerry was gone when I woke up, and the sunlight was streaming in the bedroom window. I looked at the clock. It was already eight fifteen and the kids had to be at the church by ten. I jumped out of bed feeling the now almost familiar bounce of my breasts. It was funny how quickly you could get used to large breasts, fleshy hips, and the absence of anything hanging between your legs. I just hoped I wouldn’t have to get used to them permanently.

As I showered, I mentally congratulated myself on getting through an entire day in this strange body without a major faux pas. Only two more days to go and I could petition the Judge to get back my old body. It was odd, I thought, that I had begun to think of my male body not as my 'proper' body, or my 'rightful' body, although it was those things. Instead, I found myself thinking of it as my 'old' body, almost as I might speak of a castoff article. It only emphasized the urgency of getting to the Judge. Being Cindy Patton was beginning to be normal to me.

I managed to get the kids ready for camp, bathed, clothed and fed and delivered them to the church parking lot with ten minutes to spare. I waved good-bye to them, surprised to find I felt an emptiness as their bus drove away. It was silly, I knew. They were only going to be at the church's campsite perhaps fifteen miles away, but they were my children and I missed them. I was beginning to think of them as my children in any case.

Alone at last, I determined to use my day to drive around the town a little more and finish my afternoon at the library, learning whatever I could about Ovid—both the town and the poet.

My tour of Ovid didn't take long. There were only a few points of interest in the town. On the west side, there was a small private college called Capta College. It consisted of only a handful of buildings, and the entire serene little campus would have fit in a corner of the Notre Dame campus. It appeared to be a liberal arts college, so I decided the college library might have more on Ovid. I resolved to return here rather than the city library.

There were no true shopping centers. Instead, there were businesses sprawled all along the highway as I had noted the night we came into town, and the majority of businesses were concentrated along Main Street. Most of the businesses were local, not national firms. There were a couple of exceptions—a Sears Catalogue store and a Radio Shack, but none of the other business names were familiar. The only store which could pass for a department store was called March's. It was only three stories tall and covered only a quarter of a block. I decided to take a closer look at it, so I parked the car and went in.

Like most of the shade shoppers, I was casually dressed in a knit top and jeans and tennis shoes, so I blended right in (except for the fact that I wasn't semi-transparent). I looked like just another Saturday shopper checking out Ovid's finest. It began as a lark, but slowly but surely I found myself getting into the spirit of a shopping trip. Maybe women really do have a shopping gene. I went through the men's wear section first out of force of habit and found myself wondering what Jerry would look like in some of the shirts. The children's section brought similar thoughts about Mike and Michelle. But it was the women's department I found most interesting. I couldn't help but wonder what I would look like in some of the outfits.

Then I came to the lingerie section. It was sort of a small town version of Victoria's secret, and I found myself surprised that such sexy fashions could have made it to the hinterlands. I reached out to touch a particularly sexy little number—a pink teddy with attractive lace at the hem. It felt soft and silky and I was just thinking...

"It would look good on you," a feminine voice said.

I turned to face one of the most beautiful women I had ever seen in my life. If I had still had a penis, it would have been rock hard just staring into her deep blue eyes. Her hair was golden—not blonde, but golden, looking lush and warm even in the mediocre department store lights. She was about my new height, but where I was merely well proportioned, she was magnificently proportioned. She wore a tastefully conservative periwinkle blue dress with matching jacket, but she could have been wearing yesterday's newspaper and looked just as stylish. And she was real, not a shade. A small store name tag identified her as Vera March.

I had said nothing, so she continued, "I think Jerry would like that little number, Cindy."

I blushed, for I had been thinking the same thing. It was if she had read my thoughts. Had I really been that transparent?

Vera laughed, "Don't be embarrassed, Cindy. Revel in your new womanhood."

She knew, just as Dinah had known!

"I... um... don't think..."

"That's right," she said with a soothing voice which made me warm all over. "Don't think. Love isn't about thinking, is it? It's about feeling. It's the feeling of his strong hands on your breasts and thighs, his loving kisses, his manhood against the entrance to your body..."

I was floating. There was light and there was darkness, somehow mixed together in a pattern of warmth and comfort. My body was trembling in joy. There was Jerry and...

"Cindy!"

"Huh?"

I was standing on the sidewalk in front of the department store, a gray sack with 'March's' stylishly displayed on the side in my hand. I looked up to see Dinah smiling at me.

"Been shopping, huh?" she said. "Whatcha get?"

Before I could protest, she snatched the bag and looked in. "Ooh..." she drawled. "Jerry's gonna eat you alive in that."

As she handed me the bag, I caught a glimpse of the pink teddy. I didn't recall buying it. One moment I was looking at it, then Vera March spoke to me, and then... here I was.

Dinah gave me a knowing smile. "Vera talked you into it, didn't she?"

"Yes, I guess so."

Dinah laughed, "Vera can be very persuasive when she wants to be. I'll bet she and Mark really go to town in bed."

"Who?" I was becoming more bewildered by the moment.

"Mark March, her husband. He's a hunk if ever I saw one. She has him wrapped around her little finger. Why, I can remember... no, I don't think I'll tell you about that just yet."

I bit my lip, feeling the unfamiliar taste of lipstick. "Dinah, who are you?"

She looked at me seriously for a moment, then said, "I'm your friend, honey."

"Why should I believe you?"

She was silent. Finally, she said, "I can't think of one good reason, but I am your friend."

"But you're one of them," I accused, not even sure who 'them' was.

"You, the Judge, Officer Mercer, Vera Martin, and probably her husband are all... playing with me, as if I were some kind of a living puppet."

She studied me for a moment, almost engulfing me with those deep brown eyes. I stood my ground, though, small, blonde, female, and almost ready to cry, but I stood my ground and never looked away from those eyes.

"He's right about you," she finally said, more to herself than to me. Then she was gone. I don't mean she walked away. She was just gone, as if this were a movie in which she was there in one frame and gone in the next. And to think, I had been afraid she would only fade away like the Cheshire cat!

I shuddered for a moment, then looked around. There were only shades nearby, and none of them seemed to notice anything unusual. I sighed and got into the car. It was time to go to the college library and look for some answers.

Suddenly, I remembered it was Saturday, and the Notre Dame-Texas game had an early start. I fiddled with the radio until I found the game. It was already the end of the first quarter and Notre Dame was down 21 to 3. Disgusted, I turned it off. If we had made it to the game, we would all be disgusted by now. Randy had fifty dollars on Notre Dame, and Carl and Steve would have been drunk and disorderly by now. Me, well, somehow it was hard to imagine what I would be thinking if I were at the game. If everything had gone as planned, I would probably have lost my focus on the game and started looking for some nice young Texas coed willing to console a poor Irish supporter for the evening. Now I looked more like that prospective coed than I could have ever imagined two days before.

The college library was small, I realized, but it was probably larger than the town library. It was an older building, dating back, I would say to the twenties, with faux columns on either side of the doors and high arched windows along the front of the building. As I entered, I saw that the librarian was a shade, but she answered my questions as nicely as if she had been a real person. She directed me to the research section where I immediately looked for and found a history of the town of Ovid.

It seemed the town was founded in 1908, as Dinah had said, but I knew, of course, that the real date was probably less than a year ago. All the older buildings, such as the library, were really built to look old. The college was founded by a group merely listed in the history as a 'religious order.' The current President of the college was a woman named Betty Vest. The primary industries of the town appeared to be agriculture and a couple of small manufacturers, the largest of which was Vulman Industries which made car parts for Ford. I scanned a few more pages in the book until I convinced myself that most of the history was bogus.

Next, I tackled a copy of Ovid's Metamorphosis. If there were answers in it, they were buried deeply, for the book was not an easy read. I had thought it would be like Edith Hamilton's book, Mythology, which was about the only book I had ever read on the subject, but it was considerably more complex. I had read the Hamilton book while still in high school, so while some of the names were familiar to me in examining Metamorphosis, many others were not. The Hamilton book was much more readable, I thought.

Metamorphosis contained every imaginable sort of transformation, though. I found men and women changed into trees, fish, spiders, bears, cows, horse, rocks, birds, wolves, and yes, even men changed into women. Whoever had named Ovid had a great sense of the ironic. But there weren't any gods and goddesses running around Ovid changing people into animals. Or were there?

My thoughts were interrupted as I looked at the clock. It was almost four thirty! I had become so engrossed in the book that I had not even eaten lunch. My stomach suddenly growled in protest. Oh well, at least I had wanted to lose a few pounds. But what was more important was that Jerry had said we would be meeting his bosses at six. That didn't leave me much time to get ready.

I rushed out of the library and drove home. I had to keep my speed legal, though, because for most of the trip, there was a police car next to me, and the driver looked a lot like Officer Mercer. I suddenly realized that I had not seen any police officer except Officer Mercer, and he seemed to be everywhere. I filed that thought for later and rushed home.

As luck would have it, I beat Jerry home by ten minutes, so when he came into the bedroom, I was already stripping out of my jeans. I had no idea what to wear, though, and was considering slipping back into autopilot when Jerry walked into our closet, turned me around and planted a big kiss on my lips.

"Please, Jerry," I gasped, "I'm half naked and I need to get dressed."

"I've got great news, honey," he said with a grin. "You're looking at the new manager of Duggan's IGA here in Ovid!"

Oh great, I thought, we get to stay in Ovid. "That's wonderful... Jerry," I managed.

"Yeah, Jack's going to manage a big new store over in Tulsa, and he recommended me to take over here. That means a raise and that country club membership you've always wanted."

I grew up in a small town, so I knew what a country club membership really meant. Usually in small towns, the country club was the hangout for businessmen and their wives since it often had the only golf course. It wasn't the pillar of society often found in larger cities. Still, it meant Jerry and I would be with the local in crowd. As for his manager, he was probably just another shade, so instead of a store in Tulsa, he would probably be going to wherever the shades went when they were no longer needed.

Jerry grabbed a dress shirt and slacks and headed for the shower, leaving me to try to figure out what to wear. I slipped into autopilot and let my body do whatever it had to do. I slipped off a short black cocktail dress, the proverbial 'little black dress' and proceeded to gather everything I would need to go with it—new bra and panties, a smoky patterned pair of hose with a garter belt, black three-inch heels, and a gold necklace and matching bracelet. The dress was more revealing than I had realized, showing a significant amount of both thigh and breasts, but it was too late to start over. Besides, I told myself, women wore these things all the time. I would be fine. My body seemed to know how to dress and apply makeup, so by some miracle, I managed to be ready a few minutes before six. Even my first attempt at three-inch heels went fine.

Jerry drove, so I didn't have to figure out where Winston's was. It turned out to be on a little hill overlooking the town. The sign in front said 'Best Darn Steaks in Oklahoma,' so it looked like I was going to get a good meal out of this. A suddenly feminine thought crossed my mind as I realized any meal I didn't have to cook was a good meal. I might be in for a future as chief cook and bottle washer for the Patton family for some time to come, and the thought disturbed me.

There was no valet parking. This was a small town, and ideas like valet parking didn't jive with most people's small-town, egalitarian ideas. I knew this because Ovid was in many ways like my hometown. So Jerry let me out at the door, coming around to help me out, for which I was grateful since I still wasn't too sure about the three inch heels.

As I waited for Jerry, two couples went in and one went out. We all smiled and said our "good evenings" to each other, and everyone accepted me as normal. Even though they were all shades, I did feel a little uncomfortable as the men seemed to be staring at my breasts and not at my face.

Jerry collected me and we went in together. The rest of our party was already seated with wine glasses filled in front of them. My spirits perked up at the sight of the wine. A glass of wine would be perfect. I hadn't had a drink since my transformation, and there is nothing like finding yourself in a body of the wrong sex to make you want a drink.

Jack and Sherry both stood with big smiles on their faces and greeted us. Fortunately, Jerry had given me their names, so I was able to greet Sherry by name and give her a sisterly hug. Although she was a shade, I was struck by how solid she felt. She might appear a little transparent, but it was an illusion. As I had expected, though, Jerry and I were the only two real people at the table.

"Cindy," Jack boomed in a voice thick with an Oklahoma twang (did I sound like that?) that could be heard three tables away, "I want you to meet Henry Duggan and his lovely wife, Christine."

I smiled and shook their hands before sitting demurely next to Jerry.

"Have you told her?" Jack asked Jerry without preamble.

"Not yet," Jerry replied with an innocent lie. He couldn't keep a secret, I suspected.

"Is there something I should know?" I asked innocently, playing along with Jerry's little white lie.

"Cindy," Jack began, "you're looking at the new Store Manager of Duggan's IGA here in Ovid."

Think fast, I told myself. This is supposed to be great news. I get to stay in Ovid near my non-existent parents. I don't have to move. I'm a lucky girl. Come on, Cindy, be happy. "Oh, that's wonderful!" I gushed.

"This calls for a celebration," Mr. Duggan said, beckoning to a waiter. He ordered two bottles of champagne and added to the waiter, "And keep them coming."

The evening was pleasant, with champagne flowing through every course. I tried to order as light a meal as possible, sticking with a salad, a petite filet (of which I only ate half) and no dessert. But the empty calories I picked up from the champagne probably did more damage than the steak would have done.

Sherry and Christine without knowing it initiated me in the ritual of going to the ladies room as a group. I had to field questions which were new to me such as “I love your dress. Where did you find it?” and “how do you stay so trim with two children?” Apparently I gave all the right answers, for they seemed satisfied that I was one of their sorority.

We broke up about ten. As I stood up, I realized that all the champagne had been too much for my new, smaller body. I weaved slightly, almost falling. The combination of a body with new proportions balanced on high heels, coupled with more champagne than I could handle was almost disastrous. Fortunately, Jerry noticed my distress and put his arm around my waist, as much for support as for affection. He helped me into the car and began the drive home.

“You were a big hit with Christine Duggan,” he told me happily.

“I was?”

“That’s what Henry told me.” I noticed he and Mr. Duggan were now on a first name basis. “He told me he can always tell when his wife likes someone because she invited us to stay with them whenever we’re in Oklahoma City.”

“That’s nice,” I said, wondering when my world would stop spinning around. I vowed to watch my champagne consumption in the future.

When we got home, Jerry put his arm around me again and helped me up to our bedroom. In spite of the champagne, or maybe because of it, I found myself glad to be near him, so when he turned me around to face him and lifted my chin, I actually reached up with my lips to kiss him, enthralled as his tongue entered my mouth.

We were suddenly sliding our hands along each other’s body. I felt his strong back and firm ass while his hands were on my own ass. I could feel the heat from his body as it rubbed against my own.

The first night of my transformation, I had been too shocked to experience my initiation into sex as a woman. It had been as if I were in a bad dream, or rather, in someone else’s bad dream. But this time, I had been a woman for two full days, and the body was not quite as alien as it had been. That, coupled with several glasses of champagne, was sufficient to make me relaxed and willing. I no longer thought of this man I was holding as my old friend, Randy. Jerry was like Randy in many ways, but he was... well, he was Jerry.

I marvelled at how good it felt to hold on to his muscular body, and how my nipples brushing against the hair on his chest felt so hard and pleasantly sensitive. I began to feel something hard against the inside of my thigh, and then I felt a liquid warmth coming from between my own legs.

Jerry gently laid me on the bed and spread my legs. I knew what was expected of me and arched my back as I felt him enter me. He was gentle, playing around the entrance to my vagina rather than ploughing into me, and I began to feel a wave of pleasure rising in me unlike anything I had ever felt before until I heard Jerry cry out and felt something warm in me as he gave an orgasmic shudder.

I realized in the pleasurable fog which claimed me that we had both orgasmed together. I had never in my entire life, or perhaps I should say either of my lives felt such intense pleasure. Between the buzz from the champagne and the afterglow of my orgasm, I slipped off into a blissful sleep.

I was awakened by the morning sun peeking into our room through a crack in the drapes. I became aware suddenly of two things. The first thing was that I was still as female as ever, as evidenced by the fact that I was still completely nude, having fallen asleep after sex. The second thing I noticed was that Jerry was just as nude as I, sleeping peacefully beside me. I had avoided a hangover, but just barely, for there was the faint fuzziness I always experienced after too much liquor.

What had I done? I thought to myself. For the second night, I had experienced sex as a woman, but this time, it was different from the first. The first time, it was just surprisingly pleasant, but this time, it was terrific. I had enjoyed every minute of it, and I found my body even now getting turned on at the sight of the man sleeping beside me.

I slipped out of bed and covered myself in a filmy peach-colored robe. It did little to hide my body, but it was the principle of the thing. I was at least clothed again. Every day—in fact, every hour—I was becoming more and more Cindy Patton. Did this mean that eventually, I would be oblivious to what had happened to me as the rest my family?

My thoughts were interrupted as Jerry woke with a groan and asked, “What time is it?”

I looked at the clock on my nightstand. “Eight o’clock.”

Jerry leaped out of bed, nearly startling me. “Jesus! We need to hurry. It will be time for church in an hour.”

Church? As Randy, he had seldom gone to church. Even when he did, it was never on Sunday mornings. Like me, he had been raised a Catholic, and evening Masses were much more convenient. Sunday morning Masses were too much of an effort, especially after Saturday night parties.

“Church?” I asked.

“We’re greeting at the nine thirty service, remember?”

Greeting? Oh, that’s all I needed. I would have to stand there in a dress, pantyhose and heels and smile and shake hands with hundreds of people, most of whom didn’t really exist.

“And then we have to pick up the kids from Sunday school. That’s when their overnight camp ends.” He looked at me for a moment. “Are you feeling all right?”

I smiled a reassuring smile. “I’m fine.” What was I going to say? No, I’m not fine. I just had my sex changed and now I’m forced to live as a woman raising two kids who used to be my fraternity brothers while I’m on the receiving end of a game of hide the sausage with my former best friend. Oh, and to top it off, I’m surrounded by people who aren’t really there and a few others who are but still don’t seem normal. Maybe I wasn’t really fine, but the only person I really needed to talk to about it wouldn’t be back until the next day.

With a sigh of resignation, I headed for the shower while mentally planning what I would have to wear to church.

Jerry and I made it with ten minutes to spare. I managed to cut a little time off by fixing a breakfast of juice, coffee and toast. Jerry was expecting bacon and eggs, but I told him there wasn't time. Besides, I thought to myself, I couldn't afford the calories.

Jerry wore a sport coat and tie, and I found myself envying the good old days when I would have been similarly attired. As Cindy, though, I had to find the right dress (a light blue knit dress which had a little longer skirt—that is, ending at the top of the knee), neutral pantyhose, matching shoes and purse (white two inch heels and a small white leather purse), and the right accessories (gold necklace with matching earrings and a simple gold bracelet). Then came the makeup. I had to go back on autopilot for the first time in about fifteen hours. I was learning how to be a woman, but I wasn't ready to ride without the training wheels when it came to applying makeup.

I did a lot of smiling, handshaking, and saying "Hi" to the members of the congregation as if I knew them. Most were shades, but every now and then, a real person would come up to shake my hand. A real person's handshake didn't really feel any different from a shade's handshake, but with the shades, it was disconcerting to realize that I could almost see right through them.

One real person particularly caught my attention. He was young, perhaps sixteen tops and dressed in a blue dress shirt and what appeared to be a Jerry Garcia tie. He was pleasant looking, sort of like the proverbial boy next door. What caught my interest though was when he shook my hand and said softly, "Welcome to Ovid."

He knew. He was one of the ones who retained his memory. There was a little coffee social after services, and I made a mental note to talk to him when we could be in private.

This was my first Baptist service, and I was comforted to see it wasn't too unlike a Catholic service. Actually, given that I was now wearing a dress, I was just as happy to go through a church service without kneeling. The minister was a shade, but his sermon was a bit more passionate than any I had seen at Mass. The hymns were mostly familiar, and I was somehow pleasantly surprised to learn that I had a very pleasing soprano voice. Jerry's clear tenor matched well with my voice, and I found it fun to be sharing the Hymnal with him as we sang in harmony.

After the service, Jerry stopped to speak with several of his friends while I got a cup of coffee and sought out the boy I had greeted earlier. He smiled when he saw me approach. Looking about to see that there was no one else in easy earshot, he smiled and said, "I'm Danny Mitchell. So how is your new life working out?"

I liked that. There was no preamble. I suspected this type of conversation was discouraged in Ovid, so it paid to get right to the point.

"All right, I guess," I told him. "I'm not exactly used to it yet." I wanted to add 'and I want to get out of here before I do get used to it,' but I didn't.

He smiled again. "It takes a while to get used to it. I've been here almost a year now."

"Then were you one of the first real residents?" I asked, warming to this young man.

"Pretty close," he agreed. "When we got here, I think the town had just gotten started. You could go all day and not see anyone who was real."

"We?"

"Oh, I suppose I should tell you my story. I was on a college football team last fall. We were flying down here from Northwest Missouri State to play Muskogee State in football when our plane developed engine trouble and had to land in Ovid."

"Ovid has an airport?" I asked, surprised as I took a sip of coffee.

He nodded. "It does. It isn't much of an airport, really—just a couple of private hangars and a lighted concrete runway, but it was big enough for our chartered plane. Anyhow, the coach explained our problem to the police officer who greeted us.”

“Officer Mercer?” I asked on a hunch.

“Who else? He’s the entire police force, but he seems to be everywhere. I’ve even seen two police cars on the street, both driven by Officer Mercer.”

So had I.

“Anyhow,” Danny continued, “we were taken into town on a bus that... you know, it’s funny, but I just happened to think of something. There was a bus waiting for us at the airport as if they knew we were coming.”

“I imagine they did,” I told him.

He nodded in agreement. “We appeared before the Judge right away. I couldn’t imagine why they took us to see him. I mean, we hadn’t done anything wrong. The Judge came out and muttered something I couldn’t understand, and then the changes began. About half of us stayed boys, although different, younger boys. We were all high school age. A couple of the white guys turned black and a couple became Hispanic, and some of the blacks and Hispanics on the team turned white. The rest changed into girls—all kinds of girls. Some were cute and some were plain. Again, some of their races changed. There was a lot of yelling and screaming from those of us who remembered who we had been, but the rest of the team just stood there and smiled as the changes claimed them. They didn’t even seem to notice what was happening.”

“Did the pilot and the coaching staff turn into students, too?” I asked.

“No,” Danny said, shaking his head. “Coach Wallace—he was the head coach—is now Miss Samson, our History teacher. The pilot was a woman. She’s a teller in one of the banks now. The rest of the crew just changed into people I haven’t met yet. Officer Mercer took me ‘home’ after that. I found out my parents weren’t real, but they were okay to me. Dad is real now, but I don’t know who they got to be him and he doesn’t remember.”

I hesitated for a moment, then asked, “What about the ones who became girls and remembered who they were. How did they handle it?”

“Pretty well, actually. One of them was our starting halfback, and he... she is now our head cheerleader. Another player—he was a defensive end like me—was runner-up for Homecoming Queen. She remembers everything, but she’s adapted well. She and I date quite a bit and I think she’s starting to like being a girl.”

“It sounds as if things are turning out all right for them,” I commented.

Danny nodded. “I think so. Of course it’s a lot harder for them than it is for you or me.”

I was puzzled. “Why do you say that?”

“Well,” he explained, “I was originally male, and you were originally female, so...”

“Wait a minute!” I interjected. “What makes you think I was originally female?”

His eyes went wide and his face reddened. “You mean you weren’t a woman before? Oh, I’m sorry. It’s just that you act like a woman. I mean, I was watching you while you were greeting, and then in church with your husband. You talk and act just like a woman. Did I say something else wrong?”

“Oh, no,” I told him. “Excuse me, Danny. I’d better go now.”

I turned away without another word. Danny had said something wrong all right. How could he have ever thought that I was originally female? I hadn’t changed that much, had I? Maybe, I thought, my body was on autopilot more than I realized. Either that, or my female body was beginning to affect my predominately male mind.

As Jerry and I drove home from church after picking up the kids, I began to sort through my thoughts in light of Danny’s assumption. First, there was the sex. I had experienced sex as a woman on two evenings now. How did I feel about it? Did I enjoy it? I had to admit that I did. The physical sensations were very pleasant. I began to feel a moistness in my crotch just thinking about it. But what did this mean? Was I gay? I didn't think so. I had been a normal heterosexual male in all ways before coming to Ovid. Now, I was a normal heterosexual female. It seemed the right thing to be.

Then there were the kids. I had to admit when we picked them up after church that I was glad to see them. Was it because I was worried about Steve and Carl? I didn't think so. In some bizarre way, I was beginning to think of them as my children. It was hard to think of Mike as Steve and even harder to think of Michelle as Carl. They were happy, healthy, normal children in every respect.

I began to realize that I was becoming Cindy Patton in every way that was meaningful. I was beginning to think of myself as a wife and mother, to the detriment of my male ego. It was imperative that I see the Judge in the morning before Matt O'Hara disappeared completely.

Sunday afternoon was just a normal weekend day for the Patton family. Jerry settled in to watch a football game. Apparently, we were Dallas Cowboy fans to my chagrin. I had been a Steelers fan as long as I could remember since I grew up in Pennsylvania. In some ways, I mused, supporting the Cowboys would be tougher than being a woman. Although I said all the right things as we watched the game together, I was secretly glad when they were upset by the lowly Atlanta Falcons.

The kids just played and had a wonderful time of it. Two little girls (one a shade) came by to play with Michelle, while Mike was content to read comics and watch TV. In some ways, he was just like Steve had been. I resolved that if I had to stay in this role, I would raise Mike to be a better man than Steve had been. But then, what mother doesn't want the best for her son?

I actually managed to make a pretty decent snack to tide everyone over, and then put together a meal I was actually quite proud of. It consisted of baked chicken and fresh green beans and a salad. It was nutritious and pretty low in fat. I had a waistline to think about.

By evening, the kids were tired, so I had no trouble putting them to bed. As I put them both to bed, I felt feelings of accomplishment I had never felt before. I think they must be feelings only a mother can experience. It was a feeling of pride that I had actually created these two children. I knew, of course, that I had never experienced their actual birth, but the feeling that I had was there nonetheless.

Jerry had spent the evening reading and watching TV. It was how the old me would have spent the evening as well, but I felt the need to putter around the house a little bit. I did a quick load of laundry and folded it. Then, as I was putting it away, I noticed the sack from Martin's. I had forgotten about it with all that had happened over the last day. I pulled the pink teddy out of the sack and held it up. It was incredibly sexy, and I found my groin becoming warm just looking at it. The matching panties were so sheer and soft...

There was something magical about the outfit. As I held it, I began to wonder what I would look like in it. I wondered what Jerry would think of it. I smiled at the thought.

A part of me knew that this was not what I should be thinking or feeling. I was not really a woman in spirit, only in body. Then I remembered the woman who had sold me the teddy. She had murmured something to me as she sold it, something hypnotic. I was being forced into these thoughts and feelings, I realized. They were not really my own.

My body disagreed. I began to feel the soft, yielding warmth between my legs, urging me to put on the teddy. It didn't seem to be worth resisting, so I stripped off my clothes and put it on. The panties softly caressed my dampening crotch, and the silky feel of the teddy on my erect nipples made my body shudder involuntarily.

I looked at myself in the mirror. I was absolutely sexy. To hell with the five pounds I needed to lose. A little touch up of lipstick, expertly applied, a brush through my hair, and a little perfume spritzed in all the right places, and I was fantastic. For good measure, I slipped on a pair of three inch white heels. I smiled at the finished product and started into the den.

“Honey,” I called softly from behind him.

He turned around and I nearly laughed as his mouth fell open. Wordlessly, he jumped from his chair and slipped his arm around my waist. I smiled at him as we walked together silently back into the bedroom.

I won't go through all the details. Let's just say that it was everything I hoped it would be the first, second, and third time. When we had finished, we were both exhausted and fell asleep in each other's arms.

I awakened the next morning to the sound of Jerry in the shower. I felt sticky between my legs and realized with a blush that I had slept through the night without cleaning up. It had been a contented sleep, I knew, and even in the light of day with my reason in control, I realized how fantastic the evening had been. As a man, I had never felt the waves of pleasure this new body had given me.

And yet, I realized suddenly, this was the day I would confront the Judge and ask him to change me back into my male self. What would it be like to be male again? I had actually grown used to the vacant feeling between my legs, and my breasts felt as if they had always been there. What would happen to Jerry and the kids? Could I bargain to get back all of our old lives. And what if I did? How could I ever face Randy again after what we had done repeatedly as Jerry and Cindy? Would Steve and Carl be as happy as my wastrel fraternity brothers as they seemed to be as Mike and Michelle? These were nagging questions for which I had incomplete answers.

And what was going on in Ovid? I thought I knew what, but not why. The answers had come to me slower than they might have had I not been faced with adjusting to a new life at the same time. But I was certain now that I knew who the Judge and Dinah and all the rest of them were. Somehow, I should have been more frightened, knowing what I suspected I knew, but I wasn't.

I dropped the kids off at school and drove to work. In the parking lot, I looked myself over one more time. I had tried to look very professional for my confrontation with the Judge. I wore a cream-colored silk blouse, a tan suit, two-inch brown heels, and had carefully styled my hair as best I could. My makeup was a little understated, and I thought I actually looked like a lawyer myself. I had sought that look. I had a case to plead.

I arrived in the office before the Judge and had a sinking feeling. What if he didn't come in again today? I was beginning to lose my grip on my male identity; I was fully aware of that. Was that his plan? To hide until I no longer had the will to return to my male form? How long would that be? If I were to remain Cindy Patton for even a few more days, I would completely lose my resolve to return to my old life. Each time I looked into my children's eyes or felt the embrace of my husband or admired my image in the mirror, a little more of Matt died.

My fears turned out to be groundless, though, as he entered the office at exactly nine o'clock. He was dressed in a conservative gray suit with a red and gray striped tie and crisp white shirt. There was a newspaper tucked under his arm.

"Good morning, Cindy," he said with a smile, as if there was nothing unusual. I thought for a moment that perhaps I was wrong. Perhaps the Judge knew no more than Jerry or the kids. But I dismissed the idea as quickly as I thought of it. The Judge had to be behind our transformations, and I was sure I knew who, or at least what, he was.

"Why did you do this to me?" I asked with a frown.

To my consternation, his smile grew wider. "Why did I do what?"

"You know what. Why did you change me into... into this?" I gestured at myself. "And why did you turn Randy into Jerry and Steve and Carl into children?"

He actually laughed. "Come into my office, Cindy, and I'll answer all of your questions."

When I was seated in front of his desk, he pushed the paper in front of me. "This may answer the 'why,' Cindy."

I looked at the paper. It was a Friday Tulsa paper. I scanned the headlines, trying to determine from the front page exactly what he was talking about. There were the usual national and international stories, but it was a headline and a picture which went with it that caught my eye. In the picture, the remains of a charred Firebird were clearly visible. The headline read 'Five Die in Fiery Crash!' With a sickening shock, I realized the car was Randy's. There could be no doubt as to who four of the five who died were.

"Do you mean... we're actually... dead?"

To my relief, he shook his head. "No, not really. This is only what should have happened."

It had to be the farm truck we almost hit, I realized. I remembered we were headed right for it and then... it was gone. We had hit that truck, I realized, or at least we should have hit it. Then we would have all died, taking the driver of the farm truck with us.

I looked up from the paper to face the Judge. "You saved us then?"

He nodded. "In a manner of speaking I did. If I had simply saved you, there would have been too many loose ends in reality. Your loved ones would have found you had disappeared, and the subsequent search might have led them here. What I did was erase you from reality. If you were to call your friends from school or your family, you would discover that they had never heard of you. Then, you four and the truck driver became mine to mold as I wished."

"But that isn't right," I protested. "What gives you the right to do this to us?"

"I could say might makes right," the Judge said grimly, "but I might also remind you that in many cultures, saving a life means that life is mine to do with as I please. In other cultures, I would be obligated to take care of you however I saw fit. Any of these answers gives me the right. Besides, you participated in the selection of your roles here. Observe."

Suddenly, I could see the four of us back on the road again... The old me was speaking.

"There's no Ovid on the map," I was saying.

Steve, drunkenly from the back seat yelled, "Are we there yet?" as Carl snickered.

"Quiet, guys," I had growled.

"Who are you?" Steve had taunted, "our mother?"

The scene faded. "I rest my case," the Judge said.

"So based on that exchange, I get to be the mother?" I practically yelled.

"It won't be so bad," the Judge said. "Dinah tells me you've adapted to your role quite well. And I understand Vera sold you quite a sexy outfit on Saturday. Have you had a chance to wear it yet?"

My blush told him that I had.

"I thought so. As I said, you seem to be adapting well."

It was true, I realized. I had been a woman for—what?—less than four days, and yet I had dressed as a woman, acted as a woman, and even on several occasions made love as a woman. Was I revolted by all of this, particularly the lovemaking? Yes, at first. It had all seemed so alien to me, but now? This morning, I had gotten dressed and put on my makeup as if it were second nature. I walked confidently in heels. I had kissed my husband good-bye as if I hated to see him go, and I had hugged my children before school as if I were trying to return them to my body from which they had supposedly come.

"All right," I granted. "I suppose I have adapted, and this life isn't so bad. But why did you do this to us? You didn't save us out of the goodness of your heart."

The Judge smiled. "I was right not to underestimate you. To explain why, you have to know who I am. Have you figured that out yet?"

"I think I have," I admitted. "There were plenty of clues, but the answer was almost too fantastic. That's why I rejected it when I first thought of it. But I suppose it was no more fantastic than what you did to us."

"And the answer is?"

“You are the Roman gods,” I ventured, almost certain I was correct.

“Very good!” he replied, clapping his hands as he leaned back in his leather chair. “Have you figured out which ones?”

“I think so. You are Jupiter.”

He nodded, still smiling. “Correct.”

“Dinah is Diana, Officer Mercer is Mars.”

“Wrong on that one! Officer Mercer is Mercury.”

“Of course,” I said. “I should have guessed from the name. But wouldn’t Mars have made a better police officer?”

The Judge grunted. “I don’t think so. Mars is too much of a martinet. I needed someone who would be a little more understanding, and of course, I needed someone who could be everywhere almost at once. Mercury has the speed to do so. Mars, along with his wife, Venus, whom I believe you have met?”

I nodded. No wonder I bought the teddy from her and used it so amorously. I was under a spell from Venus.

“Anyhow, they run Martin’s Department Store. I suppose I should have let Mercury run it. He is, after all, the God of Commerce, but someone once compared business to war, so I suppose it all works out.”

“Are there any other gods I should be aware of? I wouldn’t want to cross any of them,” I told him. “The way I talked to Dinah, I’m surprised she didn’t turn me into a stag like she did in Metamorphosis.”

“Oh, that’s just the legend that survived,” he told me. “Have you ever heard of Siproetes?”

I frowned. “No, I don’t think so. I didn’t see it in Ovid.”

“It isn’t in any of Ovid’s works,” he told me. “The legend of Siproetes didn’t survive to your time. The only reference to him is in a work called Metamorphoses by Antoninus Liberalis. Siproetes was a young man in Crete who saw Diana—she was called Artemis then, by the way—bathing naked in a fountain. Rather than change him into a stag as in the legend you know, she changed him into a woman. Someday, I'll tell you the whole story of that incident, but as you can see, your current transformation meets with her approval.

“As far as any other gods you should be aware of, well, you'll meet others, I'm sure, but don't worry about them now. They all know I personally decided to make you and your friends into the Patton family. I doubt if any of them will bother you. Actually, there are only twelve true gods in the pantheon. The rest are sort of second-rate gods. I'll introduce you as the occasion arises.”

My conversation with the Judge had not worked out quite the way I had thought it would. I had as much as agreed to remain Cindy Patton. I supposed I could have suffered a worse fate. Besides, in a perverse sort of way, it was actually fun to be a woman. It's just that I had thought from the moment that my transformation had been all wrong. Now, though, it seemed so right. Matt O'Hara had another semester of undergraduate work left followed by three years of law school. Cindy Patton had the opportunity to participate in the most unique exercise of the law ever imagined. And I would get to be with Jerry and the kids.

“All right,” I sighed. “I guess I'm Cindy Patton for keeps. But what am I supposed to do around here?”

“Oh, general secretarial chores will be your official job.”

“And unofficially?”

“Very good. You will attend court sessions with me,” he told me. “I need someone who can chronicle all of the cases as they actually occur. Otherwise, eventually even I will forget who was who around here.”

I frowned. “You mean you want me to be the court reporter?”

“No, no,” he replied, shaking his head. “I want you to tell them as stories. You will be my female Homer, telling the stories of those who visit my courtroom. I want you to tell the tales in your own words, expressing your own feelings. The stories will, of course, be only for the consumption of myself and my fellow gods. Yours will be the most important job of any mortal in Ovid. How does that sound?"

I had to admit to myself that it was intriguing. I would be witness to remarkable events that no mortal had witnessed before. And since I had wanted to be an attorney before my transformation, I would see courtroom justice meted out in a way I could never have imagined a few days before. How could I say no? I smiled at the Judge and nodded my head. "Okay," I said, "you have a deal."

He clapped his hands. "Excellent, my dear. You won't regret this. Now, we had better go to court. Officer Mercer has just stopped a drunk driver on the edge of town. Such childish behavior warrants a stern sentence."

"How did you know he just picked up a drunk driver?" I asked, hurrying to keep up with him as he headed for the courtroom.

The Judge only laughed.

'You know,' I said to myself, 'come to think of it, this could be fun.'

Ovid II: Return to Ovid: The Lawyer

©1998 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

I was up to my eyeballs in work.

If somebody had told me a little over a month ago that I would be the secretary to a municipal judge in Oklahoma, I would have snickered at them. If they had told me that the judge in question was in fact the Roman god Jupiter, I would have chuckled at them. If they had told me that instead of my normal male self, a college student from Notre Dame, I would be an attractive twenty-five year old woman with a husband and two children, I would have laughed so hard tears would have streamed down my face. But I wasn't laughing now.

Here I was, that attractive woman I spoke of, trying to make sense out of my job. I had come to accept my new life, and even enjoy my roles as a wife and mother, but on the job, I was frustrated. I had been hired to tell the stories of the other humans who came before the Judge to be, against their will, transformed into the residents of Ovid Oklahoma. In order to do my job, I had to sit in the courtroom for every trial and watch as the Judge passed his unusual sentences. It wasn't all that hard, really. Court was held Monday through Thursday from nine until noon, if the Judge was in town. The rest of my time was spent trying to make sense of the records of the court.

The Judge could hold about four trials an hour. I know that sounds incredible, but he didn't exactly pay attention to normal courtroom procedure. Usually, he would just hear the charges and pass sentence. The defendants were usually too frightened to say anything or were in a virtual trance during which they thought everything was perfectly normal. The frightened ones would find themselves transformed over the next hour into residents of Ovid. They would be confused at first, but they would usually find themselves playing along before very long. What else could they do? I mean, look at me. Here I was, an attractive young woman whom everyone in town knew to be Cindy Patton. What would have happened to me if I had told them my real name was Matt O'Hara? I'd be in a rubber room if I did. Most other people realized the same thing, if they remembered who they were.

About three out of four people were in a trance before the Judge. They would leave the courtroom, thinking they had gotten off lightly. They, too, would transform into new identities over the next hour. The difference is, they would never realize it. They would believe they had always been whomever they had transformed into.

Sometimes, I thought they were the lucky ones. My husband and two children, for example, believed they had always been the individuals they were now. None of them realized they were my college classmates, and they never would. But here I was, as female as I could be, after twenty-one years as a male. As much as I was learning to enjoy my new role, it had its trying moments.

Also, if I had remembered only my new life, I would have probably been given everything I needed to perform my job. In my present state, however, there was no one to train me. The Judge was nice to me, but he wasn't a teacher. Most of it I had picked up with a little effort. I knew I was supposed to schedule the Judge's trials (but never other times; he took care of that himself). I had to submit dummy paperwork to the state to make it look as if Ovid was just another normal Oklahoma municipality. But it was the other part of the job I had the most trouble with. How was I supposed to report on the transformees if the Judge never gave me all the information? All I knew was what happened in the courtroom.

When I would ask the Judge for some help, he would just smile and say, "Don't worry about it. You'll figure it out."

Figure what out? I had never even been able to figure out what the Roman gods were doing in a small town in Oklahoma. The Judge never got around to telling me that, either.

I was seriously thinking about finding a match to burn the pile of rough notes regarding the trials which I had assembled on my desk when the receptionist buzzed me.

“What is it, Mary?” I tried not to snap at her. She was only a shade, but shades had feelings, too.

“Dina Luna is here to see you.”

Who? I thought. I knew a Dinah—Dinah Moon but... Wait a minute. Luna is Spanish for Moon. “Send her in,” I told Mary.

In moments, there appeared a stunning Hispanic woman with long black hair and a perfect body encased in an expensive red dress which looked as if it had been painted on. It was Dinah all right, in a brand new body every bit as stunning as the black one I knew her in. I guess when you’re really the goddess Diana, you can look however you want.

“Buenas Dias, Chiquita!” she greeted me, swaying over to give me a sisterly hug. “Como estás?”

“I’ve been fine, Dinah,” I said, returning the hug. I was actually glad to see her. Of the gods and goddesses I had met in Ovid, Dinah was the only one I had come to consider my friend.

“It’s Dina now, hermana,” she said proudly. Then, motioning to her body, she asked, “What do you think of it?”

“It’s stunning,” I had to admit. “But so was your other body. Why did you change?”

“Why not?”

I guess when you’re a goddess, why not?

“But how about you, Señora Patton?” she said, taking a closer look at me. I was dressed in a rather flattering outfit if I do say so. It was proper business attire, but it was very feminine as well. It consisted of a silk blouse patterned with tiny lavender flowers and a gray skirt, nearly as short as hers. I had on two-inch gray heels and light, almost white stockings. I thought I looked pretty hot for a mother of two.

“Do you like it?” I asked, striking a pose.

“On you, it looks magnifico,” she said. “You just bought it.”

It wasn’t a question; it was a statement. “Yes, how did you know?”

“Because I picked out all your other clothes.”

“You?”

She shrugged. “Who else? You didn’t think the Judge picked out your wardrobe, did you?”

“I guess not.” I really hadn’t given it much thought. No wonder my wardrobe looked so good. Dinah had exquisite taste.

“And have you lost some weight?” she asked with a critical eye.

“Four pounds,” I confirmed, proudly. I had looked good from the beginning, but another two or three pounds and I would stop traffic.

“Good for you!” she said, clapping her hands. “How did you do it?”

“Oh,” I began, “I just watch what I eat. And I try to lay off alcohol.”

“Then it’s time to backslide,” she said with a devilish twinkle in her dark eyes. “Let’s go get a drink.”

“Oh, I shouldn’t,” I protested. I hadn’t had a drink in weeks—too many empty calories.

“Why not? It’s Friday and ten minutes until quitting time, and the Judge is out of town.”

True, and why not? Jerry and I had planned a romantic evening. I had been out of action for a few days with my first period. It was almost enough to make me run screaming to the Judge renewing my demands to be male again. But at least it was over for another month. Both Mike and Michelle had been invited to sleepovers, so Jerry and I had planned a nice dinner at Winston’s and then... whatever came naturally.

Then disaster struck. Jerry’s night manager had gotten sick, so Jerry had to fill in for him until the store closed at nine. By then, he would probably be too tired for any fun. The thing that really annoyed me was that Jerry’s night manager was actually a shade. That meant he wasn't even real, so he couldn't really get sick, or at least I didn't think he could. So now, instead of a pleasant evening out with my husband, I was at loose ends until the store closed.

"Oh, all right," I said. At least I could kill an hour or so of my wait with Dinah—or rather Dina.

"Bueno! Let's go."

I left the pile just where it was on my desk and locked the door. I would have to get in a little early on Monday before the Judge saw it, but I couldn't face it any more today. I was closing up ten minutes early with work still on my desk and was about to drink wine with my friend. I was a bad girl. And it felt good.

"We'll walk over to the Greenhouse," Dina said. "It's only a block."

"Sure," I agreed. It was only a block, and although late fall could be bitterly cold in Oklahoma from what I had heard, it was remarkably mild, even though the afternoon sun was very low in the sky. I slipped on my trench coat just to be safe since the temperature would probably drop before we left the Greenhouse. Dina didn't bother with a coat. I guess goddesses don't get cold.

We walked briskly toward the restaurant, causing Dina to remark, "You're walking lot better in heels now."

"I've had a lot of time to practice."

She laughed.

The Greenhouse did a decent lunch business, but the dinner crowd was usually a little sparse. Also, people in small towns don't spend much time in the bars after work, so the place was practically empty when we entered. I think Dina really liked it like that. It meant we could talk without eavesdroppers picking up our conversation. I was a little excited at the prospect since I had questions for her.

We each ordered a glass of Chardonnay and talked of inconsequential things until our drinks came. After a sip each, Dina began, "So let's hear it."

“Hear what?” I asked.

“The interesting cases. What else?”

“Okay,” I agreed, swirling the wine in its glass. “But first, tell me why all of the gods are here in Ovid.”

“They’re not,” she replied.

“Then what are...”

“Some of the gods are in Ovid,” she corrected. “Some never come here. Take my brother, Apollo. He’s never been to Ovid and will probably never come here. He didn’t even like Rome. He used to spend all his time in Greece being the god of beauty and truth and poetry and soothsaying and whatever else they could hang on him.”

This was off the subject, but I was intrigued. “I thought he was the sun god.”

She shook her head. “No, he was never that. He was the god of light, whatever that meant, but never the sun god. He’s probably sunning himself on some beach in Hawaii right now, waiting for the big wave. He usually looks like the god of surfing.”

I took another sip of wine. It tasted good, but I hated to think how many calories were in it. “So, back to my original question. What’s Ovid all about?”

Dina just shook her head and chuckled. “Girl, you won’t give up, will you? I can’t really tell you. It’s the Judge’s idea and only he can tell you. Don’t worry, though, he will. You just have to be patient. Now, about those interesting cases...”

I shrugged. “There haven’t been that many interesting ones, just your standard transformations and sex changes. Besides, I haven’t had time to write any of them down.”

“Write them down?” she repeated, laughing. “Hasn’t the Judge told you? You don’t have to write them down.”

“I don’t?”

“Of course not, silly. All the stories are in your head. All you need to do is call them up. That’s the power the Judge has given you.”

I thought about that for a moment. When I first went to the Judge and asked to be returned to my old sex, he had somehow made me see our arrival in Ovid. It had been for a few minutes as if I were back in my old body. Apparently, I could do this with others as well, if I could figure out how to do it.

“What do I need to do?” I asked.

Dina smiled and replied, “Just think of the case and remember who the defendant was. You’ll slip off into a little trance, and I’ll be able to see and feel what happened through you.”

“Well, okay,” I agreed reluctantly. “I’ll try. I guess the most interesting case happened about two weeks after I went to work for the Judge. You see, there was this lawyer...”

Damn, this car was hot!

I felt ten–no, fifteen years younger as I put my Lexus GS400 through its paces on the less-travelled highways of Oklahoma. I was really glad I had decided to drive instead of fly this trip. To fly from Oklahoma City to Little Rock would have involved either a small commuter airliner (which I hate) or changing planes in Dallas, Houston, or St Louis. Why bother? They weren’t that far apart, and it was a weekend, and I did have a brand new car–the hottest sports sedan on the market, I had been told. I had to thank the guy who sold me the car when I got back to Dallas. He told me to really appreciate it, I’d have to go on a road trip. He was right on the money.

I hadn’t felt so relaxed in years. I had just finished up a trial in Dallas, getting Billy Bob Dooley off on the murder charge for killing his girl friend. He was a rising country western star with a couple of best-selling CDs, and his studio was willing to pay big bucks to get him off the hook. It wasn’t easy, either, because he did kill her. I mean, everyone knew that. He even admitted it. But it took an attorney of my stature to get him off the hook by making a jury believe that he was acting in self-defense. How a jury could be made to believe that a two-hundred pound man was defending himself against a slip of a girl was a real test of my abilities.

How did I do it? Well, the beauty of the American judicial system is that you don't have to prove you're innocent, but the prosecution has to prove you're guilty. The deck is pretty well stacked in the defense's favor. All you have to do is make the jury unsure. If there is any doubt in their collective minds, the jury must rule in favor of the defendant. With Billy Bob, I had to make him look like a big old country boy who wouldn't hurt a fly. Then, I had to make his dead girl friend look like an unstable person who was capable of anything—a real Lizzie Borden type. Then, when Billy Bob testified that he tried to break off with her and let her down gently, only to have her attack him with a pair of sharp scissors, he tried to defend himself. But the poor guy didn't know his own strength and pushed her too hard, forcing her to fall down a flight of stairs landing on the sharp point of her own scissors.

Was it true? Maybe. Did I believe it? Not for a minute. Billy Bob is a crass character who wouldn't have given a damn about her feelings. She may have made a threatening gesture with the scissors, but he wasn't the sort of man who would be frightened by it. He probably pushed her to put her in her place, and down the stairs she went.

Did he kill her on purpose? I don't know. I like to think that he didn't. In any case, if the DA had settled for involuntary manslaughter, he might have won. But the DA was after something bigger. He thought a win against a star like Billy Bob would have set him up for higher political office. His reach exceeded his grasp, though, when he came up against me. Now, he would be lucky to get re-elected as DA.

A small portion of my fees bought this $50,000 Japanese Rice Rocket, so I was in tall cotton. Then, a chance to consult on a couple of cases, one in Oklahoma City and one in Little Rock, gave me the perfect excuse to go on a road trip. After I was finished, I would be off for Branson, Missouri, where I would meet up with Talia Moore, the hot new singing sensation. A few days shackled up with her and I would be rested and ready for the next case. How did I meet Talia? Oh, I got her brother off on a murder charge last year, and she was so grateful that one thing led to another.

One thing often did lead to another when you were Brad Monroe, 'Mouthpiece to the Stars,' as one pundit had named me.

How did I get to be Mouthpiece to the Stars? In law, timing is everything. I went through law school at Yale. It was supposed to be the best law school in the country, and I planned to be the best criminal lawyer in the country. So after law school, I took a job with a firm in Dallas. Now, Dallas is sometimes called the 'Murder Capital of the World.' It's really not that bad, but it's bad. I was very idealistic when I graduated from law school. I came from back east, and I had the impression that Texas justice was designed to railroad innocent victims onto Death Row. I was going to protect their rights and see that justice was done.

Unfortunately, I began to realize that justice often was being done. Don't get me wrong. I don't believe in the death penalty and I never will, but the felons I was suddenly faced with were often vicious, heartless killers who deserved to be put away (although not killed, I believed). Still, I did my very best to defend them. They were entitled to that.

Then, five years ago, right after I turned thirty, the big break came. A movie producer on location outside Dallas beat the hell out of local prostitute. She died, never regaining consciousness. The DA went for the whole enchilada again: Murder One. I ended up with the case because my firm had hired me out to the producer as a technical expert since the film was to be about a murder trial in a small Texas town. Life began to imitate art suddenly, and instead of advising the actors on trial procedure, I was defending the producer against real charges.

He claimed he left earlier that evening, before the girl was beaten. That explained why his prints were all over her room. The evidence was purely circumstantial, and like most prostitutes, she had more than one john on any number of occasions. The local DA never had a chance. The word got out about how there I was, a bright young lawyer who had gotten off one of the most notorious hedonists in Hollywood. It turned out everyone back in California thought he did it. Did he? He said he didn't, and that was good enough for me. Even if he had admitted it to me, he was entitled to the best defense I could provide.

Suddenly, I was on every studio's list. If there was big trouble for any star of stage, screen, television or music, call Brad Monroe. If he could get that producer off, he could get anybody off.

Unfortunately, as my professional star was rising, my personal life was in a nosedive. My wife, Brenda, and I had met in college. We were both from the east, both young and idealistic, and both likely to be in the top of our fields. She was two years younger than me, but she was closing in on a doctorate. She had majored in literature, and several universities had put out feelers to her. Her master's thesis was widely read, and her reputation would have netted her a great teaching job except for one thing: she married me.

Dallas isn't a big college town, and teaching jobs were scarce. Her sterling reputation in the east was not as great in Dallas, but we needed her to work at first since starting attorneys aren't rich from the getgo no matter what you've heard. The only job she could find was as an Assistant Librarian in Plano, the Dallas suburb where we settled. The job was beneath her, but she was happy.

We were both happy in those days. Then things started going downhill. First, we found out we couldn't have children. I never blamed her for it. She couldn't help the flaws in her reproductive system, but she blamed herself. She felt it made her less of a woman.

I didn't really notice how it had affected her. I was too busy becoming the Mouthpiece to the Stars. I didn't notice when the drinking started, but start it did. At first, she drank mostly wine. There would be a glass with me and most of a bottle at dinner. Then it would be a glass or two at lunch at the club with her friends. Then it became too much to drink at parties. She was hurting my career. I gave up drinking entirely, hoping she would follow my example. She didn't. It all came to a head almost three years ago.

I had just won the Andy McConnel rape case. You may remember it. They were calling him another River Phoenix until he was accused of raping a young girl while on location in Italy. The girl was only fourteen, and McConnel was rushed out of the country before he could be indicted. It was up to me to fight his extradition. The girl was alive, but it had been dark when the assailant pulled her into a dark alley and sexually assaulted her. McConnel was seen in a sidewalk bar, and witnesses said he had watched her walking down the street with interest. She went into a store while McConnel paid his tab and left. He was obviously drunk. The girl was seen walking in the direction he had gone minutes later.

It had been dark, I argued, and the girl could only say her assailant “looked like Andy McConnel.” There was no proof. No one had taken semen samples. McConnel may have been too drunk to rape her, and so on. I won as I always did.

I had gone home, happy in my victory to be greeted by Brenda. She had been drinking and could barely stand as I told her of my latest victory.

“So another lowlife is still on the street thanks to you,” she sneered.

“There wasn’t sufficient evidence to extradite him,” I tried to explain.

“That doesn’t mean he didn’t do it,” she countered. “Don’t you ever get tired of helping these animals escape justice?”

“Justice isn’t the only issue,” I pontificated. “What is important is the law. How can there be justice without law? The burden of proof is always on the prosecution. The defendant is always entitled to the best defense...”

“That money can buy!” she finished for me.

“No, that’s not it at all.”

“Quit deluding yourself,” she practically sobbed. “You used to have ideals. You wanted to make a difference.”

“I am making a difference.”

“You are making a mockery of decency. You don’t care if your clients are guilty or not.”

“That isn’t even an issue,” I protested. “Guilty or innocent, I’m required to defend them.”

The argument was an old one. We had had it before, but this time, all of the frustration and resentment bubbled over. She moved out that night and began divorce proceedings the next day.

I suppose I was lucky in a way. She was well off in her own right since her parents had died leaving a substantial amount to their only daughter. I was worth a couple of million on my own by then, but she went after almost nothing. Again, my reputation among my colleagues was enhanced. Brad Monroe had beaten his own wife in a divorce settlement. I said nothing, but the fact was, she asked for very little, and I gave her whatever she asked for. In spite of our problems, I still loved her.

Now I was respected, powerful, wealthy, and single. The combination drew women to me in droves. I was never without female companionship if I so desired. At first, it actually seemed an improvement in my life. What man wouldn’t view a steady diet of women as an improvement? But as the weeks went by, I found myself comparing each of them to Brenda. Many were better looking, for while Brenda was attractive, she was not glamorous. Some (only a few, if the truth be known) were intelligent, but they lacked Brenda’s keen wit.

Many was the time that I almost called her up, but pride always got in the way. I kept thinking that the very next girl I found would be her equal, but she never was. And then, one day almost a year ago, she was gone. She had planned to move back east, to Albany, New York, ever since the divorce. I had heard that through mutual friends. Then, late last fall, she made the move, and I hadn’t heard from her since. I had tried to call her once, but there was no listing for her in Albany. It was apparently unlisted. Since her friends had blamed me for the breakup and felt I had screwed her over the divorce settlement, I knew better than to call them for her number. They would never give it to me.

"I miss you, Brenda," I said to myself as I soared through the Oklahoma countryside. "I should never have let you go."

I snapped out of my reverie as I pulled the Lexus through a sharply banked curve in the road. It was stupid of me to even think about Brenda. Here I was, on my way to a rendezvous with Talia Moore. I'd be on the cover of a magazine or two after that and be the envy of half the men in America. Maybe Talia would be the one.

I could have driven Interstate 40. It was the most direct route between Oklahoma City and Little Rock, but I knew it was heavily patrolled, and I had no intention of being restricted to the speed limits while driving a GS400. I chose more challenging two-lane roads which wound through the hills of eastern Oklahoma as they slowly became the beginning of the Ozarks. I pushed the car through the straightaway to well over a hundred, never getting even close to its governed top speed of 148, but fast enough that the telephone poles were going by almost too fast to count. I would slow down in the curves, but not enough to miss the sensation of torque as my marvellous machine gripped the road.

It was on a small unmarked section of what I assumed to be a state highway that I saw a white car in my rear view mirror. I couldn't tell from where he had pulled out onto the road. It was almost as if he had appeared from out of nowhere. I had been watching carefully for patrol cars. Perhaps, I thought to myself, it wasn't really a patrol car. That hope was dashed when the dreaded red and blue lights on top of his car began to flash.

Damn! How fast had I been going anyway? I looked down and saw that I had unconsciously brought the car down to a tepid seventy miles an hour, but I must have been doing nearly a hundred when I went past his vantage point. It was time to stop and face the music. With any luck, he would recognize me, at least by name and I would be able to charm him into letting me go with a warning or, at most, a minor ticket. The last thing I wanted was to be bogged down in some little tank town waiting for some small-time traffic court judge to tell me what a bad boy I had been.

I looked back at the car. A single officer was in the vehicle. As we both stopped by the side of the road, I watched him as he got out of the car. He was tall and slender to the point of being almost thin. His movements were fluid and graceful, almost like a dancer as he approached the car. His eyes were hidden behind the mirrored sunglasses that were always popular in law enforcement.

I rolled down the window and said as charmingly as I could, "Good afternoon, officer."

"Good afternoon, sir," he said formally. "Sir, do you have any idea how fast you were going back there?"

"Well," I said slowly, as if I were giving it some thought as I read the name on his name tag, "I'm not really sure. But you see, Officer... Mercer, is it? Well, Officer Mercer, you see, this is a new car and I'm not entirely..."

"Step out of the vehicle, please, sir."

"Oh, yes, of course. Do you want to see my license and registration?" I asked, climbing out of the car.

"Yes, please."

I handed him my wallet, telling him that the registration was in the center console. He examined both, then looked at me from behind the mirrored glasses. "Sir, do you have any idea how fast you were going?"

"No, I'm sorry, but I don't," I said abjectly. "You see, I was thinking about a case I had been working on, and..."

"You were clocked at ninety-six miles an hour."

I knew he was correct, but I feigned surprise. "I had no idea! Well, Officer, if you'll just give me my ticket, I'll be on my way." Sometimes, when you're willing to accept the ticket, they let you go with a warning.

Maybe I would get lucky.

"I can't do that sir," he replied, the deadpan expression never changing.

"I beg your pardon?"

"I said I can't do that, sir," he repeated. "You were thirty-one miles per hour over the speed limit. State law requires me to impound your vehicle and place you under arrest pending trial."

I had no idea what Oklahoma law said on the matter, but my cooperation turned to recalcitrance. "Officer, I'm in no position to be delayed. I'm due in Little Rock in the morning to consult on a very important trial. Detaining me may cause a delay in a court date which would be frowned upon by your superiors, I'm sure."

"The keys, please, sir," he said, ignoring my tirade. "And please get in the vehicle on the passenger side. I'll drive your vehicle."

"I can drive it," I argued. "Otherwise, you'll have to leave your vehicle here."

"That's been taken care of, sir," he answered, nodding to his police cruiser.

I looked up at his car and was surprised to see an officer sitting behind the wheel. Where had he come from? I was sure there had only been one officer in the car. Wordlessly, I handed him my keys and got in the passenger side.

I rode in silence as Officer Mercer drove, his partner driving just behind us. The two officers must have worked together for a long time, I thought, since the two cars seemed to move almost as one, the interval between the cars never changing.

At last, I asked, "How long until I can see the judge? As I told you, I have to be in Little Rock in the morning."

"The Judge won't be back until morning," he told me. "You'll be a guest of the city of Ovid tonight."

Ovid? I had never heard of a town called Ovid. "Surely you don't plan to keep me in jail until tomorrow morning.”

“I’ll have to do just that, sir,” he said.

“I’ll post bail,” I offered, trying to control my rising fury. I had no intention of being incarcerated, even for one night.

“There’s no judge to grant you a bail hearing,” he explained, “and Oklahoma law requires you to be held until the Judge is available.”

“That’s ridiculous!” I finally exploded. “That can’t be the law. You’re denying due process.”

“I wouldn’t know about that, sir,” he replied innocently. “You’ll have to take that up with the Judge in the morning.”

The rest of the trip was conducted in grim silence. I was quietly fuming, trying to decide my best course of action. It appeared I had no choice in the matter of my confinement. It was afternoon on Sunday. By the time I got hold of anyone who could help me, it would be late evening or maybe even Monday morning. This was going to screw up my schedule for the entire week. I would have to wait until morning and raise hell with this judge he kept referring to. With any luck at all, I would have Officer Mercer’s head on a platter before I left Ovid.

As we drove into the town, I was surprised to find it was much larger than I had expected. It looked like any of a number of small Midwestern farm communities. I estimated the town to be at least ten thousand people, maybe half again that. It was clean and well-maintained, with the usual assortment of small businesses clustered along the highway and a small business district. Most of the downtown buildings were two and three story affairs with retail shops on the first level and offices above.

We pulled up in front of a small complex of buildings with a sign on one of them which proclaimed it to be the city hall. The police department was right next to it. The buildings had that timeless look of modern government buildings, except for the Doric columns framing an area which was probably the city courts. I estimated they were maybe fifteen or twenty years old. Since I was going to be staying at the Steel Bar Hilton for the evening, I was grateful it wasn't one of the old courthouse jails built back before the Depression. Evenings were cool in Oklahoma this late in the year, and I didn't want to spend the night in a drafty cell which should have been condemned back when Truman was President.

Officer Mercer showed me to my cell and personally brought me a clean shirt, fresh underwear and my electric razor from my bag. That was one advantage of a small town jail. In Dallas, I would never have been allowed personal items in my cell. He even let me keep my briefcase so I could get a little work done.

It appeared as if I had the entire cell block to myself, so it was quiet and clean. Even the bed was fairly comfortable, so my evening wasn't too bad, but I wouldn't have let Officer Mercer know that. He looked in on me a couple of times to be greeted by my best scowl. I seemed to be his only entertainment since I was apparently the only prisoner.

Come to think of it, I mused, I had not met any other police officers. When we had entered the station, there was no one at the front desk. There were no voices coming from any of the offices we passed either. I finally chalked it up to life in a small town. With little crime, probably most of the force took Sunday off to go to church and barbecue in the back yard. Whoever was minding the station had probably been in the back room getting coffee when we came in. At least it would be quiet and I could get some sleep.

I was awaked the next morning by a tapping on the bars. I opened my eyes and turned my head to see Officer Mercer standing there. "It's six thirty," he told me. "The Judge wants to see you at eight, so I got you up so you could take a shower and get some breakfast."

"Yeah, thanks," I muttered. After a shower and dressed in a clean shirt and underwear, I was beginning to feel human again. I thought about asking for a suit, but if I looked too sharp, I wouldn't be able to press home my point to the judge that I had been inconvenienced.

I wondered what the judge would be like. To me, judge was a title, like the banker or the plumber. When Officer Mercer said it, though, it was as if 'Judge' was the judge's name. Apparently, they only had one judge in municipal court. Maybe I could impress upon him all the people I knew who might be able to get him a seat on a higher court. If I could convince him that I was important enough, he should go easy on me. I'd have to wait and see before trying that, though. If he decided he was hot shit in this burg, I could get myself in deeper by playing the big city lawyer.

Breakfast was served in my cell. I was surprised to see it was like something out of a small town restaurant instead of institutional jail food. It went down pretty good. Even the coffee was hot and fresh. I found myself wondering if Miss Kitty had brought it over from the Long Branch covered in a little gingham napkin. I actually chuckled at the thought.

Officer Mercer led me into the courtroom right at eight o'clock. I was actually surprised at the appearance of the courtroom. The decor was fairly recent and very stately. Walnut wainscoting surrounded the room and the bench was quite imposing for a municipal courtroom. There was only one person seated in the visitor's gallery. She was a very attractive woman with dark blonde hair. In her navy blue suit, I assumed she was probably an attorney waiting for a client for a morning hearing or trial. I smiled at her, and she smiled back. I couldn't get close enough to see if she was wearing a wedding ring. She probably was. I couldn't imagine someone like her staying single very long.

"All rise!" Officer Mercer intoned, acting to my amazement as bailiff as well. That I would have expected in a small town. "Municipal Court for the City of Ovid is now in session, the Honorable Judge presiding."

I wondered if my hearing was going bad. I hadn't heard him announce the judge's name. I must have missed it, I thought.

The Judge (for upon seeing him, he rated the capital 'J') was an impressive figure. With his dark hair just starting to turn to gray and his scholarly beard, he didn't even need his gold-rimmed glasses to look like one of my professors at Yale. His robe was perfectly draped around him, as if he were sitting for the annual picture of the US

Supreme Court Justices.

"Be seated," he intoned. I heard the rustle of a skirt as the blonde sat. Since Officer Mercer at my side remained standing, so did I.

"First case," he ordered as Officer Mercer placed a thin folder in front of him. "Mr. Bradley Monroe, you have been charged with speeding. We're a little short of time around here, so let's just proceed with your sentence."

"Your Honor!" I interjected. "This is not proper courtroom procedure, even for something as relatively informal as municipal court."

"You don't say," the Judge said with a soft Oklahoma twang. "And just what gives you the authority to tell me this?"

"I'm an attorney," I said, almost as if I had said, "I'm Batman." If I had expected the Judge to react to this, I was disappointed.

"I know who you are, Mr. Monroe, but that doesn't give you the right to challenge the procedure in my courtroom. Are you licensed to practice in the state of Oklahoma?"

Actually, I wasn't. I had consulted in the state, but never appeared before the bar. "Not exactly, Your Honor, but..."

"I don't understand 'not exactly,' Mr. Monroe. The only two available responses would seem to be 'yes' or 'no.' Now, which is it?"

"No, Your Honor," I admitted.

"Is it my understanding that you wish to defend yourself against these charges?"

I had been willing to plead guilty, pay my fine, and move on, but the Judge had riled my legal dander. "I do, Your Honor."

To my surprise, he stood and intoned something which sounded like Latin. I picked up a word or two. Every attorney knows a little Latin since so many legal terms are in that language, but I couldn't catch enough words to make any sense of it. Then, he sat down again. Was it my imagination, or had the lights dimmed while he was speaking?

“Very well, Mr. Monroe,” he said, writing something on a slip of paper. He handed the slip to Officer Mercer, who in turn handed it to me.

“This is the name of one of our local attorneys. With her help, you will be given everything you need to practice in this court.”

I looked at the slip of paper. The name ‘Susan Henderson’ was written on it, as well as an address and phone number. “How long should this take, Your Honor?” I asked.

“You will be able to practice in this court by the end of today’s session. Normally, we adjourn at noon, but I’ve had to double up since I’ll be out of town tomorrow. You may appear before me this afternoon at two if everything is in order.”

Two o’clock! What was I thinking? I was supposed to be in Little Rock. Now, I would shoot the entire day here in Ovid. Well, there was nothing to be done about it, I supposed. I would have to see this Susan Henderson and go from there.

“Until two then, Mr. Monroe.”

Officer Mercer escorted me from the courtroom. As we reached the outside door, I stopped him and asked, “Where are you taking me?”

“The Judge wants me to escort you to Ms. Henderson’s office,” he replied.

“I didn’t hear him say anything about that,” I commented.

“Its standard procedure,” he replied from behind his sunglasses.

It wouldn’t do any good to argue, I realized. “All right,” I agreed, “but can I use a phone first? I need to call Little Rock and tell them I’ll be a day late.”

“You can call from Ms. Henderson’s office.”

As I was led out to the police car, I noted another officer with a pair of teenagers dressed very punk. He was leading them into the courtroom. There were two things that struck me as odd, though. First, both teenagers, a boy and a girl, appeared to be almost in a trance, walking in a shuffling step with their eyes looking forward but apparently not focused on anything. The second thing was that the officer leading them in looked like a virtual clone of Officer Mercer. Before I could get a better look, Officer Mercer nudged me gently into the passenger seat and closed the door.

I rubbed my eyes. It was only nine, and yet this had been a tiring morning. I actually felt a little light headed, and there was a tingling sensation throughout my entire body. I began to wonder if all of this frustration had played havoc with my blood pressure. I worked out frequently to keep in shape and keep my blood pressure down, but maybe Ovid had driven it up. The doctor had warned me it was getting a little high the last time I saw him. I resolved to get a check-up when I got back to Dallas.

We turned on to the main business street, and for the first time, I noticed something which had evaded me the day before. On Sunday, few people will be walking around in the business district of a small town, so I had not seen anyone other than Officer Mercer. Today, though, was Monday, and there were people everywhere going about their business. The problem was that many of them didn't appear to be complete. It was as if I could almost see through them, like a double image in a photograph. Other people—normal people—appeared not to notice anything strange and even stopped to talk with the strange ones.

Before I could ask Officer Mercer about them (although I honestly don't know what I would have asked him), he said. "That's Susan Henderson's car over there."

He was pointing at a Honda Civic diagonally parked in front of a Radio Shack. It looked to be about three years old. Apparently being a lawyer in a small town didn't pay all that well.

"So where is her office?" I asked.

Officer Mercer pointed to the gray stucco building next to the Radio Shack which proclaimed itself to be the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank. "Second floor. The entrance is over there next to the bank entrance."

“Thanks a lot,” I said, not really meaning it as I opened the car door. “Don’t you want to escort me upstairs, just to make sure I don’t skip town?”

“You won’t,” he said so matter-of-factly that I paused to wonder how he could be so sure. “And when you get a minute,” he called after me, “you might want to move the Civic. The meter is expired.”

I turned to ask him why in the world I would want to move someone else’s car, but he had already driven away.

As I climbed the stairs, I found myself hoping Susan Henderson had a good working relationship with the Judge. I needed to get out of Ovid and back to work as quickly as possible. I realized the Judge intended for this woman to be my attorney of record. Then, she could use me in court as a consultant on my own case while she defended me. It would cost me the amount of her fee, but it was preferable to waiting for approval to practice in Oklahoma.

Her office was at the end of the hall toward the front of the building. The door was open, so I went in. It was a two-office suite. The outer office was obviously used as a waiting room with a desk for a secretary/receptionist while the inner office must have been Ms. Henderson’s. It appeared that no one was home and might not have been home for some time. While there were the usual guest chairs and desks and filing cabinets, there were no other signs of life. There were no pictures on the walls or potted plants in the corner or magazines in the waiting area. The secretarial desk was completely devoid of any personal items. There was a computer on it, but the screen was blank.

Then I noticed a telephone on the desk in the inner office. I still needed to call Little Rock, and since no one was home, I didn’t think they would mind if I used the phone. I would reimburse them later. I dialed the number of Mayberry Jessup, the firm in Little Rock where I was already an hour overdue for my appointment. When the receptionist answered, I asked for Henry Mayberry.

“Mr. Mayberry is in a meeting right now,” she told me.

“Yes, I know,” I told her. I had given her my name, but she apparently didn’t connect me with the meeting. “Again, my name is Brad Monroe, and I’m supposed to be in that meeting with Mr. Mayberry.”

“Oh. One moment, please.”

I listened to innocuous background music for perhaps two minutes, growing more annoyed as the seconds passed. At least I heard someone typing on the keyboard in the out office. Apparently, Ms. Henderson’s secretary had just stepped out for a potty break.

“Mr. Monroe?” the voice on the phone asked. To my disappointment, it was the secretary—not Henry Mayberry.

“Yes?”

“I’m sorry, but Mr. Mayberry said he did not expect you for this meeting.”

I was suddenly very confused. “But isn’t the meeting to discuss the Nichols case?”

“Yes,” she said hesitantly, as if I had dragged top-secret information out of her.

“Then I’m supposed to be there.”

“Mr. Monroe,” the secretary began in her most imperious tone, “I’m afraid Mr. Mayberry has never heard of you. Now, good day.”

The line went silent. What did she mean he had never heard of me? I had presented a paper at the Arkansas ABA Convention three months ago and met Henry Mayberry then. He had asked me to consult on the Nichols case and we had discussed it by phone at least once a week. This whole thing was starting to make my head spin.

I sat down behind Susan Henderson’s desk. The tingling sensation was stronger, and I was so light headed that I was actually dizzy. The entire room seemed to be going in and out of focus. Then, as I looked at the blank wall in front of me, a picture suddenly formed on it. It was a still life of a very tasteful wildflower arrangement, frame and all. A bookcase suddenly appeared with a little pop as it displaced the air.

As I watched, law books began to appear neatly one by one on the shelves.

I tried to get up, but I found I couldn't. I seemed to have lost partial control of my limbs. I looked down in distress as my clothing seemed to be crawling over my body, like ants at a picnic. My shirt and pants seemed to be reshaping themselves. Then, suddenly, I realized that it wasn't just my clothing. My entire body was shifting as well. I managed to push the chair away from the desk and look down as my pants changed color, from gray to a light tan. Then, the legs of the pants grew short, moving up my legs and fusing into a... skirt?

I looked down at my legs. They were hairless and less muscular, and a thin film of nylon was knitting itself over them. My black oxfords were becoming smaller and more open, and a two inch heel formed on each of them as they changed into a soft brown color.

Something was crawling on my neck. I managed to turn my head to see a fan of light brown hair drift over my shoulders. I could feel the hair growing longer by the second. There was a sharp pin prick on each of my ear lobes, and I felt a sudden small weight on each ear.

I knew what was happening to me. How could I not know? It was impossible; it had to be, but the impossible seemed commonplace in Ovid.

There was an abrupt contraction in my groin, and I knew at once that where my penis and testicles had happily resided moments before, there was now only a feminine slit in their place. Something soft and clinging covered the new anatomy. I crazily wondered what color these new panties were. Breasts were starting to grow under what was now a silky beige blouse with a scoop neckline. A delicate gold necklace looped itself around my neck. The breasts continued to grow. I knew they were not inordinately large—probably only a B cup—but I didn't want to have breasts of any size!

I was now wearing a tan jacket which matched my skirt. On my right wrist, a gold bracelet appeared out of nowhere balanced by a small, feminine watch on my left wrist. My fingernails were actually growing as I watched them, tapering into points. They weren't terribly long, but they were obviously feminine.

As I was changing, the room was changing as well. A coat rack was suddenly standing in the corner with a woman's trench coat and multi-shaded brown scarf hung over it. Files were appearing on the desk, as were pens and pencils. On a chair near the windows, a brown purse suddenly popped into existence.

Just when I thought the changes had stopped, a pair of glasses appeared on the desk. They had small wire frames and oval lenses. I looked up to see if anything else had changed, but the room was now blurred to my vision. Great, I thought, realizing whom the glasses were for. It wasn't enough for them to change my sex; they had to make me nearsighted as well. With a frightened sigh, I put on the glasses. The world drew back into sharp focus again.

The popping and swishing noises of the changes had stopped, and the only sounds I could hear were the sounds of someone typing in the outer office and the nervous breathing coming from my (my?) own body.

I could move again, but I didn't want to. It was almost as if I thought that as long as I didn't move and feel the movement of breasts and hips, it would all go away. All I had to do was sit still until I woke up from the nightmare. It had to be a dream. There couldn't be a town where all the police officers looked alike and teenagers walked around in a trance and offices rearranged themselves and some people were almost transparent and other people changed sex, could there?

I thought back upon my recent exchange with the Judge. How had he phrased it? He said something to the effect that with the help of Susan Henderson, I would be able to practice—no. What he said was I would be given everything I needed to practice in his court. Everything I needed? A vagina, for example?

I was dealing with a clever man, if 'man' was the right term. There was no doubt in my mind that what had happened to me was the work of the Judge and his minions. Officer Mercer was certainly one of his cohorts. Were there others? What about the attractive blonde who had been sitting in the courtroom?

I had a court date at two that afternoon. That left me a little over four hours to figure out a strategy. Did the Judge plan to leave me like this? With a sinking feeling, I realized he probably did. I wondered how many other residents of Ovid had been changed by that... creature. But would he leave me a way out—a way to get back to my old life? Maybe he would. I suspected he was playing a game with me. If I won, I would have my old life back, but if I lost, it would be pantyhose and heels for the rest of my life. There was no doubt in my mind that my two o'clock court date would be the most important of my life.

I had to prepare. I needed first to find out as much about who I had become as possible. That might provide some clue as to how to approach the Judge. I got up slowly, balancing for the first time on heels. I had thought it would be no more difficult than walking in cowboy boots, but I was wrong. I was required to walk in an entirely different manner which caused my hips to sway back and forth in what I considered an exaggerated motion. I managed to figure it out pretty quickly. I walked back and forth between the desk and the purse three or four times until I got the hang of it. Still, I wondered how women I knew managed to balance themselves on even higher heels. I hoped I didn't have the chance to find out.

The purse contained the usual collection of garbage all women seem to carry around. There were tissues, credit card receipts, keys, a compact and lipstick. I shuddered when I held the lipstick in my hand. Then, tentatively touching my tongue to my upper lip, I felt an odd taste and realized I was already wearing some of it. I shuddered in disgust. At the bottom of the purse (why is whatever a woman is looking for always at the bottom of a purse?) was a wallet.

I extracted an Oklahoma driver's license and winced at the picture. Was there ever a good driver's license picture? This one had what I could only assume was my new face. It was an attractive face, but falling short of pretty. The gold framed glasses I now wore were posed on the girl's face in the picture. She wore long dangling earrings and only light makeup. The picture was cropped above the breasts, but she (I still couldn't think of her as me) appeared to be wearing a mauve sweater, very light and feminine. She looked more like a college student than an attorney. I thought she would be more at home picketing the Student Union than arguing in a courtroom. Perhaps this was part of my handicap. Instead of a dynamic attorney like Brad Monroe, I would have to sway a judge in the guise of a neophyte lawyer.

My age was listed as twenty-five, confirming my suspicions that Susan Henderson was a fairly inexperienced attorney. I was five seven, so at least in heels I wouldn't feel like a midget. Hair color was brown, eyes were blue, and the weight was... well, I guess the weight is nobody's business. That was an odd thought, I realized. If someone had asked me the day before what my weight was, I would have proudly told them one seventy-two. At a little over six feet in height, that was a pretty good weight for a man in his thirties, and I would have been proud of it. Now, though, although a quick glance at my body told me I was well proportioned, and if anything, a little on the slender side, it was still a subject I didn't want to discuss.

"Susan?"

I looked up just because I heard someone speak, but I realized in a heartbeat that I was supposed to be Susan, so I replied, "Yes?"

The speaker was a woman, probably early forties with soft brown hair just starting to go gray. She was dressed in a conservative dark blue dress and was fairly attractive in a motherly sort of way. To my dismay, she was also one of the semi-transparent people I had noticed. I realized it must have been her I heard at the keyboard.

"Norman Collier just called," she said, as if I would know whom she was talking about. "He said he is running about fifteen minutes late."

"What time was he supposed to be here?" I asked, pleased that my voice, although feminine, was the type of voice that would be effective in court. I had been afraid I would have a high, childish voice, but this pleasant alto voice would do.

“He was due here at ten,” she said in a voice that told me that I should have known what time he was due.

“Okay,” I said. “I’ll be back in a minute.”

I had passed the restrooms on my way in, so I knew where they were. I didn’t have to go (thank God), but I did want to get a preliminary look at my appearance. If I looked as bad as my driver’s license photo... well, let’s just say that if I had to be a woman, I would rather be an attractive one.

With trepidation, I entered the women’s restroom. I felt like a voyeur. If the Judge really wanted to play with me, he would change me back as I entered the restroom and have me picked up on every perversion charge imaginable. I would have gladly taken my chances on that, but when I looked in the full-length mirror along the far wall, I saw the face of a woman. I was relieved to see I was actually fairly attractive. I mean, the cosmetics companies would not have been climbing all over themselves to sign me as a model, but I wasn’t bad. I had that fresh-scrubbed average all-American girl look. I hated it, but if I had to be a girl, I was happy to be a normal looking one.

As far as the details were concerned, my hair was pretty long, flowing about half way down my back. It was as brown as brown can be and looked shiny and healthy. There were small pearls on gold settings hanging from my ears, and my makeup was feminine but a little understated. My lashes appeared naturally long, and I was surprised to note that my glasses actually made them look more alluring, like a picture in a frame.

I looked down my breasts, hoping no one would come in at that moment. I suppose I could make it look like I was adjusting my bra. As I suspected, my breasts were fairly small. I think the term one might use for them would be ‘pert.’ That was fine with me. I had heard too many women with large breasts complain endlessly about how uncomfortable they were. That was one distraction I didn’t need.

Probably my best feature was my legs. They were long and smooth with well-shaped ankles. I felt as if I had forgotten to wear any pants as I looked at them, encased in that tight tan skirt. I resolved to be careful of how I sat. I would have to keep my legs very close together, as unnatural as that was for me.

All in all, I could have done a lot worse, I realized. I looked feminine without looking dainty; I looked professional without looking butch, and I was attractive enough to feel good about myself without being so stunning that men would be spending an undue amount of time staring at my body. I never stopped to think at the time that these thoughts ran through my head how uncharacteristic they were.

When I got back to the office, a man was waiting for me. He was dressed in a plaid shirt, leather jacket, work pants and boots. And he wasn't transparent. From the look of him, I suspected he was a farmer. I didn't know if he was my appointment, or if I should know him or not, but he solved the dilemma for me when he said, "I'm sorry I'm late, Susan, but I had a little trouble finding everything."

"No problem," I said smoothly, unsure if I should call him Norm, Norman, or Mr. Collier. "Let's go to my office."

As we sat and my secretary offered coffee, which he gratefully accepted, it was time to get down to business. Unfortunately, I had no idea what the business we had to get down to was. Was this our first meeting, or was this part of an ongoing process about which I hadn't a clue? Again, he saved me by saying, "I brought these papers in for you to look at." He placed a neat file folder on my desk.

I opened the file and found several documents pertaining to a property sale with subsequent financing documents. It was easy to see what his problem was. The seller had backed out, refusing to return his deposit, claiming that Mr. Collier had not obtained proper financing in the requisite amount of time. It was a simple case that any first year law student could have handled. I hadn't done property law in years, but I was confident I could help him and told him so. He left, pleased that he had found a competent lawyer to handle his problems. I only hoped that by the time it was actually settled, I would be back in my own life. Let someone else be Susan Henderson.

My appointment had taken almost an hour. I checked with my secretary and found I had no more appointments for the day. That was both good news and bad news. The good news was that I would have time to prepare for my two o'clock trial date with the Judge. The bad news was that if I was stuck in this life very long, I would need more than one appointment a day to pay the rent.

I was wondering idly if I could get in to see the Judge any earlier when an opportunity to do just that presented itself on my doorstep. The opportunity was in the form of a sixteen-year-old boy named Johnny Lavelle.

"Susan?" Dori said (I had finally looked up my secretary's name in her file in my drawer—it was Dori Smithwick). "There's a young man out here without an appointment, but he says it's very important that he see you."

"Okay," I agreed. The young man looked like a high school football player. He was about six-two, in good shape, and handsome (now where had that thought come from?). He was dressed in jeans and a sweatshirt that bore the legend 'Ovid High School.' He muttered his name almost too low for me to hear. Of course, it didn't help that he was busy looking down trying to see down my blouse. This was Johnny Lavelle. After introductions, we sat down and I asked him, "Aren't you a little young to need an attorney on your own?"

"Look," the boy began, "let's cut the bullshit. I know you aren't who you look like and you know I'm not who I look like."

What did he mean? Was it that obvious, or was everyone in Ovid not who they seemed to be?

"Go on," I prodded.

He peered at me. "First, I gotta know, were you a lawyer before, or were you something else?"

I was something else all right, I thought, but I answered, "I was a lawyer. A very good one, too."

"Okay. Now," he said, satisfied, stretching out in the chair, "I'm—or at least I was a twenty-four-year-old man until I came to Ovid. The Judge, he changed me into a fifteen-year-old kid. He claimed I was driving reckless and endangering people, so he made me fifteen so I could be young enough to take Driver's Ed. He put me in a family of shades and..."

"Excuse me," I said, "but what is a shade?"

He grinned. "Boy, you are new here, ain't you? Shades are like your secretary. They're not real. I mean, you can talk to 'em, though 'em, even screw 'em, but they ain't real."

"But where do they come from?" I asked, genuinely interested.

"How the hell would I know? Now, do you wanna hear my problem or not?"

"Go ahead," I said, really hoping there was a reform school in Ovid.

"So that pig, Mercer, he picks me up for speeding. He said I was doin' fifty in a school zone. What a dork!"

"Did he clock you?"

He shook his head. "You don't know Mercer very good, do you? He don't need no speed gun to tell you how fast you're going. He just knows."

That was a little factoid I filed away for my own defense. "So when is your trial?"

"Noon today."

I shook my head. "Why didn't you come to an attorney earlier?"

"You gotta be shittin' me, lady," he said. I cringed silently as he called me 'lady.' "All the other lawyers in this fucked up town are shades. They'd just do whatever the Judge told them to do. He'd probably make me into a tree like that other guy."

"He turned someone into a tree?" I asked, horrified. There were apparently worse fates than being changed into Ovid's answer to Ally McBeal.

“Yeah. Some pervert. I don’t know the whole story. Mostly, people are afraid to talk about this shit.”

I could understand why, but he seemed to be willing to talk about it, so I asked, “Just who is this Judge anyway?”

A scowl appeared on his face. “That’s one thing we can’t talk about.”

“Why won’t you talk about it?”

“Weren’t you listening, lady?” he snapped. “I said ‘can’t.’ We all figure out who he is, but we can’t talk about it. I figure it’s part of the spell.”

He slumped back in his chair. “So can you get me off?”

“Well,” I began, “if he didn’t clock you, we may have a chance.”

Actually, I was starting to get excited. If this defense worked for this obnoxious teen, it might work for me as well. It was worth a shot.

I got all the pertinent facts from him: the time and place and so on, and at eleven thirty, we left for court.

Susan Henderson’s Honda Civic was not much of a car, but it got us to court in time. I was actually looking forward to this. Even though Johnny Lavelle probably deserved to have the book thrown at him, I thought I had a good chance of beating the rap. We would call Officer Mercer to testify and destroy his testimony since he didn’t have the readings from a radar gun to back him up. This could work.

We entered the municipal building just as Officer Mercer was coming out of the courtroom. He was holding the leash of a very unhappy Basset hound. “Ms. Henderson,” he nodded, ignoring my client. Then, to the dog, he said, “Come on, Sam. Your new master’s waiting.”

The dog looked up at me with sad brown eyes and whined. I could guess he was trying to say, “And you think you have it bad...” I gave an involuntary shudder.

“Jeez,” Johnny muttered, “the Judge is in a piss-poor mood today. You’d better be damned good, lady.”

So help me god, I thought, if he calls me ‘lady’ one more time, I’m going to... going to... what? Hit him with my purse? Beside, lady was probably the best he could do. After talking with Johnny for a while, I'm surprised he didn't call me a cunt.

When we entered the courtroom, the Judge was nowhere to be seen. I assumed he was in chambers. I was surprised to see Officer Mercer acting as bailiff, though.

"I thought you just left," I said to him.

"I did," was all he said in reply.

The blonde was still there in the visitor's gallery. She was as attractive as ever, but I found to my surprise that I was having some odd thoughts as I watched her. I kept wondering what I would look like if my hair was styled like hers, and where had she gotten that dress? Be careful, Brad, I told myself. These are not thoughts to be thinking. Apparently more than my body had been affected by the change. It was time to get down to business and get my old body back.

"All rise!"

I hurried Johnny to stand next to me at the defense table as the Judge entered the room.

"Be seated," he said without looking at the audience. When he was seated, he looked up at me, one eyebrow raised. "Ms. Henderson, I was under the impression that you would be here at two o'clock. I believe it's just now noon, and I have a trial with Mr. Lavelle."

I stood, trying to look imposing and failing. "Yes, Your Honor," I agreed. "I am acting as legal counsel for Mr. Lavelle."

"Legal counsel?"

"Yes, Your Honor. I believe I am authorized to represent defendants in this court."

The Judge was silent for a moment. Then, he nodded and said, "Very well, Ms. Henderson. I hope you know what you're doing. Your client is charged with speeding. How do you plead?"

I nudged Johnny, hoping he would remember to say what I told him.

"Uh... not guilty, Your Honor."

I breathed a tiny sigh of relief.

“Not guilty!” the Judge said loudly. I could have sworn I heard the rumble of thunder when he spoke. “Officer Mercer picked you up for doing fifty in a school zone. How can you plead not guilty?”

“Your Honor,” I said with a calmness I did not feel, “Officer Mercer did not actually clock my client’s speed at the time of the arrest. Therefore...”

“Officer Mercer!” the Judge interrupted.

“Yes, Your Honor?”

“How fast was this young hoodlum going?”

I tried to break in by saying, “Your Honor, this is not proper courtroom procedure.”

His wrath was suddenly turned on me. “Are you trying to tell me how to run this court, young lady?”

There was that lady word again. “No, Your Honor, but...”

“Then answer the question!” the Judge said to the bailiff.

“He was travelling at exactly fifty-three point six miles per hour,” Officer Mercer recited.

“Good. Then Mr. Lavelle is guilty,” the Judge declared.

“Your... Your Honor,” I stammered, “how can you just take his word for it? I mean, he didn’t have a radar gun.”

“Ms. Henderson,” the Judge said in a condescending tone, “if you would take the time to read our Municipal Code, you would know that the word of an officer is sufficient in this court.”

“But surely that law couldn’t stand up under state laws,” I argued, getting angrier by the minute.

“No, I imagine it couldn’t,” he agreed, “but in Ovid, you don’t just get law; you get justice!”

Many years ago, a Federal judge supposedly told a young attorney,

“In this world, you get law. In the next world, you get justice.”

Apparently, Ovid was closer to the next world. I was in deep shit, and I knew it. It was time to shut up. The Judge was obviously baiting me.

“Yes, Your Honor,” I said meekly, eyes downcast.

Mollified, the Judge went on, “Mr. Lavelle, I had thought that taking Driver’s Education would improve your driving skills. It seems I was wrong. Perhaps you need a little more time to grow up before you get behind the wheel of a car again.”

The Judge stood and began the chanting again I had heard at my own appearance that morning. This time, I was ready for it. I listened closely, but could only pick out a word or two. What little Latin we use in the legal profession is unaccented. This Latin (if it was in fact really Latin) was warmly accented with a flavor that made it sound almost like modern Italian.

Unlike my own situation, this change was almost instantaneous.

Apparently, it didn’t really take any time at all to invoke the spell. I watched as Johnny started to shrink. There was a look of terror in his eyes as he became smaller. I wondered if he was going to disappear entirely, but when he was about two feet tall, the shrinking stopped. His hair was growing longer and weaving itself into two tiny pigtailed with a little pink ribbon on each one. His jeans and sweatshirt turned pink and became a small, frilly dress. White leggings were now on his tiny legs and little white shoes. He—or I suppose I should say she—looked up at me with her pretty little blue eyes and said, “Wady, some wawyer you turned out to be.”

“Officer Mercer,” the Judge said, “would you escort little Lisa Ann home?”

“Yes, Your Honor.”

I turned and watched with a mixture of horror and amusement as little Lisa Ann took Officer Mercer’s hand and was led reluctantly from the courtroom. She looked back at me with disgust, and I realized with a start that I had just lost my first case ever. That was a sobering thought since my own turn before the Judge was quickly approaching.

“Ms. Henderson!” the Judge’s voice boomed from behind me.

Reluctantly, I turned to face the Judge. As much as I didn’t want to be Susan Henderson, I was beginning to realize that my fate was a pleasant one compared to becoming a three-year-old girl or a dog or a tree. I was somewhat relieved, though, when I saw that the anger had left his face. He looked serene and compassionate, the perfect model of a modern judge.

“Ms. Henderson,” he began in an almost fatherly tone, “I actually admire your spirit. It took a lot of courage for you to try to defend that little rat in this court. You still don’t seem to understand how the system works here in Ovid, though.”

He paused for a moment, as if waiting for me to reply. I thought better of it, though, and continued to give him my best contrite, attentive look. I hoped that it was the right look. After all, I wasn’t used to this face. He seemed satisfied and continued, “Instead of our two o’clock session, perhaps we can come to some agreement now. You are qualified by virtue of your current identity to practice before this court, so have you prepared your defense?”

I had, but I realized it would be as unproductive as my defense of Johnny—or rather Lisa—Lavelle. Think fast, Brad, I told myself, or it’s pantyhose and purses for the rest of your life.

“Your Honor,” I said finally, “may I approach the bench?”

“By all means.”

I walked with as much dignity as I could muster in unfamiliar heels to the bench and said, “Your Honor, I don’t understand all of this, but I do understand that a usual defense of my case would result in my loss.”

“That is the most astute thing you have said to me yet, young lady.” There was that ‘lady’ word again.

“Then I would like to plea bargain. I will admit to my guilt in the speeding case in return for a sentence which will allow me to regain my old life. Is that acceptable to the court?”

At least, I had him thinking about it. He appeared deep in thought for a moment, his eyes never leaving mine. Then, his eyes widened for an instant. "Ms. Henderson, I believe I have something in mind which will satisfy us both."

"Yes, Your Honor?"

"I will accept your plea, and grant you a sort of probation. The terms of your probation will be as follows. You will remain as Susan Henderson for exactly one week. During that time, you will act at all times as the woman I have made of you. You will dress, speak, and behave in a manner appropriate to your current identity. You will, however, have to maintain a high moral tone. This is a small town, and we espouse decent family values. You may not engage in sexual relations with anyone, male or female, for this period. The definition of sexual relations we will use in this case will be the old 'penetration, no matter how slight' which has been a standard for many years."

Actually, that was subject to some recent interpretation, but I knew what he meant. It was a safe bet, though, because I had no intention of engaging in sexual relations while in this body.

"Furthermore," he continued, "I want you to demonstrate to me your fitness to practice in this court in accordance with the rules of conduct I have established. Make trial that you may know. You must within a week argue and win a case before me. I assure you, in spite of what you are probably thinking, that it is possible to do."

"Now, if you are able to do these things in a satisfactory manner, and appear before me next Monday at nine o'clock, I will return you to your old life as you have requested. Are you willing to accept this probation?"

What choice did I have? "I am, Your Honor."

"Very well. Then final judgement shall be set aside until next Monday at 9 AM. Case is continued until that time." There was a sharp rap of his gavel. I was dismissed.

As I picked up my purse, the Judge called out to me, "One other thing, Ms. Henderson. I would advise you to read two things before we meet again. The first is the Ovid Municipal Code and the second is Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice."

"I will, Your Honor," I said, but I was puzzled. I understood why he would want me to read the Ovid Municipal Code, but of what value was a Shakespearean play? I had never cared much for the Bard, but if the Judge thought it would help, I would have to find a copy of it.

I got back to the office just before one, tired and hungry. I was depressed from losing in court, an entirely new experience for me in either gender. My feet hurt from being in heels, and the muscles (such as they were) in my legs were tired from trying to balance on those tiny heels. The bra was rubbing on the bottom of my breasts, and my panties felt like they were trying to crawl up inside me, both front and back. My neck even hurt from the weight of my hair, and I kept having the feeling there was something crawling on the bottom of my ear lobes every time my earrings moved. To make matters worse, I had to go to the restroom and I didn't particularly want to experience that as a woman. Still, if I was going to be one for a week, I would have to go sometime, and my body was telling me that sometime was very soon.

"How did it go?" Dori asked me in a tone so cheery that I wanted to kill her. Could you kill a shade? I suspected you could.

"I lost," I mumbled.

"Oh, you poor dear," she said rushing over to put her arm around me. "Well, you'll win the next one."

I hoped so. I almost said, "Thanks, Mom." I couldn't imagine anyone in my old office acting so concerned about a loss. They would probably be hiding out. Whenever one of my associates had a bad day back in Dallas, it didn't pay to be very visible in the office. I would have to change that when I got back. I liked Dori's approach better.

"Thanks, Dori," I said with a small smile I didn't feel. "Is there anything to eat around here?"

"I'll order us a couple of salads from the Greenhouse," she said. Oh, great—rabbit food. "Do you want your usual?"

“Sure,” I said, dropping my stuff in my office.

The restroom was my first chance to really relax for a few minutes. I squatted on the toilet and just forced myself to relax. To my surprise, I felt a flow of liquid from my new plumbing. That was all there was to it, it seemed. It really wasn't that much of a different sensation as a woman. The best I can describe it is that as a man, it's like using a hose and as a woman, it's like emptying a bucket. I could live with it for a week. Carefully and tentatively, I wiped myself as I knew I was supposed to. I hoped I did it right, I thought. What I had done was just let my mind go for a minute and do it the way it seemed right. Maybe I had a few basic skills built in. It was the first time I had had the opportunity to touch my vagina. I thought about what the Judge had said about no sex. That really wouldn't be a problem. Even I wasn't anxious to touch myself there, and I certainly wasn't going to let a man touch me.

Back in the office, I spent the afternoon poring over the Ovid Municipal Code. It seemed pretty straightforward, very much like most city codes. The only thing which threw me a little was at the beginning of the document where it said, “Moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue.” Where had I hear that before? Wherever it was, it suited the Judge to a T.

After I had eaten my salad, I began to settle into a routine I knew I would have to suffer for the next few days if I was ever to return to my old life. I didn't have many clients, and those I did have had fairly easy legal needs. I saw two clients in the afternoon, both walk-ins, and each had problems I was able to help them with without the need of going to court. I began to long for another Johnny Lavelle. At least, he was interesting, the little shit.

The good thing is that I wasn't feeling so strange any more. I thought this was because I was busy being a lawyer. Male or female, I was doing the same job. Now, if I had suddenly been forced to be a waitress or a teacher or a housewife, I would probably felt more alien, but there were as many women graduating from law schools now as men, maybe more. I didn't exactly feel like a woman; I felt like a lawyer.

Five o'clock rolled around, though, and I would have to stop being a lawyer for awhile and spend the evening alone as a woman. I wasn't looking forward to it. I said good-night to Dori and promised to lock up. I had survived my first day as Susan Henderson. One day down and six to go. All I had to do was act the part and win a trial with the Judge. The first part I could do with a little discipline. It was the second part that worried me. I needed a case to go to trial almost at once. I resolved to drop by the municipal offices in the morning and see what was coming up on the court schedule.

I found my apartment without too much trouble. Ovid wasn't that big, so I just looked at my driver's license to get the address and checked the map of Ovid in the back of the phone book. Small towns aren't much for building apartments, but Ovid had a small college, and there were several small apartment buildings catering to students and faculty around it. My apartment was in a small complex with about a dozen units, located a block south of the campus. I had to admit, the five-minute commute beat the forty-five minute one on the Central Expressway I tolerated in Dallas.

My apartment was feminine, but not overtly so. There were a few more frills and pastels around, but no more than I had experienced when Brenda had been with me. I slipped out of my skirt, blouse and hose and climbed into a sweat suit and sweat socks. I felt almost normal again. Not quite, but almost normal.

I spent a boring evening by myself. I fixed a quick dinner. Fortunately, the pantry was full, and being a bachelor for the three years since Brenda had been gone had forced me to either eat out or become a decent cook. I had chosen the latter, since I knew my waistline would not stay firm if I ate out all the time. I had a simple salad, a chicken breast, and a baked potato (no butter). It was pretty standard fare for me, and this female body seemed to like it fine.

The rest of the evening, I spent looking through drawers and closets, trying to familiarize myself with all the things I would need to know for the next six days. I didn't put it past the Judge to have a trick up his sleeve. I didn't want to show up Monday morning and find out his idea of acting like a woman for a week included something I hadn't done. I would have to dress and act like the young woman lawyer I was. I had no doubt that any being who could change my sex so easily could be spying on me right now.

The only thing I had to soul search on was in the bathroom. I found a small container of pills which I recognized were birth control pills. As I had said before, I had no intention of needing them, but perhaps this was the trap the Judge had set for me. If I didn't take them, I wasn't really getting into the spirit of the thing. You weren't acting like a woman. Sound the buzzer. You lose. Next contestant, please. I found the pill in the slot marked 'Monday' and reluctantly swallowed it.

Tired from my ordeal, I went to bed early. I found a pair of pajamas, which looked relatively unfeminine if you ignored the little red roses printed all over them, and went to bed. It had been a dull evening, in spite of my time spent investigating my new and (hopefully) temporary life. But it wasn't just dull, I reflected, closing my eyes. I was lonely. In fact, if I was honest with myself, I had been lonely for a long time. At first, I had Brenda to spend my evenings with. Then, as we drifted apart, there was my work, which often kept me working very late. After Brenda, was gone, my work continued, often punctuated with short, shallow relationships with a number of women. Even if I hadn't come to Ovid, my relationship with Talia Moore would probably have been over almost before it started. She wasn't the right woman for me, I thought as I drifted off to sleep. She wasn't Brenda.

I awoke at six on Tuesday, oddly refreshed. I knew at once who I was and where I was, so there was no sudden shock. I always woke up that way, and being Susan didn't seem to have changed that. I did feel ten years younger, though, and then I remembered that I was ten years younger. I resolved to go running that evening. It would be interesting to see if the ten years and more than fifty pounds I had shed improved my running.

Dressing proved a chore, as I was afraid it would. Still, I managed to do a respectable job with my makeup. I had watched Brenda do her makeup a number of times, so I had some idea how to do it. It took a couple of times, particularly the eyes, but I managed. In fact, I thought I actually looked a little more alluring than I had the day before, for what that was worth. I have to admit, though, that if I just relaxed, my hands seemed to know what to do without any conscious thought. Still, I was proud of my efforts.

I managed to get all the tangles out of my long hair and get my bra fastened without ripping off a breast. Picking a dress for the day wasn't that hard either. I picked a nice dark blue skirt and matching jacket, a white blouse, and black heels, about the same height that I had worn the day before. Getting new earrings in took a few minutes, but I managed. By seven thirty, I had eaten a light breakfast and was ready to go. I was actually looking forward to the five-minute commute. Day two was underway. After today, only five more days to go.

I got to the office, exchanged morning pleasantries with Dori, and looked over my calendar. I had two appointments for the day. Surely one of them would involve some court time. The first appointment wasn't until ten, so I headed for the Judge's office to see what his court schedule looked like.

The receptionist told me that the Judge was not in. I remembered that he had said something about that when I was in court. She then said, "But Cindy is in, so she can help you."

"Thanks," I replied. "Where is her office?"

The receptionist looked at me oddly, as if I should have known the answer. "It's down that hall, right next to the Judge's office."

"Thanks again," I said with my best smile.

I was more than a little surprised to find the blonde from the courtroom was apparently Cindy. She looked up and saw me, then smiled. "Hi," she said softly, rising and offering me her hand. I took it, startled that her hand and mine were about the same size. "I'm Cindy Patton, the Judge's secretary."

“Uh... I’m Susan Henderson,” I said, playing the role as best I could.

Cindy laughed, “You don’t have to pretend when you’re here with me. The Judge just expects you to act like a woman. I know who you were, of course. As far as most people around here think, you and I are old friends. We even went to high school together.”

“We are? We did?” No wonder the receptionist was surprised that I had to ask for directions.

“Yes,” she replied, “that’s the way things work around here. When you change, you’re given a complete life. I know what’s supposed to be happening since I have to follow it all for the Judge.”

“Then you’re like him?” I asked.

She laughed her musical laugh once more. “Oh, no, I’m a changee just like you. Just about everybody who’s real in Ovid was changed, but most of them don’t remember it. They think they’ve always been here.”

“Who were you before?” I asked.

“I’ll warn you, Susan, that isn’t considered a polite question in Ovid,” she admonished me.

“But why not?” I asked, genuinely puzzled. “You know who I was.”

Cindy sighed, “Well, for openers, it affects how we relate to each other. Let’s say that I told you that I used to be a four-hundred pound Sumo wrestler, which I wasn’t by the way. That would affect how you talked to me and acted around me. It wouldn’t be a natural way to act around a woman like me. Do you see?”

“I suppose,” I admitted. “It’s all pretty complicated.”

“Well, you’ll get used to it.”

I shook my head, feeling my long hair drift around me. “I hope not. I still have a chance to get back to my old life.”

“That’s right, you do,” she agreed. “I imagine that’s why you’re here today—to look for a good case to defend.”

“That’s right. Can you help me?”

She smiled. “Sure. Always glad to help out an old high school classmate.”

I smiled back. “Thanks, Cindy,” I said, getting into the spirit of the thing. “You’ve always been a great friend.” We laughed together. I think it was the first time I had felt like laughing since I had come to Ovid.

We looked at the court calendar. The Judge was out of town that day, but court was scheduled for Wednesday and Thursday, but not Friday. There were a couple of mundane trials and an arraignment on Thursday, but nothing else. “Then I can schedule a trial for any other time?” I asked Cindy.

“Not necessarily.”

Oh-oh, I thought. The Judge plays games with the schedule. “Why not?”

“Well, people like you get brought to court on pretty short notice. Anyone who gets picked up today will have to appear tomorrow, and if court is in session, they’re brought in for judgement immediately.”

“Well, how about one of them? Couldn’t you just give me a call and I could defend one of them?”

She shook her head. “I don’t think that would be a good idea, Susan.”

I winced at the name, but she didn’t seem to notice.

“People who are brought in for that kind of judgement are going to become citizens of Ovid, and there’s nothing you or any other attorney can do to stop that. You see, the Judge knows what they’ve done, and they’ve all done something. Usually it’s some traffic offense, like yours, but sometimes, it’s more serious. This place is sort of a speed trap in the Twilight Zone. All you’d do is lose another case like you did yesterday.”

I saw her point, but that did nothing to help me. How was I going to find a case to try before the Judge on such short notice? I had only two days to find a client, gather all the information, and get a trial appearance scheduled. The bastard had stacked the deck against me! I wouldn't be able to do it, and would be stuck as Susan Henderson for the rest of my life. In frustration and rage, I felt the most unnatural urge to cry.

Cindy saw my distress and put a comforting hand on my shoulder. I was learning that women touch each other a lot more than men. I found myself envying her. She was comfortable as a woman. I suspected she had always been one, though. I wonder what she would think if she suddenly found herself in the body of a man.

"Look," she said softly, "I'll do what I can for you. I'll check around with Officer Mercer and see if he knows of any locals who need a lawyer. If there needs to be a trial on any of them, I'll schedule it in. But that may be a long shot, so keep working on it yourself."

"I will," I said, trying to smile and hold back the tears at the same time.

I got back to my office in time for my ten o'clock appointment, but there was nothing to take to trial there. It was just two shades who were a married couple wanting to set up a simple will. My two o'clock wasn't much better. It was an elderly woman (and a shade) who wanted to set up a trust for her grandchildren. I wondered to myself if they were shades, too, or if they were scampering around the school playground unaware that they had been adults only a short time before.

That was it for the day. It was nearly four and I was no closer to a trial than I had been that morning. I called Cindy, but it had been a slow day for our ever-busy police officer. There had been no new arrests and there was nothing pending. Apparently the Judge liked an orderly little town. What this town needed was more Johnny Lavelles.

I was getting depressed. It was looking more and more as if I would be in skirts for the rest of my life. Then, at about four thirty, Dori popped in the office. "There's a young man who would like to see you right away. He just called and is driving over now. He said he could be here in ten minutes. I told him it would be all right, since he sounded very upset. I hope I did the right thing.”

“I’m sure you did, Dori,” I told her with a confirming smile. A client was a client. Even if it wasn’t something I could take to court right away, if I ended up stuck as Susan Henderson, struggling young lawyer, I might need every client I could get. That Honda Civic had a lot of miles on it, and the rent needed to be paid, I was sure.

The young man Dori spoke of showed up, good to his word, ten minutes later. He was about my current age, and I found myself thinking he was quite attractive. Apparently my new hormones were kicking in, much to my chagrin. He was about six foot one with brown eyes and dark brown hair cut fashionably short. He appeared to be in good shape, but wasn’t muscle-bound by any stretch of the imagination. He was wearing gray slacks, a lighter gray herringbone sport coat and a dark blue turtleneck. And like me, he was wearing glasses.

“I’m Steven Jager,” he said in a soft, mellow voice as he offered me his hand.

I rose and took it, feeling very tiny as his larger hand surrounded mine. “Susan Henderson,” I said.

“I appreciate you seeing me on such short notice,” he said, taking the seat I had motioned him to. “I just didn’t want to let this wait until tomorrow since it was so upsetting.”

“Please tell me about it,” I urged. Could this be the case I was looking for?

“Well,” he began, “I teach English at Capta College. This is my second year on the staff.”

Somehow, I wasn’t surprised that he was a college instructor. He looked every bit the part. “Are you tenured?” I asked.

He shook his head. “No, the agreement I have is year to year. I won’t be up for tenure until I’ve been there five years, and as it stands right now, I may not be there another five days.”

“Why is that?” I asked. I could sense a case coming up.

“Two of my freshman English students, both young girls have accused me of sexual harassment,” he said, his face turning beet red. “Well, actually, only one has, but the other one is backing her up.”

Two emotions coursed through me at the same time. The first was sympathy for this man. He didn’t look like someone who would sexually harass his students. Of course, I was still looking at him from a predominately-male perspective. If I had been a woman all my life, I might have thought differently. Still, he looked shy and gentle—certainly not like a sexual aggressor.

The other emotion was disappointment. This didn’t look like a crime under the Ovid Municipal Code. Oh, I might be able to take it there if there was no other court to handle it (and I suspected that there were no other courts available to the residents of Ovid), but that would take time. I couldn’t force that before my deadline. But, as I had said to myself earlier, I might soon need every client I could get.

“Did you?” I asked.

He looked at me blankly. “Did I what?”

“Did you sexually harass her?”

He straightened up so fast I thought his backbone would snap.

“Certainly not! I couldn’t dream of such a thing.”

I pulled out a pen and legal pad. “Why don’t you tell me the whole story?”

He was embarrassed, I could tell. That was actually a good sign. In spite of what most people believe, the guilty are often the most confident. They can look you right in the eye and deny they ever did anything wrong. As often as not, the innocent are the ones who are nervous and embarrassed. They know they don’t deserve the accusations, but they are unnerved because others do believe they are guilty. Steven’s embarrassment was a small indicator of innocence. I found myself happy about that. I liked what little I had seen of him, and I wanted him to be innocent.

“Judy Walker and Audrey Bertram are in my beginning English class,” he began. "They're both pretty good students. They're not A material, but they have strong B grades and participate well in class. They seem to be good friends since they always come to class together, usually giggling and talking like old friends. Then, about a month ago, Judy started hanging around asking questions. I didn't think much of it, but she was always the last student to leave."

I was taking notes furiously. "Did she seem to hang back so she was always the last student to ask a question?"

Steven thought for a moment before replying, "Now that you mention it, yes. She would hang back from the other students and then ask me questions when we were alone."

"Were you alone in your office?"

He shook his head. "No, only in the classroom."

"Was the door open?"

"Yes."

"Did she ever make any advances at you?"

"I don't think so. It's actually a little hard for me to tell."

"Are you gay?" It was a question I had to ask. How could he not notice if she was making advances? I found myself hoping he wasn't gay, although it would have made his defense easier. I wondered why I cared.

He smiled. I thought that was odd. Most men would protest vehemently, even some who really were gay. "No, I'm not gay."

I shifted forward in my chair and looked him straight in the eye. "Then why is it so hard for you to tell? You're an attractive man. Surely other girls have come on to you before."

He looked a little startled. "Do you really think I'm attractive?" he asked.

Did I? "Well..." I managed, "...yes."

We were both silent for a moment. I didn't know why he was silent, but I knew why I was silent. I had just told a man I thought he was attractive. I mean, it wasn't a come on; it was just a statement of fact from an attorney to his—rather her—client. Still, it was odd that I even noticed. Like many men, I had never been able to tell if another man was good looking or not. It just wasn't something straight men looked for in another man.

Flushed, I tried to get the discussion back on track. "So have girls come on to you before?"

He shifted uncomfortably. "Well, yes, but I'm not the kind of person to take advantage of that. I mean, I'm a little old to be chasing after eighteen-year-old students."

"You don't look that old," I pointed out. "What are you? Twenty-six?"

"Twenty-eight actually," he said. Then, looking me straight in the eye, he added, "Now."

My heart jumped. He was like me; he remembered his previous life. "So you remember who you were," I concluded.

He nodded. "Yes, and from your statement, so do you."

"Then is there anything in your previous life that might help us?"

"No," he said. "It wouldn't be allowed anyway. By the way, I suppose I should ask if you are really an attorney. You act as if you might be new around here."

"Yes, I am. I'm new around here and I am an attorney," I told him. "I was an attorney before I came here, and I was a damned good one. Now, what do you mean by 'it wouldn't be allowed'?"

"Well," he began, "we can talk about who we were here in private, but if you try to talk about it around more than one other person, you'll find you can't say a thing. It's like a safety valve. If we couldn't talk about it among ourselves, we'd probably go crazy, but if we talked about it around a group of people, particularly the ones who don't know they've changed, we could upset the entire social system here in Ovid."

It made sense in a perverse sort of way. Many dictatorships had operated on the principle that two people was a conversation and three people was a revolution. Ovid was certainly an odd form of a dictatorship, albeit an apparently benevolent one.

“So what you’re saying is you have no interest in college girls,” I concluded. “What kind of girls are you interested in?”

Now what made me ask that? It wasn’t something I really needed to know, but I found that some strange part of me wanted to know the answer. I leaned forward to hear his response.

“I guess I really haven’t thought much about that,” he replied after a moment’s thought. “First, there was the change that turned me into Steven Jager, and then, I had to establish myself in a new role. It’s a demanding job, really, and I enjoy it. I want to be tenured and stay at Capta College for the rest of my life.”

“Be careful of that,” I warned him quietly. “Getting too wrapped up in your career can be very costly in your personal life. I know.”

He looked at me in silence for a moment; then said, “I believe you do.”

“Well,” I said, somewhat flustered, “I think we need to get back on track. What does this girl claim you did?”

“She said I took her back to my office and made sexual advances to her after class yesterday,” he replied hesitantly.

“What did happen?”

He shifted uncomfortably in his chair. “We did go back to my office. That much is true. She got very close to me and asked me what I thought of her. I told her I thought she was a good student and I was pleased to have her in my class. She asked me if that was all, and I told her it was. She seemed disturbed by this and left.”

“Did anyone see the two of you in your office?”

“I don’t think so.”

“Was your office door open?”

“Yes. I never close it.”

Either he was a polished liar or so naive that he couldn't understand what had happened to him. He seemed so innocent and unsuspecting that I was beginning to think he was telling the truth. That had never been very important to me before, but there was something about this man that made me genuinely want to believe him.

“How did you find out about the accusation?”

“I was called into the Dean's office earlier this afternoon. He told me what had happened, and that the College's Board of Trustees wanted me to appear before the Moral Review Committee on Saturday.”

“This Saturday?”

“Yes.”

That meant even if I did find a case to argue before the Judge, I would still be here to defend Steven before the Committee. That actually made me happy. I felt he was being railroaded. Apparently, even in Ovid, political correctness was out of hand. It was so much easier for an organization like the College to punish an individual like Steven than find out what had really happened. It made my blood boil.

“Okay,” I told him. “I will defend you at the meeting on Saturday, but I'll warn you, it won't be easy. We have a lot of work ahead of us.”

We spent over an hour examining every possible detail of the situation. We discussed how well the girls responded in class, what the subject of their papers had been, who their other friends were, what they wore to class. I began to form a mental picture of the two girls. First, they were both shades. Did this mean shades could act independently, or was someone pulling their strings? Assuming for the moment that they were acting independently, why were they doing this? Was it to attract attention? Was it to get revenge for a perceived slight? My next step would be to interview the two girls. I suspected that Judy would stick to her story no matter what, but perhaps I could do something with Audrey.

Steven suddenly leaned back and groaned, “I can't think on an empty stomach. Are we about finished?”

I looked down at my notes. “We are finished for tonight. I’m tired, too. I need to interview both girls before we can do anything else.”

“Okay, fine with me.” He looked at his watch. “Are you leaving now? If so, I’ll walk you to your car.”

I looked up at him in puzzlement. “Why should you do that?”

His face turned red. “Well, it is dark out, and a young woman alone on the street... it’s just not a good idea.”

I hadn’t thought of that. Most women I knew did not like to go out in the dark to their cars. Of course, Dallas, like all major cities, could be a dangerous place at night, even for men, but I never stopped to consider that I should take precautions in Ovid. “Do you think it’s necessary?”

“Probably not,” he admitted, “but it’s still a good idea.”

“Well...”

His face brightened. “Say, I have an idea. Why don’t we go over to Rusty’s? I’ll buy you a burger.”

My clients had never been my friends, and I always tried to maintain a discrete distance from them outside legal issues. This is just good common sense, since most ethical rules for attorneys stipulate that there should be no relationship with a client which might prevent a lawyer from doing his or her best for the client. I had always subscribed to that rule. But did that mean I couldn’t have dinner with a client? Certainly, if I had been male, I wouldn’t have thought twice about a conflict just because I had a burger with him. But now, things were different. I was a woman and he was an attractive man (there was that odd thought again).

I decided it wouldn’t be a conflict. After all, a going to a place called Rusty’s for a burger hardly seemed like a romantic evening. Besides, I was hungry and I didn’t like eating alone. “Okay,” I agreed.

“Great! I’ll drive us over and then drop you off back at your car after dinner.”

I readily agreed since I didn’t have the foggiest notion where this Rusty’s was.

Steven drove a Volvo. I filed that fact away, too. If he had driven a Corvette or some other flashy car, it would have said something about the type of man he was. It didn’t necessarily mean that he was on the make just because of the car he drove, but it was a potential indicator. Volvos aren’t exactly babemobiles, and Steven’s looked to be several years old. It somehow made him seem even more professorial.

Rusty’s proved to be exactly what I thought it would be. It was a small burger joint out on the highway where all the car dealers, gas stations, and fast food joints were located. The neon sign proclaimed ‘Rusty’s Best Burgers’ under a smiling neon bull. The sign was so large, it almost threatened to dwarf the white stucco café beneath it where the words ‘Rusty’s Burger Barn’ were printed in fading red paint.

Inside, the dining room was brightly lit with only a few customers parked in the row of booths by the window. I suspected this place did most of its business on weekends and in the summer when the high school kids could stay out later. An attractive young brunette in a tight-fitting waitress’s uniform was at our table almost before we were seated. She was a shade.

“Hi, Mr. Jager,” she said with a wide smile. “I haven’t seen you in a while.”

“You know the life of a college instructor, Maxine,” he said, returning the smile. “Busy all the time. No time to eat.”

She laughed, “Then you’ll have to make up for it tonight. What will you have, folks?”

We ordered burgers, fries, and I had a Diet Coke while Steven had a vanilla shake. When the waitress left, I asked, “Is she a friend of yours?”

“As in a girlfriend of mine?”

I smiled.

“You never stop working, do you?”

“Not if I want to win,” I replied.

“Is that what’s most important to you?”

“It’s pretty important,” I replied, but I wasn’t sure if it was still the most important thing to me. If someone had asked me that a few days ago, I would have said yes, but now I wasn’t sure. Maybe losing that little case with Johnny Lavelle had taught me that even when you lose, life goes on. If I had been a little less intense in my career, I might have won as many cases as I did, but I might still have Brenda.

“To answer your question, she was in one of my classes last year. She’s working on a degree in psychology.”

“She seems to like you,” I noted.

Steven frowned slightly. “Does that mean we must have something going on? Just because she likes me?”

I put my hand over his in a gesture that seemed somehow natural.

“I’m sorry, Steven,” I said softly. “I didn’t mean to offend you. It’s just that some people might think that if they saw you talking to her. She’s young and pretty, and given the accusations against you, a lot of people might think just that.”

“But I can’t ignore girls like Maxine,” he protested. “They’re my students.”

“I know,” I agreed. “Just be aware of appearances.”

The burgers came, and they were great. I couldn’t eat all of mine, though, but Steven devoured every bite of his own burger as well as half of my fries. We talked about the College mostly. It was a small liberal arts school with only about two thousand students. It had apparently originally been a denominational school, but that had changed. Steven wasn’t sure when. The president was a woman named Betty Vest.

“You’ll meet her Saturday,” Steven said.

Steven dropped me off at my car and waited until I had started it and put it in gear before driving away. We had set up another meeting for the next day right after lunch since he had a free period then. I was going to try to interview Judy and Audrey before then.

I got home tired but somehow in a good mood. I was no closer to solving my dilemma than I had been the night before, but I was busy again. Actually, it was more than that, I realized. It had been a long time since I had represented someone in an important case whom I really liked. There was something about Steven that I really liked. It was as if he were vulnerable and I could protect him.

As I got ready for bed that night, I was actually happy. I had broken my rule about clients. I had made a friend.

The next thing I knew, it was six in the morning again. I got up and started my morning routine of getting a shower and getting dressed. It actually was a routine now. Although it was only my second morning in the body, it was far easier than the previous morning. Oh, the shower was still a challenge. It was a terrible temptation to fondle myself. My male mind found this body very attractive, and fondling it would have been natural, but I wanted to keep myself as chaste as possible. Perhaps I feared that I might enjoy self-stimulation a little too much. If I wasn't able to get back to my own body, I might try experimenting, but the goal for now was to return to my old life.

Susan's wardrobe was mostly lawyerly suits, for which I was thankful. I would have been very uncomfortable in less tailored attire. Still, the suits were feminine, even the charcoal gray one I had donned for the day. And the addition of hose, gray heels and a ruffled white blouse were certainly not examples of masculine attire. But when in Rome...

I phoned Dori and told her I was going immediately to the Judge's office. Then, I downed a slice of toast and a glass of orange juice and started off for another day.

Cindy greeted me warmly and offered a cup of coffee, which I accepted. I really was starting to think of her as a friend. When I had taken a drink of the coffee, I asked her, "Is there anything coming up for trial today?"

She looked at me with sympathetic eyes and said, "Susan, I'm afraid not. The Judge has been called out of town for the rest of today."

My heart sank. I was running out of time. I had to find a case to try or I was Susan forever. "Is he coming in to the office at all?" I asked.

"Yes I am," a voice said from behind me. It was the Judge. He looked at me for a moment and told me, "Come in. I can only give you a few minutes. I do have to go."

I followed him in and took the proffered seat. Without preamble, I began, "Your Honor, as you can see, I'm trying to meet the terms of my probation. In dress and manner, I have displayed the feminine attributes you required, but I can't argue and win a case before you if there is nothing on the docket for me to do."

"That isn't my problem," he said laconically. "It's your problem. I never promised you a case. You could always go find one on your own."

"You set me up," I accused. "You knew there wouldn't be a trial for me to conduct. You plan to beat me on a technicality—no possible case, no win."

To my surprise, he actually smiled. "A technicality? You mean like when you got that soundtrack composer off for molesting little girls?"

"The prosecution stepped over the line with my client," I explained, feeling my face flush. "They didn't follow proper procedure."

"So, thanks to you, a dangerous pervert escaped justice."

I shifted uncomfortably. "He was caught a year later in London. They imprisoned him there, so I'd say justice caught up with him."

"No thanks to you," the Judge pointed out. "I only wish he had come through Ovid. We need more oak trees in the park."

I shuddered. At first, I thought it was at the thought of being turned into a tree, but then I realized that I had pictured the composer in my mind. He was a sick man who should have been put away sooner. By getting him off, I had been partially responsible for the molestation of at least three other girls whom he had attacked after I got him off. I had never really thought of it that way before. I was suddenly not very proud of myself, but I pressed on, "My past cases aren't the issue. I know I can win a case if I have more time."

"You have no more time," he said sternly. "You are to appear in my courtroom at nine o'clock next Monday. If you haven't met all the terms of your probation by then, you will be sentenced to be Susan Henderson for the rest of your natural life."

He said it as if it were a life sentence. I suppose it really was.

"Now, that's all the time I can give you this morning. I have to be in Tulsa in fifteen minutes."

Fifteen minutes? But Tulsa was at least an hour and a half away. But I supposed that would not be a problem for the Judge. He rose from behind his desk and walked into the outer office. I turned to follow him, but he was already gone.

"Where did he go?" I asked Cindy.

"Tulsa," she replied.

"Yes, I know he's going to Tulsa, but where is he right now?"

She smiled. "Oh, he's already there. It doesn't take him any time at all to get there."

"Damn!" I said, tears welling up in my eyes.

Cindy looked at me with concern. "What's wrong, Susan?"

"Cindy, you know about my probation. You were in court when the Judge gave it to me. I'm running out of time. If he's not in court today, that just leaves tomorrow's session for me to win a case and get my old life back. What if there's nothing for me to take to trial tomorrow?"

That was it. I did break down and cry. I knew it was those damned female hormones coursing through my body which brought on the tears, but that only made it worse. I was becoming a prisoner of this body—a prisoner for life if something didn't happen in a hurry.

Cindy put her arm around me. "It's okay, Susan. If you have to stay a girl, it won't be that bad. I'll help you in any way I can."

"Not that bad!" I repeated, practically screaming. "That's okay for you. You've always been a girl and..."

"Always been a girl?" Cindy laughed. "Until a few weeks ago, I was as male as you were."

"But that can't be," I protested. "You act so... so..."

"Feminine?"

I nodded, wiping the tears from my eyes. "How is it that you seem so natural as a woman?"

"Well," she sighed, "I don't really know. I never wanted to be a woman, but I seem to have an aptitude for it. It feels natural. I guess the Judge knew where I would fit in best here."

Was that to be my fate? Would I slowly become more and more comfortable as a woman until I just gave up and accepted my new gender? I shuddered at the thought. I didn't want to be a woman. I didn't want to wear skirts and pantyhose and makeup. I didn't want to have periods or have someone stick his hard dick in me. I didn't want to have babies and wear heels. There was nothing about being female that had any appeal for me. I had been a woman for nearly forty-eight hours, and that was nearly forty-eight hours too long.

"Look," she suggested, "why don't you just show up in court tomorrow morning. I'm sure at least one of the cases will be something you can at least take a stab at. I'll let you know tonight if anyone is awaiting trial in the morning."

I nodded, trying to smile bravely. "You really are a good friend, Cindy. If I'm stuck here, I just hope we can... you know."

She smiled at me. "Sure. We'll be friends. But let's do what we can to get you out of here, if that's what you want."

I got back to the office in time to handle my ten o'clock appointment. It was an insignificant matter. A local roofing contractor wanted me to help him file a lien on a house where the homeowner had disputed the total payment. I convinced him to participate in an arbitration meeting first. We tentatively scheduled it for the following Tuesday. I was beginning to think I'd be at that meeting since I would be stuck as Susan.

I looked at my watch. I still had over two hours before I met with Steven. That would give me the time I needed to interview Judy and Audrey. I hoped they weren't both in class.

I got their room assignments from the Registrar's office. Both girls lived in Rhea Hall, the one of only two women's dormitories on the campus. In character with other buildings on the campus, it appeared to be perhaps fifty years old and built in a Neo-Gothic style. Both girls lived on the same floor, but at opposite ends. I decided to go right for the gold and try to break Judy first.

"Why should I talk to you?" she asked after I had introduced myself. She was certainly attractive, the sort of girl many guys, even college instructors, would be happy to make a play for. She had long blonde hair, large breasts, and a nearly perfect face and figure. She was as Steven had said a shade, but certainly a very attractive one.

"I'm just trying to find out what happened," I told her, mustering as much innocence in my voice as I could manage.

"Then read my statement," she replied, not fooled by my act. "I don't have anything else to say to you." With that, she closed the door in my face. I couldn't help but feel she was hiding something. I was even more convinced that Steven was being railroaded.

Her friend Audrey was a little better. She was an attractive brunette, but nowhere near as attractive as Judy. She invited me into her room and said, "I don't know what I can do to help you. I mean, Judy is my friend and I didn't see or hear anything."

"I realize that," I said, "but she has made a very serious charge against Mr. Jager. Have you considered what might happen to him?"

"Well," she answered, "it isn't a trial. I mean, he can't go to jail."

"That's right," I agreed, "but he could lose his job. That job is the most important thing in the world to him. Do you want to be responsible for his dismissal?"

I could see that she had never thought out the consequences of the accusation. No matter that she was a shade; she was a person, or at least ably playing the part of one. It was time for me to press my point home.

"Now, do you want to tell me what really happened?"

She was silent, as if weighing the consequences of her response. If she told me that Judy was telling the truth, she would be responsible for destroying a man. If she told me Judy had lied (which I was sure was the case), she would destroy a friendship. Was she mature enough to make the right choice?

"What... what will happen to Judy?" she asked. The unstated part of the question was 'if I tell the truth.'

I put my arm around her as Cindy had done with me. It was a staged gesture for me at first, but when I held her for a minute, I began to see why women did it. There was a comforting feeling to it. I think I was actually as comforted by the gesture as I wanted Audrey to be.

"I told you, I wasn't there," she said, crying softly, "but I know she's really had a thing for him for some time. She... she told me the morning it happened that that would be the day she got him to make a move on her or else. That's all I know, except for what she said he did to her."

I thought I knew what the 'or else' was. I didn't have an iron tight case, but I had enough to cast serious doubts on her accusation, if I could get Audrey to tell the truth. Cindy would have two days to work on her, so I had to reinforce what she had said.

"If you tell that to the committee, I think you'll be doing the right thing," I told her softly, hugging her. "It's the right thing for Mr. Jager, and it's the right thing for Judy, too. Someday, she would regret doing this, but it would be too late. She needs help, and now, I'll see that she gets it."

Audrey looked up at me and smiled through the tears. I smiled back, surprised to find that my eyes were a little misty, too.

"I can't promise you anything," she sniffed, "but I'll think about it."

A couple of hours later, Steven was in my office. He was a little depressed because although he was still on the payroll, he had been temporarily taken away from his teaching assignments. The College had told everyone only that he was on a special project, but he and I both suspected that everyone on campus knew the real reason. I told him what I had found out from Audrey, and that perked him up somewhat.

"Now," I told him, "we need to start working on the members of the committee. Do you know who will be on it besides Betty Vest?"

"Yes, I do," he told me. "I got the Board secretary to give me the names of the members of the Moral Review Committee. In addition to the President, there's Eric Vulman, the President of Vulman Industries, and the Judge."

My ears perked up. "The Judge is on the committee. I mean, the Judge?"

"There's only one."

The wheels were turning inside my head. I thought back to what the Judge had said when detailing the terms of my probation. He had said I must argue and win a case before him. He hadn't specifically said it had to be a trial, had he? No, he hadn't. I was sure of it. I had taken Steven Jager's case, and I was prepared to argue it Saturday before the Moral Review Committee, of which the Judge was a member. I had him! I could still get my old life back!

"You seem happy to hear that," Steven commented. "Being in front of the Judge isn't exactly my idea of a good time."

"Oh, I think things will go just fine," I said enigmatically.

Steven looked at his watch. "I have to get back. Even though I'm not teaching, they expect me to be in the office for regular hours."

"But I need to go over some details with you," I said. "I need to know everything you can tell me about the members of the committee.”

Steven thought for a moment, then replied, “Why don’t you come over to my place for dinner and we can discuss it then?”

Alarm bells suddenly started going off inside my head. Was he putting the moves on me? Did he figure dinner, a few drinks, and then get little old Susan into the sack? I wasn’t that kind of a girl. Hell, I didn’t even really consider myself a girl at all. This was just a body I was forced to wear until my normal one was ready. Maybe I had given Steven too much credit.

“Unless you think it would be inappropriate,” Steven was quick to add.

What was I afraid of? I could handle myself. I didn’t think he would get carried away with his own lawyer three days before the big event. Besides, I told myself, it would be all business. “No, that’s fine. I’ll be there.”

He smiled. “Great. Shall we say six thirty?”

“Sure.”

He started to leave, then turned and pulled a small book out of his pocket. “I know you’ve been very busy,” he said, “but I found a book you might find interesting.”

He put it on my desk. It was called Mythology by an Edith Hamilton. I was curious as to why he thought the book would be of any interest. Still, I told him I would look at it when I got a moment.

I was in high spirits for the rest of the afternoon. For the first time since I had initially checked the Judge’s court calendar, I was beginning to feel as if I had a real chance to get back my old life. With any luck at all, the Mouthpiece to the Stars would be leaving Ovid in his GS400 in a few more days. The first thing I would do when I got back to my old life would be... would be... It was odd, but I really couldn’t think of what the first thing would be. Back in the days when I was married to Brenda, I would tell her everything, the triumphs and the tragedies. I guess the first thing I wanted to do was tell someone about Ovid. Oh, they wouldn’t believe me, but I had to tell someone—someone I liked and trusted. Someone who was a true friend, practically a soul mate.

It was at that moment that I realized there hadn't been anyone like that since Brenda. Well, I would just have to find someone like her, or maybe I would try to reach her. Maybe we could get back together again. I could change; my few days in Ovid had proven that. The loss of my first case had taken the sharp edge away from my life. I no longer had a perfect record to protect. I could live a normal life with a less frenetic practice, and maybe Brenda would be willing to be a part of that life again.

No, I realized sadly, that couldn't happen. I had been as bad for Brenda as she had been good for me. It was my thoughtlessness and inattention which had driven her to seek solace in a bottle. If she were to come back to me, we would both fall into the same old patterns we had been in before, and I would destroy her life again. It wasn't fair to her.

The afternoon passed quickly with only one appointment dealing with a simple real estate transaction. I told Dori to close up and I took the rest of the afternoon off. I wanted to get changed before going to Steven's for dinner. Back in my apartment, I stripped out of my heels, pantyhose and dress and slipped on a woolly robe. It felt absolutely heavenly. I wouldn't miss the heels when I got back to my old life, I thought, although I was actually getting pretty good at walking in them.

Rather than a shower, the thought of a warm bath appealed to me. I ran the water and slipped into the tub. Showers are quick and utilitarian, but baths could be absolutely sensual, I suddenly realized. It was really the first time I had looked at my new body without trying to wash it, dress it, or figure out just how to live with it. The breasts weren't terribly large, for which I was thankful, but they were well formed with substantial pink nipples which seemed to actually harden as the warm water slipped around them. My waist and hips were nice, too, and the legs were a masterpiece. I noted, though, that I would have to shave them, as some stubble was beginning to grow. All in all, it was a very nice body as bodies went. If I had not found a way to beat the Judge, it wouldn't have been a bad body to spend my life in.

Growing bored with this self-examination, I picked up the book I had left by the side of the tub. I had about half an hour to read and relax before getting ready to meet Steven. It was the mythology book he had loaned me. I thought I would read a few pages and give it back to him at dinner.

I had never cared for mythology as a child. I was always firmly rooted in serious nonfiction, and myths did not fit my definition of that. Sure, I had heard or read many of the basic Greek myths, but I found this book much more literate than the children's tales usually associated with the topic.

Relaxing, almost to the point of sleeping, I scanned the book. The, near the end of the introduction, I found a familiar name: Ovid. Apparently, he was a Roman poet who, although he didn't believe the myths for a minute, had written a very literate work on the subject. I could see how Steven, as an English instructor, would be fascinated by his works, but I decided not to add them to my reading list.

It was the next chapter that really caught my attention. I was reading about Zeus, or Jupiter as the Romans knew him. There was a quote by Zeus from the Iliad (another work I suspected I would never get around to reading) which intrigued me. It began with 'I am the mightiest of all. Make trial that you may know.'

Odd, but that phrase seemed familiar to me. Where had I heard it before? With a start, it came to me. It was when the Judge had issued my probation. He had said, "Make trial that you may know."

Apparently, he had read the Iliad or... Now wait a minute! I thought. That's impossible. He can't be... It's just not possible.

But with a shudder, I began to realize it was possible. I was living proof of that. Who but a being with godlike powers could have changed me into a woman? Who else could have created a place like Ovid?

I read on. It was all becoming clearer to me now. I continued to read and came to an unsettling conclusion. I was not going to be up against one god, but three gods. Betty Vest was probably Vesta. I didn't really understand why Vesta would be a college president. It seemed more a task for Minerva, but I didn't know enough of the details of the myths to understand why. There didn't seem to be many tales written about Vesta, but she was apparently Jupiter's sister. In any case, she seemed to be a family-oriented goddess. Would she espouse 'family values?' I suspected she would. That meant she would expect high moral standards.

Eric Vulman was most likely Vulcan. Like Vesta, little had been written about him, but he was apparently the blacksmith of the gods. That would fit him in the role of Ovid's leading industrialist. From everything I read, he seemed to be a kindly god. He was also apparently Jupiter's son.

The Judge, his sister and his son—that made the Judge the key to it all. If I could convince him that Steven was innocent, the other two should follow along. It was doable. I could almost feel my penis and testicles growing back already.

I put the book down and picked up a razor from a basket of bath items by the side of the tub. I wasn't looking forward to shaving, but I had to conform to social convention. I sort of let myself go and managed to shave my armpits and legs without drawing blood. That job complete, I got out of the tub. I needed to get ready to go to Steven's. What to wear? I thought about just a blouse and jeans, but I was a little concerned that the Judge would construe such attire as unfeminine and deny my return to manhood. I decided on a casual but feminine look. This was just to meet the terms of my probation, I told myself. Looking good for Steven never crossed my mind, did it?

In a short time, I was dressed in a black turtleneck, red plaid skirt, black hose and black patent flats. A gold necklace with a gold bracelet and two fair-sized gold hoops on my ears and I looked darned good. Applying makeup was becoming almost second nature, although I suspected I was getting some help from Ovid's magic. The only problem was my hair. It was still long and straight like many girls wore it in college. I thought as a professional, I should have a little more sophisticated hairstyle. I resolved to do something about it by Saturday.

Steven's house was a small bungalow just a block off campus and only about four blocks from my apartment. In spite of the proximity, I drove. I was now an attractive woman, so it wouldn't do for me to be walking too late. Also, it was November, and gray skies had moved in that afternoon, threatening perhaps the first snow of the approaching winter season.

Steven greeted me at the door. He was wearing a forest green turtleneck and khaki slacks. I couldn't suppress the fact that he looked quite handsome. His glasses actually accentuated his eyes, and I hoped mine did the same. He smiled at me. "Hey, you look great!"

"You're not so bad yourself," I managed, actually meaning it. Was I actually becoming attracted to him? I had to get back in my old body quickly before my whole sexual orientation was affected. These new hormones coursing through my body were changing my entire perspective.

"Would you like something to drink?"

Oops. Here it came. Start to get her drunk and then take advantage of her. "Do you have any Diet Coke?"

"Lots of it."

I smiled. "I'll take one, please."

If Steven was disappointed, he didn't show it. I got out two glasses and filled them with ice and Diet Coke. It gave me a moment to look around his apartment. It was uncharacteristically neat for a college instructor's home, I thought. Most bachelors were talented amateurs when it came to keeping a sloppy home. I had been something of a slob myself in my single days. Brenda had hired a maid who stayed with me after she left or my half-million dollar home would have been carpeted in dirty laundry. But college instructors were true professionals when it came to keeping messy houses. Steven was the exception to the rule. The furniture was not new, but it was clean with all the nicks and scratches polished away. The carpet was recently vacuumed, and all the fixtures had been recently polished.

Even the kitchen was fairly neat, I noticed as he handed me my Diet Coke. There were obvious signs of meal preparation, but even the utensils had been neatly rinsed and placed near the sink for washing. He would make some woman a wonderful husband, I thought. Damn! I had to stop thinking that way.

"I'm sorry," he said, "but I just remembered, I didn't get any wine for dinner."

"That's okay," I told him, actually a little relieved. "I don't drink."

"Really?" he said brightly. "Neither do I. I guess we're both cheap dates."

I used to drink, I mused, but when Brenda started having her drinking problems, I gave it up to try to help her. I had never been much of a drinker in the first place. Of course, I couldn't tell any of this to Steven.

"Did you want to go over anything before dinner? We've got about fifteen minutes."

"Let's wait until after," I suggested. Business after dinner would prevent a nice dinner from leading to anything more intimate. Steven didn't seem like the lecherous sort, but I was taking absolutely no chances when it came to the terms of my probation.

I helped him in the kitchen, and as promised, in fifteen minutes we were sitting down to a simple salad and what looked like a very tasty lasagne. The meal was, in fact, great. I had to watch how much I ate since my body was no longer the size it had once been, but I still managed to eat a full helping and all of my salad.

"I didn't make any dessert," Steven apologized.

"I'm glad," I told him. "This was delicious, but it's more than I'm used to eating."

"I'm pleased that you liked it. Did you want to get down to business now?"

"Let me help you clean up."

He shook his head. "No, there's not that much. I'll get it later."

As I said to myself before, he would make a wonderful husband. I mean, for somebody else—not for me. I was going to be husband material myself if everything went right.

"Okay," I agreed. I pulled his book out of my purse and handed it to him.

"You read it already?"

"Not all of it," I admitted. "I just read the first part of the book. But do you really think that the Judge is... is..."

I was trying to say, "Do you really think the Judge is Jupiter?" but it wouldn't come out. It was that sort of feeling that happens when you try to think of a word and you just can't think of it. I looked at Steven as if waiting for him to say it for me.

"What's wrong, Susan?"

"I wanted to tell you something," I replied, "but for some reason I can't." Wasn't that what Johnny Lavelle had said? You can't say it because it's part of the spell.

Steven seemed to understand. "I know. You can't say it directly, but if you're a little obtuse, you can usually get the idea across, so yes I do."

"Then that means that Betty Vest and Eric Vulman...?"

"Are, too."

I breathed a heavy sigh. It was just nice to know I wasn't stark raving mad. Others believed it as well. So I was up against the gods, but I wasn't some virile young warrior in a tunic and sandals, my sword and shield challenging the very gods. Instead, I was a fairly attractive young woman in a skirt and pantyhose armed only with my law degree. Well, it would have to be enough.

"Okay. That doesn't change anything, though. We still have to convince them that Judy is lying. What can you tell me about her that we haven't already discussed?"

“Nothing really,” he replied. “She’s just another student as far as I know. We’ve never discussed anything outside of class. You know she’s a shade, but like all the other shades, she seems to have a completely independent personality.”

He said roughly the same thing about Audrey. It seemed I probably knew more about them than he did at this point. Then, we discussed the committee. Again, he knew very little about any of them, except for Betty Vest.

“She’s very family-oriented,” he explained. “That’s why she seems so upset about this incident. If I’m guilty, I’m flaunting her values. She’ll have to be certain Judy’s lying or she’ll be against me.”

“What about Eric Vulman?”

He shook his head. “I’ve seen him around town. Except for the College and the city, he’s the biggest local employer. He walks with a limp, but I’ve never actually met him.”

“And the Judge?”

He smiled. “I think you know him a lot better than I do. Other than my day in court, I’ve tried to avoid him. Most of the real people in Ovid do, too.”

That was a pretty common attitude in any town, I realized. Judges and police officers represent authority figures most of us would prefer to avoid. Unfortunately, I needed to know everything I could about them. I made a mental note to talk to Cindy the next day.

“Well, I guess that about does it,” I concluded. “I should probably go home and get some sleep.”

“You sure you wouldn’t like a cup of coffee?”

I found that a part of me did want to stay and get to know Steven better, but I couldn’t afford a personal entanglement. I shook my head. “Maybe some other time.”

“How about this,” he proposed. “If we win this case Saturday, I’ll buy you a big steak at Winston’s that night. Consider a bonus on your fee.”

“All right,” I laughed. “It’s a deal.” Why not? If we won, I would be in a mood to celebrate Saturday evening.

I got out without even an attempt on Steven’s part to kiss me good night. I found I was both relieved and a little disappointed. I would have begged off, of course, but... Don’t go there, girl, I thought.

I was still thinking about Steven when I got home. I don’t think I had ever known a man quite like him. He was thoughtful, gentle, intelligent, and, to be completely honest with myself, he was attractive. If something went wrong on Saturday, what would my relationship be with him? There might not even be an opportunity for a relationship, I realized. The Judge might decide to call him into court for his transgressions, and I had little doubt that the punishment would involve a name change to Stephanie.

I had to make sure that didn’t happen. Steven was completely innocent; I was certain of that. As I drifted off to sleep, my last thoughts were that I would see Steven acquitted or know the reason why.

It was suddenly Thursday morning, and I got out of bed with a renewed spirit. I had only one appointment in the office that morning. Then, I would go over to the municipal building and beard the Judge in his own den. I was actually looking forward to it.

Even Dori commented on my mood. I just laughed as she handed me a cup of coffee and told her things had been looking up. She gave me a motherly smile and went back to her desk. I was actually going to miss Dori. I made a vow to try to find someone like her for my office in Dallas. Then, I realized that would be a problem. The office in Dallas was too high pressure for someone like Dori. Her type belonged in a place like Ovid where legal matters were simpler and people operated more on common sense. The more I thought about it, the more appealing it sounded. Maybe when I got back to Dallas, I’d cut back a little bit.

Of course, I suddenly realized, there was another reason a person like Dori wouldn’t fit in my Dallas operation. She and I had developed something almost like what I suspected was a mother-daughter bond over the last few days. I doubt if she would have been able to do that with Bradley Monroe. It wasn't that Bradley was such a bad person, it was just that he... Now what was I doing speaking of myself in the third person?

"Susan!" Dori called out.

"What is it, Dori?"

"Cindy just called. Court is running a little fast today. She says the Judge will probably adjourn in the next thirty minutes."

Holy cow! I thought. It was almost ten. I had an appointment at ten thirty and I needed to see the Judge. "Dori, can you see if you can reschedule my appointment for after lunch? I really need to see the Judge this morning."

"No problem, dear," she said as I rushed out the door.

As I rushed down the hall to the courtroom, two elderly ladies came out from a trial. They smiled pleasantly at me and continued planning for a bridge party that afternoon. Both ladies were real people. I wondered who they had been. I was still looking back at them as I opened the courtroom door.

"Purse snatchers," Cindy said to me.

I turned to look at her. "I beg your pardon?"

"You were wondering about those two older women," she told me, smiling. "They were purse snatchers. They beat up a little old lady in Tulsa a couple of days ago and took her purse. The police were after them when they fled in the direction of Ovid. Unfortunately, they don't remember who they were, but the punishment certainly fit the crime, don't you think?"

"I have to admit, it does," I replied. "They didn't rape the woman, did they?"

"If they had, they wouldn't have gotten off so lightly," Cindy said grimly. Then, smiling again, she continued, "I told the Judge you were on your way over. He's waiting for you in chambers."

"Great!" I exclaimed. Cindy really was becoming a good friend. On the spur of the moment, I asked her, "Look, after I've talked to him, do you have time for lunch?"

She looked at her watch. "It's a little early, but sure, I'd love it."

The Judge was reviewing some papers as I entered. He looked up and said with a smile, "Yes, and what can I do for you today, Ms. Henderson?"

He thought he had won. Court was over for the week, and I hadn't won a case. I hoped I had a big surprise for him.

"I've been thinking about what you said during my probation hearing the other day, Your Honor," I began brightly.

"Yes?" he said cautiously.

"You said I had a week to argue and win a case before you, but you didn't say it had to be a trial."

"I believe I did use the word trial," he countered.

"Yes, but not in the same context, as we both know." His use of trial had been the quote from the Iliad.

"What other case could you be arguing?" he demanded.

I folded my hands before me in what I hoped was a very demure pose. "Well, Your Honor, I'll be representing Steven Jager at the Moral Review Committee on Saturday."

The Judge grunted, "He's charged with a very serious offense. I don't think you have much of an opportunity with him."

"Oh, has his guilt already been determined?" I asked innocently.

"Of course not!" he said, his voice rising defensively. Then his eyes narrowed. He looked me straight in the eye and asked, "Young lady, are you trying to annoy me?"

"Of course not, Your Honor," I replied. "It's just that this will probably be my last chance to meet the terms of the probation. I believe I have met all of the other terms.”

“Let’s see about that,” he mumbled, suddenly closing his eyes and freezing in place. When his eyes opened a few seconds later, he said, “Yes, you appear to have met the other terms for the moment.”

I wasn’t surprised to learn that he had the ability to see what I had been up to. I suspected nothing in Ovid was outside his view.

“Very well, Ms. Henderson,” he said at last. “I think you have earned the right to meet the final requirement of your probation. We will consider the Jager affair to be a case for the purposes of your probation. But I must warn you, your chances of winning will not be good.”

“But the hearing will be fair?” I asked.

“Very fair.”

I smiled and prepared to leave. “Thank you, Your Honor.”

“Don’t thank me yet,” he warned.

Cindy and I were walking together chatting like the old friends we were supposed to be. She had suggested we go to the Greenhouse, the place Dori ordered salads from. We had walked over to the restaurant, and on a cold blustery day where the threat of snow was still in the air, I realized I at last had the answer to the question of how women can wear pantyhose in the winter without getting their legs cold. The answer is: they can’t. My legs felt as if they were encased in ice cubes, and the wind swirling under my skirt threatened to make more intimate parts of my body cold as well.

The restaurant was a pleasant little place. We were early, so there was no crowd to worry about. Still, Cindy requested a booth near the back where we could talk without being overheard.

“So what did the Judge say?” she asked the moment we had been seated.

I told her of my conversation with the Judge, then added, “Do you think he’ll really be fair?”

“He always keeps his word,” Cindy told me, “no matter what.”

“You make that sound like a problem,” I observed.

She waited for a minute as the waitress supplied us with water and menus. When she was gone, Cindy said, “It’s not a problem; it’s just that he seems a little inflexible sometimes. He had a strong sense of right and wrong. I think he used to be a lot more arbitrary—how shall I say this—when he was younger. It’s almost as if he’s making up for that now. So once he’s promised something, he never goes back on it, even if what he’s promised doesn’t make a lot of sense.”

“But you think he’ll change me back if I win?”

“It’s a big if,” she noted, “but yes, he’ll change you back if you win.”

We each ordered a small chef’s salad with dressing on the side and iced tea. Then, Cindy said, “Look, Susan, I’ve noticed a pattern to the Judge’s sentences.”

“So have I,” I said dryly. “He gets his jollies out of changing men into women.”

“Sometimes,” she conceded. “But there’s a method to what he does. It seems to go beyond justice. Take me, for example. I thought he was giving me a punishment when he changed me, but it really wasn’t a punishment at all. I can’t imagine being anyone but Cindy Patton anymore.”

“That’s fine for you, but what about the person he turned into a dog, or the guy who became a tree? And I don’t imagine those two little old ladies were so tired of being young men that they decided to look like their grandmothers.”

“None of those people deserved any mercy. I did because I really hadn’t done anything wrong. I was just a young guy who was going to die if I didn’t become Cindy, so the Judge did all right by me.”

I saw where she was going with all of this. “Look, Cindy, let’s cut to the chase. You’re trying to tell me the Judge did me a favor by turning me into Susan, am I right?”

She looked down for a moment. "Well... yes."

I shook my head, feeling my long hair move against the back of my neck. "I don't see it that way. Cindy, I was a very successful lawyer, but I know I wasn't a very nice person. I was egotistical, I drove my wife to drink, and I helped a lot of bastards stay out of jail where they probably belonged. I won't say I haven't learned a few things since coming to Ovid. I hope I'm a different person—a better person. But I wasn't cut out to be a girl."

"Haven't you enjoyed it just a little bit?"

I was silent. I really wasn't sure how to answer the question.

She put her hand on mine. "Look, Susan, I'm just saying give it a chance. You may lose Saturday, and I'm afraid if you do, you'll be devastated. At the risk of sounding like a pop psychologist, get in touch with your feminine side. If you do go back to your old life, you'll never have an experience like this again."

She was right about that. "I'll try," I promised.

"Good. And, Susan, if you do lose, I can help." She wrote a phone number and address on a slip of paper and handed it to me. "This is my home number and address. Call me or come by if you need to talk after the hearing."

We said our goodbyes and I walked back to my car. As I was getting in, I suddenly realized that if everything went right, I wouldn't see Cindy again. I would actually miss her since she had become a good friend in a very short period of time. I felt almost as if we really had been old school chums. It was funny how things in Ovid had a tendency to grow on you. For all its bizarreness, it was actually comfortable, like an old pair of shoes.

I took care of my rescheduled appointment. It was an easy one, so it only took about thirty minutes. I spent another hour working on paperwork, since I didn't want to leave any of my clients to the skills of the shade Susan who would probably replace me, assuming they replaced me at all. I wondered, if they didn't replace me, what would happen to Dori? Would they find another role for her, or would she be changed into someone else? I didn't know if that was even done, but I knew Ovid would be a poorer place without her. If I got changed back, I would ask the Judge to take care of her.

By four, I was finished for the day. I didn't really want to go back to my apartment, and there was nothing to keep me at the office. I wanted to go to the library and do some research on Vesta and Vulcan, but I didn't want to do it until Friday morning when I was fresh. I didn't really know that many people in town. Cindy had a family anyway, and I noted Dori wore a wedding ring. That just left Steven, and he and I had just had dinner together the night before. With a sigh, I resigned myself to a lonely evening at my apartment. Maybe I would use the time to get my personal life in order. I realized with a start that I hadn't even checked the mail at home all week. I had better do that. If I got to be my old self again, I should at least leave Susan's personal life in order, and if I failed on Saturday, it would be my life, so I shouldn't ignore it.

There was actually very little in the mail. There was a letter from my mother. Apparently, she and my father now lived in Tulsa where dad was with an oil company. I wondered if they were really in Tulsa. Were there shades there acting out the roles of my parents, or did the letter just come out of some supernatural post office? I would probably never know, no matter what happened to me after Saturday. The rest of the mail consisted of bills and junk. There was one magazine tucked in between the junk mail. It was Cosmo. I can't say that I had ever read it, but it actually looked interesting to me for some reason. I decided to make myself a tuna sandwich and read it. Maybe I'd watch a movie later.

It was then that the phone rang. It was Steven. "Hey," he said lightly, "are we all ready for the big day?"

"I think so," I replied. "I do have a little more research to do on the committee, but that should wrap it up. Then all I have to do is cast doubt on Judy's story."

"Do you think you can do it?"

"I think so," I told him. "I don't think Audrey will give much support. It may come down to your word against hers, but I think I can make you look good."

"I've got every confidence in you," Steven said, giving me an oddly warm feeling. "Say, look, would you like to go out for a bite to eat?"

"No, I'm sorry. I've already eaten," I lied. Why didn't I go eat with him? I wondered. I did like Steven. I felt very comfortable around him. Maybe that was the problem. I was beginning to feel too comfortable around him. This boy-girl stuff was new for me while I was on the girl side.

"Oh." I could hear the disappointment in his voice. I suddenly realized Steven was as lonely as I was. My heart went out to him. Maybe that's why I suddenly asked, "Say, why don't you come over for dinner tomorrow night? We can go over any last minute items then."

"I'd like that." His voice was suddenly brighter.

"Great. How about six thirty?"

"I'll be there."

Now why had I done that? I would be preparing my arguments the night before the hearing. Fixing dinner for Steven would be a complication, but I wanted to do it. We were two lost souls, it seemed. I hoped that if I succeeded Saturday, the Judge would provide another Susan for Steven. I sensed there was more to Steven's interest in me than a client to his lawyer. Did I reciprocate? Well, of course I did, but we were just friends, weren't we?

I put on a sweatshirt and jeans. God, did it feel good to get out of the pantyhose. I made my sandwich and opened a Diet Coke. After snarfing it down quickly, I curled up on the couch with the copy of Cosmo.

The Cosmo was actually kind of fun to read. I actually giggled at the title of the article I first turned to. It was called 'Ten Ways to Please Your Man in Bed.' I read it anyway, and realized the article was right on. There was nothing in the article that as a man I wouldn't have liked. I didn't know how anxious I would be to do some of them as a woman, though. I was actually beginning to feel a little warm reading the article, and there was a strange tingle around my nipples. I looked inside my bra and was shocked to realize the nipples were actually slightly erect. There was a moist warmth in my crotch, too.

I closed the Cosmo quickly and threw it on the coffee table. I pulled myself up into a tight ball, willing the feelings to go away. Put the magazine down, lady, I thought to myself, and slowly move away. Nobody will get hurt.

As the feelings subsided, I watched a little TV and actually got to bed by nine o'clock. I was bored to tears, so there was nothing to do but go to bed. I think I was asleep before I could even muster one more coherent thought.

Friday morning was my fourth morning to awaken as a woman, and I had actually gotten the routine down pretty well. I had noticed if I just let myself go into sort of an alpha state, everything came naturally to me. I could select matching outfits and accessories, apply the right makeup, and arrange my hair, all with confidence.

It was in a lawyerly gray suit and two-inch gray heels that I strode confidently into my office that morning, greeting Dori with a cheery smile. I only had one appointment that morning. Then, I would go over to the College library and do some research in the mythology section. I suspected they would have a good one in Ovid.

The appointment didn't take too long, but it was an interesting one. One of the waitresses at a little bar called Randy Andy's wanted to sue the owner, a Marty Bachman, for sexual harassment. It sounded as if she might have a good case. She was real, and I found myself wondering if she was a former man who had lost her memory and now had to learn how the other half lived.

As she left, I found myself wondering if that was why I was now a woman, I didn't feel as if I had ever harassed a woman, but what else would explain what had been done to me? I was still an attorney. My profession had remained the same but my sex had changed. Why? I'd probably never know, and with any luck, it wouldn't be an issue in a couple of days.

I told Dori where I was going and headed over to the College library to do my research. Before I did, I checked in on Audrey. She was nervous about testifying, but so far, Judy didn't suspect she might be helping our case. Things were looking good.

I had been correct. The mythology section in the library was a good one. It took me very little time to find the information on the various gods. What I had not realized before, though, was that the myths on the gods were not exactly consistent. I was sure Betty Vest was Vesta, but there was very little written about her. She seemed to be goddess of the hearth. Nothing was said about her role in education. That seemed to be the province of Minerva as I had thought, but I wasn't aware of any Minerva associated with the College. Eric Vulman was consistent with his suspected mythological persona of Vulcan. The smith of the gods had become the industrialist of the gods. Here again, though, little was actually written about him. He seemed to have a gimp leg and was apparently well liked, but sources seemed to disagree about many other details, including who his wife was. Some sources indicated it was Venus while others leaned toward Aglaia who was apparently one of the Graces, whatever they were.

As for the Judge, or rather Jupiter, entire volumes were written on him. Some of it backed up the image I had formed of the Judge, but some of it seemed as if Jupiter was wilful, petty and capricious. Perhaps he had changed over the centuries, or perhaps he was the victim of hearsay. I decided to rely on my gut instincts in dealing with him.

So my research came to less than I had hoped. There were no terrific insights on the gods to be gleaned from the books I scanned. I knew a few things about them I hadn't known before, but not enough to weigh in at the Saturday hearing.

Just as I was getting ready to leave, I remembered the Judge telling me to read a Shakespearean play. Which one was it? Oh, yes, The Merchant of Venice. I got a copy to read later and checked it out.

I got back to the office just before lunch. Dori had ordered a salad for each of us, so we sat in my office and talked as we ate. I got the feeling I was dealing with a real person. She talked about her husband who was apparently a honcho at Vulman Industries. I wondered to myself if he was a shade, too? Dori had a girl in high school. The way she talked about her, she was a handful. Dori said she was dating some guy on the football team whom she didn't like. It all sounded so normal. I actually enjoyed the conversation. I couldn't imagine talking with my secretary in Dallas in that way. Maybe Dori wouldn't have talked to Brad Monroe that way, but as Susan, I was just one of the girls. The way I was participating in the conversation, I felt myself being more and more feminine.

After Dori took away the empty Styrofoam plates and went back to her desk, I sat there thinking about something Cindy had said. She had told me to get in touch with my feminine side. I wasn't sure I really had one, but it might be interesting to try. I was at loose ends for the rest of the afternoon. Besides, wouldn't it be fun to get a new hairstyle and a sexy dress for my Saturday dinner with Steven? It should be my next to last night as a woman, so it would be interesting to see what it felt like to be an attractive young woman out on a date with a good looking guy. I mean, I would have to restrain myself. Any hanky-panky might be enough to screw up my return to my old life. Besides, I wasn't too sure how I felt about even kissing a guy, especially Steven. So okay, it was time to quit just getting my toes wet and dive into the pool.

"Dori?" I called. "Who does your hair?"

"What do you think?" Janice held the mirror so I could see what she had done to my hair. Janice ran M'lady, supposedly the best beauty shop in Ovid, and Dori told me Janice was the best stylist in the shop. She had agreed to take me on short notice. I think it was just because she and Dori were good friends.

My hair looked great. With it trimmed up and slightly curled, I looked less like a college radical and more like a poor man's Cindy Crawford. "I like it!" I said to my own surprise. I had had some real misgivings about this little fling when I entered the shop, but the results were impressive.

“While you’re here, how about letting us do your nails?”

“Well...”

“Oh come one. It’ll make you feel like a new woman. I can tell Bobby Sue over there is just dying to work on you.”

I already felt like a new woman and had for the last four days, but what the heck. In for a penny, in for a pound, as they say.

Bobby Sue, like Janice, was a shade. She looked like the stereotype movie manicurist, blonde with heavy makeup to compliment her inch long nails. I was expecting her to be chewing gum and talking in a high-pitched voice. Instead, her voice was a pleasant alto with no indication that she was chewing anything.

“While you’re here, I’d like to work on your makeup a little if you don’t mind,” she said pleasantly as she expertly used a file on my somewhat short nails.

“What’s wrong with my makeup?” I asked. I was rather proud of the progress I had made over the last few days applying it.

She shrugged. “Nothing, really, but I’m a licensed cosmetologist, and I think with these new nails, you might want a little makeup treatment. If you like it, I sell a full line. What do you say?”

“Why not?”

She took about an hour with me, doing both my nails and my face. Several times I wondered what I had been thinking when I told her to go ahead. I had no desire to walk out of here with a painted lady look. When she was finished at last, she held a mirror up to my face and said, “Well, what do you think?”

I was stunned. With my glasses off, hair styled, and makeup professionally applied, I looked almost good enough to be a model. She had given me a very professional look, with the makeup actually more understated than I had been doing. The difference was the colors and how it was applied.

“Do you like it?” she asked.

‘Like’ wasn’t exactly the word I was looking for. For the second time in a week, I felt like a different person. Since Monday, I had been a lawyer first and a woman second. This creature in the mirror was a woman first and foremost. I felt somehow smaller and more vulnerable. I began to think I had made a mistake doing this. I was really just satisfying my curiosity, but how far would that go? What if I decided to satisfy my curiosity about going to bed with a man?

Was I curious about that? Yes, to be honest, I was very curious, but I wasn’t curious enough to ruin my last chance of returning to my old body.

“Yes, I do like it,” I finally managed to answer.

“Oh, that’s great!” Bobby Sue said with a big smile. “You were so quiet there for a minute, I thought you didn’t like it.”

I paid Janice and Bobby Sue, giving them both a healthy tip, and I even bought some cosmetics from Bobby Sue. I figured if I remained as Susan, I could use them, and if I didn’t, I wouldn’t even have to pay the credit card bill. I couldn’t lose. I hoped I could afford it if something went wrong on Saturday. I had no idea how well my law practice was going, but I hadn’t exactly been overworked during my stay.

My next stop was March’s Department Store. The entire three-story store could have fit into a small corner of any major Neiman Marcus store in Dallas, but in spite of its shortcomings, it did seem to have an excellent women’s department. I found the right dress for Saturday night. It was dark green with a very short skirt and cut to show a lot of cleavage. I managed to pick out a pair of shoes and a purse to go with it. My last big fling as a woman was going to be a fashionable one.

“Wow! What happened to you?” Dori asked as I breezed back into the office.

“Janice does nice work,” I said with a grin. I pulled the dress I had just bought out of its sack. “This is for tomorrow night,” I told her.

“What’s happening tomorrow night?” she asked.

“Steven is taking me to Winston’s, hopefully to celebrate.”

Dori gave me a sly look. “You and Mr. Jager seem to be developing quite a relationship.”

“Relationship?” I repeated. “No, Dori, we’re just friends. Besides, he’s a client.”

“You can’t fool me,” she said smiling. “I’ve seen the way he looks at you when he comes into the office. I think he’s nuts about you. And you look like you might be just a little bit interested in him.”

“Oh, no, Dori. This is all just your imagination,” I protested, but something told me she might be right. Steven had been looking at me differently the last day or so. Had I been looking at him the same way? I didn’t think so. I just considered Steven a friend. He was a gentleman and a good looking guy. Maybe my hormones were sneaking up on me again.

I would have to watch myself. If everything went according to plan, I would see Steven three more times. The first would be tonight for dinner at my place. There should be no problems there. We had to finish preparing for the hearing. Then, there would be the hearing itself. Even if I were mad about him, nothing could happen there. The most dangerous time would be Saturday at dinner. Part of me was sorry I had agreed to do it. If we won, we would each be celebrating a different victory. Steven would be celebrating the salvation of his reputation and his career, and I would be celebrating an imminent return to manhood.

I finished up the last of my paperwork about four. I had planned to get out of the office a little early to get changed and fix dinner, so I was right on schedule.

“No problem,” Dori said when I told her I was leaving. “I’ll see you first thing Monday.”

Oops, I thought. No, she wouldn’t. I would be in court. “Dori, I have an early meeting with the Judge, so I may be a little late.” Like forever, I realized.

“No problem,” she said. “Your first appointment isn’t until ten on Monday. I’ll see you when you get here.”

“Yeah,” I said, hefting my briefcase and heading for the door. “I’ll see you then.” I had to fight a terrible urge to go back and hug her. She had become more than a secretary; she had become a friend. I would miss her. She would be the standard by which I would rate all other secretaries in the future, and I was sure none would ever match up. I was a lucky attorney to have had her for the week.

As I drove home, I began to reflect on the life I would soon (hopefully) be giving up. It really wasn’t a bad life. I had made three very good friends. Dori was a marvel. I hoped she got her problems with her daughter resolved. Then there was Cindy. She, like me, had been a man, and yet she had accepted her new role with apparent relish. I didn’t think I could be as accepting of the sex change as she had been. I only hoped I didn’t have the opportunity to find out.

Then there was Steven. There was something about him I just couldn’t put out of my mind. He was masculine, yet at the same time vulnerable. He was a dedicated teacher, an intellectual if you will. I could easily see how some of his female students could have become infatuated with him. I recalled the scene in an Indiana Jones film where one of the girls in his class wrote ‘I love you’ on her eyelids, to Harrison Ford’s alarm. I could see a girl doing that for Steven.

Yet I couldn’t see Steven and Brad Monroe being friends. Brad was too driven, too ensnared in the need to win all the time, no matter what the consequences. He would chew Steven up and spit him out. He would... Why was I thinking about Brad as if he was another person again? I was Brad, and I liked Steven. In fact, if I got stuck in Ovid for the rest of my life, I might even learn to... to...

No! I couldn’t think about that. It wasn’t right. It wasn’t... natural? I just couldn’t think about that. Not now. There was still too much to do. I had to stay clearheaded for the hearing. There was a good reason why American Bar Association ethics demanded the attorney-client relationship be a professional one. No attorney could be depended upon to do her best when romantically entangled with the client. Her?

Oh, God.

I started dinner as soon as I got home. I had planned something simple, just baked chicken with yogurt, lime and salsa. It was easy to make. With some asparagus on the side and a salad, it made a tasty, attractive and fairly healthy meal. In my recent bachelor days, I had actually become a decent cook when I had to be. I had to do something to balance out the unhealthy meals eaten out in restaurants.

I slipped out of my suit and opted for pants. I found a pair of black pants, low-cut boots, and a rust-colored sweater, all of which I thought would not be too sexy. I was wrong, though. The boots were almost elfin in appearance, the pants were formfitting, showing off my legs and ass, and the sweater was tight enough that it did nothing to disguise my breasts. Oh well, it was too late to change. Besides, I thought I looked pretty good.

Steven arrived at exactly six thirty. He was dressed in a brown tweed jacket, tan slacks, and a beige turtleneck. I guessed that he must have nothing but tweed jackets and turtlenecks in his wardrobe. He was the archetypal college instructor.

He looked at me appreciatively. "I like your hair that way. It really looks fantastic."

"Why, thank you," I said with a big smile.

"Nice place," he commented, looking around.

"Thanks," I replied, suddenly realizing that I hadn't vacuumed or dusted. Thank god I wasn't the kind of person who left junk scattered everywhere. Even at that, Steven was a better housekeeper.

"Dinner's almost ready," I told him. "Can you make the drinks? Diet Coke is in the cupboard over the dishwasher."

"Sure." He pulled two cans out of the pack, then noticed the library book I had laid on the counter. He picked it up and said, "Shakespeare's play, eh? Going after my job?"

"Hardly," I laughed. "Someone suggested I read one of his plays, The Merchant of Venice. Is it any good?"

"It's not one of his best," he told me. "But of course, I prefer his tragedies to his comedies. It's hard to get the humor to translate to our era. To a lot of people, that play is anti-Semitic."

"Do you think it is?"

He shook his head. "Not really. It's just that Shylock, one of the main characters, is Jewish, and he's more or less the villain of the play."

It didn't sound like anything that would have an effect on my situation. I wondered why the Judge had suggested I read it. "Does it have anything to do with the law or justice?"

"Sure," he said opening the book. "Here it is. It starts with 'The quality of mercy is not strained'."

"I've heard that somewhere before," I interjected.

"It's a famous passage. See, here it is."

I looked at where he was pointing and was drawn at once to a line which read, 'And earthly power doth then show likest God's when mercy seasons justice.'

I looked up at Steven. "I'm not sure what it means."

Steven shrugged, "Like anything else in Shakespeare, it's subject to a myriad of interpretations. I guess the simplest interpretation would be that justice alone isn't always the answer. If all you seek is justice, many men can provide that, but to temper justice with mercy takes a god-like insight."

I wasn't sure what the Judge was getting at, but I had a suspicion. It was as if he were telling me that what he had done to me wasn't just in the name of some twisted justice that as a mere mortal, I would find hard to understand. He was telling me that he was also being merciful in his role as not just a judge, but as a god. I had yet to understand how giving me breasts and a vagina was an example of mercy.

Steven and I had a pleasant dinner. We talked about Shakespeare some more. I had never taken the time to read the Bard, but Steven piqued my interest. I made a mental note to attend a couple of his plays and get a better feel for him. My total immersion in law through the years had kept me from enjoying the arts. I vowed to change that when I got back to my old life.

Steven finished dinner with a satisfied sigh. "That was terrific. You've got to give me the recipe."

"It's pretty simple," I told him. "Just bake the chicken, add a little yogurt and lime juice, and top with salsa. I suppose you could make your own salsa, but mine comes right out of the jar."

"In any case, it was great." He looked at me with an appreciation that made me a little uncomfortable.

"Well, we need to get down to business," I announced. I wanted to keep the evening completely professional. "I think we're all ready for tomorrow. I just want to go over a couple of points."

"Fine."

"Ms. Walker is going to claim that you were alone with her in your office. You've admitted as much."

"But the door was open," he pointed out.

"Yes, but no one saw that," I countered.

His shoulders slumped. "So it's my word against hers."

"Not necessarily," I told him. "I have a strategy I think will work. I just want to make sure you have all the details straight in your mind. Remember, the committee will have the College's attorney in that meeting as well to make sure everything is kosher. If he spots any inconsistencies in your testimony, it won't go well. Now, let's go over all the details."

We spent the next two hours practicing. I drilled him with every question I could think of. Most of the questions would never be asked in the hearing, but he had to be ready for everything. I had done this many times before, so I was in my element. For Steven, though, it was a new and gruelling experience.

It was ten o'clock when I finally said, "Okay, I think we're ready."

"Thank god," Steven said, stretching as he stood. "I think I may sleep in the hearing tomorrow."

"I doubt that," I replied, "but you'll sure want to after this is all over."

He smiled at that. "I can't. I have to take a beautiful woman to dinner tomorrow night."

I felt myself blushing. I really didn't know what else to do in response, so I returned his smile with a faint one of my own. I didn't want to tell him that his dinner date with me might well be the last public appearance of Susan Henderson. After all, that was what I really wanted, wasn't it? But I would miss Steven.

"Just get a good night's sleep tonight," I advised him. "You need to be sharp tomorrow."

"Okay," he agreed. "I'll pick you up an hour before the hearing."

"You don't have to do that. I can just meet you there."

"Nope, my mind is made up."

I finally agreed and hustled him out the door before anything could happen between us. I was becoming increasingly aware that Steven was very attracted to me. That wasn't really what concerned me. I was aware that I was reasonably attractive. What concerned me was that I was beginning to feel an attraction as well. I hadn't planned on it. In fact, I had done everything I could to prevent it, but there were different hormones flowing through my body, and my new plumbing was becoming aroused. If I didn't win tomorrow, I suspected it would not be long before I could no longer fight back these growing feelings. It would be my last chance.

Saturday morning seemed to come the minute after I had put my head on the pillow. I groaned as I got out of bed. This was it. La Momenta de Verdad, as the bullfighters say: the Moment of Truth. The hearing was at ten, so most likely, by one o'clock, I would have either saved Steven's career and my own identity, or I would be Susan Henderson for the rest of my life, and poor Steven would be disgraced and possibly subject to further punishment in court. I had to be at my best.

The occasion called for my most serious look. I chose a navy blue suit with a skirt that came down almost to my knees. The blouse was simple and white—the white of purity and truth. The jewelry was simple and understated, as was the makeup. The shoes had only a small heel to show I was all business. I examined myself in the mirror as I slipped on my glasses. Ally McBeal, eat your heart out.

As promised, Steven was at my door promptly at nine. When I opened the door, I saw he was carrying a large paper sack. “Coffee and bagels,” he explained. “It might be a long time until lunch. Sorry it’s not Starbucks, but we don’t have any of those in Ovid yet.”

“This will do fine,” I laughed, in spite of the serious mood I was trying to maintain. “I’ll get some orange juice and cream cheese and we’ll feast.”

We were in a confident mood as we arrived at the hearing room. There was nothing special about the room. It was just a seminar room in one of the classroom buildings. We appeared to be the only people in the building. It was fifteen minutes until ten, and no one had arrived from the committee. That gave me the opportunity to arrange the seating the way I wanted it. I had Steven sit next to me half way down the table. That way, the committee would be forced to sit opposite us, but not so far away as they would if we were seated at one end. It gave more the appearance of a conference rather than of a trial. It also forced them to look Steven and me directly in the eye. As I said, I was in my element. I was the predator, not the prey.

The committee members entered the room at five before ten. The fact that they entered as a group meant that they had already had a meeting to decide how to proceed. The Judge, I already knew, so I looked in his direction first. On cue, he offered his hand with a formal, “Ms. Henderson.”

I took it, replying equally formally, “Good morning, Your Honor.”

“I would like to introduce you to our Chairman, Eric Vulman,” he said, turning to the tall beefy man at his side. Eric Vulman looked out of place in his suit. He would have been more at home in a work shirt with tongs and a hammer in his hands as he worked a sword or horseshoe into its proper shape. He was, as the texts had speculated, not a handsome man, but he had the appearance of an honest, hardworking businessman perhaps fifty years old. It was hard to imagine that he was a god.

He stepped forward, limping slightly as he offered his hand. "I'm pleased to meet you, Ms. Henderson. The Judge has told me a lot about you."

I was sure he had. I just smiled rather than comment and took his hand. His handshake was firm but not uncomfortable, and it nearly swallowed my much smaller one.

"And this," the Judge continued, "is Elizabeth Vest, the President of Capta College."

"Call me Betty," she said with a sincere smile as she extended her hand. "Only the Judge ever calls me Elizabeth."

Betty Vest didn't look like a college president. She looked more like Betty Crocker. She had a pleasant, even attractive face and a matronly figure. She appeared to be no more than forty with just a touch of gray surrounded by fairly short brown hair. I was pleased to note that I had dressed well for the occasion, for she was wearing an outfit that appeared to be almost the twin of my own. There was a friendly twinkle in her eyes that made you feel that she was genuinely glad to meet you.

I took her hand. As I did, she placed her other hand over mine. "Please call me Susan," was all I managed to say.

"And this," the Judge said, motioning to an older man, perhaps sixty, "is Henry Wilcox, the attorney for the College."

Henry Wilcox looked like the typical distinguished attorney. He had gray hair which was beginning to recede, a small moustache, a trim body, and wore the male equivalent of my own outfit. He was also a shade. I wondered if I was the only human attorney in Ovid. I took his hand as well, but neither of us spoke, as if the first to speak would somehow give away too much information to the other. We did look each other directly in the eye, though, and it was my impression that he was not confident with the actions which might have to be taken in the meeting.

When we were seated as I had planned, Eric Vulman, who was seated directly across from me, called the hearing to order. "We are here to examine a very serious charge levied by two Capta students. Ah, here they are now."

Judy Walker and Audrey Bertram had slipped quietly into the room and seated themselves at one end of the table. Good, that was just where I wanted them.

Eric placed an unusually small pair of glasses over his nose and began, "The charges are that Steven Jager did on Monday last make overtures of a sexual nature to Judith Walker, a student in his Freshman English class. This is not a formal court of law, but rather a deliberative body tasked with determining Mr. Jager's fitness to continue in the employment of this institution."

These were formal words. Good. That meant the hearing was going to follow a formal pattern. Proof would be required. I was most certainly in my element now. My greatest fear was that the meeting would be informal where hearsay and speculation often run rampant.

"If it acceptable to the Committee," I began, "I would like to suggest that before this hearing continues, that any witnesses be asked to leave the room until their testimony is officially required."

"And why is that, Ms. Henderson?" the Chairman asked. I could hear the other members of the Committee shuffling uncomfortably in their seats. This was not the way they had planned things.

"I would reserve my reasons until there are no witnesses in the room," I replied.

The members of the Committee looked at each other, then at the attorney. He gave a small but perceptible nod.

“Very well, Ms. Henderson,” the Chairman agreed. “We will ask the witnesses to leave until we have had a chance to discuss your reasoning.”

The two girls with questioning looks stepped out of the room, ushered by the attorney. When they were gone and the attorney had returned, I began, “The accusations made by the two witnesses can neither be substantiated nor disproven since there were no witnesses to the actual exchange. However, the accusation has been backed up by Ms. Bertram who, although she did not by her own admission see any misconduct, has been a confidant of Ms. Walker and has stated that Mr. Jager had shown sexual interest. We intend to show that Ms. Walker’s story is nothing more than a fantasy which cannot be substantiated in any way.”

The Judge and the attorney conferred for a moment. Then, the attorney whispered something to Betty and Eric. When they had finished, Eric said, “Very well. We will conduct this hearing in the fashion you have suggested so as to be completely fair to your client.”

The Committee began the hearing by asking Steven to tell his side of the story. All I had to do was sit back and take notes. The questions they asked were much more gentle than the ones I had asked him the previous evening, so he was well coached. He appeared confident but thoughtful, as if he was sure he had done nothing wrong, but was willing to cooperate in every way to make certain that nothing he had done was improper. Eric Vulman and Betty Vest asked all of the questions. The Judge remained uncharacteristically silent, simply observing and taking occasional notes. I hope I looked calmer than I felt. There were a couple of lines of questioning I had hoped the Committee would not pursue. To my relief, they did not. When the Committee had finished asking its questions, the chairman turned to the attorney and said, “Bring in Ms. Walker.”

Judy Walker had done an excellent job of preparing herself for her appearance. She had worn very light makeup and had her hair pinned back to give herself a very vulnerable girlish look. Her cream cable knit sweater and tan ankle length skirt gave her a very chaste, demure look. She appeared as she wanted to appear, as an innocent victim.

“Ms. Walker,” the Chairman began once she was seated, “you have levelled a very serious charge against Mr. Jager. We would like to hear in your own words what happened last Monday.”

“Well,” she began in a very soft voice, looking down at her lap, “I stayed after class Monday to ask Mr. Jager a question about Milton. That’s what we’re studying now. He asked me to come back to his office with him. I did. I never suspected he would do what he did.”

“And what was that?” the Chairman asked.

Judy looked very serious. “He exposed himself to me and told me to... to suck on it. I... I didn’t know what to do. He was blocking the door. I managed to push my way past him and ran out into the hall. I ran back to my dorm and told Audrey. She said I should tell Ms. Vest about it. I didn’t want to get him in trouble, though. Then Audrey talked me into it, so I went in the next morning and told her what had happened.” She looked around like a frightened deer in the forest. “I... I guess that’s all.”

Either Steven had lied to me or this girl deserved an Oscar. My money was on the latter. This was not the same girl who had refused to talk to me a few days earlier. That girl was strong and forceful. This girl was nothing like that. This was an innocent little flower, about to be plucked by the evil beast.

I waited for a nod from the Chairman, then began, “Ms. Walker, you say Mr. Jager asked you to come to his office. Why was that?”

She shrugged. “To answer my question, I guess.”

“Did he always take you to his office to answer questions?”

“I... no. I mean, sometimes he did.”

I scowled at her. “Which is it—no or sometimes?”

She thought for a minute. “Sometimes.”

“Isn’t it true that this was the first time he asked you to come to his office?”

“Well, yes, I guess it was.”

“Do you know why he asked you to come to his office?”

“I do now,” she said ominously.

Oh, good. Steven couldn’t remember if he had told her why he wanted her to go back to his office or not, and I had coached him to say nothing about it. The Committee had failed to ask him that as well.

“Then you didn’t know that he was meeting a colleague for lunch right after class, a colleague who was going to meet him at his office?”

“Uh, no.”

“How often did you stay after class to ask questions?” I asked, changing the line of questioning to throw her off balance.

“I don’t know.” She was beginning to fidget now. “Maybe once a week.”

“And the questions were always answered in the classroom?”

“Yes.” A defiant ‘yes’ at that.

“Then don’t you think it is a little odd that the one day he takes you back to expose himself to you is the one day he’s expecting someone in his office at any moment?”

There was no response for a moment. Then she said angrily, “I don’t know. I just know he pulled out his c... his penis and told me to suck on it.”

She just shot her demure little girl act in the ass. I smiled and said, “Thank you, Ms. Walker. I’d like to see Ms. Bertram now.”

Judy Walker was escorted out. She had an angry scowl on her face. Things hadn’t gone as she had planned. Now, she had to alert Audrey to be careful. I wasn’t going to give her that opportunity.

“Please send her in at once,” I requested. Henry Wilcox smiled knowingly. This wasn’t his fight. He was only there to see that the College wasn’t embarrassed. He was now my ally. Shade or not, I suspected he was an astute attorney, and he realized momentum was now on my side. At the moment, it appeared to him that doing what I had asked was the best course of action. He brought Audrey Bertram back immediately.

Audrey looked worse for wear. I had given her reasons to doubt the little plot Judy had hatched with her. Judy had been hammering her for the last few days, I was certain. Now, she had seen Judy shaken, so she had no way of knowing what had been said. Thank god this wasn't an actual trial, or I could never have gotten away with what I was doing.

"Ms. Bertram," I began, not giving the Committee a chance to question her. I had become a de facto member of the Committee and no one was challenging me. I was asking the questions for them. "Ms. Bertram, we have just heard testimony from Ms. Walker regarding alleged sexual misconduct on the part of Mr. Jager. Would you please tell us what you know about the incident?"

This was the moment of truth for certain. If she substantiated Judy's story, I had a long day ahead of me no matter what. I had to hope that she was sufficiently shaken to try to weasel out of any culpability. I wasn't disappointed.

"Well," she began meekly, "I really wasn't there."

"You weren't there," I repeated, "but you talked to her about the incident."

"Yes."

"And she told you that Mr. Jager had asked her back to his office because he was expecting a luncheon appointment?"

"Ye- no. What luncheon appointment?"

"Then you weren't aware that someone was about to visit Mr. Jager's office, someone he had been expecting?"

"No," she said softly.

"Someone who would have caught them in the middle of the act Ms. Walker claims she was asked to perform?"

It didn't take much. Audrey was practically at the breaking point when she came in the room. "She said I wouldn't have to do this!" she said with a loud sob.

"Do what?" I demanded.

"Do this—testify. She said all I would have to do was tell Dr. Vest and that would be it," she cried, practically incoherent. "It was all her idea. She said she would take care of all of it. I just wanted to help her. She's my best friend, and now... and now..." That was all she could say. She broke down in tears.

No one else in the room spoke. I had been through confrontations like this many times before, and I knew we had won.

The members of the Committee looked at each other. They each nodded, and the Chairman spoke. "Mr. Jager, the Committee appears to owe you an apology. Please accept that apology, and rest assured that the persons responsible for the accusation will not escape lightly."

Steven looked at the members of the Committee with obvious relief. "Thank you," he said sincerely. "I'm just happy the truth prevailed, but I really don't want to see Judy or Audrey here punished. I think they just need help. They're both good girls at heart, and as someone recently quoted to me, mercy should always season justice."

"A noble thought," the Judge commented with a sidelong glance at me. I couldn't tell, but I think he was actually smiling.

Outside the classroom, Steven suddenly surprised me with a loving hug.

"Be careful," I warned him lightly, "or you may have another sexual harassment suit on your hands."

He let go and looked a little concerned until he saw my smile. "Do you want to go to lunch?"

"Thanks, Steven, but no. I have some personal business to take care of this afternoon. Besides, you're taking me out for a big dinner tonight as I recall. If I eat now, I won't be hungry tonight. In fact, to work up an appetite, I think I'll walk home. It's only a couple of blocks."

He grinned. "Come to think of it, if I ate now, I wouldn't be hungry either. I'll pick you up at six?"

"Six would be great," I replied.

The Committee filed out, led by Henry Wilcox. Each pleasantly said good-bye to me and walked on, except for the Judge who remained behind. "You did a marvellous job in there," he said, "but what would you have done if you hadn't uncovered his lunch appointment?"

I smiled. "There was no lunch appointment."

"What?"

"There was no lunch appointment. Steven never said there was. I just wanted to do something to shake our Ms. Walker up a little. Phony stories like hers always fall apart when you tweak them."

"You could never have gotten away with a stunt like that in my court," the Judge said seriously.

"You're right," I agreed, "but as you pointed out, this wasn't a courtroom."

He actually laughed. "Very good, Ms. Henderson. Or I suppose I should call you Mr. Monroe since that is who you will be on Monday."

My heart jumped. "You're going to change me back?"

"Nothing could stop me now," he replied. "I always stand by my agreements. Be in court at nine on Monday. By ten, you'll be on your way home. You won't even remember Ovid even existed!"

"Thank you," I managed to say as he turned away. I had done it! I was going to be Brad Monroe again. I had won.

Then why did I feel so empty?

The walk home was pleasant. The cold air had moved on, and it was a pleasant late Fall day in Ovid, sunny and about fifty. I walked slowly back to my apartment, taking in the cool crisp air and enjoying life. I had been Susan Henderson for only five days, but it had actually started to feel normal. I would actually miss some things about being a woman. There was a light feeling to being so much smaller than I was as a man. It made walking home, even in heels, seem almost like walking on air. I would actually miss some of the sensations I felt walking home, the feel of long hair swirled by the breeze, the airy but not unpleasant feeling beneath my skirt, even the rhythmic sway of my breasts and hips as I walked. Yes, I would actually miss those sensations.

The apartment seemed empty when I walked in, as if I wasn't really there anymore. I wondered if it would have a new resident on Monday, or if someone else would be Susan Henderson. Maybe another lawyer would come speeding through over the weekend and become the new Susan Henderson. Part of me hoped that wouldn't happen.

I puttered around the apartment, cleaning up, doing laundry. I knew I didn't have to, but I had to do something. My work was almost done here. I didn't want to just sit and count the hours with... what? Anticipation? No, not really that. I couldn't quite put my finger on the emotions I was feeling. To take my mind off such thoughts, I picked up the Cosmo again. I don't even remember what I read; I just looked at the words until it was time to get ready for dinner.

I suppose it was because I expected my dinner date with Steven to be my last night in a skirt and heels that I decided to go all out. Although I hadn't wanted to stay a woman, it was a unique experience. This would be my one and only opportunity to go out on a formal date as a woman, and I wanted to make it a memorable evening.

I started by taking a leisurely bath. That was a decadent habit I planned to continue when I got my old body back. Of course, I would probably have to give up the scented bubble bath, but at least I would enjoy the feel of warm waters caressing my body rather than the harsh sting of a shower. I shaved my legs and under my arms. I had to admit, it was a more sensual experience than shaving one's face.

Dressing took no time at all. I had been dressing in skirts and heels for nearly a week now, so it was becoming second nature to me. I wondered if starting Monday, I would have trouble tying a tie again. The thought of doing that made my neck hurt. I dressed in the laciest black lingerie I could find in my dresser. I had also found a dark shade of hose—not pantyhose—that would go well with my new dress and shoes, so for the first and probably only time, I slipped on a garter belt. The Dress fit like a proverbial glove. Although my breasts were at best average in size, the dress pushed them in and up to form ample cleavage. The hemline was wickedly short, showing off my legs encased in the smoky nylons. The shoes were only three-inch heels. I had worn a pair that high earlier in the week, but this heel was much narrower and caused my steps to be a little shorter.

Makeup and hair had become easier as well. I can't say they had become second nature, but with careful attention, I did a more than passable job. I added just a little extra eye shadow on a whim and was pleased with the results. I slipped my glasses into my purse. I might not be able to see that well without them tonight, but I would look great. I spritzed on a little scent, and I was nearly finished.

Jewelry was the final step. I had minimized my wearing of jewelry during the week. As a man, I normally wore only a watch, so I had little interest in or knowledge about jewelry. As Susan, though, it was different. I actually liked the finished look jewelry gave to this body. I found two gold bracelets, a beautiful gold necklace and matching earrings which were accented by tiny diamonds. I suspected they were a gift from my shadowy parents since I doubted if Susan made enough to afford them. They looked great when I put them on. I was just finished attaching the last earring when the doorbell rang.

When I opened the door, I watched in amusement as Steven's jaw dropped. "Wow! You are absolutely fantastic."

I grinned. "Why, thank you, sir." He didn't look so bad himself. The tweedy look was gone. He was wearing a dark blue pinstripe suit, oxford cloth blue shirt, and a tie which looked as if it had cost him a week's salary. I may have been the lawyer, but tonight, he looked more like a lawyer than I did.

"Oh," he remarked, pulling a bouquet of roses from behind his back. "I almost forgot these. But now that I've seen you, the roses don't look so great."

I flushed at the compliment. "I think they're very pretty, and very thoughtful of you, too. I'll put them in water right now."

I took the flowers to the kitchen, wondering quietly what was happening to me. I guessed that having the pressure of the hearing and the need to satisfy the terms of my probation fulfilled, I was actually relaxing in Susan's body. I was able to enjoy the feeling of being an attractive young woman in the company of an attractive young man. It felt more satisfying than... than anything else in recent memory.

Winston's proved to be a modest steakhouse on the edge of town. It was on a small wooded hill and actually enjoyed a view of Ovid spread out in the valley below. Inside was a small town version of a four star restaurant, complete with carpet, drapes, classical music and table linen. It appeared cozy and relaxing. I was momentarily startled as the maitre'd pulled my chair back for me, but I recovered quickly and took my seat with a smile.

"What do you think of the place?" Steven asked when we were both seated.

"It's very nice," I replied. And it was. I liked the simplicity of the restaurant. I had grown tired of the posh Dallas restaurants with their unhealthy food, snooty waiters, and ridiculous prices. Winston's seemed a little more... well, real. That was an odd description, I thought, since nothing in Ovid was real in the normal sense of the word.

"They even have sparkling grape juice," Steven told me as a waiter brought a silver bucket to our table. He grinned, "I called ahead and told them to have it ready."

I sometimes missed the pleasures of a celebratory glass of champagne, so this was a delightful surprise for me. The waiter poured us each a glass of the sparkling juice.

"To you," Steven said raising his glass.

"To me?"

“Yes. Raise your glass.”

I did so, carefully holding it as Steven’s glass clinked against mine.

“To Ovid’s most beautiful attorney,” Steven said with mock solemnity. Then, more seriously, “Without you, I’d have nothing to celebrate tonight.”

Why was I feeling so pleased? I felt a contentment I hadn’t felt since the early days of my marriage with Brenda. I had to put on the brakes, I realized. Something was happening between Steven and me that could go no further. I hadn’t forgotten the last condition of my parole: no sex. I was actually starting to become curious as to what it would be like with Steven.

Fortunately, the waiter interrupted the scene with the pronouncement of the evening specials. His interruption stifled the mood for a little while. We managed to order dinner, and the talk turned to Steven’s career as we ate.

“I would like to make full professor,” Steven told me. “I’ll be up for Associate Professor as soon as I’m tenured. I think I’ll have a good chance of getting it right after tenure.”

“That would be terrific,” I said between mouthfuls of the most exquisitely tender steak I had ever eaten. “Do you already have your doctorate?”

“All I need is my thesis,” he replied. “Capta has an arrangement with the University of Oklahoma in Norman. It isn’t exactly an Ivy League degree, but it’s all I’ll ever need at Capta.”

“So you’re going to stay at Capta?”

He grinned. “I don’t think I have a choice. I don’t think anybody ever leaves Ovid.”

“I suppose not,” I conceded. I hadn’t really thought about that. I wondered if the locals could leave. Maybe after I got back to Dallas, I could call Steven and... No, that wouldn’t work. I’d be a different person, and I certainly didn’t plan to continue any sort of relationship with him. I wasn’t gay. Besides, the Judge said I wouldn’t even remember Ovid.

I wouldn't remember Ovid. A shudder went down my back. I realized I didn't want to forget Ovid. I wanted to remember my time here.

"Did you hear me?"

"What?" I said, breaking out of my reverie.

"I asked you what you wanted to do with your career here in Ovid?"

I was going to have to tell Steven that I had less than two days left in Ovid, but I didn't know how. For the moment, I replied, "Oh, I guess I'll just continue to practice law."

"I suspect it isn't as interesting a practice as the one you left behind," he ventured.

"Not by half," I agreed.

We talked about many other things. We talked politics (what attorney does not like to talk about politics?), sports, the state of higher education in America, and a myriad of other topics. I hadn't had so much fun just talking to someone in years.

When we had finished dessert and coffee, we looked around and realized we were practically the only people left in the room. Nearly everyone else had left without our even noticing it. It was nearly ten. In Dallas, there would have been a substantial crowd of late diners, eating after attending a play or concert, but Ovid was a Midwestern farm town, and people went to bed early, even on Saturday night.

"Do you want another cup of coffee?"

"I think I'm going to float away if I do," I laughed. "Maybe we should call it a night."

"All right," Steven agreed reluctantly, signalling for our check.

As he drove me home, I began to feel what Cinderella must have felt as the clock began to strike midnight. The ball was over. My womanhood was almost a thing of the past. I found I didn't want the night to end, not yet. "Steven," I ventured, "would you like to come in for a cup of coffee?”

“I’d love to,” he replied softly.

When I had made the coffee and poured each of us a cup, we sat facing each other at my kitchen table, just as we had at Winston’s. But the mood had changed. I was feeling wistful. It was almost time to say good-bye to Steven forever. Steven was quiet as well. He just sipped his coffee and looked at me, as if trying to decide what to say.

“Susan,” he began at last, “I’ve never told you about my previous life. As you know, our past lives are rather private things here in Ovid, but I’d like you to know mine.”

“You don’t have to tell me,” I told him. “I don’t think I care who you were before. I just like the way you are now.”

“Susan, I’m in love with you,” he blurted out.

“No, Steven, I...”

“No, I’ve got to get this out,” he said, almost in pain. “I know you’ve been here only a short time, and I don’t know who you were before, but we’re all here for the rest of our lives, and I want to spend my life with you.”

He leaned forward, taking another sip of coffee, as if it could somehow give him the strength to continue. “It was just before Christmas last year,” he began. “I had made a first-class mess of my life. I had no career, no family, and a drinking problem that landed me in the Ovid jail for driving while impaired.”

I was starting to feel a strange feeling in the pit of my stomach. I could almost tell what would come next. I seemed to sense it. Woman’s intuition?

“I was a woman then,” Steven continued, and with a shrug added, “I was actually married to a lawyer at one time—a very famous lawyer in fact. You may have heard of him. His name...”

“Brenda?” I asked softly, my heart about to break through my breasts.

“What? How could you...?” His eyes were suddenly as wide as I was sure mine had become. “Brad?”

I put my head in my hands. Someone once said that man plans and the gods laugh. The gods, or at least one god in particular had to be laughing now. No wonder I had felt such a strong attraction to Steven. I suddenly felt Steven’s larger hand on mine. “Brad... Susan? Are you all right?”

“I don’t know,” I said, shaking my head. “I can’t believe it. It’s just too bizarre.”

“But it’s not!” Steven countered, holding both of my hands in his. “It’s wonderful. Oh, Br–Susan, I never wanted to leave you. I always loved you, but I had to go.”

“I know,” I agreed. “I was destroying you. I didn’t mean to, but I couldn’t stop myself. My career meant everything to me.”

“That’s what makes this such a wonderful opportunity,” Steven said brightly. “We both have the careers we want here in Ovid, and now we can have each other.”

“Steven,” I whispered, pulling my hands away from his, “I can’t.”

“What?”

“I can’t. I’m not ready for this. I’m not Susan—not really.”

“Yes, you are, and I love you.”

I was fighting to hold back tears and failing. I knew if I cried, he would enfold me in his arms, and I knew where that might lead. I was in shock to the point of practically being in pain. I needed to think. I couldn’t let this conversation continue. “Steven, please go now.”

“But, Susan...”

“No! Please go!” I said more forcefully. “I need some time. I need to think.”

There was a worry of concern on his handsome face now. He realized this discussion could go no further. “Susan, I’ll call you in the morning.”

“All right,” I agreed. Anything to get him out. As soon as I heard the door close behind him, I broke out into a flood of tears.

Reluctantly, I got out of my clothes. It was probably the last time I would wear anything like them, I thought sadly. I put on a pair of flannel pajamas. No sense in wearing anything very feminine. I hadn’t found the nerve to tell Steven the truth, but I could tell it to myself. In less than thirty-six hours, I would be male again. I would have completely forgotten Ovid and Susan and even Steven. I had won. Then why did I cry myself to sleep?

I awoke to the sound of a telephone ringing. As always, I was awake instantly. I looked at the clock by my bed as the phone continued to ring insistently. It was nearly ten. I knew who was calling. It had to be Steven, but I didn’t want to talk to him. Not now, at least.

At last, the ringing stopped and the answering machine turned on. “Susan, this is Steven. I need to talk to you. I know this is a difficult time for you... for both of us really. We can work it out, though. I love you, Susan. I... I need you. Please give me a call.”

There were tears forming in my eyes again as I heard the message. What could I tell him? Gee, Steven, I’m very sorry, but tomorrow I’m going to be a man again, so I don’t think it would really work out... I had once sworn that if I ever had the chance to get Brenda back, I would take it, but Steven was Steven, not Brenda. It wasn’t the same, was it? Was it?

Reluctantly, I got out of bed. A hot bath and a cup of coffee were what I needed. Then, I would figure out what to tell Steven. I drew a bath and stripped off my pajamas. Standing there naked in front of the tub, I looked up into the full-length mirror on the back of the bathroom door. It was the first time I had really inspected myself nude in the mirror. It was as if I had been avoiding doing so before. I had tried somehow to deny what had happened to me. Now, though, in the waning hours of my womanhood, I was determined to come to grips with whom I had become.

I didn’t know why I had chosen that moment, or maybe I really did.

With a sigh, I moved a hand to one of my breasts, gently stroking at the nipple. A little shudder passed through my body. I moved my other hand down to my crotch, brushing against the soft mass of pubic hair to the very lips of my vagina. I felt a twitching sensation and gently stroked around the area, feeling warmth begin to grow.

Carefully, I stepped into the tub and slid down into the warm water. An involuntary sigh of pleasure escaped me. I continued to touch myself, my eyes closed, pretending it was a man. Then, with a sigh of disappointment, I stopped. I knew what I had been doing. There was still a way to remain in Ovid with Steven if I chose it. All I had to do was have sex with him before I saw the Judge. Then, I would have failed to satisfy the terms of my probation. But that would require a greater sacrifice from me than I was ready to make. As much as I wanted to stay with the person Brenda had become, I was still not able to think about having sex with her—him.

But did I really want to stay in Ovid? Yes and no. If the Judge would turn me into Brad and Steven into Brenda, I would be willing to stay on the dark side of the moon. But that wouldn't work. Even if the Judge agreed, Brad Monroe would go crazy in Ovid. Brenda would probably be all right, but Brad would demand more legal challenges than Ovid would provide. And I doubted that the Judge would be willing to provide a few local murders to satisfy Brad's drive. No, if I stayed, it would have to be as Susan Henderson. Was I willing to do that? I still wasn't sure.

I got dressed in jeans and a sweatshirt. It was really the first time all week I had dressed to go out in such a unisex fashion. I guess I had worried that the Judge would think such attire violated my pledge to act like a woman at all times. It probably wouldn't have, but I had taken no chances. Now, though, here I was, throwing caution to the winds. Yeah, right. With a sigh, I pulled off the sweatshirt and replaced it with a cream-colored sweater.

I did put on a little makeup, though. I didn't want to appear in public as Susan looking unattractive. That was certainly a real change for me. A week ago, I wouldn't have cared.

I made some coffee and ate a bowl of cereal, really not tasting any of it at all. I was too busy trying to decide how to proceed. It was nearly noon and I didn't have much time. I decided my first move would be to see Cindy. She knew the Judge better than anyone else. If anyone knew what the Judge might be willing to do, it was Cindy.

I stepped out into a bright late fall Ovid day. The sun was low on the horizon, but doing the best it could to provide some warmth as it shone through the leafless trees. I had on a leather jacket, and it was sufficient to ward off the chilly air. I got in my Civic and started the engine. That was my one regret. I was really going to miss my Lexus if I stayed in Ovid.

I had no trouble finding Cindy's house. In the first place, Ovid wasn't a very big town, and in the second, it was laid out on a typical Midwestern grid without any high hills or other obstructions, so getting around was a breeze. Cindy's house was a modest two-story in a typically American middle class neighborhood. I almost expected to see the Beaver running out of the door yelling, "Come on, Wally, or we're going to be late!"

The Beav didn't answer the door, though. Instead, a very pretty six-year-old girl did. She was wearing a medium-blue dress with white leggings and little black Mary Janes. She looked up at me with big blue eyes but said nothing.

"Michelle, honey," I heard Cindy's voice from the back of the house, "I'll get the door."

Cindy stepped into the entryway. "Michelle! I've told you before, I'll answer the door."

"I'm sorry, Mommy," the little girl replied, chagrined.

"Okay, honey, go get changed."

Cindy was wearing a dark blue dress with a red and yellow flowered print and heels.

"I didn't catch you on the way out, did I?" I asked, embarrassed now that I hadn't called ahead.

“Oh, no,” Cindy laughed. “We just got back from church and hadn’t had a chance to change yet. Come on in the kitchen. I just started a pot of coffee.”

“I hope you don’t mind me just dropping in like this,” I said, smelling the freshly-brewed coffee. I had already had two cups, but it smelled too good to pass up. Like many people who give up alcohol, I now drank too much coffee. “I just needed to talk to someone.” Before I knew it had happened, I had slumped down into one of the kitchen chairs and was softly crying.

Cindy came up behind me and put her arm around me. “Oh, Susan,” she began, sympathy in her voice, “I guess this means you lost yesterday. I’m so sorry. Being a woman isn’t that bad, though.”

I shook my head and managed to get out between the sobs, “I lost, but not the way you think.”

The coffee calmed me down. I managed to get control of myself in a few minutes. Soon the only sound in the house was the giggles of two children playing. Cindy told me her husband was at the supermarket he managed, so there was no one to disturb us. We looked like two old chums just enjoying a relaxing cup of coffee together. I managed to tell her what had happened, only breaking down once during my narrative.

“So,” she summed up for me, “the net of it is you want to remain here as Susan.”

“Yes,” I sighed, really realizing it completely for the first time. “It’s the only way I can stay with Brenda, or Steven now.”

She shook her head and chuckled, “Here you are, the only person I’ve ever seen beat the Judge at his own game and you want to throw the match. But they say a woman is entitled to change her mind.”

“Do you think he would allow me to stay if I asked him?” I asked. “I mean, I don’t have to accept his offer, do I?”

“You already agreed to the terms,” Cindy answered. “Have you ever read stories about prisoners who become so comfortable in prison that they never want to leave? The system doesn't allow for that. Once they've met the conditions of their sentence, they're back out on the street. That's why some of them commit crimes again, so they can be put back in jail where they're comfortable."

"So maybe I could get caught speeding again," I ventured, not really believing it.

Cindy shook her head. "It wouldn't work. When you get changed back, you won't even remember you were ever in Ovid."

No, I was sure I wouldn't remember, but I was willing to bet there would be an emptiness in my soul that I could never quite identify. Brenda would be lost to me forever, but I would never know why. I might be the most successful attorney on the face of the Earth, but buried deeply within me would be that sense of loss. How did the old saying in the Bible go? Something about what profits a man to gain the world yet lose his immortal soul? Was that what would happen to me?

Cindy leaned over her coffee and looked straight into my eyes.

"Susan, you know what you need to do to stay here, don't you? I don't think I really have to spell it out for you."

I looked down. "I don't know if I can, Cindy. I mean, I know I have the plumbing for it, but the thought of making love to a man just doesn't seem right."

"Do you want to make love to me?"

I jumped, startled. "No! Of course not! I mean, we're both... And I'm not..."

"Not gay?"

"I'm not, no," I agreed, flustered.

"Then if it seems gay to make love to a woman and it doesn't feel right to make love to a man, that doesn't leave you with too many choices. I don't think the Judge included a nunnery when he created Ovid."

I slumped in my chair and took a long drink of coffee, not even flinching when it practically burned my tongue.

“So if I want to stay here...”

“You have to violate your parole and you have to reconcile yourself to being a woman one hundred percent of the time. That includes in bed with the person you love.”

“What... what’s it like?” I ventured.

Cindy leaned back with a dreamy expression. “When it’s done right, it can be fantastic. You two have an advantage Jerry and I didn’t have. You both remember who you were, and you’ve both had experience from the other sexual perspective. I envy you. I mean, Jerry is great, but to have a partner who knows exactly what will do the most for you would be unbelievable.”

“Then you think I should do it?”

“That’s your decision, Susan.”

I rose to my feet. “I don’t know, Cindy. I don’t know if I’ll have the courage to go through with it or not, but I’m going to try.”

She got up and gave me a sisterly kiss on the cheek. “I’ll be rooting for you.”

I drove around town for a little while, just trying to adjust to Ovid. Could I spend the rest of my life here and be happy as a small town lawyer and as a woman? If I did nothing and returned to my old life, I would be wealthy, respected, even feared by my opponents. In Ovid, wealth was out of the question. Even once I had built up my practice, the most I could hope for would be modestly comfortable. Fear? In a town run by the gods, it was hard to imagine anyone being very afraid of me. As for respect, yes, I could have respect, but not as much as I would have had if I had been male. Female attorneys were seldom awarded the respect freely given to their male counterparts.

On the other hand, if I returned to my old life, I would come home every evening to an empty house. There was no one for me in the outside world; I was sure of that now that I had rediscovered the one love of my life. Brenda and Brad had been a single being ripped apart by ambition. Susan and Steven could be different. I was sure of that.

The twisted knot in my stomach disappeared. The dark cloud that threatened to obscure the brightness of the late fall day cleared from my mind. I knew at last what I had to do. I had made up my mind.

Steven must have been beside himself. There had been three more messages on my answering machine when I had returned home, each more desperate than the last. I had answered none of them. What I had to say had to be said in person and said quickly before I lost my nerve.

I was standing at the door of his house. I had gone home to change clothes, so here I was now, wearing what I hoped was a sexy outfit under my trench coat. All that showed of it now was dark nylons and the highest black heels I could find. I hoped Steven came to the door quickly, I thought as I knocked. The November sun was going down and I wasn't wearing the warmest outfit in the world.

The door opened, and Steven looked at me with surprise and joy. "Susan! My God, I'm happy to see you. Come in, let me take your coat."

"I'll keep my coat on for now," I said, entering the house and standing directly in front of him after he had closed the door. "There's something I need to tell you first."

"All right," he said cautiously, obviously not sure where I was going with this.

I had made many summations to juries in my career, but condensing what had happened to me during the last week in Ovid into a few concise sentences was not easy. "Steven, your hearing was part of a test the Judge agreed to with me. If I got you off the hook, I could be returned to my old life. If I didn't, I would be Susan for the rest of my life."

Realization was dawning on his face. His confusion was turning to disappointment. "Then you're free to leave—to go back to being Brad Monroe."

“Yes,” I agreed, “I can go back.”

“When?”

“Tomorrow morning at nine o’clock I’m to appear before the Judge. If I’ve successfully met all the terms of my probation, I’ll be changed back.”

He looked at me suspiciously. “Have you met all of the terms?”

“So far,” I replied coyly. “The only one I haven’t completed is the Judge’s prohibition on sexual relations.”

Before Steven could reply, I opened my coat. After what had happened to him over the last few days, it was hard to imagine him being shocked, but he was. His mouth dropped open as he stared at me. I was wearing nothing but a black lace teddy I had found at home. Susan was meant to be a healthy girl, and one of her drawers had contained several outfits that would have fit the occasion, but I had decided the black teddy was the best. It pushed my flesh in the sexiest of ways, causing my breasts to be larger and fuller. It came to such a small vee at my crotch that I had had to trim my pubic hair just to make it look right. The garter belt was the same one I had worn Saturday night, but now it was in plain sight, my dark stockings clinging seductively to my thighs.

“Susan,” he began, almost unable to speak, “are you sure you want to do this?”

“I’ve never been more sure of anything in my life,” I breathed as I stepped into his arms.

I was snuggling in his arms, watching as the darkness turned into faint morning light. We were still naked. It had been the most incredible night of my life, male or female. I thought as I lay there about the Cosmo article on ten ways to please your man in bed. I think I had used all of them, and maybe added a couple which weren’t in the article. Steven had been very very responsive. I had smiled, realizing for the first time as a woman how easy it was to arouse a man. The trick, though, was making the most of that arousal. We had.

The first time, Steven had entered me gently, waiting until I was so wet that I thought my entire body was turning to liquid. It was a strange feeling, to be entered rather than being the one doing the entering, but it was a satisfying feeling. He had filled me in a way that made me feel complete, as if my body were a puzzle and his penis was the last piece. When he began to thrust carefully but decisively, I thought I was going to explode. There was a wave of emotion and pleasure spreading like tendrils of ivy through my entire body. But instead of the explosive concentrated climax I had enjoyed as a male, my orgasm was more all-encompassing, wrapping my entire being into a blanket of pleasure.

We slept for a while, then began again, slower the second time leading to an even more thrilling conclusion. Then we slept again.

It was completely dark when we began again. By now, we were both relaxed in our new roles. Since I had once been male, I knew what to do to heighten his pleasure. Since he had once been female, he was able to do the same for me. Together we were one being, laughing and enjoying the feel of each other's bodies.

Steven was frustrated the third time. He couldn't quite get it going. I told him it was no problem, and on impulse, shifted until my face was over his crotch. Before he could protest, I had taken him in my mouth, slowly bringing it to life once more. Before he could ejaculate, his face was between my legs, returning the favor. It was a new experience for us both, and while enjoyable, not as satisfying as more conventional sex, but we both agreed we would do it again sometime.

We managed one more, only an hour or so before daylight. We were both tired from interrupted sleep and our strenuous activities, and we were both just a little sore, but we couldn't resist the temptation.

Now, it was nearly dawn. I had to get up, go home, and get dressed for court. Then, if things went well, I would be off for my office to begin my first day of my new life unshackled by the fetters of my old existence. I gently slid out of Steven's arms. He mumbled and suddenly awakened.

“Where are you going?”

“It’s morning,” I told him. “I have to go home and get dressed for court.”

“Here,” he said, getting up himself. “Let me find you something to wear.”

“You don’t need to do that.”

He looked at my naked body. “Oh, yes I do. You can’t wear what you were wearing last night. I think we ripped it to shreds. I have a jogging suit. We can adjust it long enough for me to drive you home. After you get changed, I’ll take you to court.”

I shook my head. “No, Steven, I need to do this myself. I don’t want you there this morning. I don’t even think he’ll allow you in the courtroom.”

“Then I’ll wait outside.”

I went over to him and kissed him gently. “I have to do this alone.”

“I love you,” he said after a moment of silence.

“And I love you,” I replied, meaning it more than anything else I had ever said in my life.

I got to the courtroom a few minutes before nine and slipped into the back row. Another case was underway. The Defendant appeared to be a trucker. He was a large muscular man respectfully holding a cap emblazoned with the word Peterbuilt on the front. He did not look very happy. The Judge was murmuring the unfamiliar words again as the trucker stiffened into a near trance. Then, it was over. Officer Mercer led him, dazed, from the courtroom.

Cindy had slid in beside me. “When he comes out of the trance out at the Midway Truck Stop, he won’t be thinking about molesting any young teenage girls who are hitchhiking anymore,” she whispered.

“Why not?” I whispered back.

“He won’t have anything to molest them with anymore.”

Given the Judge's sense of justice, I was surprised there were any men in Ovid. I also wondered why some people seemed to change while they were in front of the Judge and others, like the trucker and me, changed later. I suspected I might never know.

"Ms. Henderson!" the Judge boomed, causing me to jump. I got to my feet and approached the bench. It actually felt good this morning to be in a skirt and heels. I thought I looked great. I just hoped I had the opportunity to leave the courtroom dressed the same way.

"Yes, Your Honor?" I said formally.

"You are appearing before me today to be returned to your previous life. Let's do it right now and get you on your way."

Oh my God! He was going to do it without checking to see if I had met the terms of the probation. I had to do something at once or I would be Brad Monroe again.

"Uh, Your Honor?"

"Yes, Ms. Henderson? Or should I say Mr. Monroe?"

I was hoping there were no perspiration stains on my suit. This was not going the way I had planned. "Your Honor, as an officer of the court, it is my duty to inform you of a violation of my parole."

"Oh?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

"Would you care to elaborate?"

I was silent. He was a god. Couldn't he just use his powers to see what I had done? Apparently, he could, for a stern look crossed his face. "Yes, Ms. Henderson. There has been a severe breach of parole. Do you have anything to say in defense of this violation?"

"No, Your Honor," I replied, trying to look as contrite as possible.

"Then I have no choice but to revoke your parole and re-impose sentence. You shall remain Susan Henderson for the rest of your life."

"Yes, Your Honor," I said respectfully. It was all I could do to restrain myself from rushing up to the Judge and kissing him.

“Next case!” the Judge intoned with a rap of his gavel. I turned to see Officer Mercer bringing in a young punk wearing a motorcycle jacket, his hair shaved into a Mohawk, but I wasn’t thinking about the punk. All I could think about was Steven. I could hardly wait to see him!

“Oh, Ms. Henderson?” the Judge said suddenly.

I turned. “Yes, Your Honor?”

“It has come to my attention that some of the cases before this court are more complex than others. There may be from time to time a need for a Public Defender to ensure the rights of some of the accused. If you’re interested, the court will authorize a standard fee of one-hundred and twenty-five dollars an hour for this work. Are you interested?”

In my old life, my paralegal was billed out at that rate. I was billed at several times that. But that was in my old life. I smiled and replied, “Yes, Your Honor, I’m very interested.”

“Good. Get with Ms. Patton later today. She will have the agreements.”

“Yes, Your Honor.”

The click of my heels was the sound of a victory march to me. I had done it! I was going to be Susan Henderson for the rest of my life. It was hard to imagine that only a few short days ago, I would have considered that fate a disaster. Now, I could only think of how happy I was. There were tears in my eyes as the courtroom door closed behind me, but they were tears of joy. Then, I saw a figure standing by the building exit. Steve! I smiled at him. He smiled back. Hand in hand, we walked together into the beautiful Ovid morning.

It was like waking up from a dream. Then I saw Dina looking at me from across the table. There were tears in her big brown eyes. “Que bonita!” she said to me.

“What?”

“Oh, Cindy, I said how beautiful.” She wiped away the tears. “Truly, they were made for each other.”

“Or remade for each other,” I quipped. Then, looking around, “What happened anyway? I feel like I was in a trance.”

“Oh, that’s how it works,” she laughed. “You and I lived the story through the powers the Judge gave you.”

“You mean I’ve been sitting here staring out into space for... how long?”

Dina shrugged. “Only about ten seconds. Don’t worry, nobody noticed anything. So what happened after that? Don’t worry, you don’t have to go back into a trance. Have you seen Susan since then?”

“I see her almost every day,” I told her. “Since she’s a lawyer, she’s in and out of my office all the time.”

Dina leaned forward, a devilish grin on her face. “Does she suspect anything?”

I giggled, “Not a thing! She has no idea it was all a setup on the part of the Judge. He’s been trying to figure out a way to lure Brad here ever since he changed Brenda into Steven. He finally got close enough to him when he sold him the Lexus. Brad never knew it was the Judge in disguise who sold him his car and suggested he take it on a road trip.”

“The Judge has been a master of disguise for centuries,” Dina added. “It’s good to see he hasn’t lost his touch.”

“We got to him just in time,” I said more seriously. “With all the strain Brad had been under over the last three years, he would have died from a coronary before another week passed. Of course, Susan didn’t know that. If she had chosen to return to her old life, Brad would be dead by now.”

“I’ll bet there was one hell of a ripple in reality when Brad Monroe ceased to exist,” Dina speculated while taking a drink of wine.

I nodded in agreement. “I think it was actually harder for the Judge to keep Brenda's existence viable until Brad could be coaxed here. Normally, she would have ceased to exist as soon as she was changed into Steven. But you're right. The ripple effect when Brad Monroe winked out of existence was incredible. No less than twelve murderers who had gotten off the hook when Brad defended them were convicted and imprisoned in the new reality. Unfortunately, OJ still got off, but Brad had only consulted on that one, so maybe his impact wasn't that great there."

"So I assume Susan and Steven are still an item?"

"Yes," I replied, "and that reminds me of something." I dug into my purse and produced a white envelope which I gave to Dina.

"What's this?"

"It's a wedding invitation. Susan and Steven are getting married a week from tomorrow. You can even be in the wedding party."

She was grinning from ear to ear. "But she doesn't even know me."

"I know," I agreed, "but then again, she really hasn't met a lot of people in Ovid. She asked me to be her Matron of Honor, and Dori will be one of the Bridesmaids. You'll be the other one."

"I wouldn't miss it," she laughed. "Another drink?"

I shook my head. "No, one is enough for me. I think I'll go see Jerry and see if I can get him out of there a little early."

"Porque, hermana?"

I smiled back at Dina. "Susan's story has given me a couple of new ideas for later tonight."

Dina was still laughing as the door closed behind me.

Ovid III: The Road Crew

©1998 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

It had grown colder in Ovid through the month of December. The remains of an early December snow were still piled by the side of the streets and a gray sky threatened at least another four inches before evening. I had grown up in Pennsylvania and had laughed at snow and ice from the time I was old enough to drive. But I was male then. Being changed into a woman with two small children tends to change one's perspective about such things as icy roads. I had a lot of errands to run before meeting my husband, Jerry, at Northside Elementary for the twin's Christmas pageant.

As I headed for my car in the municipal employee's parking lot, I looked at my watch. If I could change one thing about being a woman, it would be to make larger watches fashionable. What idiot ever convinced women to wear these petite little watches with a face that you needed a microscope to read? I smiled to myself. Other than that and a couple of other things, like periods, I found I was actually enjoying my new womanhood.

Court had gotten out early, so I was able to finish up some paperwork and take the afternoon off. I needed the time. I still had a lot of Christmas shopping to do, and stores in small towns like Ovid don't stay open late like the malls in bigger cities. Thank god I had a Christmas list from Jerry and the kids. I wouldn't have had the foggiest idea what to get them. Although they knew me as a constant in their lives in my role as wife and mother, I had known them in their present personas for only a little over two months. Even with the list, though, I wouldn't have a lot of time. If I hurried, I might have time for a...

"Lunch?"

I turned at the sound of a musical voice, a voice I would recognize no matter what body she wore. "Dina!" I exclaimed, forgetting that she no longer called herself Dina Luna.

Dina had been an attractive Hispanic woman. She had decided to change herself for Susan's wedding. "Goes better with the dress," she had said. The woman who stood before me was a tall, well-proportioned redhead with pale Irish skin in a lovely emerald green dress. She wasn't dressed warmly enough for the day, but when you're the goddess Diana, I guess warding off the cold isn't a big problem. She was stunning as always. She flashed her emerald eyes (which, of course matched the dress) at me and said in a light brogue, "What do ya' say, lass? A bite 'o lunch perhaps? And remember, it tishn't Dina now, it's Diana O'Moon."

I laughed, "What? No Irish last name for 'Moon'?"

She snorted in disgust, giving up on the brogue as well, "I'm afraid not. The Irish language sounds like someone clearing her throat. The word for moon is something like 'gealach.' I don't even know if I'm pronouncing it right, so let's just stay with O'Moon."

"Fine with me," I smiled. I knew why she had done it. We had both been in Susan Henderson's wedding, and she had chosen green dresses for the bridesmaids. As Dina, Diane had fretted that the dress didn't look that good against her dark skin, although she loved the dress. I had seen the wheels turning the whole week before the wedding. Sure enough, when she showed up at the rehearsal, she had picked a new look that went well with green.

"So how about lunch?"

"Diana, I'd love to, but I have so much Christmas shopping to do," I protested. "I thought I'd just grab a quick sandwich and fight the shopping crowds at March's."

"No need," she said with a teasing grin as she pulled a small sheet of paper out of the air. "Vera is holding a few packages for you at March's right now. This is the list."

"You've done my shopping for me?" I practically squealed. "Let me see the list."

She handed me the list. It was virtually identical to the one I had in my purse. "But how did you...?"

"What's the good of being a goddess if you can't use a little magic to help your friends? See, now you have time for lunch."

And that's how we ended up at the Greenhouse, waiting for our lunches with a glass of wine each. I normally wouldn't drink at lunch, but since I wasn't going back to work that day, I figured I might as well. I needed to celebrate the unexpected and successful conclusion of my first Christmas shopping as Cindy Patton.

"Okay," I said after we had ordered, "you want something, don't you?"

Diana looked around the room in mock innocence. "Oh, nothing really. I just thought since you had a little time, you could tell me a story."

Telling a story to one of the gods consisted of falling into a trance for a few seconds in which we would virtually relive the exploits of one of Ovid's newest residents. Although to someone who casually looked at me, it would appear that I was in a trance for only a few seconds, entire days and weeks would go by for Diana and I.

"Okay," I relented. After all, she had done all of my shopping for me. It was the least I could do. And besides, it was actually a lot of fun. "Is there something in particular you'd like to hear? We had a college girl from Omaha through the other day who got herself changed into a three-month-old baby boy."

She scrunched up her face. "Ugh! Not my kind of story. Even if they remember their past lives, all they can think about is where's mom for the next meal and how long before I'm potty trained? Besides, I hate the taste of the baby food."

"Well," I ventured, knowing very well the story she wanted to hear, "there was a state road crew through here a few weeks ago."

"Right!" she said brightly. "I heard about that. It was just before Susan's wedding, wasn't it? Well, come on, girl, tell it!"

"Okay," I said relaxing for the coming trance. "It seems there was a pothole just outside of Ovid..."

I had a teacher in high school who used to say to me, “Marty, not very many ditches are dug by hand anymore.” That was his way of trying to motivate us to get a good education. Well, I’m here to tell you he was wrong. A lot of ditches are dug by hand. I know it for a fact, because I’ve dug plenty of them. And when I’m not digging ditches, I’m filling potholes or raking concrete or doing any of a number of tiresome, dirty jobs for the Oklahoma Department of Roads.

My teacher was right about one thing, though. He said I couldn’t avoid digging ditches if I didn’t get a good education. I hate it when he’s right.

It isn’t that I wasn’t smart. Hell, I had an IQ that meant I could have been a rocket scientist if I wanted to, but I didn’t. All I wanted was to have fun, and man, did I ever have fun.

I lost my cherry on my fifteenth birthday. She was a junior—a year ahead of me—but jeez, could she fuck. And she was just the first. By the time I dropped out of school in the middle of my junior year, she was just the first out of about twenty.

I started drinking at the same time. Not too much at one time, but you know, just drinking. It wasn’t hard to get booze. All you had to do was hang around some of the older guys, and they’d buy it for you. I didn’t drink much anymore. It was too hard to get up the next day and go to work with a hangover. Besides, drinking was an expensive habit, and expensive I couldn’t afford.

Okay, so if I was so smart, why did I drop out of high school? Was it because I was more interested in sex? No, not really. Sex was extracurricular. I never had to cut class to have sex. Was it the drinking? No, I didn’t drink any more than a lot of my fellow students. Was it because I was stupid? Well, a case could be made for that. To be completely honest, though, I was bored. Bored, bored, bored, bored, bored. I thought I was too smart to be in school. I was wrong. By the time I wised up, I was nineteen and working too hard to keep myself fed to take the time to go back and finish my education. It’s a shame, too. What’s the old line Marlon Brando has in On the Waterfront? “I coulda been a contender; I coulda been somebody.”

My folks didn't really give a rat's ass. They had six kids to raise, and I was just number four. My big brother, Billy, he was into drugs. He was really fucked up, and Mom and Dad knew it. He got a lot of attention. The rest of my brothers and sisters were just like me—unmotivated. One of my brothers and one of my sisters finally graduated from high school, but the other two sisters got knocked up and dropped out. Me? Well, I've gotten a little education on my own at least. As long as I can remember, I've loved to read. I'm probably the only guy digging ditches for the State of Oklahoma Department of Roads who's read most of Shakespeare's plays. I knew I had to be the only one that well read who had been digging them for ten years.

I mean, I wasn't all bad. I didn't smoke. I just never liked cancer sticks. And I didn't do drugs. Oh sure, I had tried pot. Bor-ring. Heavier drugs I stayed away from. I didn't need drugs to be a loser. I could do it just fine without them. The girls had pretty much gone away by now. The ones who used to be interested in me weren't anymore. I was a loser. And the ones that were interested in me were bigger losers than I was, so I wasn't interested in them.

Working on a road crew was about as high as I figured I'd ever go in life. I mean, it had its advantages. The pay wasn't bad, and since the state did a complete background check, I didn't have to compete with illegal aliens for the job. About the only guys who got into this sort of manual labor were the dropouts and the illegals. Everybody else had too much sense.

At least, I thought to myself as I looked out the truck window at the cold December landscape, it wouldn't be too rough today. We had gotten a pretty easy assignment. We were going to fill a couple of big potholes out on a stretch of state highway that didn't get a lot of use. The truck was loaded with cold patch, a tar-like substance that can be applied to a road in winter. It doesn't hold like the hot tar you see in the summer, but it makes the road a little smoother until a permanent patch can be made.

Our supervisor had gotten a call from some judge who said he had to get his Lincoln realigned after he hit one of those potholes. When a guy like me calls up to complain about a road, nobody gets too excited, but when a judge calls up, a road crew looks like a fire company at a four-alarm fire. We had been dispatched out of our home base in Muskogee, so we were a little out of our normal territory, but as I said, when a judge says jump, we jump. I was surprised there weren't more than four of us on the crew. Actually, two guys could have handled it, but our supervisor jumps when somebody important tells him to.

Brad Blackstone was driving the truck. He and I had been told to go on out to the site and wait for two other workmen who were being diverted from another job. That was fine with me. Brad and I were pretty good friends. We had worked together and played together for over a year. I guess it was because we were two of a kind. Like me, Brad was pretty bright to be working on a road crew. Unlike me, I got the idea he wasn't here because of a lack of motivation. There was something in Brad's past that had driven him from Chicago to Oklahoma, but I didn't know what it was. He never talked about it, or his family or anything else. The only thing I really knew about him was that like me, he had never graduated from high school. It was as if he didn't want anybody to know anything about his past. Whatever happened, it must have been serious, I thought. My job for the day would be sentry. Every road crew needed to have somebody standing out on the road in an ugly yellow safety vest with that pole sign that said Slow on one side and Stop on the other. That was the easiest job on the crew. I had drawn that job because I was on light duty since I had pulled a back muscle a couple of days before. I'd probably take crap from the diggers since sentry was easy.

"Who's digging today?" I asked Brad.

He shrugged as he brought the truck to a stop next to the road. "I don't know," he said. "Just as long as it's not the Asshole Twins."

"Right," I agreed. The Asshole Twins weren't really twins. They weren't even really related, but they were assholes. Mack was the brains of the pair, although he probably had more cunning than intelligence. He was about my height—six feet—but with a spare tire around the middle. You wouldn't figure a guy could get pudgy doing what we did for a living, but Mack managed. His partner was Bear. Bear was about as tall as Godzilla, and he was the brawn of the outfit. Whatever Mack said, Bear did. I didn't even like to think about everything that might entail. Almost for certain it included selling drugs, but I was sure there were plenty of other unsavory activities for them to be involved in as well. I tried to ignore their sidelines. It probably wasn't safe to get involved.

Brad was busy looking at a map. He would stop every few seconds and look around. "Shit!"

"What's the problem?" I asked.

"We're lost. That's the problem."

I looked at the map. It was a highly detailed, official department map. "How can we be lost?"

"I don't know," Brad said angrily, pounding his fist against the door. "Damn! Now Murray is going to be pissed." Murray was our supervisor.

"Well, where are we supposed to be?" I asked, more than a little concerned. This job might have been shitty, but I needed it. Crews that wandered around lost didn't keep their jobs very long.

"Right here," Brad said, pointing at an intersection between two state highways. "I passed County Road 12 five miles ago. This intersection should have been at least a mile back, but there's no intersection here. And see that town over there?"

I saw the town he was speaking of. It was a small town, maybe ten or twelve thousand, nestled in a little valley below. "Yeah?"

"Well it ain't supposed to be there," he told me with a heavy sigh.

Every truck carried a mobile radio. I picked ours up and said, "Unit thirty-six to base. Come back."

I released the call button to wait for a reply, but all I got was static.

"Here, give me that," Brad demanded, pulling the radio out of my hand. "Unit thirty-six to base. Come back."

I don't know why he expected it to work for him when it wouldn't work for me, but he was disappointed. He got the same static in reply that I did.

"Ain't that a kick in the ass!" he growled, thrusting the radio back into my hand.

Yeah, it was a kick in the ass. What it meant was that we were lost with a full load of tar and sand, and two diggers were going to be someplace else waiting for us without hearing anything about where we were. The final result of the snafu was that Brad and I would probably have to get back to state Maintenance and let Murray chew on our butts for not being where we were supposed to be. Great.

"Hold on," Brad said, suddenly a little calmer. He was watching a white extended cab pickup truck approaching us from behind. It appeared to be a state vehicle. At least maybe we'd all be lost together. The truck pulled up behind us and two men got out, one tall and one gargantuan.

"Oh shit!" I breathed. "It's the Asshole Twins."

"Shit don't say half of it, brother," Brad muttered.

We hopped down out of the truck to meet our diggers. They looked to be about as pissed as we were. To make matters worse, they both looked like they had had a busy night of parties before they came to work. Bear's face was flushed, and Mack's face was the color of a stop sign.

"So where's the fucking pothole?" Mack yelled, as if it were our fault that it wasn't there.

"Don't know," was Brad's terse reply. Brad had taken a dislike to Mack the minute he met him, almost six months before. He had never found any reason to change his first impression. I think if it wasn't for the ever-present Bear, Brad would have taken Mack out months earlier.

"Well what the fuck are we supposed to do?" Mack asked, exasperated.

“How should I know?” Brad asked, leaning back against the truck.

“Did you radio in?” Mack demanded.

“We couldn’t get through,” I replied, although the question had been addressed to Brad. Mack didn’t like Brad, but me, he hated. It was almost as if he hated anybody who was smarter than he was. That meant he hated an awful lot of people. I think I was pretty close to the top of his list.

Mack looked at me, as if trying to think of a snappy comeback. It took him a while, but he finally said sarcastically, “You mean a smart kid like you can’t figure out how to use the radio?”

Kid. Mack was about thirty, and I was only a couple of years younger. Kid my ass. “Try yours,” I told him. I liked that. It was a challenge, so he had to accept it, but it also sounded like an order. I guess Mack realized it, too, because he took a few seconds to respond. At last, he must have figured that if he got through, he would show me up, because he pushed the Talk button on his radio. I was actually relieved when he was greeted with the same static Brad and I had heard.

“So now what?” Mack asked, his arsenal of ideas exhausted.

Brad looked up at the sky. It was already mid morning, and gray storm clouds were starting to gather. “The forecast said maybe snow this afternoon,” he said. Snow was a problem. In Oklahoma, a few inches could become deadly as the winds swirled the snow into tall drifts leaving glare ice on the road where the snow had been.

“Look,” I suggested. “There’s that town over there. Why don’t we go over there, get a phone and call Murray?”

No one questioned that suggestion. It meant that Murray would have to make the decision. That got all of us off the hook.

“Good idea,” Mack agreed. “I could use a cup of coffee.”

Bear grunted his agreement. Grunting was about all Bear ever did. He was even dumber than Mack, if that was possible.

“Okay,” Brad said, taking charge. “We can go down in your truck, Mack.”

Mack’s truck was a standard state Dodge with an extended cab, so we could all ride together. Mack looked a little uncomfortable, but finally agreed. “Let me move some stuff around,” he said, sauntering off toward the truck. He moved a briefcase out of the back seat and put it in the shotgun seat. He threw the keys to Bear and ordered, “You drive.”

I was thankful the trip was short. Extended cab pickups are okay for short trips, but Brad and I were practically eating our knees in the small back seat. In five minutes, we were driving into the town. A small sign with the picture of what looked like an eagle flying past an oak tree greeted us. ‘Ovid Welcomes You!’ the sign proclaimed. Underneath was a list of the usual civic clubs and their meeting dates: typical small-town stuff.

“Where the fuck is Ovid?” Mack asked, rattling his map.

“Right here, I guess,” Brad said laconically.

I had never heard of Ovid, and as an Oklahoma native, I thought I had heard of every town over five thousand in the state. This one was a new one on me, though. It was a pleasant little town, clean and fairly well kept. Winter is the worst time of the year to form an opinion of a town in Oklahoma. Everything is brown and gray with a dirty look to it. The trees always look like there isn’t any way they’ll leaf out again in the spring. Even the people look like they aren’t alive. The only saving grace in December is the Christmas decorations on the street lamps and buildings. Ovid wouldn’t exactly take any prizes for their displays, but the red and white candy canes and green Christmas trees hanging along light poles on the highway strip made the town look a little better.

“Stop there!” Mack told Bear, pointing to a small cafe which declared itself in neon to be ‘Rusty’s Best Burgers.’

“Burgers?” I questioned.

“So I’m hungry,” Mack growled in challenge. “So I suppose you want to go someplace where you can get an espresso and discuss philosophy?”

“Burgers will do fine,” I agreed reluctantly. At least I could get a cup of coffee.

Mack got out with the briefcase still in his tight grip.

“What have you got in there?” Brad asked suspiciously. Brad and I had talked about the Asshole Twins many times, and we suspected they might actually be selling drugs to the crews. Somebody was, we were told, but Brad and I had always stayed away from drugs. We also told no one about our suspicions regarding the Asshole Twins. It was none of our business.

“My lunch,” Mack muttered.

Brad looked Mack in the eye. “Look, I want to know, are you guys dealing? Because if you are, I don’t want to be here with that shit.”

“Of course not,” Mack sneered.

“Then how about opening the case?”

“No fucking way!”

Brad made a step toward Mack, and I followed, but before Brad could get to the case, Bear stepped in between. “He said no fuckin’ way,” Bear boomed, uttering what I suspected were his first words of the morning. We could see his arm muscles tighten as he doubled his fists.

I don’t know what would have happened next if the police hadn’t interfered. I think Brad would have gone after Bear. That would have left me to take Mack. I think I could have done it, but now, I’ll never know. We were all startled by the sudden short whine of a police siren, and turned as one to see a black and white police cruiser had pulled up directly behind our truck. None of us had even heard the car drive in.

“Shit!” Mack yelled, and turned to run. He never had a chance, though.

The cop was a blur of motion, running after him and grabbing his shoulder faster than any of us could blink. Mack turned, as if to hit the officer, then lowered his fist and appeared to be almost in a trance. I wondered why Bear hadn't run, but then I noticed that he, too, was standing as if in a trance.

"What the hell is going on here?" Brad asked in a voice barely above a whisper. He, at least, seemed normal.

"I don't know," I replied in an equally quiet tone.

The cop turned to face Brad and me. He was tall, maybe six three or so, and wore mirrored sunglasses. I wondered why since it was such a cloudy day that it seemed almost dark. In spite of his run to catch Mack, he wasn't even breathing hard, and not a hair was out of place. It was if he had just strolled over from his car to meet us.

"Into the car, guys," he ordered.

"Officer," Brad began, "our truck is a state vehicle and..."

"Don't worry about the truck," the cop interrupted. "It'll be taken care of."

"But the keys..." Brad protested.

"I said it would be taken care of," the cop said in a tone that allowed no further argument. With a shrug, Brad headed for the car, and I followed him.

Mack and Bear were already in the car. They were both still in some sort of trance as they sat together in the back seat. They had arranged themselves so I could squeeze in next to them while Brad got in front with the cop.

As we were driving away, I noticed something odd. There was another cop, or at least he looked like a cop, getting into our truck. He was wearing the same grayish blue shirt as the cop who had picked us up and, in fact, looked like his identical twin. The truck started right away and pulled out of the parking lot behind us, but I remembered seeing Bear pocket the keys, so how did he get it started? Bear and Mack looked like they were taking a mental vacation to the Caribbean, so they didn't notice any of this, but Brad did. He just gave a small shrug that only I saw.

We drove off the highway down another business street. Gas stations and fast food joints gave way to one-story offices and small shops. After only a few blocks, we were in the main business district of Ovid. It consisted of one main business street, called unoriginally 'Main Street,' and a few businesses on the intersecting streets, but these trailed off after a block or so. A block or so west of the business district stood a gray granite building with Greek columns in front. The words 'City Hall' were carved into the granite above the columns. There was an Oklahoma flag flying next to the US flag in the grassy area in front of the building. It looked like your typical Midwestern municipal building.

The cop hadn't said a word to us. He hadn't read us our rights or explained why he had taken us in. I had no doubts, though, about what was in Mack's briefcase, and I was pretty sure the cop knew, too. But how had he known? And where had he come from? One moment, the four of us were ready to go at each other in the parking lot of some burger joint, and the next minute, there was a cop there ready to haul us in. It had to be some sort of a setup, but I couldn't figure out what. I looked at Brad in the front seat. He had the same suspicious look I was sure I had.

"Let's go, guys," the cop said, motioning us out of the car.

Mack and Bear led the way, almost as if they knew where they were going. Brad and I fell in after them with the cop, holding the briefcase, bringing up the rear. We walked into an area that looked familiar. It wasn't because I had been there before, but I had been in places like it. It was a police station. But the odd thing is that there was no one there except us. Usually, even in a small town like Ovid, there would be a couple of cops around. One would be on the front desk and another dispatching. I mean, even a town this size had to have a couple of police cars in motion all the time.

It was almost with relief that I saw another cop standing near the last cell in the cell block. He had the same tall, lean look of the other cops I had seen in Ovid. It was almost as if they were all the same guy. Maybe the government had a secret cop factory someplace where they made these guys, I thought with a weird little mental twist. He was waiting for all of us to file into a cell, I realized. Mack and Bear marched dutifully toward the cell, but our escort suddenly put a hand on my and Brad's shoulders.

"You two come with me," he ordered. We were ushered into a small room with a conference table and a half dozen cheap conference chairs.

"What do you think is going on here?" I asked Brad after the cop had left, closing the door behind him.

"It's not a good idea to talk," Brad told me. "They may be listening."

"They? They who?" I asked, plopping down in the nearest chair.

"They—the cops. This is an interrogation room."

I looked around, then laughed, "What are you talking about? This is just a conference room. Look, there's no one-way glass and the furniture is too nice."

"Haven't you ever been in a police station before?" he asked calmly.

I shrugged. "Well, yeah, a couple of times," I conceded. "I mean, it was just minor stuff, though."

Brad sat next to me and looked at me with his most serious look.

"Okay, Marty, we'll play it your way. This is serious business. Do you know what was in that briefcase?"

"No," I replied, "but I can guess." Like I said, Brad and I had suspected the Asshole Twins of dealing. What was it? Pot? Coke? Something with initials? I didn't know, and I didn't want to know.

Brad nodded. "So can I. Now, you're the cops here in this little tank town and four scruffy guys show up out of nowhere with a briefcase full of illegal shit. What makes you think they'll believe only two of the guys were dealing?"

I shifted uncomfortably. He had a point. Before I could answer, the door opened. It was the cop again, only this time, he was accompanied by an attractive woman. She was about five six or seven with long brown hair and a nice, athletic build which her gray dress accentuated and her matching gray jacket did little to hide. She had a conservative, professional look about her, emphasized by the glasses she wore, the one-inch heels, and the attaché case which she placed on the desk. That chore ended, she extended her hand, first to Brad and then to me. I noticed there was an engagement ring on her other hand. The good ones are always taken.

"I'm Susan Henderson," she said crisply. "I've been appointed as your Public Defender."

"Have we been charged with anything?" Brad asked innocently.

"Not yet," she conceded, "but it looks like you will be. Possession of drugs is the most likely charge. Your trial has been set for three this afternoon and that's bad. The Judge hates afternoon sessions and never schedules them, but the seriousness of the situation demanded it."

"Wait a minute," I interrupted. "What trial? I mean, I don't know that much about the law, but how can this be happening so quickly? It's not like this was a traffic offense or something."

She shook her head, looking almost uncomfortable with the way it moved across her ears and the side of her face. "You're right about that, but there's a lot you don't understand yet. Justice is pretty swift in Ovid. If you know what's good for you, you'll take all the help I can give you and not ask too many questions."

She was young, but sounded tough, almost as if she had done this hundreds of times before. I hadn't had much experience with lawyers, but I was rapidly gaining confidence in her. Brad wasn't as convinced, though, as he asked, "Don't we get the chance to get our own lawyer? I mean, no offense, but you look like you just got out of law school."

She gave a wry smile and replied, "Don't concern yourself, Mr. Blackstone. You and Mr. Collins here are in good hands. I have all the experience you'll ever need."

Somehow, I believed her, but Brad went on, "Look, lady, I don't want to go down for something I didn't do."

She seemed to wince at the term 'lady,' but she recovered quickly. "You almost sound as if there was something you did do that we should be concerned about."

It was as if she had hit Brad between the eyes with a hammer. All the bravado flowed out of him, and he slumped back wordlessly into his chair. Not for the first time, I wondered what there was in Brad's past that he was trying to hide.

"How about you, Mr. Collins?"

"No misgivings at all, Ms. Henderson," I said laconically.

She frowned for a minute. "You seem to have a better command of the language than I would have expected. Have you had some college?"

"No, ma'am," I replied. I wished that I did have some college. Then maybe I wouldn't be digging ditches. "I just read a lot."

She nodded. "Good. You and your friend here seem to have a much better demeanor than those two oafs you were with."

"Are you defending them, too?" I asked.

"No. They will be tried separately. Believe me, that is to your advantage."

I believed her, but I couldn't figure out what was going on. Why were we being tried so quickly on such a serious offense? Why weren't we being tried together? Had the Asshole Twins confessed? That didn't seem very likely. Had they feigned innocence and tried to shift the blame to us? That seemed very likely. Still, I was happy I wouldn't be on trial with them: guilt by association and all that.

When Brad and I said nothing, she continued, "Now, let's get down to the facts. That briefcase is loaded with cocaine." She paused for a moment before observing, "I notice that neither of you seem very surprised."

“We’re not,” Brad answered for us.

“You guys want to tell me what happened?” she asked.

We told her the entire story, switching off to verify each other’s statement every now and then. She took a page of notes, stopping occasionally to ask a question. When we had finished, she sat back in her chair. She looked me straight in the eye and said, “Now, give me one good reason why I should believe you.”

“Is that a rhetorical question?” I asked.

Her eyebrows went up. “Rhetorical? My, you are well read, aren’t you? And no, it isn’t rhetorical.”

“But I thought you didn’t have to believe us to defend us,” Brad observed.

She shifted uncomfortably. “I suppose I don’t, but I feel as if I can do a better job for you if I’m convinced of your innocence. Face it, things don’t look good for you. There’s fifty thousand dollars worth of cocaine in that briefcase. For all the court knows, you were getting ready to split it up and distribute it. Your two friends will try to pin it on you. You are trying to pin it on them. Usually, the courts decide everybody was involved. Punishments for drug dealers in Ovid can be very serious.”

“Look, ma’am,” I replied, “Brad and I were just doing our job. We don’t know anything about drugs. We don’t use them and we don’t sell them. You can look in my bank account or see how I live, and you’ll know I don’t make extra money selling drugs. Brad’s the same way. We were just questioning them on the contents of the briefcase when the cop stopped us.”

She was silent for a moment, looking back and forth at Brad and I with her big blue eyes. Damn, I would have given anything to be worthy of a woman like her. She had it all: intelligence, poise, looks, and an education. For at least the thousandth time in my life, I realized what a mess I had made of everything. Here I was, scruffy, uneducated, nearly broke, and now facing jail time for a crime I didn’t commit, all because when I was fifteen, I decided having fun was more important than having goals.

At last, she sighed and said, "Okay, guys, we'll go with what we've got, but it isn't going to be easy. I'll be back here at a quarter 'til three. Then, we go to see the Judge."

We were led to a cell as far away from the Asshole Twins as possible, for which I was grateful. Those bastards had gotten us into more trouble than I could ever imagine. I tried to get some sleep, but I was too worried about the trial. Brad must have been the same way, for I could hear him tossing and turning in the bunk above me. I wondered what was in Brad's past that our attorney had speculated about. Maybe it was just woman's intuition, but she sensed something about him. I had never asked Brad, but I couldn't imagine Brad ever doing anything wrong. He was a real straight arrow.

I finally dozed off. It seemed like only a few minutes, though, before the cop who had picked us up called in, "Okay, you two, on your feet. The Judge is ready to see you now."

Why was it, I wondered as I pulled myself out of the uncomfortable prison bed, that whenever someone in this town said 'the judge,' it sounded more like 'the Judge' with a capital 'J'?

We were led out of the police station through the parking lot to the court wing. A receptionist smiled at us as we walked by. I did a double take at her because she seemed almost transparent. I don't mean like a ghost in the movies or anything. It was just that if you looked at her long enough, you could somehow tell what was obscured by her body. I thought my eyes must just be tired and playing tricks on me until Brad whispered, "Did you notice anything odd about the receptionist?"

"Yeah," I whispered back. "What's going on here anyway?"

"No talking," the cop said brusquely. He brought us to a halt outside a room with a bronze sign in front declaring it to be Courtroom 1. We waited there silently until I heard the outside door open. I looked around and saw another cop bringing in the Asshole Twins. The other cop left them in our cop's care, turned and returned to the police area, but I thought as he went that he looked enough like our cop to be his twin. Great, we had twin cops to go with the Asshole Twins.

Mack and Bear were both unnaturally quiet. It was as if they were still in some sort of a trance. I didn't question it, though. I was just as happy to not have to talk with them. I had thought that we were being tried separately, so I wasn't happy to see them. Then, an unpleasant thought crossed my mind. What if they were there to testify against Brad and me? Our attorney was probably right. It was going to come down to our word against theirs.

The outside door opened again, only this time, there was the click of high heels. I turned and saw Susan Henderson approaching us with a look of grim determination on her face.

"I thought you said we were going to be tried separately from them," Brad challenged with a nod toward the Asshole Twins.

"No talking!" the cop yelled.

Our attorney turned to the cop and said, "Officer Mercer, I need to talk to my clients for a moment in private. I'll be personally responsible for them."

"All right," he agreed reluctantly, motioning to an adjacent conference room. "In there. But when the Judge is ready, I have to take them in right away."

She nodded. "I understand."

When we were seated and the door to the conference room closed, she began, "First of all, you are going to be tried separately, but you'll all face the Judge for sentencing at the same time. Your friends have already been tried and found guilty of possession of drugs. I know that sounds confusing, but the court system is a little different here in Ovid."

The way she said it, it sounded as if she was Alice speaking of Wonderland. I was really starting to get a bad feeling about this. She must have noticed, for she continued, "Look, I had lunch with the Judge's secretary. She told the Judge about my meeting with the two of you. He always listens to her, so he agreed to meet with me earlier this afternoon. I've tried to get you the best deal I could."

"Like out of here and on our way home?" I ventured.

"If I can, but that may not be possible," she cautioned.

Terrific. Brad and I were about to be punished for something we didn't do. The Asshole Twins were probably going to testify against us to get lighter sentences. At least no matter what happened, maybe Murray could get us out of here. Murray! We had forgotten to call him. He'd probably fired us by now. "Look, Ma'am," I began, "we need to call our boss. He's probably looking for us right now."

She thought about it for a moment before replying, "That may not be a good idea."

"But we'll be in a lot of trouble!"

She shook her head. "Don't worry. It will be taken care of. Besides, I think I heard the courtroom door open."

She rose and opened the door. Although my vantage point wasn't very good, I saw another cop who looked like our Officer Mercer leading one of the homeliest men I had ever seen out of the courtroom. He was tall with a face that was almost unnaturally elongated. He seemed to be hunched forward, almost as if he found it difficult to walk. He coughed, making a rumbling sound almost like a horse. Then, he was gone, but I thought I heard a cry even more like a horse outside the building, followed by a clopping sound. When our attorney turned back to us, she was quite pale.

"Is there something wrong?" Brad asked.

She shook her head. "No, it's just that I don't think the Judge is in a very good mood today. Both of you need to be on your best behavior if we're going to come out of this okay."

The courtroom was very professional, almost to the point of being intimidating. At the bench sat a middle-aged man of perhaps fifty or a little more in the black judge's robe. He looked very scholarly in his gold rimmed glasses, but I could see there was an unhappy scowl on his face. He was shuffling a stack of papers as we were taken to the defense table. The Asshole Twins were seated in the gallery directly behind us.

The only other spectator in the gallery was an attractive young woman. She was blonde and appeared to be in her mid twenties. She was dressed in a stylish brown suit. I wondered why she was in the courtroom. Maybe she was the attorney for the Asshole Twins. No, I thought, she wasn't sitting with them or even acknowledging their presence. Maybe she was with the local paper, assuming Ovid had one.

The judge looked up and rapped his gavel. "Court is now in session. Next case is the People versus Bradley Blackstone and Martin Collins." He looked sharply at our attorney. "Does that satisfy your desire for proper court procedure, Ms. Henderson?"

She actually smiled. "It's a start, Your Honor."

The judge actually smiled back. I wondered what was going on between those two. It was as if they were both enjoying a joke that we weren't able to understand.

"All right," the judge said, motioning for Brad and me to stand. When we had done so, he continued, "Mr. Blackstone and Mr. Collins, the court has already determined that your two associates bear the full responsibility for the possession and attempted sale of drugs. The question remaining before this court is your role in this entire affair."

"Your Honor," Ms. Henderson began, "the defense would like to stipulate that Mr. Blackstone and Mr. Collins had no knowledge of the contents of the briefcase and..."

"I'm well aware of that," the judge interrupted gruffly. Then to us, he asked, "Did either of you have any inkling that these other two men were dealing drugs?"

Brad and I were both silent. Yes, we both knew what they were up to, but it wasn't our business. We didn't want to get involved.

"Didn't want to get involved, eh?" the judge said, almost as if he could read our minds. Come to think of it, I realized, maybe he could.

“We didn’t know for sure,” Brad offered.

“Didn’t know for sure?” the judge repeated loudly. “But you suspected.” It wasn’t a question.

“Well, I guess,” Brad allowed.

“You guess!” the judge sneered, removing his glasses and staring at us. “Of course you guess. Wasn’t that part of the reason you call them ‘The Asshole Twins’?”

“Not really,” I replied truthfully. “We do that because... well, they are assholes.”

There was a sudden giggle which came from the direction of the blonde.

“While I might agree with that,” the judge said, looking sternly in the direction of the blonde, “you know very well that they were involved in illegal activities.”

Again, Brad and I were silent. Our attorney stepped in. “Your Honor, while they may have suspected illegal activities on the part of these other two men, without proof, they were under no obligation to report them.”

“And so, you are asking for...?” the judge said to her.

“Clemency,” she replied.

But the judge shook his head. “I will not grant clemency.”

Clemency? I wondered. Since when was not reporting someone a crime? Was this Nazi Germany or something? I could see the same confusion on Brad’s face.

“I will, however, be lenient,” the judge continued. “Now, I want all of the accused to approach the bench.”

Brad and I did so reluctantly, but Mack and Bear did so as if they were zombies, with a shuffling, mindless cadence. When we were all in place, the judge did something I had never expected—he began to speak in Latin. I didn’t know what he was saying, but I recognized a word or two from my readings. As he spoke, I felt something almost like a chill in the room and felt my skin tingle. I wanted to see how the other guys were reacting, but for some reason, I couldn't turn my head. It seemed as if the lights were getting dim as well. I nearly panicked, wondering if something was physically wrong with me. Maybe the anxiety of the trial was having an effect on my body.

Then, suddenly, everything was normal again. The Judge, for I somehow realized he did indeed rate the capital 'J', rapped his gavel and gruffly muttered, "Court is adjourned!"

Do you remember the scene in the old science fiction movie, Forbidden Planet, where the ship has just dropped out of hyperspace and everyone is stumbling around groggy rubbing their heads? That's the way we all looked. Brad was rubbing his neck; Mack was looking around as if he had no idea of where he was, and Bear was... well, Bear was Bear. He just looked like he was not sure what planet he was on. Me? I felt kind of light-headed. I wasn't really myself. If only I had known then exactly how true that was.

"I'll walk you to your car," Officer Mercer said, making it sound more like "Go to your car—now!"

We didn't argue, but Mack at least was back to being his old obnoxious self. "Can you believe it? They let us go!"

"Yeah," Bear agreed, "but what about the brief...?"

"Quiet, you moron!" Mack ordered. Odd, I thought, but Mack's voice sounded a little higher.

I looked at Brad. He was still looking as if he was a little dazed. Also, he looked somehow different. I mean, he was still Brad, but he looked a little taller than me, and we were both the same height. Also, his hair looked a little curly instead of straight, and it appeared to be a couple of inches shorter than usual. My hair, on the other hand, felt a little longer. I reminded myself to get a haircut before the weekend, assuming we still had jobs. I looked at my watch. It was a little after four. We still had time to call Murray.

“Let’s find a phone,” I said to no one in particular. “We can still call Murray.”

“Who’s Murray?” Mack asked, his voice higher still. I looked at him. His brown hair seemed somehow lighter.

“Who’s Murray?” I repeated. “I’m talking about the guy who’s going to fire us if we don’t call in.”

Mack laughed a high-pitched laugh, “Oh, Myra, quit joking around.”

Myra? Who was Myra?

“Here you go,” Officer Mercer said, opening the door of a car I had never seen before. It was a Pontiac Grand Prix, dating from the early eighties. My dad had had one similar to it when I was a kid. It was a piece of shit then, and age had not improved this one. Its plum-colored metallic paint had faded badly, and there was a rough, unpainted smear of Bondo over the wheel wells where it appeared to have rusted, probably while Reagan was still President.

“What’s this?” I said to Officer Mercer in a voice that didn’t seem to be my own.

“Get in, Myra.” I felt a strong arm grip me from inside the car and pull me down into the front passenger seat. I turned to see Bear behind the wheel, holding onto my arm, only he wasn’t really Bear anymore. Instead of the greasy dark brown hair that had probably helped to give Bear his nickname, his hair was now blonde, and cut extremely close to the scalp. He was actually a little better looking, with clearer, younger features than I remembered. And if anything, he was bigger than before.

Officer Mercer closed my door. I felt almost as if he had awakened me from some weird dream, but if so, I had fallen back asleep into an even weirder one. I looked around into the back seat. Brad had changed still more. He was now a little taller and slimmer with dark, curly hair and deep brown eyes instead of his normal blue ones. He looked almost as if his ancestry was Italian instead of the English I knew it to be. Also, he was younger, looking perhaps sixteen.

But the real changes were happening to Mack. I knew it was Mack because he was still wearing the denim coveralls he had been wearing all day. Only now, they bulged out in odd places, notably at the hips and chest. He still had his normal face, but it looked a little softer and more rounded now. His hair, though—it was long, falling both in front of and behind his shoulders in soft blonde curls. As I watched him, his face began to change, becoming more and more feminine by the moment. Then, I could see traces of lipstick and eye shadow appearing, as if they were being drawn on his face by some invisible artist.

I looked back at Brad, but he was looking at me with wide eyes. Why? What was wrong with me? Then, I felt the changes. I had been so intently watching the other three that I had paid no attention to what was happening to my own body. I felt something tickling the back of my neck, and a sudden weight on my head. Then, there was a small pinching sensation at each of my ear lobes, and I felt an odd weight there, as if something was swinging back and forth at the bottom of my ears. When I blinked my eyes, it was as if there was something dark on my eyelashes, causing them to be thicker. There was a sudden taste, almost a sweet perfumed taste, on my lips. Blonde hair began to cascade down my back and over my shoulders.

But it was the rest of my body that I could actually see. My gray work shirt was now a tightly-knitted white sweater, which did nothing to disguise two mountains growing on my chest. It was almost as if they were heavy balloons heaving up and down as I gasped in surprise. At the end of the sleeves were two delicate, feminine hands with long red nails. My jeans had fused into a single tube of leather, which was shrinking up toward my expanded hips, leaving behind two feminine legs encased in dark nylon. I lifted a foot far enough to see a black pump with a two-inch heel covering a dainty foot. Jesus H. Christ! I screamed inside my mind, this just wasn't possible! I had been changed into a girl!

"Usual place?" the mountain of a teenager Bear had become said.

No one said a word. Brad and I were too busy staring at each other, and the buxom blonde girl Mack had become was too busy snuggling against Brad to say anything.

“Jack, Damn it! I’m talking to you!” Bear said sharply.

As the only other male in the car, Brad thankfully took his cue. “Yeah, sure the usual place.”

Bear turned the car sharply through a wide metal gate. I could see the name ‘Sooner Park’ in black wrought iron letters at the top of the sign. It had started to snow as we made our way down into a small forest of oak trees. Without warning, Bear wheeled the car into a secluded side road, sliding slightly on the thin coating of new snow. He put the car in park, and wordlessly slipped his meaty paws under my sweater.

“Stop it!” I screamed, surprising him so much that his hands actually retreated.

“Hey, what’s the problem?” a high-pitched voice called from the back seat. I looked around to see Brad frozen in shock and a blonde bimbo unzipping his fly with her face no more than a foot from his crotch.

“Yeah, Myra,” Bear agreed. “What’s the fuckin’ problem?” I was almost relieved to see he was hardly a class act no matter what body he wore. It gave me a sense of stability in a topsy-turvy world.

Bear had given me my cue, though. I was obviously Myra. I had to come up with an answer. Let’s see, what was the most devastating response to this any girl had ever given to me. Think!

“Uh,” I began, “I... I’ve got the cramps.”

Bear looked stricken.

“Yeah,” I went on, getting into the spirit of the thing. “I’m getting my period!”

“But it ain’t time for your period,” Bear protested.

“It’s early!” I insisted.

“Oh, shit!” He slumped into his seat and hit the dash with his fist, rattling the entire car. Then his face brightened, as if the one thought he would be able to manage all month had finally crawled through his thick skull. An evil grin appeared on his face as he turned to me. I wasn't going to like this. "Then blow me."

I knew I wasn't going to like it. Think again! I had to be able to outwit this dunce. Yes! I had it! "You don't understand," I wailed, "I don't have a tampon. I'm going to bleed all over the seat."

I figured the car had to be his, and piece of shit that it was, it had to be his pride and joy. The thought of menstrual blood all over his cheap seats was enough to offset the need to have his raging hard on sucked. I could see in his eyes that he couldn't wait to get me home.

"Oh crap!" That was from the girl in the back seat. I looked back at her and saw her, arms folded in disgust. Brad, on the other hand, looked at me with something resembling relief. Although he had said nothing, I knew that Brad and I both knew that this was not the same reality we had been a part of only a few hours before.

Bear dropped me off first. In spite of the fact that I was probably his girl, the need to get me out of the car before I bled all over his precious upholstery outweighed any other strategy he might have had. We had pulled up in front of a white two-story house in a nice, middle-class neighborhood. Since the winter day had already turned dark, I could see through the windows into lighted rooms. The house looked warm and cozy. I didn't care if there was an axe murderer living there. Anything was better than spending another minute in the car with this newer, younger Bear.

"Wait, I'll walk you to the door," the girl in back said as I opened the car door.

I nearly stumbled getting out of the car in my new high heels. At least thank God they weren't any higher. This was like a nightmare. I could imagine Bear getting out of the car to chase me while I stumbled in unfamiliar shoes.

"Take your books," Bear said gruffly without even looking at me. I looked at the floorboard beneath my seat and saw a small book bag and a woman's leather jacket next to it. I grabbed both and started unsteadily toward the house we had pulled up in front of. If I could have managed, I would have run to the door. Anything to get away from Bear.

“What the hell is wrong with you?” the blonde who had been Mack whispered loudly to me as we walked to the door.

“My period,” I said tersely.

“Bullshit!” she said. “Your period is never early. It’s always the same time as mine, and that’s not for another two weeks.”

Oh, goody. There was something to look forward to.

She pulled my arm. “Look, Bull is pissed at you now, and you know what that means.”

I didn’t, but I had a pretty good idea.

“Myra, he’s the best catch in the school. He was already being looked at by college scouts this last year, and he’s only a Junior. He’ll probably be listed as the top football prospect in the nation for center after next season. And he’s crazy about you. Play your cards right and you’ll be the wife of a pro football player. You know what that means, don’t you?”

Sure I did. It meant that a drug-running scumbag like Bear was being rewarded by being turned into a hotshot college football prospect while innocent little old me got to be his would-be blushing bride. The Judge was behind this. Oh, excuse me, Mr. Judge, but I think you got your wires crossed. I’m the good guy; he’s the bad guy.

“Myra, say something!”

Okay, it was time for me to do something to recover this situation before I made a total fool of myself. Thus far, I was only about an eighty percent fool. I tried the old tired smile look. “Hey, I’m sorry... (I had no idea what her name was). I just don’t feel good, okay?”

It worked. She melted a little and put her hand on mine. “Okay. I’ll call you later. I’ll back up your story with Bull. Everything will be fine by morning.”

We smiled at each other. Then, with a little wave, she ran back to the car. She barely got the door slammed before Bear's, or apparently now Bull's tires squealed away from the curb. Great. I was a girl with a mountain of a boyfriend who thought he was Mario Andretti.

I got to the door and read the bronze plaque on the door. It said: 'The Smithwicks.' So apparently that was my last name in this strange new reality: Smithwick, Myra Smithwick. I sighed. I guess it was better than Hermione Grubbermeister. So I had a full name. That was one problem solved.

Next problem. I didn't have a key. Or at least I didn't think I did. I checked the pockets of the leather jacket. No key. I was freezing out here and the snow was starting to come down harder. Finally, I rang the doorbell.

I was greeted by a forty-something woman with brown hair just starting to go gray. She was dressed in a conservative white blouse and navy blue skirt and looked as if she had just gotten home from work. She had a kindly look, but it was marred by flashes of concern and bottled-up anger. Also, she was one of the transparent people.

"Myra!" the woman said with honest concern. "Where have you been? It's been snowing hard for over an hour, and you promised to be home early. And where is your key?"

This was a new experience for me. When I was in high school, I came and went as I pleased. Mom was a waitress and often worked late, and dad's schedule was always screwed up, too. I'd get home, fix myself something to eat, and then take off to party. Nobody cared. What was this woman doing getting so steamed up? I could take care of myself. Then, remembering my recent experiences in the car, I realized that maybe I couldn't take care of myself so well after all.

"I'm okay," I said emphatically, but actually a little warmed by her concern. "I was just out with some friends."

"You were out with that Bull Brewster, weren't you?" she asked sternly. Then, without waiting for an answer, she continued, "I wish you wouldn't spend so much time with him. I really don't think he's a very nice boy. Some of the other mothers have told me he doesn't treat girls very well."

I could testify to that. So, this woman was supposed to be my mother. No surprise there, I guess. I knew I was being chewed out, but I didn't seem to mind. For one thing, we agreed that I shouldn't spend so much time with Bull Brewster. As far as I was concerned, one second with him out of the rest of my life (either life) was one second too many. I didn't answer her, though. Until I learned more about who I had become, I didn't want to appear out of character, so I just listened. My 'mother' didn't seem to be looking for answers from me anyway.

"And where is your key?" she demanded.

"Uh... I don't know," I replied. I was confident with that answer. I didn't have the slightest notion where my key was.

"You didn't leave your purse somewhere, did you?"

Oh shit! I was a girl now, and girls carried purses. I must have left it in Bull's car, I thought. How would I get it back? There was a sick feeling in my new stomach.

Mother was going through my book bag, and in a moment, she produced a small brown leather purse. "Well, at least your purse is still here. Did you lose your key out of... Oh, no. Here it is," she said, producing a small ring of keys. "Why didn't you use it?"

I felt the sick feeling going away. At least I wouldn't have to get my purse back from Bull. "Well, I guess..."

"Oh, never mind," she said with a sigh. "Now I need your help in the kitchen. Your father will be home from the plant any minute now. But before you come in to help me, get out of that outfit. You know your father hates it."

Gee, I thought, he and I were going to see eye to eye on that. I couldn't wait to get out of this outfit. Thank god girls wore jeans. There had to be a pair in Myra's room, if I could just find her room.

Finding 'my' room proved not too difficult. All I had to do was find the bedroom done in pastels with a closet that looked like the Frederick's of Hollywood warehouse. Didn't this Myra own anything that wasn't sexy and either way too tight or way too short? I managed to find a red and white University of Oklahoma sweatshirt, a pair of jeans, and some tennis shoes with, of all things, pink shoelaces. It looked like the most conservative stuff was in Myra's wardrobe. Oh well, I sighed to myself, it was better than a leather skirt and high heels.

This was my first chance to get a good look at myself, and I wasn't pleased with what I saw. I was about medium height. I was very attractive in a cheap sort of way. My hair was too blonde, probably lightened. I wore way too much makeup, especially around my deep blue eyes. My outfit looked as if it had been painted on the large breasts, tiny waist, and flared hips. My legs, as the old saying goes, went all the way down. I looked as if I should be singing that old Julie Brown song, 'I'm a Blonde.' I had to tone this look down in a hurry.

I stripped out of my sexpot outfit, finding to my disgust that my underwear consisted of a black lace bra and French-cut panties. Also, I was wearing a garter belt and stockings. I wondered if 'Mom' knew about all this hot babe stuff under the skirt. I was sure she probably did, but what could she do? Chastity belts had been out for centuries, and I was sure Myra wasn't the only high school girl wearing something this provocative. In fact, when I had been in high school, I had known quite a number of them—some of them, ahem, quite well. Was that what kind of a girl I had become? That didn't sound very promising. I remembered when some of my sisters had started dressing this way. It hadn't taken them long to end up pregnant.

I certainly had the body for this kind of an outfit, I realized. I was blonde with deep blue eyes and that peaches and cream complexion that other girls would kill for. As for makeup, Myra apparently liked a lot of it. I managed to look at the size of my bra. It was a 36D. Pretty hefty for a—what?—sixteen-year-old. The entire body would be a candidate for a centerfold in a few years. I could see it now. Here she is, Playmate of the Year—Myra Smithwick. Thank you. My turn-ons are sexy guys with tight buns and my turn-offs are girls who go after my guys. When I get out of reform school, I want to be a rocket scientist. It was enough to make me want to throw up.

At least, I thought, the sweatshirt and jeans would tone the look down a little bit. I slipped on the sweatshirt, relieved to see that it was baggy enough to disguise at least a little of the voluptuousness of the breasts. The jeans were another matter, though. I had to tug them over my now-ample hips since my waist was so much smaller. These weren't the kind of jeans I was used to as a guy. They clung to every part of my lower anatomy like paint. It was better than the skirt, though. I added the sweat socks and tennis shoes, and that made me feel a little more normal than seeing those small, dainty feet with their red toenails.

I looked in the mirror at the final effect. With the makeup, long blonde hair, and large hoop earrings that I had no idea how to remove, no one would mistake me for a man, but at least I didn't look like the crown princess of the bimbos anymore.

"Myra, I need your help!"

Okay, I thought, time to play the part. I was going to have to be Myra Smithwick—maybe forever. I guessed I would have to play her well until I could figure out what else to do. As I slowly walked down the stairs, I kept thinking how unfair this was. I was an honest guy, yet here I was in the body of a bimbo while Bull was still male. Maybe the Judge had made a mistake. I mean, he changed four people all at once. Maybe Bull was supposed to be the blonde, and like Brad, or rather, Jack, I was supposed to still be male. That would have made a lot more sense.

'Mother' was in the kitchen, doing about four things at once. I could smell the aroma of meat cooking, and could see three salad bowls laid out filled with lettuce and tomato wedges. A vegetable—it looked like green beans—was in a bowl, ready to be served, with a dollop of butter melting down over it. My stomach growled. Male or female, I began to realize I had eaten nothing since an early morning breakfast with Brad.

"Here," she said handing me a bowl of steaming potatoes. "Mash these, and make drinks for everyone. I just talked to your father, and he'll be here any minute."

I took the potatoes without question and began to mash them. As a bachelor, I knew my way around a kitchen when I had to, although I would usually settle for an unhealthy portion of a burger and fries either alone or with somebody like Brad, washed down with a couple of beers.

My ersatz mother was bustling so vigorously that I wondered what kind of a man my 'father' was. Did he expect this type of service every night? Maybe he was like that guy in the Julia Roberts movie who insisted all the towels be straight. I shuddered at the thought. On top of Bull the Ape Man, that's all I would need—a domineering father. I had visions of him with Bull, the two of them smoking cigars, while my 'father' told him, "That's right, son. When I turn her over to you, you be sure to keep her in line, you hear?"

The rumble of the automatic garage door brought me out of my waking nightmare. I nearly dropped the potatoes in the process.

"Myra! I think those potatoes have been mashed enough. You haven't even started to make drinks. Oh, never mind, sit down. I'll do it."

The door between the kitchen and the garage opened, and for the first time, I saw my 'father.' He appeared to be about the same age as my 'mother.' He stood about six feet tall, I guessed, given that I appeared to be about five four. He was relatively trim with just the hint of middle age spread. He was wearing a dark suit and a conservative tie. He had short hair that was mostly gray with a matching moustache. What impressed me most, though, were his eyes. Like mine, they were blue, but although they looked tired from the stress of a long day, they had a warmth that made me regret the terrible things I had imagined. One more thing about him: unlike 'Mom,' he was not transparent.

"How are my two girls today?" he asked, giving 'Mom' a hug. Then, looking at me, he asked, "What, I don't get a hug?"

I don't think I had ever hugged my real father, or for that matter, even my mother after I was about twelve. I hesitated for a moment before reminding myself that until I sorted everything out, I had a role to play. With a forced smile, I stepped over to him and gave him a hug. He hugged back, firmly, but not uncomfortably. For just a moment, I felt something I had not felt in a long time. I felt safe.

“Sit down; dinner’s ready,” Mom said. I suddenly realized I actually thought of her for a moment as my mother. And why not? I wasn’t close to my real parents. I hadn’t seen them in over three years, or even talked to them for that matter. If I had to be stuck in Ovid for a while, I supposed it might as well be with people who seemed to be loving parents. Since I had no visible means of support, being someone’s teenage daughter was probably the best strategy.

I waited until my new parents had seated themselves before taking my place at the table, since I had no idea where Myra normally sat. I wondered if Myra had been one of the transparent people before I was transformed. I imagined that she was.

As we ate, everyone talked about his or her day. Dad was apparently a mid-level executive at something called Vulman Industries. As nearly as I could tell, they made car parts, but I could have been wrong about that. Mom was a receptionist/secretary for a law firm, and she seemed to be happy with her job. She never mentioned the firm she worked for, but talked instead about a couple of cases they were working on. I didn’t pay much attention, though, since I had no idea who the people she was talking about were.

“How about you, honey?” Dad asked, looking at me.

I had been absorbed in my dinner. The pork chops and vegetables were among the best I had ever eaten. Even with a much lighter feminine appetite, I had been concentrating heavily on the delicious dinner. “Me?” I said stupidly after swallowing a bite of meat.

“Who else do I call ‘honey’?” he said with a smile. “By the way, I’m glad to see you’ve decided to dress a little more conservatively. Now, if I could just talk you into lightening up on that makeup...”

I’m sure the old Myra would have groaned, “Oh, Dad!” Not me. I didn’t like wearing this much makeup either. I just nodded and said, “I’ll try.”

For the reaction I got, I think 'I'm pregnant' would have been less of a shock to them. What kind of a person was Myra before I came on the scene? I had a hunch she was practically an apprentice streetwalker. Bull seemed to expect me to spread my legs on command, and my parents expected me to always do the opposite of what they wanted. I didn't know if I was cut out to be a model daughter, but apparently, I was something of an improvement.

Dad finally recovered. "Great. Now, how was school?"

What could I say? I had never been there. I assumed I was a sophomore or junior since Bull was a junior. I couldn't have been any younger—not with a body like mine, and Bull didn't seem the type to date older women. I just shrugged. "It was okay."

This seemed to be a comment more in line with what they expected.

When dinner was finished, I found out it was my responsibility to do the dishes. That didn't bother me. It was a lot easier work than preparing a meal. My only slip-up was forgetting to put on the rubber gloves before sticking my hands in the hot dishwater.

"Myra, don't do that!" Mom cried in horror. "You'll ruin your nails."

I supposed I would, but it had never occurred to me before. My short male nails weren't affected adversely by the hot water. In fact, it was a way to soak out the dirt and grime that had accumulated during the day. As a man, my hands were callused and rough. Hot water didn't bother them at all. As a girl, though, the soft skin stung in the hot water, and I realized that if I soaked my nails very long, they would become too soft and lose their shape. Something told me there was going to be a lot to remember if I was successfully to maintain this new identity.

Mom and dad retreated to the den to watch TV. I told them I had studying to do. That evoked another odd stare. Apparently, Myra didn't study much. Actually, I just wanted to get away for a while so I would not have to continue the masquerade. I opened the book bag to see what books Myra had brought home. To my surprise, there was only a notebook and a romance novel. No wonder my purse had fit in there so easily. I was about to examine the purse when I hear the doorbell ring. A moment later, Mom called up, "Myra, there's a young man here to see you."

Oh my god, I thought. It had to be Bull. I didn't want to see him. I would have to go down and give him another story about my period. With a heavy sigh, I went downstairs to face Bull. Imagine my surprise when I saw it wasn't Bull at all. Instead, it was Brad—or rather, Jack. In his high school letter jacket of black with a gold 'O' on it and the stack of books tucked under his arm, he looked like a Norman Rockwell version of American youth. I grinned when I saw him, and he grinned back. I had been right! He remembered who he had been.

"Let's go in the living room and talk," I told him. The living room was the room furthest from the den, so with the TV turned up, my new parents wouldn't be able to hear what we said.

"I thought we could study together," he said when we had settled in on the couch. "It's been a long time since I've been in school, so it's going to take some time to get back into it."

"You sound as if you've decided to be Jack all the way," I observed, a little disturbed that he was taking all of this so rationally.

He nodded. "I suspect we're stuck here, so I figured I'd make the most of it. I didn't get the chance to finish high school, and now I do. I'm fine with this new life. You sound as if you're not."

"Not really," I replied. "It's all too weird for me. I don't know if I can face it."

"Oh, come on, Marty, show some balls. You have to face it."

"Show some balls?" I repeated loudly. "It's funny you should say it that way. I seem to have misplaced mine. If I remember my biology correctly, what's left of them have travelled inside my body and set up shop as a baby factory. Add to that, I have a possessive boyfriend with the IQ of a large fireplug and a physique to match. And the way I was dressed today tells me I can expect Bull and the baby factory to get together any day now. With all of that going on, you're telling me to face it?”

Jack turned a little red and looked down. I took it as my cue to continue. “To make it even more fun, I don’t have a clue as to how to apply makeup or put on a bra or fix my hair or shave my legs or any of a hundred different things a girl has to know every day. You, on the other hand, just have to figure out how to get to football practice.”

“Okay,” he finally said, “you’re right. I’ve got it a lot easier than you do, but look on the bright side. You’re a sixteen year old again. You can start to live a critical part of your life over again. Maybe this time you’ll do it better. Sure, you have to wear skirts, but you don’t break your back digging ditches.”

“But I’m a girl,” I argued.

“So?”

“You wouldn’t be so glib about it if it were the other way around,” I muttered.

“You’re probably right. But this is the way it is. Now, do you want to study with me for the history test?”

“What history test?”

He sighed, “The one we’re scheduled to have right after lunch tomorrow. Didn’t you look in your book bag?”

I batted my eyes and gave my best Valley Girl imitation. It was frightening how accurate it sounded. “Well, like, you know, Myra’s not really into this study thing.”

“So you don’t have your history book.”

“No, and how do you know about it anyway? And how are you so sure I’m even in your class?”

“Jack is apparently a little better organized than Myra. I found the test notification in my notes, and there was a class roster taped to the front of the notebook. You’re on it.”

A sudden pang of fear struck me. I had had the dream in which you show up for class and don't have the foggiest idea what you're supposed to be doing. I think everybody has had that dream. Although, this time, it was for real. I had no idea what class I was supposed to be in or what to do once I got there. Jack saw the fear on my face. "What's wrong?"

I told him the problem. He thought about it for a moment and suggested, "Maybe there's a schedule in your room."

I thought about what I had seen in my new room. It was feminine; that I remembered, but I couldn't think of... "Wait a minute. There's a desk in my room. It doesn't look as if it gets much use, but maybe Myra stuffed a class schedule in there."

"Let's go look," Jack advised.

It took some doing, but we found it. It was stuck in the bottom of a desk drawer with some other school papers.

"It looks like you're in most of the classes I'm in," Jack said as he read the schedule over my shoulder. He was so much taller than I now was, that this feat presented no problem. He was right. I was scheduled for American History at the same time he was. In addition, I had English and Government in the morning and Chemistry and Algebra later in the day. I had always been pretty good in subjects such as History and Government, and when it came to English, I had always been a voracious reader (I mean, how many ditch diggers knew what voracious even meant?), so that subject would present no problem. When it came to chemistry, though, I didn't know a proton from an electron, and math had always been hard for me. If I were completely honest with myself, however, I would have to admit that both of those subjects had bored me, so I hadn't paid attention when the fundamentals were explained.

"Any problems?" Jack asked.

"Algebra and Chemistry," I told him.

"Don't worry," he replied. "Those are my best subjects. I need help in things like History. I never was very good at memorizing dates and names.”

“That’s because you’re going about it all wrong,” I told him.

“How so?”

“Well,” I began, “History isn’t so much about memorizing dates and names as it is about understanding events. If you understand that England was invaded by Normans who held claim to English land, then 1066 AD and William the Conqueror are just the date and name you hang on the event. You’ll see, it’s easier that way.”

Jack looked at me with newfound admiration. “I didn’t know you were good at this stuff. Why didn’t you go on in school?”

“The truth is,” I explained, “I was bored.”

“Bored?”

“Yeah. My IQ is measured at 165. That puts me way up there.”

“And you flunked out of high school?” he asked incredulously.

I shook my head, startling myself with the feel of the long blonde curls sweeping along my neck. “No, I didn’t flunk out. I probably would have, though, to be honest. I hate to whine about this, but most public schools have lots of programs for slow learners, but they don’t know what to do with the fast ones. They let them get bored and underachieve. There are members of Mensa, the club for people with high IQs, who sweep floors for a living.”

“Or dig ditches,” Jack added.

I flushed. “Yeah, or dig ditches. I went to school in Tulsa, in the inner city. Tulsa isn’t all that big compared to Chicago, but it’s big enough to have poor schools in the inner city. There was never enough money even to teach the basics, let alone handle guys like me. And my parents didn’t care. I was just one more mouth to feed. If I dropped out of school, I’d have to go to work and stop being a burden to them.”

“Sounds rough,” he commented.

“It didn’t seem so at the time,” I said, really thinking about it for the first time in years. "It just seemed... normal. Now, though, I'm not so sure."

"Well, you're a lot brighter than I am," Jack told me.

I shocked myself by putting a comforting hand on his shoulder. "No, Jack, that isn't so. You're very bright, too. I know we never talked about it, but I think that's why we've been friends. Let's face it, we were always the oddballs on the crew. Most of the guys just lived for boobs, beers and burgers." And now, I was the boobs, I thought darkly. "You must have dropped out for about the same reasons."

"Well, I wasn't as bright as you. My IQ is in the 130's."

"But that's pretty high, too. Were you bored, too? Is that why you dropped out?"

Jack shifted uncomfortably, causing me to pull back my hand. "Not really. Look, I'd rather not talk about it if it's okay with you. And I really need to study for this test. I'll make you a deal. When we're done, I'll help you with the math and science, okay?"

I smiled. "Sure. Let's do it."

The evening passed quickly but productively. The History test was going to be on the American Civil War. That had always been one of my favorite periods. I had read Bruce Catton's and Shelby Foote's books on the subject, and considered myself something of an expert. I was able to walk Jack through most of the important details, and in about an hour, I pronounced him ready to take the test. Then, we disposed of English and Government. Government was an easy course. Jack understood that it was taught by an assistant coach who would rather be playing basketball. He had heard that from Bull (who was in the class with all the other jocks) and Mikki. It turned out Mikki was the former Mack's new name.

"She doesn't remember a thing about her old life," Jack told me.

"She's just a bimbo looking for a jock to hold onto. Apparently I'm the jock."

"So what did you two do after Bull dropped me off yesterday?" Why did I want to know that? It was none of my business, but the way she was clinging to him made me... jealous? No, just curious.

"Nothing much," Jack said simply. "Bull dropped us off together. Mikki wanted me to come back to her house. She just lives a couple of blocks beyond me. I begged off, though. Her parents weren't home, and it was obvious she wanted some action."

"And you didn't?" I asked, now genuinely curious.

He shook his head. "Not that way. Maybe later, when I've got things figured out around here, but I smelled a rat. Why was Mikki changed into a bimbo just for me? I know you're not supposed to look a gift horse in the mouth, but I've been suspicious most of my life. Just because I've been given a new body doesn't mean that I won't still be that way."

Next, we looked at English. Apparently, we were reading a Shakespearean play in class, so we could catch up on the fly. I had already read just about every play he had ever written, so I was on home turf there.

Before we could tackle Chemistry and Algebra, Mom came in. She looked pleasantly surprised that we were studying so industriously. "I've made some hot chocolate," she announced, "and there are still some of the cookies I baked yesterday. Why don't you two take a little break?"

We did, but it only took a moment to see Mom's true motive. She sat with us in the kitchen with her own cup of chocolate. Dad had apparently already gone up to bed, so we were now the evening's entertainment. It was obvious she wanted to learn more about Jack. She subtly questioned him about his family (she knew them already—Ovid was a small town), how he was doing in school, what his hobbies were, and so on.

Jack was very glib, considering the fact that I was certain he was making up a lot of it as he went along. I had been in his situation when I was in high school (or maybe I should say the first time I was in high school). I knew this was an interview for the position of Myra's boyfriend. Fat chance of that, I thought. Apparently I already had one of those, and I wanted to get rid of him as quickly as I could.

The third degree—Mom style—out of the way, Jack and I retired to the living room to work on Chemistry and Algebra. With Jack there to explain it, it wasn't hard to pick up on either subject. I had never paid much attention to either subject the first time around. These subjects were the last ones I had taken before dropping out of school, and my mind really wasn't on them. Now, though, they seemed to make sense. It was as if I had been wandering around in the dark and someone had turned on the light. Of course! That's how it works. I hadn't really understood this or that before.

At last, Mom, came into the living room. "Don't you think you two should call it a night?" she asked. "It's late, and you both have to go to school in the morning."

"What time is it?" I asked as I finished the last assigned algebra problem.

"Nearly midnight."

"We should call it a night," Jack said, closing his book. "If you want, we can work on this tomorrow evening."

"Not tomorrow evening," Mom told him. "Myra is going with us to the pre-nuptial dinner for my boss."

Pre-nuptial dinner for her boss? I hadn't known anything about that. Wait a minute, I thought. She worked for a lawyer, and the lawyer who had defended us was wearing an engagement ring. It had to be. There couldn't be that many engaged lawyers in Ovid.

"Well, then maybe this weekend," Jack suggested.

"Sure," I agreed readily. "I'll see you to the door."

It was still snowing out, but not too hard. I looked at the curb and didn't see a car. "Where's your car?"

He smiled. "I walked. It's only about three blocks."

We just stared at each other, basking in our mutual friendship. It was us against Ovid. I was actually starting to think I could make it with Jack's help. Finally, Jack said, "G'night," and turned away with a wave.

"Good night," I called after him. I was really sorry to see him go.

"He's a very nice boy," Mom said as I closed the door.

"I think so, too," I agreed. "We're good friends."

Mom was thoughtful for a moment before saying, "He's certainly a lot nicer than that Bull you've been dating. I'm glad to hear you talk about someone else. All you usually have to talk about is Bull this and Bull that."

Boy, I must have been a space case to do that.

"Oh, I almost forgot," she said suddenly. "That Mikki called up a little while ago. She said you were supposed to call her. I forgot to give you the message."

Read that as "I didn't want to give you the message, especially while you were with Jack."

"I guess you can go one night without talking to her for hours instead of studying."

"I guess I can." Actually, I couldn't think of anything to talk to her about for more than thirty seconds. She might have been significantly different from Mack, but I suspected I wouldn't like her any better. She was a bimbo from the word go. Actually, I suppose I was, too, at least in the eyes of my new contemporaries. I could see us now, Bimbette and Bimbina, the Bimbo Twins. Yeah, sure.

Mom trundled off to bed, leaving me alone at last. I went back to my room, so tired I could barely keep my eyes open. It had been a long and eventful day, and all I could think about now was going to bed. As I pulled down the covers, I... Wait a minute. I was ready for bed. I was wearing a horribly frilly pastel yellow nightgown. My mouth felt fresh as if my teeth had just been brushed. The growing pressure in my bladder was gone, and a look in the mirror told me that I had washed off all my makeup. The problem was, I hadn't consciously done any of those things. That meant the same magic that had changed me into Myra was still at play. It must have been like training wheels on a bike, helping you to balance until you could figure out how to do it yourself.

If I thought about it, I could remember everything I had actually done. I could remember going to the bathroom for the first time as a girl. I could remember carefully wiping myself, as if I had done it all my life. I could remember looking at my face in the mirror as I removed my makeup. I could remember all of these things, but I couldn't remember what I had been thinking about at the time. I would have to be careful in the morning, I realized, or Myra would be back to the bimbo look without any intervention from me. As I drifted off to sleep, I began to think the next day might easily be the longest day of my life.

"Myra, you're oversleeping!"

At first, I didn't recognize the voice, but then I realized it was my new Mom. With a groan, I started to wake up, immediately remembering the events of the previous day. It hadn't been a dream, and I hadn't expected it to be.

"Did you forget to set your alarm?" she asked as I pulled myself out of bed. The sudden sway of heavy breasts was unnerving.

"I guess so," I said sleepily. Actually, I hadn't even thought about it.

"What time is it?"

"Six fifteen," she said. "Your ride will be here in an hour."

But an hour would be plenty of time, I thought. Then, I remembered that as a girl, I would have to spend a lot more time getting ready. There was long hair to contend with, makeup, accessories, and clothes to select. I wasn't looking forward to the process.

Still, I managed. I even found a few minutes to wolf down some cereal and drink some juice. I found if I let myself go in the shower, my built-in programs took care of everything. I was more aware of how they worked now, so I was able to exhibit a little self-control. I picked out my own outfit, consisting of a cream-colored sweater and another pair of tight jeans. I stayed with the tennis shoes I had found the night before. I actually got pretty good at attaching earrings and picking the right accessories. The only trouble I had was makeup. My program wanted me to apply it thick and heavy like the day before, but I was able to force myself to apply a little less. It was still more than I wanted, but significantly less than the day before.

I gave myself the once-over in the mirror. I was still one hot babe, and all the light makeup, jeans and tennis shoes in the world couldn't disguise that. I was ready to face the world. Mom had said my ride would be there at seven fifteen, and I was standing by the door with five minutes to spare. I even remembered to grab my purse.

"Be home right after school," she told me. "We have to get ready for Susan's dinner tonight."

"I will, Mom," I said cheerily as a horn honked outside. Bull was behind the wheel. Damn! I had hoped he wasn't going to be my ride, but I wasn't surprised. To my relief, Mikki and Jack were already in the back seat.

I jumped in the front seat and was suddenly surprised as a big, beefy arm closed around my shoulders and pulled me to face Bull. "Hiya, babe," he said with a grin, planting a sloppy kiss on my lips before I could stop him. The bastard actually pressed my lips so hard that I thought they were going to be forced back through the spaces between my teeth. It hurt like hell. I pulled away before he could force his tongue into my mouth. Now, I'd have to redo my lipstick, too.

"What's your problem this morn...?" His voice trailed off as he looked at me. "What did you do to your face?"

I shrugged. "Nothing, really."

"It looks different. You don't look as sexy."

Now, if I had been a girl all my life, I'm sure I would have been hurt by this comment. Considering my circumstances, though, I felt as if it was the first complimentary thing Bull had said to me. I didn't want to look as sexy. Well, maybe that wasn't accurate. I just didn't want to look like Bull's definition of sexy. Wait a minute, I thought to myself, just whose definition of sexy was I trying to look like?

"And what's with the pants?" Bull roared. "I thought I told you I didn't want to see you ever wear pants when you were with me."

"Look," I yelled right back at him, "it's cold out. There's a foot of snow on the ground and pants are warm."

"Get out and get changed!" he ordered.

I have to admit, I was frightened. Here I was, a slip of a girl, yelling at a guy more than twice my size and god only knew how much stronger than I was. He could hurt me. He could hurt me very badly and not even work up a sweat. I was confused. No, more than that, I was terrified.

"Look, Bull," Jack said calmly but forcefully, "we're all going to be late for school if Myra goes in to change."

"Yeah, Bull," Mikki agreed to my relief. Although she was dressed in a fashion Bull would approve of, she seemed to support me. "You know how Mrs. Miner is. She's just looking for an excuse to have the principal suspend you from sports for awhile. Being late might be the excuse she needs."

All of this seemed to soak slowly into Bull's thick skull. At last, he nodded. "Okay, I'll let you get by this once, but that's it, you understand?"

I said nothing, but that seemed to please Bull. He didn't require answers from females. Saying nothing to him probably passed as agreement in his slow mind. We drove wordlessly to school, but I was fuming. I had never felt so helpless in my life.

Ovid High was one of those sprawling, flat school buildings that sprung up from the fifties on. It looked as if Ovid supported its schools, for I doubted if the building was more than ten years old. It was a complex of wings, all built out of tan brick with a minimum of windows so that the students in the classrooms would not be distracted by the weather outside. Dozens of students were milling between the parking lot and the school entrance, in spite of the cold temperatures and gray skies which threatened more snow. Bull parked his car, got out, slammed the door and headed for the building without a word to any of us. He was pissed; I was relieved. I was afraid he would want to lead me into the school his arm around me, just to let everyone know that I was his chick. What a disgusting thought!

Mikki came up and grabbed my arm tightly through the down jacket I was wearing. "Are you trying to piss him off?"

"I'm just trying not to piss me off," I told her. "What business is it of his what I wear to school?"

"Look," Jack said, grabbing my other arm, "we can all talk about this later. You and I have a Government class to get to."

Leaving Mikki behind and confused, Jack guided me into the school.

"You act like you know where you're going," I said.

"I think I do," he replied. "If you just sort of let your mind go, you seem to find or do what you need by instinct."

Ovid High was a fairly good-sized school. If I had to guess, I would say it probably had about twelve hundred students. Of course, it was also probably the only high school in Ovid. The student body consisted mostly of the transparent people. They seemed to be going about their business as if they were as real as I was. Occasionally, I would catch a glimpse of someone who was solid, but not often. It was an eerie feeling. I could tell Jack was disturbed by it, too.

Jack and I got to our Government class just as the bell was ringing. We took the two remaining seats in the back of the room and tried to look interested as the teacher, a transparent person by the name of 'Mr. Dewitt' according to the nameplate on his desk, launched immediately into a lecture on the relation of the Federal government to the state governments. It was dry material, and I had heard it before. Blessed with an excellent memory, I knew I would have little trouble with this class.

I used the lecture to spend a little time looking around the classroom. I counted only four other 'real' people in the class. One, unfortunately, was Bull. He was sitting about half way toward the front, slumped back with body language that cried, 'I'm bored.' Jack, of course, was one of the real ones. The other two were a boy and a girl who sat a couple of rows forward and to my right. They both looked as if they belonged on the cover of a teen magazine. He had wavy brown hair and looked like a younger Brad Pitt. She was attractive enough to be a model, her auburn hair like something from a hair care commercial with its shine and body. They kept looking at each other with obvious affection. Both were dressed very preppy. The rest of the class was composed of kids who looked like normal high school teens, except for the hint of transparency.

We had a study hall next (no open campus nonsense in a small town like Ovid. If the kids weren't in class, they were to be in study hall). I used it as an opportunity to re-read Romeo and Juliet, which according to the assignment sheet in my locker was to be the play we were reading this week. Then, I used the rest of the period to do a last-minute review for the History test. The period passed quickly, and I became so absorbed in what I was doing that I didn't even think about who I had become.

English proved to be my first real challenge. For one thing, I was sure from the way some of the other girls whispered and giggled as I came in that Myra had become something of a joke in certain circles. I wasn't surprised. Myra may have been a bimbo, but she wasn't taking bimbo classes. She was taking a full load of courses that college-bound teens took. Also, I noticed the students surrounding me looked a bit brighter on the average than those in the Government class. That class was probably a required one. This class looked a bit more accelerated. They were expected to read fairly advanced material, I noticed from the outline. Shakespeare, Milton, and Chaucer were all on the agenda, and none of them were easy reads. The only two real students who had joined us in English were the two preppies. I wouldn't have been surprised to find out that their names were Biff and Buffy.

I wondered what had happened to Myra. She seemed to be, at the heart of things, an intelligent girl. Yet here she was, dating an anthropoid ape and dressing like Little Betty Bimbo. What had gone wrong?

The English teacher, Ms. Saunders from the nameplate, was an older woman, perhaps sixty, with a kindly face and a mature but not unattractive figure. Her hair was mostly gray, pulled back into a tight bun. She was dressed in an attractive blue dress of a modest length. And, she was not transparent. I wondered if everyone who was real in Ovid was like me, and if so, who she had been before. She was the oldest real person I had seen thus far. Even given her age, she was reasonably attractive. I suddenly realized that in many ways, Ovid was like a television show's version of a small town. It was populated by unusually attractive people.

"Today," Ms. Saunders began, "we have a special guest who will be joining us. Dr. Miner, our Superintendent of Schools will be here shortly. As some of you may know, her Master's degree is in English literature, and her thesis was on Romeo and Juliet. Ah, here she is now."

Dr. Miner was a very sophisticated woman in perhaps her early forties. Her hair was light brown and fashionably styled, and she wore an attractive dark green business suit. She was a real person, and maybe a bit more. She was, like the Judge, almost larger than life, and she carried herself with such poise and grace that the entire classroom was enraptured.

"I'm very pleased to be invited to your class today," she said, her warm smile returned by every student. "Romeo and Juliet is certainly one of my favorite of Shakespeare's plays. Ms. Saunders has promised me a reading of one of the scenes. Let's see, Jack Paris, would you read the part of Romeo for us?"

There were snickers from several girls as Jack stood. "Yes, ma'am." I realized this was the first time I had heard Jack's last name. I kind of liked it. It sounded... what? Romantic? Please.

“Myra Smithwick?”

“What?” Oops. My mind had been wandering.

“Myra,” Dr. Miner said calmly, “would you read the part of Juliet for us?”

“Oh, yes,” I said, standing. There was more snickering. Only this time, I felt as if the snickering was another way of saying, “The bimbo did it again.”

“All right,” Dr. Miner began. “I would like for the two of you to start with Act II, Scene II.”

Oh my god. It was the balcony scene. I looked at Jack as he began, “He jests at scars that never felt a wound. But soft! What light through yonder window breaks?”

Jack read marvelously well. There was almost a magical cadence to his delivery. His soliloquy was broken only by my words, “Ay me,” before continuing. As he finished, it was my turn. “O Romeo, Romeo! Wherefore art thou Romeo?” I was amazed at the musical quality of my own voice. We were like two singers singing the perfect duet, back and forth, bringing life to Shakespeare’s prose.

It was as if we were no longer Jack and Myra, but actually Romeo and Juliet, showering each other with promises of undying love. I began to feel something stirring in my breasts and between my legs that I had never felt before. We didn’t even have to look often at the text. It was as if we knew it by heart. At last, when Romeo—Jack—finished the scene with, “Hence will I to my ghostly father’s cell, His help to crave and my dear hap to tell,” the room was quiet for several moments. Then, at the urgings of Dr. Miner, the room erupted in applause. Self consciously, Jack and I took our seats, nodding to the applause. But, I noticed we continued to look at each other.

Other students read, only to be rewarded with polite applause. Before we all knew it, the bell sounded, signifying our lunch break. On the way out, Dr. Miner stopped Jack and me. “You two did a terrific job of reading,” she said with a big smile. “I’m very proud of you both. Myra, I hope this means we can begin to expect great things from you again.”

“I hope so,” I said, not sure exactly what she was driving at.

I had forgotten how bad high school cafeteria food could be.

Compared to Mom’s cooking, this was slops. But it filled the stomach.

Jack and I ate together, neither mentioning our morning reading. Just as we finished lunch, we were joined by the other two real students who had been in our English class. They were both bright and cheerful in a preppy sort of way.

The boy began the conversation. “Hi, Jack, Myra.”

We both mumbled “hi’s” since we were apparently supposed to know who they were.

“Myra,” the girl said, “I need to go to the girl’s room. Will you come with me?”

I know girls have a habit of going to the restroom in packs, but I suspected there was more to it this time. It was not so much a request to keep her company, but more of a command. I was curious, so I just replied, “Sure.” As we walked away, I noticed the boy had begun an intense conversation with Jack.

The girl’s room was deserted except for one transparent redhead who was just finishing her hair. She smiled at us and continued to brush. My companion looked somewhat uncomfortable as she made the motions of primping in the mirror. I emulated her actions until the redhead, with another smile, walked out.

“Okay,” the girl said. “Now, we can talk, but if someone else walks in, we’ll have to just be two girls fixing our faces, okay?”

“Okay,” I agreed, confused but very curious.

The girl put out her slim hand. “First, hi, I’m Samantha Wallace. Just call me Sam. My boyfriend is Danny Mitchell. But in Ovid, you should know that, because we’ve all gone to school together since kindergarten. What you and I remember, though, is very different.”

“You know who I am—was—then?” I asked.

She shook her head. "I know what you were. I know that until yesterday, you were someone else. I don't know who you were, though, and you probably shouldn't tell me until you know me a lot better. We tend to keep our original identities private. It helps us to fit in here better."

"So what can you tell me?" I asked. "And why couldn't you tell me out there with your boyfriend? Can't he know any of this?"

"No," she explained. "He knows everything I'm going to tell you. The problem is there is a little corollary to the spell on all of us. If we remember who we were, we can only talk about the changes in twos. When all four of us were out there together, we couldn't be having this conversation. Danny is telling Jack roughly what I'm telling you, okay?"

I nodded.

"That's why we need to talk about something else if somebody walks in on us and..."

The door opened and two girls in black and gold cheerleader outfits walked in. One was blonde like me, but the other was dark, probably Indian. Oklahoma has a large Indian population. They greeted us, but both seemed a little surprised to see Sam and me together.

Apparently we ran in different circles. They primped at the mirror, causing Sam and I to do the same. Then Sam said softly to me, "I see you're trying for a more subdued look with your makeup. Let me give you a hand."

She opened my purse and pulled out my lipstick. Then, she handed me a tissue and suggested, "You should wipe off your lipstick first and we'll start over."

I did as she asked, then faced her as she carefully recovered my lips. I was actually becoming used to the odd taste and the slightly greasy feel. I would have preferred to wear none at all, but I knew that was out of the question. It would be so far out of character as to be suspicious. She finished just as the two cheerleaders left.

“There!” she said proudly. I looked at what she had done. It was a subtle difference, but it looked so much more... natural. I was actually pleased with the result.

“Can you do something with the rest?” I asked. “I mean, the eyes are a bit much still, don’t you think?”

“Yes I do,” she agreed, “but let’s go on with our discussion first. When we get interrupted, I can work on your face.”

“Okay.”

Sam sighed and began a recitation I was sure she had given before. “As nearly as we can tell, Ovid was created about a year and a half ago by the Judge and some... others. Its population was made up almost entirely of the semi-transparent people I’m sure you’ve noticed. Then, slowly but surely, he’s repopulating the town with people like us who had other lives before. Most of the people he changes never remember their old lives, but about one in four or five remembers. We haven’t figured out why some remember and some don’t, or why this was done to us, but it just is.”

“Who is the Judge?” I asked.

She closed her eyes. “That is perhaps the biggest taboo here. We can’t talk about that, even when there are just two of us. You’ll probably figure it out eventually. Most people do, I’m sure.”

The restroom door opened again, and three girls, each giggling about something a teacher had said in some class, fixed their makeup as Sam worked on my eyes. I was beginning to wonder if girls ever actually used the toilets in the girl’s room. All I had seen thus far was a procession of girls in front of the mirror. If I were an architect, I think I would decrease the number of toilets in high school girl’s rooms and double the square footage of mirrors. At last they left. I was actually glad they had come in, for Sam had worked her magic on my eyes. All trace of bimbo was gone from my face.

“Okay,” I asked when they were gone, “is there any way to get back to my real life?”

"I don't think so," she replied. "At least, I'm not aware of anyone who has managed it. Once the Judge has decided, that's who you are." She hesitated for a moment before asking, "I don't mean to pry, but was your old life that good? I mean, life here is really pretty pleasant."

I thought about that. In my real life, I had no close family. I also had no future and a stack of regrets. Every morning, I got up to go to a nowhere job and every evening, I came home (if you could call the dump I lived in 'home') filthy with a sore back and calluses on top of calluses. No, my old life wasn't a very good one, but I was a man. And as a man, I could... What could I do? Well, as a man I could... be a man.

"I suppose you're right," I allowed, "but in my real life I was... I mean, I wasn't..."

"You weren't a girl?" she prompted.

"Is it that obvious?" I asked, embarrassed.

She shook her head. "No, except for the thing about not knowing some of the finer points of makeup, you're doing pretty well. When you read the part of Juliet this morning, I practically cried. If you were just playing the part of a girl with no real feelings behind it, they should give you an Academy Award."

"I've just always liked Shakespeare," I protested. "I could have probably read Romeo as well."

"You may think that, but I doubt it. Try it at home some time. I think you'll be surprised. Now, as far as trying to learn to be a girl, I can help you. After you've been here for a couple of months, you'll wonder why being male was ever important to you."

I couldn't imagine that, but I had a gut feeling Sam was speaking from experience. It was almost impossible to imagine this model-perfect girl as a man. Every movement, every word, spoke of confident femininity, and when she looked at Danny, it was with the look of a woman gazing at the man she adored. No, I thought, dismissing my suspicion. There was no way Sam could ever have been a man.

We rejoined Jack and Danny, who had obviously had a long talk about Ovid. "Danny has asked us to join them at his house tonight," Jack mentioned nonchalantly.

"I've got a dinner to go to with my parents," I explained. "It's a prenuptial dinner, so I don't know what time it will be over."

"Neither do I," Danny said, "but my parents are going to be there, too. Dad is one of the groomsmen, so you can just ride home with them."

"No bachelor party for the groom?" I asked.

Danny shook his head. "It wouldn't be very exciting. The groom doesn't drink and wouldn't look at any other woman than his bride-to-be. Not that I blame him, because Susan Henderson is a pretty nice looking woman, even with the glasses. Where's the fun in a bachelor party?"

I smiled a genuine smile. "Okay, sure. I'd like to come over."

"I'll meet you at Danny's," Jack said.

A sudden black thought crossed my mind. "Wait a minute," I said. "What about Bull?"

"He's not invited," Danny replied darkly.

"That's not what I meant," I explained. "I mean, he seems to think he owns me, and I'm a little... well, concerned."

"Frightened?" Jack clarified.

"Well, yes."

Jack shifted in his chair to come to his full height. "Look, don't worry about Bull. First of all, he's got a wrestling meet tonight. Mikki told me since she's going to it with some friends. I begged off. Also, if Bull gives you any trouble, well, let's just say he'd better not."

I felt suddenly better than I had felt since my transformation. "Okay, let's do it!"

Jack smiled at me. "Then we had better head for History class. I believe we all have a test to take."

I had worried about the test, but I shouldn't have bothered. In a word, it was a breeze. Most of the test was multiple choice. For example:

'The President of the Confederacy was:

a) Andrew Johnson b) Robert E. Lee c) Jefferson Davis d) None of the Above.'

Please.

I didn't remember history being that easy when I was in high school as a male. Maybe it was, and maybe I just wasn't paying attention. I'll admit, I developed an interest in history after I dropped out of school, but this was so simple, I wondered why I had even bothered to study.

The history teacher, Ms. Samson, seemed bewildered when she saw that I was the first student finished. "Ms. Smithwick," she admonished me, "if you are finished with your test, perhaps you should spend some time reviewing your answers."

"Yes, ma'am," I replied. "I've already done that."

There were snickers around the room. Obviously, my reading of Shakespeare had been a fluke. The bimbo had made random guesses on her history test and was now ready for an exciting day at the mall (assuming Ovid was even big enough to have a mall, which I doubted). The surprise will be on you guys, I thought. I aced that test and I knew it.

Even Jack looked a little surprised. He was still working on the test. I could foresee that I would have to help him with History, in return for his help in Algebra and Chemistry. We would probably be spending a lot of time studying together. I found that an oddly pleasant prospect.

By the end of the school day, I was quite proud of myself. I had acquitted myself well, I thought. Even Chemistry and Algebra didn't seem too hard. I was amazed how much I learned when I paid attention. Of course, I was really over a decade older than the other students. I was more like the college dropout who did well in school after spending a few years working or in the military. I knew what awaited the uneducated, and I didn't think this female body would do very well at digging ditches.

“Are you going to the wrestling meet?” Mikki asked me as she caught up with me at my locker.

I tried to look disappointed, but I probably failed. “Can’t. I have to go to that prenuptial dinner with my parents.”

“Oh, that’s right,” Mikki said. She didn’t sound all that disappointed either. I think Mikki was beginning to feel a little uncomfortable around me. “Well, I’m going. I’ll root for Bull for you.”

“You do that.”

I managed to figure out which bus to get on and slid into my seat. It was only a minute or so before Jack slid in next to me. I was a little ashamed of myself, but I felt a momentary shiver of pleasure as he scooted against me on the narrow seat. “Want to drop by for a few minutes?” I asked him.

He studied me for a moment. “I thought you had a dinner to go to.”

“I do,” I agreed, “but I’m sure I have time. I wanted to hear what you learned from Danny.” That was partially true. I also just wanted to have Jack around to talk to. We were both strangers in a strange land, and without him, I wasn’t sure I could hold my masquerade together.

“Okay.”

Mom and Dad (it was odd how quickly I had come to think of them more as my mother and father than I did my real ones) hadn’t made it home yet, so Jack and I settled in at the kitchen table, glasses of milk in front of us, looking for all the world like something out of a sixties sitcom on Nickelodeon. I told him what Sam had told me. Then, he told me of his conversation with Danny.

“He told me about the same thing Sam told you,” he replied. “He told me the transparent people are called ‘shades.’ He doesn’t know where they come from. They look like people and act like people. They’re completely solid, too. Then, whenever the Judge decides to transform someone into an Ovid resident, the shade representing them disappears.”

“So there were shades for all of us,” I concluded.

Jack shook his head. “No, not for all of us. There was a shade for you before, and one for Bull. Mikki and I apparently didn’t exist before yesterday. The real people know that, although Danny said that slowly but surely, they’ll develop false memories of knowing us for a long time. The shades accept us as if we had always been here.”

“So even memories are in a constant state of flux,” I said slowly.

“Constant,” Jack agreed. “Get this. Ovid High plays other schools in sports, right?”

“I guess so.”

“But the shades can’t leave town, and if people from outside came to Ovid, they would notice something was wrong with the shades. Danny says that what happens is that all the other schools always play Ovid in Ovid. Their teams and fans come here, enjoy the game, never notice anything wrong, then go home and when they leave, they forget that they were ever here. The out of town papers don’t report the game, and everybody outside Ovid assumes their team had a bye the night they actually played Ovid.”

“Does he know how all this is being done?” I asked. “This would be quite a juggling act even for Q on Star Trek.”

Jack shrugged. “Obviously, it’s magic. Danny knows who the Judge really is, but apparently, he can’t tell us. And apparently, the Judge isn’t alone in this. We have to figure it all out for ourselves.”

I heard a car pull up in front. “It’s Mom,” I said, looking out the window. “You’d better go now. I’ll see you at Danny’s house later.”

“Okay,” he said, grabbing his books. Then, he did something I would never have expected. He gave me a chaste, brotherly kiss on the cheek as he left. I was too surprised to respond. I was even more surprised to realize I enjoyed it.

Mom helped me get ready. I didn’t have the foggiest notion what to wear. It’s a good thing I asked. I assumed since the dinner had to do with the wedding that it would be fairly formal. I was wrong. It was ‘nice casual’ as Mom put it. I ended up back in a skirt and heels, but nothing extreme this time. I wore a black sweater, a red plaid skirt which fit snugly but not too tightly, black tights, and black patent leather slip-ons with just a hint of a heel. I had replaced the hoop earrings with small, subtle studs and finished the outfit off with a gold bracelet and matching necklace. Along with the makeup treatment Sam had helped me with, I had a real ‘girl next door’ look. I kind of liked it.

Mom did, too. She came up and hugged me while dad was getting ready. “Sweetheart,” she said softly, “I’m so glad you’ve decided on a new look. It’s absolutely darling. I think this Jack is a good influence on you.”

“What?”

She looked a little flustered. “I didn’t mean to assume anything. It’s just that I saw Jack leaving this afternoon, and the two of you seemed to get along so well last night.”

“But we’re just friends,” I protested.

“I know you are,” she agreed, still flustered. “But it’s just that Bull seemed so... well, wrong for you, and this Jack is such a nice boy. Is he taking you to the dance?”

What dance? “I don’t know,” I said honestly.

That seemed to slow her down. “Well, I just assumed...”

Dad got her off the hook by calling out, “Where’s my green tie?” She rushed to help him, grateful for the interruption.

What dance? No one had said anything about a dance. I would have to ask Sam later.

The rehearsal went fine. Susan’s fiancé, Steven, was a nice guy, and I had to admit with chagrin, very nice looking. I had never noticed a man’s looks before, but I found I was now starting to notice. I wasn’t exactly interested in them; I just noticed. I knew that would start to happen more and more to me as the female hormones kept pumping through my body. It was a little hard to accept, though. I would have to get used to it sometime.

The bridesmaids, including my mother, seemed to be having a wonderful time. In addition to Mom, the blonde I had seen in the courtroom was a bridesmaid, and the third was an absolutely striking redhead I had never seen before. For all her laughter and friendliness with the other two women, I couldn't help but think that she had the same bearing and larger-than-life demeanor of the Judge as Dr. Miner. I wondered if they were all some sort of superhumans or... A thought struck me. I began to have an idea about the identity of the powers that were in Ovid. I would have to check later.

"And how are you doing, Myra?" a woman's voice asked. I turned to see Susan Henderson, the bride. She looked somehow different than she had looked in the courtroom. She seemed more feminine and very much at ease.

"I'm doing okay, I guess, Ms. Henderson," I answered.

She smiled. "Just call me Susan. I'm not that much older than you are now, and I'm younger than you were a couple of days ago."

I looked around and saw that we were alone, so it was possible to talk about my transformation. "I guess so," I agreed.

"Your mother and I have gotten to be pretty good friends in the office. She's had a lot of trouble with you until the last couple of days. She thinks you've made a dramatic change in your life. Of course, she has no idea how dramatic that change really is," Susan laughed. "In any case, I'm proud of you, Myra. You seem to be adapting well. Certainly better than... well, let's just say better than some others I know."

I sighed, "I didn't figure I had much choice. I got a feeling the Judge doesn't change people back, does he?"

She shook her head. "I don't know of anyone he has ever changed back." Did I detect a note of irony in her voice?

"I know you can't tell me who the Judge is," I began.

"That's right."

“But can you at least tell me why he did this to me? I mean, Bear was a drug dealer and a bully, but here he is in Ovid, a great athlete with a bright future. And Jack and I were friends. Why did he get to stay male while I got to be a bimbo?”

“I notice you didn’t mention Mikki,” Susan observed.

“No, but at least Mack had to become female. Besides, he doesn’t remember any of his old life.”

“Does this mean you consider becoming a girl punishment?”

I was on shaky ground. Every real person in Ovid, as I understood it, had been someone else before they came to Ovid. I was sure Mikki and I weren’t the only sex changes. If Susan was born female, she might be insulted if I told her I thought becoming female was really a punishment. But wasn’t it? As a guy, I had strength. I could be ready to go anywhere in fifteen minutes. I was master of my own destiny. I was in charge. I lost all of those things when I became female. Here I was, a weak girl. I had only a small fraction of the strength I had enjoyed while male. Getting ready in fifteen minutes? I would be hard pressed just to get my makeup on in fifteen minutes. Was I in charge as a female? Not really. I couldn’t even tell Bull to get lost. I was genuinely frightened of him. I could never remember being truly frightened of another man in my entire life. And I didn’t even want to think about the clothes I had to wear.

On the other hand, I realized it was a potential second chance. I had dropped out of high school my Junior year, yet here I was back in my Junior year again. I was sure I could make something of my life this time around. Wasn’t that more important than having something dangling between my legs? I was beginning to think it was. Yet, I couldn’t overcome the nagging feeling that I could have utilized a second chance just as well in a male body.

“Well, Myra, do you consider it a punishment?”

“I’m not sure,” I replied honestly. “I know I would rather be male.”

She nodded. “I think that’s pretty natural at this stage. To answer your question, though, the Judge seems to have his own criteria for deciding who gets to be male and who gets to be female. All I know is that I argued with him in chambers that you and your friend were both innocent bystanders.”

“Then why didn’t he let us go?”

“That I know and can tell you. To be honest, Myra, did you know Mack and Bear were dealing drugs?”

“We knew somebody was,” I allowed.

“No,” she said, glaring at me. “That isn’t what I asked. Be honest, now, you and Jack—or rather Brad at the time—knew they were dealing drugs.”

“Okay,” I sighed. “So I knew. We both knew. It really wasn’t any of our business.”

“Things as serious as drugs are everybody’s business,” she argued.

“The Judge won’t even allow them in Ovid. I have the feeling that he bought my arguments about you two. I think he was lenient with both of you.”

“Maybe,” I replied, “but I still feel like the guy in that old joke who gets sentenced to three hundred years in jail and sighs in relief because it could have been life.”

Susan laughed a musical laugh. “I know, it does seem that way sometimes.”

“Susan,” I asked slowly, “I know it’s frowned upon, but I have to ask. Who were you before you came to Ovid?”

She grinned. “I was a lawyer.”

It wasn’t the answer I was looking for, but it would have to do.

Susan moved on to talk with the rest of the party and tie up the details with Reverend Pickering, a real person who was the minister of First Baptist where the wedding would be held. Then, I rejoined my parents and we drove off for the dinner.

It was a nice dinner, held at a local steak house called Winston's out on the edge of town. I introduced myself to the two shades who were Danny's parents, then sat with my parents and enjoyed the meal. I didn't have to talk much. At sixteen, I was considered little more than a child, and except for polite small talk, I was excluded from most of the conversation. I was also excluded from the wine. It looked good, and I would have loved a glass with my meal, but I realized I was too young. It would have been out of character for me even to ask.

I noticed, though, that when I did respond to the question, my answer was the answer of a sixteen-year-old girl. It wasn't the magic, I was certain. Instead, I was actually beginning to think like a sixteen-year-old girl. When someone asked me what I wanted to do after school, I answered that I didn't know. When they asked me how I liked school, I gave the standard "fine" any young girl might give. When someone asked me if I had a boyfriend, I said, "Not really," but an image of Jack came up in my mind, unbidden.

About eight, the Mitchells collected me and I was off for an evening with Jack and our new friends.

I was afraid I would be seriously overdressed for the evening, and I was. Everyone else was in jeans, although Sam's were certainly feminine in appearance and did nothing to hide her sensational body. Danny and Jack were in the den when I came in while Sam was in the kitchen fixing soft drinks for everyone. Danny and Jack waved and Sam motioned me into the kitchen. When Danny's parents headed off to their room, saying something about "letting the kids have some privacy," Sam said, "Danny and Jack are discussing Ovid in a little more detail. We can join them in a few minutes and watch a movie. Danny and I thought we'd give you a chance to ask any other questions you might have thought about."

This was an awkward way to discuss matters. Why didn't the Judge allow us to discuss Ovid together instead of only in pairs? Did he fear a revolt? How could he be afraid of any of us when he had the power to transform us? "One question comes to mind," I replied. "Why is this being done to us?"

Sam smiled, "Why not?"

"That isn't an answer," I said petulantly.

"No," Sam agreed, "but it's probably the only answer you'll get. Everybody asks the question, but nobody seems to ever come up with the answer. Or if they have, they haven't been able to pass it on to the rest of us. After a little while, most of us just give up on that question and get on with our new lives."

"That's probably a lot easier for you than it will be for me," I pointed out.

"Why?" Sam asked, handing me a Coke. "Because you used to be a guy and I've always been a girl?"

"Well, yes."

"Fooled you!" she laughed. "After you've been here for a few weeks, you tend to take on all the characteristics of the person you've become. I've been here over a year now, but when I got here, I was as male as you were. In fact, I was a football player. Danny and I both played for Northwest Missouri State. Our plane was forced down here and the whole team was transformed into boys and girls of every shape and color. Even the coach was transformed. He's our History teacher now."

"Ms. Samson?" I gasped. It was hard to think of her as a football coach.

"That's right."

I mulled all of this over. "But why all the sex changes?" I asked.

"I can't help you there either, but if you think about it, a lot more males travel alone than females, especially on back highways like the ones that run through Ovid. Women take the Interstates and stop and ask for directions. Men like taking back roads and never stop to ask where they are. I guess that makes men more susceptible to finding Ovid. And since the town needs both men and women, a lot more men become women than the other way around."

“Okay,” I said, sipping my Coke. “I can buy that. But tell me what you can about me. Have we always been friends?”

“We used to be,” Sam replied uncomfortably.

“Look, Sam,” I explained, “I’m not the same Myra you knew before. You understand that. Right now, you know more about my past as Myra than I do. If I’m going to get through this, I need your help. So what’s the deal?”

Sam sighed, “The deal is that you and I go back to elementary school together. If you think about it, we don’t live very far apart, and there are only three elementary schools in Ovid, so it stands to reason that we’ve known each other most of our lives. You were my best friend until last summer.”

“What happened then?”

“Bull happened,” she replied. “You were drawn to him for some reason. He was everything you weren’t. He was big and strong and depended more on his brawn than his brains. Over the summer, you changed from being a real girl next-door type to a... a bimbo. By the time school started, it was if I didn’t even know you. You went from being an A student to one of the ones just getting by. We just didn’t have anything in common anymore.”

“And now?” I prompted.

“I don’t know,” she replied honestly. “You seem more like the Myra I remembered. And now, we have a lot more in common, since neither one of us were even girls before Ovid. What do you think of Bull?”

I told her who Bull and Mikki had been before. When she had digested this, she said, “I can understand why you would be repulsed by both of them, but be careful, Myra. Mikki isn’t Mack and Bull isn’t Bear. They’ve forgotten who they were. They won’t be drug dealers here. In case you didn’t know, there are no drugs in Ovid. They aren’t allowed by the Judge, and Officer Mercer is everywhere.”

“They may not be the same people,” I argued, “but I at least remember who they were.”

“I hope so,” Sam replied. “It’s been my experience that even though they aren’t the same people, good people stay good people and bad people... well, let’s just say they usually don’t make good people. I’m glad you’re wary of Bull. Does that mean you’re going with Jack to the Christmas party?”

“What Christmas party?”

Sam explained, “The school has one every year. It’s not exactly politically correct, I know, mixing church and state and all that, but the rules are different in Ovid. I had expected you to be going with Bull, but maybe you and Jack should go.”

“I don’t know,” I admitted. “I’ll have to check with Jack.”

“If he is, we can double,” Sam suggested.

“I’d like that,” I admitted. I paused for a moment. There was one more thing I wanted to ask, but how to ask it? I would just have to blurt it out. “Sam?”

“Yes, Myra?”

“When did you, you know, become interested in boys?”

Sam leaned against the counter and looked up at the ceiling in thought. “That’s a tough question. It happened over time. When I first became a girl, I was in too much of a shock to be interested in either sex. Danny and I had been good friends in college. We just started talking, trying to help each other through the changes. The next thing we both knew, we were... well, you know. It just started to seem natural to us.”

“Is that what might happen to Jack and me?”

“It might,” she agreed. “You’ve got all the right equipment now. Since you’re going to be a girl for the rest of your life, it wouldn’t hurt to find the right guy.”

“Sam?”

“Yes, Myra?”

I gave her a quick hug. "Thanks for your help."

"Any time," she said, smiling, as she picked up a drink for Danny and headed for the den. I got Jack's drink and followed.

We ended up watching Beauty and the Beast. It was a compromise. Danny had wanted to watch an action film (he didn't really care which one) and Jack and I abstained. Sam had her heart set on a romantic comedy. "For about the last year, her taste has gone from action movies to romantic comedies," Danny said cryptically. It was about as close as he could come to talking about Sam's change into a girl in a larger group.

I wondered if the same thing would happen to me. I was pretty much a fan of action films as well. I had never been much of a fan of romances. I had to admit, though, that I enjoyed the film. I found myself sympathizing with poor Belle. First, there was the clod in her hometown who was determined to have her. Then there was the Beast. Of course, the Beast turns out to be her true love while the handsome guy from her hometown turns out to be the baddie. The film actually made me think. What was Bull? Was he the baddie from my hometown, or was he the Beast? It would be best to just stay away from him rather than try to find out. I admit, I was frightened of him and what he might do when I tried to stay away, but try I must.

It was all in all an enjoyable evening. Sam and Danny snuggled up together on the floor, leaving the couch to Jack and I. A few minutes into the film, I noticed Jack's arm draped casually on the couch behind me. At first, it caused me to tense up and lean forward, but as I got into the movie, I began to lean back in a more comfortable position. I don't know when it actually happened, but by the time Belle had reached the Beast's castle, Jack's arm was resting around my shoulders, and by the time the movie ended, I was actually leaning against him and thinking about what a happy ending the film had. Wistfully, I began to wonder if my own life would be as happy.

The movie over, Jack and I said our good nights. Jack had brought his parent's car, so he offered to drive me home. I happily accepted, and the two of us walked arm in arm out into the chilly Oklahoma night. In the car, I found myself sitting close to Jack.

As we were driving to my house, I asked Jack, "Did Danny tell you anything about a Christmas party at school?"

"No, he didn't, but Mikki did."

"Mikki?" I repeated cautiously, moving a little further away from Jack.

He nodded. "I'm taking her to the party."

"Oh." The disappointment in my voice was obvious. I didn't mean for it to be, but there it was.

Jack looked at me, stopping the car in front of my house. "Look, I didn't ask her. I mean, Jack did, but I wasn't Jack then. I'd really rather not take her. I'd rather take you."

Why did my heart suddenly jump. "Oh?" There was no disappointment in my voice that time.

"Yes, but you're going with Bull anyway."

But I didn't want to go with Bull. I wanted to go with... with... well, anybody else. I mean, it would have been better with Jack, or... Oh, hell, I didn't know what I meant.

To break the silence, Jack suggested, "Look, maybe we can all go together."

"Maybe," I said without conviction as I opened the door. Jack moved toward me, then thought better of it and moved back under the wheel.

"Good night," I said softly, feeling my voice catch. I closed the door before I heard his reply.

As soon as I had closed the front door behind me, I began to feel unwelcome tears welling up. With effort, I choked them back down and jumped as I heard my mother's voice from the living room saying, "Myra, are you all right?"

"What?" I said, startled as she turned up the lights. "Oh, yes, I'm fine,"

I managed to lie. "It was just a sad movie."

"Oh," she responded, not really believing it, I knew. "I stayed up because your friend Mikki called. She said for you to call her at this number. It was something about Bull being hurt." There didn't seem to be much sympathy in my mother's voice. I knew she didn't like Bull one bit. "She said to call before eleven."

"What time is it now?"

"Ten thirty," she replied.

Bull hurt? Did I care? Maybe my change of sex had given me a more tender heart, but I really didn't want him hurt. I just wanted him to leave me alone. I called Mikki.

"Oh, Myra, thank god you called," Mikki said breathlessly. "Bull got hurt in a wrestling match this evening."

"What happened?" I asked, trying to sound concerned.

"He was pinned funny," she told me. "It twisted his leg back and stretched the ligaments in his knee."

Good. At least it wasn't life threatening.

"He's going to be fine," she went on. "They were concerned about how it might affect his football chances when I called you, but the doctor has checked him out and he's going to be fine. They're going to keep him over night and put him on crutches for a couple of days. Then, they say with a couple of weeks of therapy, he'll be fine. Isn't that good news?"

"Yes, very."

"He wants to see you," she said. "Of course, it's too late tonight. Where were you anyway?"

"At Sam's," I replied without elaborating.

"Oh. Well, visiting hours start at nine tomorrow."

"Okay," I agreed. "What hospital is he in?"

"What hospital?" she laughed. "What do you think? There's only one."

Whoops! “Sure. I’ll be there in the morning.”

As I hung up the phone, I quickly forgot about Bull and began to think about Jack again. What was wrong with me anyway? I wondered as I got ready for bed. Jack had been my best friend, Brad, and he hadn’t changed that much when he became Jack. Why was I mooning over him like some lovesick teenage girl? Oh, shit, I was a teenage girl. Was I lovesick, too?

I suddenly looked down at myself and realized that while I was thinking about Jack, I had managed to get ready for bed again. I was wearing the same yellow nightgown I had worn the night before. I looked at myself carefully in the mirror while wearing the nightgown. I looked like a typical teenage girl. No trace of Marty was there anymore. Why should I fool myself?

I touched a breast and tried to imagine what it would feel like to be wearing something like this nightgown while a boy like Jack touched my breast. I was a little surprised to feel my nipples pushing outward against the soft material. There was a warmth in my groin as well that signalled an empty feeling there. It was almost a yearning. I pulled my hand away from my breast at once. Yes, I was most assuredly a teenage girl.

I felt a tear squeeze from my eye unbidden and trickle down my cheek as I crawled into bed. I was so confused. Why couldn’t I be like some of the others in Ovid who had no idea who they had been before? That would make life so much simpler, I thought, as I drifted off to sleep.

Mom woke me again the next morning. “I’ve got to get over to Susan’s,” she told me as I was still waking up. “The wedding is at two. Tell your father to get there by one thirty. He’s at the office this morning and he’s supposed to go directly to the church. You need to get ready and—oh, how are you going to get there?”

I suddenly realized she had planned to leave me without a car. “Mom, I have to visit Bull this morning. I promised.” Did I really sound that whiney?

She started to say something, then stopped. After thinking for a moment, she commented, "I didn't think you were seeing Bull anymore."

"I'm not," I said. "At least I don't think I am, but he's hurt, and I promised Mikki I would visit him."

"All right. You can take my car. I'll get a ride with Cindy. But don't be late! I want you there at one thirty, too."

"I will be," I assured her as she gave me a quick peck on the cheek and rushed for the phone, probably to call Cindy, whoever that was. "Oh, Mom, what should I wear?"

"The maroon dress would be nice," she called up from the kitchen.

Maroon. Hmmm. I looked in the closet and found it with little trouble. It appeared to be velvet with long sleeves. She was right. It would look good on me. Let's see, dark tan hose and hopefully I had matching shoes. Maybe a gold necklace, and... What the hell was wrong with me? I was acting like this was the important decision of the day. It was as if the thoughts invaded my mind whenever I let my guard down. I sighed. I might as well give into them. At this rate, within a month, I'd be as feminine as if I had been Myra all my life. I just had to have that life in order when that time came.

To see Bull, I slipped on a pink sweat suit and tied my hair in a long ponytail. I didn't want to look too sexy for him. He'd have to take me as I was if he wanted a visit from me. Finding the hospital was easy. There was a map of Ovid in the phone book, and all I had to do is drive Mom's little Ford Tempo close enough to the hospital that I could follow the signs.

Bull was on the third floor, which was the top floor. He had a semi-private room, but had no roommate when I got there. He was sitting up, his knee in a brace, watching Saturday morning cartoons. He didn't look especially threatening, and as I entered the room, I tried to remind myself that he had no idea he had ever been anyone but Bull. He turned and smiled when he saw me.

“Hey, Myra,” he said cheerfully. “I’m glad you came.”

“How are you feeling?” I asked tentatively.

He shrugged. “Pretty good. I get to go home tomorrow. The doctor said there’s no real damage. I’ll just have to take it easy for a week or so.”

“I’m glad you’re okay,” I said. Then, I just couldn’t think of anything else to say as I stood by his bed. After all, I really didn’t know him. And what I had seen of him the last couple of days, I hadn’t liked.

At last, he broke the ice. “Listen, Myra, I’m sorry for the way I’ve acted with you. I guess I was just nervous about the meet.”

I didn’t say anything, but he was saying all the right things.

He continued, “I just love you so much.”

Love?

“I won’t do it again, okay?”

I had to answer that. “Okay,” I agreed.

He smiled. “That’s great. Then I’ll pick you up Monday for school, okay?”

There was that ‘okay’ thing again. “Okay.”

“And I’m gonna get you the nicest corsage for the dance Friday. Okay?”

“Okay,” I said, returning his smile, realizing that I had just confirmed our date for the Christmas dance. I didn’t want to go with him. I didn’t want to go with anybody. But what was I to do? Besides, if he was good on his word, he would be a perfect gentleman. And I had to get used to socializing in this body anyhow. “Uh, look, I’ve got to go,” I told him. “I’ve got a wedding to go to.”

“Okay,” he said calmly. “How about a little get well kiss?”

I hesitated for a moment, then bent over and gave him a sisterly kiss on the cheek. It seemed to be all he had expected, for he smiled at me and said, “Have a good time at the wedding.”

I got to the church at exactly the same time as my father, right at one thirty. I was afraid that I was going to be late, but I found I was getting better at dressing as a girl. Sam's makeup lessons had come in handy, and I found that I had all the accessories I needed for the maroon dress.

"You look great, Myra," my dad said to me, giving me a hug as I stepped out of the car.

"Thanks, dad," I replied. I didn't actually feel great, though. This was the third time I had worn a skirt, but it was the first time I had worn something so formal and at the same time, well, sexy. As we walked to the church, I could feel every male eye turning in my direction. Now I knew how the Iraqi fighters must have felt during the Gulf War with every allied radar in the area zeroing in on them.

This was only the second time I had worn a really high heel. I was happy to see that whatever force had transformed me had given me the balance I needed to maneuver on them, although I did feel a little unstable. At least it had turned out to be a beautiful sunny day with a temperature in the forties, so the ice which might have been on the sidewalks the day before had substantially melted. I still had visions of how embarrassing it would be if I slipped while wearing these heels and landed on my cute little butt.

The service was beautiful. It was a word I would probably not have used in my old male body, but it was beautiful. All of the bridesmaids, my mother included, were gorgeous in their dark green dresses. My mother's brown hair contrasted well with the blonde and redhead who stood beside her. Danny's father looked resplendent in his dark tuxedo as did the other groomsmen. Uncomfortably, I found myself looking at the bridesmaids more to see how they did their hair or makeup. The groomsmen, I was beginning to look at as if trying to decide who was the best looking. Actually, the groom beat all of them.

Fortunately, these thoughts were interrupted by the grand music announcing the entry of the bride. Susan was incredible. For once, she had forsaken her glasses, and her long hair had been gently curled, to frame an absolutely perfect face. The look of joy and contentment she exhibited were breathtaking. She wore a long white gown which molded itself perfectly against the curves of her body. Her hand was curved gently around the arm of a proud-looking shade who was apparently her father.

I heard sniffles from some of the women around me. 'Why do so many women always cry at weddings?' I wondered, trying to ignore the moisture forming at the corners of my own eyes. I hoped no one noticed the little snuffle I made.

The reception was held in the community room of the church. I hung around with my parents, since I really didn't know anyone there until I spotted Danny. I made my way over to him and was rewarded with one of his bright smiles. "Sam's not here?" I asked.

"Nope. I don't think her folks even know the bride or groom. I notice Jack and his parents aren't here either."

"No," I replied. "I wouldn't know them if I saw them. I haven't met them. Jack has always been a very private person, even... well, even before our changes."

"I know," Danny observed. "I think there's something in his past that's made him this way, and even the transformation wasn't enough to change that. It's lucky that if one of you had to become a girl, it was you and not him."

I flushed at that. Was he accusing me of being effeminate or gay? I wasn't either, and how could he make that assumption anyway? He hadn't known me before. He saw the anger in my eyes and quickly said, "Look, Myra, don't misunderstand me. I didn't mean what you thought I meant. I'm part of the largest transformation the Judge has ever made. It took him three days to change us all, so we must have exhausted even his powers. I was part of a planeload of macho football players and their coaches on their way to a game. About half of us became girls of all ages, shapes and descriptions. Of the thirty guys who became female, six remembered who they were before. Five of them adjusted pretty well, but the sixth, well, she was a lot like Jack. She was a very private person, and now she's got a lot of psychological problems. That's all I meant."

I wondered who that person was. I didn't ask, though. I was beginning to understand the etiquette of Ovid. If someone was transformed and lost all memory of their previous life, it was all right to talk about the change, but if someone was still aware of who they had been before, it wasn't polite. It was a strange convention, but Ovid was a strange town.

Others drifted too close to our conversation, so we were forced to talk about more mundane things. As our respective parents found us, we went with them into the buffet line. I didn't see Danny after that. My parents accepted an invitation from some friends to go out to the Ovid Country Club for a couple of drinks. Since I had Mom's car, I told them I would be fine and walked in the house, exhausted, at a little after eight. The phone was ringing as I walked into the kitchen. It was Jack.

"You sound tired," he observed as I answered the phone.

"I am," I said truthfully.

He was silent for a moment, before asking, "Look, are you mad at me?"

"I'm not mad," I answered tersely. But I was. Was it because he was taking Mikki to the dance? Why else would I be mad? It was stupid of me, I knew, but there it was.

"You sound mad."

"I'm not!"

He sighed. "Okay, let me start over. I know you're disappointed that I'm taking Mikki to the dance, and..."

"I'm not disappointed," I lied. I'm surprised my nose didn't grow.

"Hear me out. I've decided to tell her I can't take her. I'd rather be with you."

My heart was suddenly beating faster, and I got one of those warm flashes in my crotch. This shouldn't have been important to me. I was physically a girl, but mentally, I wasn't, at least not entirely. All right, I realized I had a steady stream of female hormones running through my system. I also knew that men and women were wired differently. Every hour of every day, I was becoming more and more mentally the girl the Judge had made of me physically. I could accept that. What I was having trouble accepting was the obvious growing attachment I had to Jack. Someone once said lovers should be best friends first. Jack, or rather Brad, and I had been best friends. It just seemed so unnatural for this to be happening so quickly.

“Are you still there?” he asked, worried.

“I’m here. Look, Jack, I don’t want you to let Mikki down. It’s not fair to her.” What was I saying?

“But she’s really Mack,” he argued.

I responded, “No she isn’t, at least not in any way that counts. Maybe deep down there’s something of Mack left, but it’s not there where you or I can see it. I saw Bull today. He was very nice to me, and I don’t want to let him down, either. Let’s not make any changes right now. After the dance Friday, we can see how we both feel and go from there.”

“All right,” he agreed reluctantly. Then, after a pause, “Do you want to get together tonight?”

“Jack, I would,” I replied, “but I really am tired. This being a girl is hard work. I’m going to take a bath, put on a warm robe, and read until I fall asleep.”

“Okay,” he said, obviously disappointed. “Say, how about church?”

Church? I didn’t even know he went to church. He didn’t seem the type.

“Well... okay.”

“Great! I’ll see you at nine thirty. Church is at ten. Good night.”

That sly dog. He had already looked up church times. Well, maybe I could use a little religion, too. It was ironic, though, I thought as I started getting ready for bed, Sunday would make the fourth day in a row that I had needed to wear a skirt. I vowed that I was going to wear nothing but jeans on Monday even if I was invited to a White House dinner.

I had surprised myself by not accepting Jack's invitation to the dance. Obviously, I would have rather gone with him. It was just that Bull seemed to be trying to improve his behavior toward me, and I was concerned at what might happen if I broke our date. Concerned? Yes, and a little frightened, too. I had seen two sides of Bull. I didn't want to do anything which might bring the bad side back.

Sunday morning, I got up cheerful and well rested. It was another beautiful day, and I was actually looking forward to going out with Jack. It would really be the first time we went out by ourselves. I wasn't sure where I wanted our relationship to go, but I knew I felt a lot better when we were in each other's good graces. I dressed quickly in a tan sweater and brown skirt. I did wear hose since the thought of braving a winter day with bare legs was too much to think about, but I also wore a pair of brown flats instead of heels. I was somehow pleased to note how good my legs looked, even in flats.

Mom and Dad were casually reading the paper when I got to the kitchen. From their robes, I realized they had no intention of going to church. That was fine with me. I wanted just to be with Jack. They both seemed pleased that I was going to church, and doubly pleased that I was going with Jack. It turned out that dad knew Jack's father since they both worked for Vulman Industries. He said he didn't know him well, though.

Jack picked me up at exactly nine thirty. "Hi," he said with a shy smile when I slid into the car. I smiled back at him. I might have only been a girl for a few days, but I thought I could tell some definite interest on his part. I hoped it was only friendship, because I wasn't ready for anything more. Or at least, I didn't think I was.

We chatted casually on the way to church, never mentioning our situation until we reached the church parking lot. Then, Jack said, "It seems ironic to be going to church here when the go... g..."

“Are you all right?” I asked. It sounded as if he was choking.

“I’m fine,” he gasped. “I just was musing and forgot about the taboo.”

“Which one?” I asked dryly. “There are so many.”

“The one on discussing the origins of our founders,” he replied, breathing normally at last.

I thought about what he had started to say. What was ironic about...? Then it struck me. He had figured out who the town’s founders were. Given his statement, that meant... okay, so they were gods of some sort. That didn’t help me. I had a bigger problem. I had to keep two boys at bay, and I liked one of them as a friend and hadn’t formed a final opinion of the other one. Besides, so what if the Judge was Zeus or Odin or something? Was he going to wave his magic wand and help me with my problems? I didn’t think so.

I hadn’t been in a regular church service since I was a kid. I actually found it was a lot of fun, particularly after I learned that I had a fine soprano singing voice. After church, we found a little coffee shop a couple of blocks from the church and decided to try it. It wasn’t Starbucks, but it was decent.

After a little discussion on the church service, Jack looked up at me over his coffee and said, “You know, I was serious about dumping Mikki and taking you to the dance. Mikki and I don’t have anything in common, and I just can’t get past who she used to be.”

“Jack,” I protested, “we’ve been all through this before. Mikki may have been Mack, but she isn’t him now. It’s the same with Bear now that he’s Bull. They’re different people. They don’t even remember Brad and Marty; they only know Jack and Myra. I think that’s why so many of the people here who do remember who they were don’t want to talk about it. It’s like carrying around someone else’s baggage. You can’t use it, but it weighs you down.”

Jack frowned. “Do you mean to tell me you could honestly have a relationship with Bull or Bear or whoever he thinks he is?”

I shook my head. “No, Jack, I couldn’t. I don’t think I could have a relationship, as you put it, with any guy right now. I mean, three days ago, I was still a guy myself. It still seems a little... queer."

Jack put his hand over mine. I wasn't sure how I felt about that. Then, he said, "Look, first of all, you aren't a guy anymore. You don't look like a guy and I don't even believe you can think like a guy anymore. I've watched you grow more and more like girls I've known with every passing hour. You don't curse much anymore. Your dress and makeup are feminine, even when you're wearing jeans. The way you walk and talk..."

"All right already!" I interrupted, pulling back my hand and motioning for him to stop.

"Even the way you're holding your hand and fingers now."

I dropped my hand and balled it into a small fist.

"Look, Myra, you're a girl."

"You think I don't know that?"

"And I'm a boy."

"Is this where we start the 'Me Tarzan, you Jane' nonsense?"

He slumped in his chair. "I'm making a big mess of this."

Maybe he was right. The old Marty might have moved in for the kill, but not Myra. I looked at him with compassion. "Jack, I know. This is difficult for both of us. We just need to take it slowly. The dance is coming between our friendship. You need to go with Mikki, and I need to go with Bull. We'll laugh and we'll dance, that is, if I can figure out how to dance backward on the slow ones, and then we'll try to sort everything out later. Maybe by the time all the female hormones kick in on me, I'll be some little teenybopper mooning over Leonardo DiCaprio."

We both smiled at my joke. He took me home after that. I don't think either of us were still sure of what we wanted or how to proceed, but at least we were still friends.

I had forgotten how much time teenage girls spent on the phone. I had decided to use the rest of Sunday to catch up on schoolwork. Since I had been away from school so long, it was going to take some effort to get back up to speed. But the phone seemed to ring constantly. Bull's call was the shortest. He called to tell me his therapy had gone well and he would be home shortly, so I could plan on a ride to school Monday.

Then Mikki called to give me the same information. She had visited Bull earlier in the day. Then she wanted to talk about everything. I didn't have a clue about half the things she was talking about. Who was dating who, who was screwing who, who was the hottest new young actor, who was the singer with the biggest bulge in his pants, and so on. I honestly believe it was the most long-winded, boring conversation I have ever endured. I practically needed a bimbo-to-English dictionary.

At last, I got rid of her and settled in to study Chemistry, which I was sure would be my most difficult subject. I had only been studying for about twenty minutes when Sam called. I was going to impatiently cut Sam off, but as we talked for a few minutes, I found I really enjoyed talking with her. She began to fill me in on events at school as Mikki had done, but her information consisted of things I could use. She told me about our teachers, what they were like and which of the real ones remembered who they had been. As it turned out, only Mr. Flannery, the Principal, and Ms. Torrance, the Biology teacher, had any memory of their previous lives, and they didn't discuss them with Sam. It turned out that only about a hundred or so of the students and teachers at Ovid High were real, and of that, I could expect only a couple of dozen would remember who they had been.

Sam and I talked nearly as long as Mikki and I had talked, but I found I wanted to keep on talking to Sam. I invited her over to study after dinner, and she accepted.

I took a break from studying about an hour before dinner and decided to read until it was time to help Mom with dinner. No one had told me that I would have to help, but I was certain that as a girl, I would be expected to help with dinner. I picked up a paperback book with an action-adventure picture on the cover. I had always liked adventure novels for light reading. A few pages into it, though, I realized it was a romantic adventure, taken from the viewpoint of a young college coed who happened upon a spy ring. The hero of the book was a James Bond Junior type who, of course, was smitten by the coed. It was a book I would have thrown away a few days before, but I found myself engrossed in it, much the way as a young boy, I had devoured superhero comic books.

As expected, I helped Mom with dinner. I was actually learning a few things about cooking that as a bachelor I had never known. It was actually entertaining and creative. Of course, it helped that Mom was a good cook.

Dad cleaned up after dinner, so I was already free when Sam rang the doorbell. She gave me a girlish hug and practically led me upstairs to my room. Before we studied, there was apparently going to be some girl talk. Oh, if our real parents could have seen us now, I thought.

“So I hear you’re going to the dance with Bull,” she said when we were in my room.

“News travels fast.”

She sat down on my bed. “Can you tell me why?”

“I thought you said Bull wasn’t Bear. Why shouldn’t I go with him?”

“Well,” Sam began, “in the first place, he may not be the same. I didn’t know him as Bear, but I do know him as Bull. He’s a pompous ass. He thinks every woman should kneel down before him and unzip his fly. Second, he’s not very smart, and third, Jack is really hot for you.”

I was ready to refute the first reason. Bull had given me his promise that he would behave. As for the second, he was no Einstein—I realized that—but he was smart enough to apologize. Besides, I wasn’t looking for a lifelong commitment from him. I was just honoring a promise Myra made before I arrived to go to the dance with him. After that, well, we’d see. I didn’t think he was going to be the right guy for me. Maybe no guy was. Maybe I’d be a lesbian and ask Sam out. That would be interesting.

The third reason, though, caught me napping. “Why do you think Jack is hot for me?”

Sam sighed, “Oh come now, Myra, I know you’re new at being a girl, but you aren’t blind. Can’t you see the way he looks at you? Don’t you notice the way he tries to be near you and even protect you? Do you think he’s going to give you an engraved invitation to a relationship. Think about when you were male. How did you act around a girl you liked?”

There had to be a time to admit the truth, not just to Sam but to myself. That time had arrived. “I never really liked a girl that way.”

Now it was Sam’s turn to be stunned. “You weren’t gay, were you?”

“Good lord no!” I laughed. “I probably had more pus—that is, sex—than most guys you’ve ever known, but it was just... sex. It wasn’t love; it wasn’t even like... It was ‘getting my rocks off.’ Of course, that’s when I still had rocks.”

“You were an emotional cripple,” she said softly.

“That smacks of pop psychology,” I told her.

“Were you close to your family?”

I shook my head. “No, I wasn’t. We were poor, and my parents came home tired to a house full of kids every night. They didn’t care about us, and we didn’t care about them, or each other for that matter. We pretty much raised ourselves. I haven’t talked to anyone in my family in years.”

“So you weren’t close to the girls you dated either.”

“No,” I admitted. “They were just grist for the old penis mill. They were fun while they lasted. Does that shock you?”

“I don’t think it does,” she said, surprising me now. “Look, Myra, everybody in Ovid is who they are for a reason. I assume you’ve figured out who created Ovid by now.”

“I think so.”

“Well, then you can imagine that the... agency behind Ovid probably doesn't think quite the same way we do. Humans think in a pretty straightforward way. If a rapist comes to Ovid, a human would turn him into a woman to give him a little of his own medicine. A human might even make sure he was raped so he'd really know how the other half lives. The powers that be might see it differently, though. They're just as likely to change the rapist into a raped girl's mother, and let her experience as a parent the anguish their daughter is going through. The concept seems to be justice, but something else as well. Some might call it mercy, but to others, it might just be irony.”

“So what is the reason I've joined the Sit-Down-to-Pee Club?” I asked, not sure where she was going.

Sam smiled, “Well, if I had to make a guess, I would say part of the reason is that you needed to be changed into a more emotional being if you were ever going to succeed in life. You've never told me what you did in the outside world.”

“I guess not,” I realized. “I was a road maintenance worker for the state. I dug ditches, filled potholes, and fun stuff like that.”

“And in spite of the fact that you are obviously bright, you had a poor education and no personal life to speak of and no future, am I right?”

“That pretty much sums it up,” I admitted, sitting down on the bed beside her.

“Did you ever stop to think that maybe one of the reasons you had the life you did was that you couldn't ever get close to people? You had no one to be proud of you, or to trust you, or to love you.”

I thought what I did next would surprise Sam. It didn't, but it did surprise me. I burst into tears. I suddenly felt her arm around my shoulders, holding onto me while my body heaved with sobs. She didn't try to talk to me; she just held me. I wouldn't have thought I had so many tears in me. I was embarrassed and hoped that my parents couldn't hear me. How could I explain it to them? Mom, Dad, I'm crying because I never had a life before when I was a guy, but now as a girl, I have friends, and two boys who want me to be their girl and loving parents. And, oh, by the way, a bunch of ancient gods did this, and Mom isn't even real.

When the sobs became mere whimpers, I looked at Sam and said, "I'm so embarrassed."

She smiled and shook her head. "Don't be, honey. I think you just realized how much the world has changed for you. Things can be a lot better this time around. All you need to do is be a girl."

Sam helped me fix my makeup. My crying had left it with clownish streaks. Then, we talked for awhile—just girl talk, I guess. Finally, we went downstairs to the kitchen and actually studied. We hugged again at the end of the evening like the old friends we were supposed to be.

As I got ready for bed, I reflected on what I had learned. I had learned that I held my future in my own dainty hands. Actually, for the first time in years, I really had a future. So I had to be a girl to get that future. Sam was managing just fine, and so could I, I realized as sleep claimed me.

On Monday, I made good on my promise to wear jeans no matter what. I was pleased that Bull made no comment on them as well. He was a perfect gentleman as he drove Jack, Mikki and I to school. He was a changed man. Well, he was transformed, of course, but I mean he had changed his attitude. He was polite, joked around, and seemed genuinely concerned about whatever I wanted. I thought he would be my slave if I asked him to.

School went well also. English class gave me the opportunity to show off my knowledge of Shakespeare, and I aced a pop quiz in Algebra. My crowning achievement was the A I got on the History exam. It was the highest grade in the class, according to Ms. Samson, who seemed to be at a loss to understand how Myra Smithwick, a known bimbo, could have possibly known anything about the Civil War that didn't involve the length of General Grant's penis.

The day went quickly, and before I knew it, Bull was dropping me off at my house. He gave me a chaste kiss and cheerfully waved. I had to admit, he was changing a lot. Could I be his girl friend? I still didn't think so, but it had at least risen above an impossible rating to a highly improbable one.

When I got home, my parents were extremely proud of me when I told them about my History grade. After dinner, Mom told me, "Myra, your father and I are so pleased with the way you've buckled down in school that we've decided to let you have that dress you wanted for the Christmas dance after all."

I smiled. "Gee, that's great, Mom!" I told her, even though I didn't have any idea what dress she was talking about.

"Why don't you come by the office after school tomorrow. We'll go over to March's and get it."

"Okay," I agreed. Inwardly, though, I was concerned. My tastes in clothes and the original Myra's were probably very different. I could imagine that my namesake had chosen a dress that appeared to be spray-painted on. But what the heck. I realized I probably had a closet full of dresses like that. At least, I would have some say in what I bought to wear this time.

Tuesday went by quickly and without incident. Bull continued to be a gentleman. I tried to make conversation with Mikki, but we were rapidly growing apart. She was the poster child for Bimbos of America and I was quickly developing the reputation of a serious student. Sam and I were drifting together more and more. She was starting to introduce me to her friends. Since they were all either shades or girls who couldn't remember their previous lives, I was becoming more and more immersed in 'girl talk.' You know what they say. If it walks like a duck and talks like a duck, it must be a duck. Substitute 'girl' for 'duck' and you have the story of my new life.

Jack and I remained friends. We rode to and from school together, but Jack always rode with Mikki, so we didn't talk much. In class, we would say a few words to each other, but Jack was becoming a little distant. If Sam was right about Jack 'having the hots for me,' he was hiding it very well. It was probably just as well, though. After my date with Bull on Friday, I planned to swear off dating until I could decide who I was.

Trying to be interested in boys was really the hardest thing for me to manage in my new life. I had all the right equipment to be interested in them, and an endless stream of female hormones were having constant influence on my mind, but intellectually, it seemed all wrong. I could no more think about serious sex with any guy any more than I could have considered it when I was Marty. I knew that would change, though. Already, I could tell who the hunks were. If I let myself go, I found myself sneaking a peek at some guy's tight butt or his broad chest. A boyish grin from one of them would elicit a coy smile from me. I began to feel odd warm tingles from parts of my body I had otherwise come to accept as part of my new female anatomy. Time would tell.

Tuesday was a bleak, dreary day in Ovid. The sun was absent all day, and it was spitting flakes of snow when Bull dropped me off at Mom's office. I had no trouble finding it. It was a small office over a bank building. I had expected Mom to be at the front desk, but there was no one there when I looked in. There was someone in the inner office, though, which I assumed to be Susan's. I was surprised to see Susan at her desk reviewing a document.

"Myra!" she said, looking up with a smile. "Your mother is running an errand for me. She'll be back in a few minutes. It's good to see you again."

"I thought you'd be on your honeymoon," I said, taking a seat she motioned me to.

"Not for a few more days. We leave for Hawaii a couple of days before Christmas. Steven had to finish out the semester before we could go, and I had to clear my calendar as well. So how is girlhood?"

"Not as bad as I had expected," I admitted. "In fact, I think I could get to like it. I don't know about... well, you know."

"Sex?"

“Yes. It’s a little hard to think about having something inside me.”

“I think you’ll get used to the idea,” Susan said, leaning back in her chair. “You’re just sixteen. I understand a lot of girls have a problem with it when they’re your age.”

“Did you?” I asked.

Susan gave me a wry grin. “Let’s just say I was a little older than sixteen before I had sex with a man.”

“I think I will be, too. I mean, the shade that was Myra messed around. I’m pretty sure of that, but I don’t have time for that this time around. I’m determined to make something of myself. It would be a little hard for me to get a job digging ditches in this body.”

“Yes it would,” she admitted. “Fortunately, you’re really very bright. Have you given any thought to what you want to be after school?”

“Well,” I ventured, “I might want to try law school.”

Susan mulled that one over for a moment. Then, she said, “You know, I think you might be a good lawyer. I’ll tell you what. Check with me next spring. If my practice picks up—and I think it will—I might be able to arrange a part-time summer job for you.”

I beamed, “I’d like that very much.”

“Like what?” my mother called from the outer office.

“I was just telling Myra we might be able to use her in the office over the summer,” Susan explained.

I could see Mom was very proud. As we braved the winter cold on the short walk to March’s Department Store, Mom told me, “Susan is a very good attorney. I really don’t even know why she stays in Ovid. She could be a big city lawyer if she wanted to be. She must have studied a lot of criminal law in school, because she knows it cold, yet there are seldom any criminal cases in Ovid.”

“I’ll bet she knew it cold,” I thought. I wondered if she had been a criminal lawyer before she came to Ovid.

“And the fact that she’s thinking about taking you on for summer work is a credit to you,” she went on. “She doesn’t suffer fools.”

“I think it’s because I talked to her about becoming an attorney,” I explained.

“Is that what you want to do?”

“I don’t know,” I said honestly. “Susan thinks I would be a good attorney. Maybe I’ll go to law school and come back here and be her partner. Then my mother would be my secretary.”

Mom laughed, “That might be fun and it might not.”

I laughed, too.

I’ve seen sporting goods stores that were bigger than March’s Department Store, but it was the biggest and finest retail establishment in Ovid. The store was three stories tall and took up about a quarter of a block, so it was probably ample for a town the size of Ovid. Still, I wondered what these people would think of a Dillard’s like they had in Oklahoma City or Tulsa. Even Muskogee where I had lived had bigger stores. In spite of its small size, the entire second floor was devoted to women’s clothing. How did women ever decide what to buy? There were dresses, tops, skirts, and pants of every possible size, color and description. Thank god I had a full closet of clothes at home, for I don’t think I could ever decide what to buy given the vast array of merchandise. As a man, all I had to do is choose from jeans or about four colors and styles of casual pants. Then for a shirt, it was usually plain, striped or plaid in a few colors. Shoes? Brown, black or tennis shoes. But women could shop all day and never look at the same style of shoes twice. No wonder women had such a reputation of being professional shoppers. With the variety available to them—us now, I suppose—it could take forever to find what you needed.

There was an entire section of what I supposed could be called party dresses. They were all short and revealing. I remembered an old girlfriend of mine telling me that every girl needed a basic black cocktail dress. Here they were, only they weren’t all black.

“Now which one was it you said you wanted?” Mom said.

I gulped. I didn’t have the foggiest idea which dress Myra had wanted. Whichever one it was, I was certain it would have been the one with the shortest hemline that showed off the most cleavage.

“This one would look darling on her,” a musical woman’s voice said from behind us.

I turned to face an unbelievably beautiful woman. She was the kind of woman men would kill just to be in the same room with. Her eyes were the bluest blue I have ever seen, and her hair was a rich gold. Her skin was absolutely flawless, and every inch of her fantastically proportioned body was firm and feminine. She was wearing a very stylish dark blue dress that, although tight, was as perfect for her figure as anything could be. A name tag identified her as Vera March, but again, as with the Judge and a couple of others I had seen in Ovid, she had a presence about her that led me to believe that if the others were gods, so was she.

She held in her flawless hands a red dress. Actually, red didn’t do it justice. It was a dark, rich metallic red that shimmered in the lights. It was short and from the cut, I was sure it would show too much cleavage, but I was somehow drawn to it. She was right. I would look good in it. In fact, I would look fantastic in it. Involuntarily, I touched the fabric. Despite its metallic sheen, it was soft and warm to the touch.

“What do you think?” she asked in a voice that was so soothing and mellow, it bordered on being hypnotic.

“I think it’s scrumptious,” I replied. Now why had I used that word? I don’t think I had ever used that word in my life.

“Why don’t you try it on?” she asked.

I had to try it on. Everything else in the store had disappeared from view, and I could only see the dress. I was drawn to it like a magnet. Without a word, I took it and walked as if in a dream to the nearest dressing room. As I was disrobing, Mom knocked on the door. When I opened it, she handed me a package of pantyhose and a pair of red sandals with a three-inch heel. "Vera said to try these on," she told me. "She said she was sure they would fit."

I did as she asked. When I looked in the dressing room mirror, the result was nothing short of fantastic. If I had still been my old male self, I would have done anything to please the girl I saw in the mirror. I pressed my hands along my sides, thrilling to the feel of every feminine curve. In retrospect, I know I was under a very powerful spell, presumably placed on me by Vera March, but at the time, the feelings seemed perfectly natural.

I stepped out of the dressing room, feeling more sensitively than ever before the sway of my hips and the controlled bounce of my breasts. Vera March smiled a very satisfied smile, and my mother appeared stunned by what she saw.

"What do you think of it?" Vera asked my mother.

"I... I don't know what to think," she replied honestly. "Don't you think it's, well..."

"Perfect?"

"No... yes! Yes, that's it. Myra, it just looks perfect on you," Mom said decisively.

I smiled. I thought so, too.

We ended up buying the dress, shoes, and a necklace and earrings to go with it. With Vera's influence, I was one very happy girl.

The rest of the week became routine. I was beginning to establish myself as one of the top students in my class. My social life suffered, I knew. I studied every night and took advantage of every study hall period. Bull seemed very understanding. He continued to play the gentleman. Wednesday became Thursday, and I aced a Chemistry quiz. Now, I was carrying an A average on every paper and quiz I had done as Myra, with the exception of Algebra. Even there, I had strong B's.

One minor revelation occurred on Thursday. I was in the school library doing research for a Government paper when I ran across a book on Greek and Roman mythology. I had never been very interested in the subject, but given my experience in Ovid, I scanned the book. I began to realize that the Judge had to be Jupiter, not Zeus, who was apparently the Greek version of Jupiter. Dr. Miner I suspected must be Minerva, and Vera March was a good candidate for Venus. Big deal, I thought. I didn't figure I would have to worry about them again. The damage, if you wanted to call it that, was already done to me. Then, I remembered the feelings I had experienced while trying on the new dress. Maybe the gods weren't finished with me yet. I would have to be careful.

Friday went by too quickly. I must have been the only girl in Ovid High who wasn't counting the minutes until the Christmas dance. I was starting to have severe second thoughts. I suspected the dress I had been maneuvered into buying would be far more revealing than my unspelled mind could handle. I also wondered about Bull. His old aggression seemed to be slowly returning. He had actually leered at me when I got in the car that morning. At least my efforts in school were continuing to pay off, and I immersed myself in my classes to try to get my mind off the dance.

After classes, Bull dropped Jack and Mikki off, then took me home. Parked in front of my house in the dying December afternoon, he put his arm around me with more authority than he had dared all week. He pulled me to him, and before I could stop him, kissed me gently but firmly. It wasn't as bad as it had been right after my transformation, but it wasn't that enjoyable, either. I managed to slip gently away without offending him. He gave me a wide grin and said, "I'm looking forward to tonight, babe. I'll pick you up at seven."

"Okay," I managed to reply softly. I just wasn't looking forward to an evening with Bull.

As I scrambled up to my room, I seriously considered faking an illness for the evening. The thought of wearing the sexy dress I had been spelled into buying and dancing with Bull all evening, meant I was starting to get a little stage fright. I wasn't ready to do this. It was going to be like a stage performance, so stage fright was probably the right expression for it. And now, ladies and gentleman, Ovid is proud to present Marty Blackstone in the starring role of Myra Smithwick. It was a terrifying thought.

Mom had come home from work a little early and fixed me a quick dinner. Then, she hustled me off to my room. "I need to do something with your hair," she told me. "Go ahead and get into the lingerie you plan to wear and we'll get you ready."

When I was in the dark red bra and panties I had decided matched the dress, Mom began working on my hair. It was so long and full to begin with that I could actually feel its weight as she shifted it around. She was as nimble with hair pins and hairspray as she was with a word processor at work. I got the feeling she was a frustrated stylist. "There!" she said finally.

I looked in my mirror. She had done an incredible job. Most of my hair had been piled up on top of my head, with little wisps of hair running down my neck and around my ears. The effect was very elegant. I would look great when I got my dress on.

Mom helped me get dressed, pulling the dress over my head so as not to disturb her work. She even made a couple of makeup suggestions, although I was getting pretty adept in that department myself. It all came together, the pantyhose, shoes, purse, and jewelry until a girl who would have given Cinderella some real competition stood in front of the mirror.

"Let's go show your father," Mom said. Dad had come home while I was still getting dressed. "You look absolutely beautiful. I only wish you weren't going with Bull."

So did I, but for some reason, I replied with the answer teenage girls had probably used forever. "Mom, it's just a dance. I'm not going to marry him." Indeed, I was not. If I could pull it off, I wouldn't even be dating him after the dance.

"I know," she sighed, "but I worry when you're with him. He seems so... aggressive."

Didn't I just know it? Well, at least he had been under control for the last few days.

Dad thought I looked great, too. He pulled out a small flash camera and made me pose. I did my best, although I wasn't sure I wanted a permanent record of me in that dress. It looked as if my boobs and ass were going to be out there for everyone to see if I just twitched in the wrong direction.

Bull arrived at exactly seven. He had gone all out, in a stylish gray herringbone sport coat and a subdued, tasteful tie. The only problem was that he was so big that even a well-tailored outfit tended to look a little out of place on him. He looked like one of those huge bodyguards you always see in pictures protecting movie stars or other famous people. He had bought me an absolutely lovely corsage, but I could tell he was a little disappointed when my mother grabbed it to pin it to my ample bosom instead of letting him pin it on me. Thanks, Mom.

Bull escorted me to the car. I noticed we were alone. "Aren't Mikki and Jack going with us?" I asked.

"Not tonight, babe," Bull said pleasantly. "It's just you and me."

Somehow, that was not a comforting thought. Bull had been a perfect gentleman all week, but I was starting to see signs that his conduct was threatening to slip back into the old pattern I had experienced right after my transformation. He was starting to strut around me again and call me 'babe.' All I could do, though, was to try to get through the evening. Maybe I would talk him into sitting with Jack and Mikki.

I started thinking about Jack. I hadn't seen much of him all week. Mikki had monopolized most of his time, so the only time I saw much of him was in the car to and from school. He didn't have much to say during those times. He honestly didn't seem very happy, but maybe he was just in a pensive mood. I found myself wishing it were Jack taking me to the dance instead of Bull. Jack was a friend while Bull... well, Bull was a predator and I was the prey.

We left our coats at the temporary coat check in the hall outside the gym. Once I had taken off my coat, I felt positively naked. I looked down at myself and could see the swell of my breasts and the narrow canyon in between them. I was sure every boy in the school would be looking lustfully at them all evening. Of course, they might be looking at my slim legs, covered in smooth nylon, just hoping that I might forget myself bend over or not cross my legs in a ladylike fashion.

Either way, I felt very vulnerable. Maybe that's why girls seek the company of one strong boy. Maybe they're just hoping he will keep the other boys away. Was that why I was with Bull? I don't exactly mean me, but rather the original Myra. It was possible that this buxom girl got so tired of the wolves circling that she agreed to start dating Bull just so she would have someone to keep them away. Then, the solution turned worse than the problem. Bull had become an aggressive, possessive nightmare. Maybe the original Myra was too frightened not to do what he said. Maybe I was, too.

I had a sister who dated a guy like Bull. Come to think of it, that was the sister who had told my real mother that she was just dating the guy, not marrying him. And now I had said the same thing to my new mother. Of course, three months later, the guy my sister had been dating knocked her up. Was that what was going to happen to me? Not if I could help it, of course. The problem was, could I help it?

I didn't want any part of sex with Bull, or any other guy for that matter. Since I was almost certainly going to be a girl for the rest of my life, I knew I would have to face that some day. Either that or be a lesbian, and frankly, girls didn't look that good to me in that way anymore. But what if Bull forced the issue? What could I do? He was big and strong. For that matter, he was persuasive, too, and charming when he wanted to be. I used to think girls were real saps to fall for some smooth talker's lines. Hadn't that happened to me? How else could I have ended up at a dance with him?

At least, there was a crowd, so Bull would be limited in what he could do. The gym was filled with students, all in their dress-up best. They were all drinking punch, eating, talking in groups, or dancing to the CDs one of the younger teachers was selecting.

I spotted Mikki and Jack and pulled Bull in their direction. Mikki was wearing something even more revealing than I was. It was white and sparkled so you could pick her out in a crowd from a hundred yards away. Jack looked sensational in a navy blue blazer and gray slacks. He looked very preppy, a far cry from his usual drab wardrobe covered by a letter jacket. Again, I had this sudden wish that I could be Jack's date.

"You look great, Bull!" Mikki squealed. "You look like you're gonna just bust right out of that coat." To emphasize the point, she leaned over just enough to let him look down her dress while she squeezed his biceps.

"You look fantastic," Jack said quietly to me.

I actually blushed and fumbled in reply, "So do you. I mean, you look great."

We smiled nervously at each other.

The evening progressed innocently enough. With no drugs available in Ovid, the dance looked more like something out of Grease than I would have thought possible. And here I was, Olivia Newton John, right down to my blonde hair and sweet smile. A few of the guys looked as if they were sneaking out for a quick drink, though. Bull managed to join them more than a couple of times. That was all right with me, though. That gave me a little time to recover from Bull's clumsy dancing and increasingly lewd remarks. There was even one time when Mikki had joined some of her bubble headed friends in the ladies' room, leaving me alone for a few minutes with Jack, since Bull had slipped outside for another belt of what smelled like bourbon.

"Are you having a good time?" Jack asked me.

"Not really," I told him with a sigh.

"Me neither," he said with a sigh even more obvious than mine.

I looked at him. "I thought you and Mikki got along okay."

"We do," Jack agreed. "It's just that she's not really my type."

"Who is your type?" I asked coyly. Now what had made me say that?

I felt a hand barely touch my narrow waist. "You are," he said.

My heart leaped and my stomach dropped at the same time. I didn't want to be interested in any boy. I had made that very clear to myself. Yet here I was, actually glad that Jack like me. Sam had been right. Was this the way it started? I supposed it was. First, you find a guy who you sort of like, a guy who won't paw you to death the moment you say something to him other than "get lost." Then, you learn to talk to him. You find you have a lot in common. Then, you agree to go out with him and find out if you really like the same things. Then... well, then you have some decisions to make—big decisions—the kind of decisions which could affect the rest of your life. Was that going to happen now? It certainly wasn't going to happen with Bull. We had nothing in common. But Jack was another matter.

Fortunately, before I could reply, Mikki came back and Bull wasn't far behind her. We all talked together for a few minutes, although Mikki did most of the talking. I held up my end of the conversation, but Bull and Jack mostly grunted or replied in monosyllabic words. Was there a tension developing between Bull and Jack? I hoped not. Although Jack had become a guy who looked to be in good shape, Bull had become a powerhouse. He looked as if he could handle any guy in the room, Jack included, and not even break a sweat.

Eventually, we drifted apart. Bull took me out for a slow dance. I kept trying to dance apart from him a little as he kept trying to crush me against his crotch where he obviously wanted me to be aware of his formidable hard on. When the music stopped, he said, "Come on, I need a little air."

We walked out of the gym and strolled down the hall. It was too cold to go outside, so we were obviously just going to stay in the school. Suddenly, he reached over to the door to Ms. Samson's room. I was surprised to see he had a key. "I lifted it off her desk yesterday," he explained as the door clicked open. Then, without any warning, he pulled me inside the classroom, closing the door behind him.

"At last, we've got a little privacy," he murmured to me as he wrapped a beefy arm around my waist and pulled my lips up to his face. In the faint light coming through the frosted glass in the door, I could see the look, not of a lover, but of a predator.

Desperately, I tried to pull away from him, but my struggles just caused him to hold me tighter. I held my lips grimly together while he probed at them with his tongue.

"Come on, babe," he pleaded, but there was a menace in his plea.

"You know you want me. Quit the hard-to-get routine. It's getting old."

"I don't want you," I replied, my already high voice almost squeaking in terror. His Mr. Nice Guy act was over. Bull was reverting to true form. He planned to have me whether I wanted him or not. I tried again to push him away, but my feminine strength was no match for him. I doubted if few men could fight him off, either.

"Look," he said, his voice becoming harder as he pushed me against a wall, "I've had about enough of your prick teasing. I was good enough for you before last week. Now for some reason, you seem to think you're too good for me. Well, listen, bitch, nobody died and made you Queen of England. You're my girl and you'll do what I tell you to do."

Before I could protest, he forced me to my knees. I had a sudden hysterical thought that I hadn't had time to tug my dress down and stood a good chance of getting a run in my pantyhose. What a complete female I had become. Here I was, in severe danger of being raped, and all I could think of was how my clothes looked.

Now, I was eye level with his crotch. He held my head in place with one hand, and when I experimentally tried to move it to one side, he forced it back straight so I was forced to watch as he unzipped his fly and pulled out his hard penis. As a male, I had seen plenty of dicks in my high school gym, but I had never seen one like this. It was huge and it was menacing. I could even detect a faint odor of musk. I could see every veined line in its considerable length. I had no doubt as to where he intended to put that thing, and I clamped my jaw as tightly as I could.

"Listen, you fucking cunt!" he roared, grabbing me painfully by the arm as his other meaty hand tried to push my cheeks hard enough to force my lips open. "You either open up now and take this like the whore you are, or I'll break your arm."

I don't know if I would have done it or not. I was most certainly frightened enough. I could feel my gums hurting as he applied pressure to them. His penis was only inches from my mouth. Should I take it and then bite it? I wondered. No, I told myself. If I did that, his rage would be even worse. I wouldn't be able to bite it off, and in his pain and rage, he would probably kill me. Fortunately, I'll never know what might have happened, because a familiar voice suddenly ordered, "Get away from her, goddamn you!"

The classroom door was suddenly open, and silhouetted in the brilliant hall light was Jack. Even against the light, I could see the rage in his eyes. From down the hall, I could hear Mikki screaming, "What's happening?" as her heels clicked on the hall floor.

Bull pushed me to the floor, knocking my head against the wall. I groaned, but managed to stay conscious. Now the back of my head, my jaw, and my arm all hurt, and I realized I had twisted my ankle a little when Bull had forced me to the floor.

Bull pushed his penis back into his pants, but didn't bother to zip up. He glowered at Jack and warned menacingly, "Look, Paris, if you know what's good for you, you'll walk away."

"Out here, Bull," Jack growled, backing into the hall. "I want you out here."

"So you can run, you pussy?" Bull didn't move.

"Are you afraid?" Jack asked slyly. What was he doing? I wondered. Jack was in good shape. Anyone could see that, but he was no match for Bull. Bull had at least fifty pounds on him. Plus, his conditioning for football and wrestling meant he was in terrific shape. Jack was being very brave, but in the mood Bull was in, Jack could end up very dead.

It was the wrong thing to say to him. Bull stripped off his jacket and threw it carelessly on the floor at my feet. His tie followed. With a killing anger in his eyes, he stepped out into the hallway to confront

Jack.

To my amazement, Jack was completely calm. He had his fists clenched in a protective posture before his face. I had never seen Jack—or Brad—box, but he appeared to know what he was doing.

Bull wasn't impressed, though. He actually laughed at his former friend. "What? You think we're going to box like gentlemen? I'm gonna bust your ass, Paris."

Several of the attendees at the dance had heard the commotion and were running down the hall to watch. I managed to get shakily to my feet and step out into the hall. I nearly fell, a combination of the ordeal I had just been through and my unfamiliarity with heels that high. As I began to slip to the floor, Sam caught me. "Myra, are you okay?"

"I'll make it," I told her with a sob in my voice. "We've got to stop them!"

Sam shook her head. "Look at them. I don't think anyone can stop them."

She was right. They were both spring-loaded and ready to jump at each other's throat. There was Jack, fairly slim and agile against Bull, who looked like a mountain ready to collide with him. At last, Bull could wait no longer. He lunged at Jack like a rock launched from a catapult. I expected to see them both fall to the ground, Bull on top, but it didn't happen. At the last second, Jack neatly sidestepped Bull. I could imagine Bull dropping to the floor, rolling, and getting up to attack again. He wouldn't miss a second time.

Instead, I watched in wonder as Jack's leg shot out like lightning as Bull passed, his foot catching him in the side, just below the ribs. Bull howled in pain and dropped to the ground. He was up quickly though. "You're gonna pay for that!" he yelled. "I'm gonna kick your balls now!"

It was eerie, but Jack didn't say a word. He just continued to dance gracefully in front of Bull, his fists still in a defensive posture. Bull charged again, but this time, he adjusted his course at the last second, heading directly for Jack. But before he could reach him, the foot jumped out again, higher than I would have thought possible catching Bull in the chin. As Bull was rocked back by the kick, Jack struck him in the gut with four quick blows from his fists. Then, as Bull reeled unsteadily, Jack spun completely around, his leg extended, aimed directly for Bull's chest. At the last instant, his foot seemed to veer slightly, catching Bull high on the shoulder instead of dead center on the chest. It was too much for Bull. He dropped with a thud to the floor, completely spent.

The silence that had accompanied the bout ended with a roar of appreciation. Jack had done what no one in the school had imagined was even possible. He had laid Bull out. Other boys were slapping him on the back and shaking his hand. Sam held me as I cried gently, more from relief than fear. The other girls were clustering around me to see if I was all right. They also cast sidelong glances at Bull sprawled on the floor. The fact that his fly was still unzipped, and that his penis was actually visible was not lost on any of them.

One person rushed to Bull's side. It was Mikki, a look of concern on her face. She cuddled him gently in her arms, while looking up with hatred at Jack. "You bastard!" she screamed. "What have you done to him?"

It became apparent to me then. I hadn't noticed it before. If I had been a girl all my life, I probably would have noticed, but I wasn't, so I didn't. Mikki had been in love with Bull all the time. That was why she had cultivated the bimbo look. She did it to please him. I doubted if the Jack who had been in place before we arrived really liked bimbos any more than my Jack did. She was waiting for her moment. Well, sister, I thought to myself, the moment has arrived. He's all yours.

Suddenly, the crowd parted. It was Dr. Miner. Oh, great, Jack and I were actually getting our lives together, and now, we were all going to be thrown out of school. Well, I wouldn't. I mean, I hadn't done anything wrong. But what if she thought I had enticed him? With my everything-out-front dress, he could claim I had led him on. That was just what the bastard would do, I thought. And even if I got off the hook, Jack was in trouble. He had given Bull the beating of his life, and Bull had never laid a hand on him. Of course, it could have been worse. If that last kick of Jack's had hit Bull squarely in the chest, it might have caved in his entire rib cage, crushing the heart. Bull had come only inches from death.

"All right," Dr. Miner said calmly. "The dance is still in the gym. Go there now for your entertainment."

The crowd reluctantly began to shuffle back to the dance. At last, there was just Jack with Danny standing next to him, Sam and me, with Sam still holding me gently, and Bull, who wasn't going anywhere for awhile, while Mikki stroked his forehead lovingly. Dr. Miner looked at the remaining group. She was an intelligent woman, I could tell. It took her only a few moments to decide what had happened. My disheveled condition and Bull's open fly told the story.

"Mikki," she said at last, "help Bull to his feet and get him out of here. When his head clears, tell him I want to see him at ten o'clock tomorrow in my office, is that clear?"

"But," Mikki protested, "tomorrow is Saturday, and there's no school."

There was a glow in Dr. Miner's eyes as she said forcefully, "Ten o'clock in my office! Now, is that clear?"

"Yes, ma'am," Mikki said weakly, helping Bull struggle to his feet and leading him away.

Before Bull was led out of our circle, he stopped and looked at Jack. The hatred was still in his eyes, but behind it there was... fear? He mumbled to Jack, "This... isn't... over."

Jack just quietly dismissed this bravado when he replied, "Yes, it is." The downcast look from Bull told me Jack was right.

"I hear this was a very interesting display of kick boxing," she said to Jack.

"He tried to rape Myra," Jack replied.

"Yes," Dr. Miner said drolly. "I can see that. You did well, Jack. You controlled yourself this time."

Jack's expression changed for the first time. There was alarm in his eyes. "You know?"

"Of course I know," she replied with a grim smile. "I know all about you. Don't worry, though, that's all in the past. Brad Blackstone never existed, did he?"

"I suppose not," Jack allowed.

She turned to Sam and me. "Sam, take Myra to the girl's room and get her cleaned up. Jack, you'd better take her home. Danny, stay with Jack until Myra's ready." These weren't requests; they were orders. I had a pretty good idea who was giving the orders, too. 'Miner' formed the first five letters of 'Minerva.' There seemed little doubt that our superintendent was the Goddess of Wisdom. Without another word, she walked gracefully down the hallway and back to the dance.

Sam got me cleaned up in no time. We collected our coats and said our goodbyes to Sam and Danny. Sam got me to agree to call her in the morning to make sure everything was okay. She was so sweet and feminine that it was almost impossible to imagine her as a guy. If it hadn't happened to me, I never would have believed it. Danny shook hands with Jack and got him to promise to call, too. It was easy to see that Jack and Danny were becoming good friends as well.

Jack and I walked to the car in silence. As we got in, Jack asked quietly, "Do you want to get a cup of coffee before I take you home?"

"I don't know," I replied. I was still too shell-shocked from Bull's attack to know what I wanted.

"It might make you feel better."

Yes, it might, I realized. If I went home right now, my parents would still be up. They would take one look at me and wonder what was wrong. There was no telling what they might do about it. I didn't want them doing something stupid like confronting Bull or his parents. I suddenly realized, I didn't even know Bull's parents. In any case, a cup of coffee sounded good. "Okay."

Jack wisely avoided Rusty's. It was a late-night hangout for the high school, and I didn't want to be seen by my classmates. We picked a little donut shop just off Main Street. It was called Dunker's. If it had been in a city, I would have avoided it, especially in my new body, since it looked like the sort of place derelicts would choose to get warm and maybe sleep off a bender, but Ovid was too small for that. Instead of derelicts, the only customer appeared to be two men who looked as if they had just finished a late shift, maybe even at dad's company, Vulman Industries. They were chatting about football as we walked in, making friendly bets on the upcoming bowl games. Instead of a pimply-faced teen behind the counter, there was a heavy-set middle-aged shade who looked a lot like Mel in the old Alice TV series.

We took a booth toward the back of the shop, and Jack got us two coffees and a couple of donuts. "Any cream?" I asked him with a sniffle.

"Since when do you use cream?"

"Since I got this peaches and cream complexion," I said. "I don't seem to be able to drink it straight anymore."

He got me one of those little plastic containers of cream and a stirrer. I dumped it in the coffee, followed by a packet of sugar. Jack watched in fascination as I stirred them in the strong coffee.

"You really have changed," he remarked.

I actually found myself smiling. "When I take a shower, I notice a lot more than the way I drink coffee has changed."

"For the better or worse?"

I sighed, sipping the coffee while I thought of an answer. It tasted good, and I felt a little calmer. "Better, I think. I mean, at first, it was hard. I had been male all my life. Then, suddenly, to find that I had breasts and... and... all the rest, was a little disconcerting. Now, though, it's starting to feel more natural. I think I can see why people like Sam have adapted so well. When you spend every day being seen as a girl, you start acting like one. I guess it's like speaking a foreign language. If all you hear day in and day out is, say, French, before long, you'll start speaking French or you'll go crazy. Then, after awhile, it starts to sound normal. You never forget English, but you start to speak and maybe even act French."

"Yeah, but what about guys?" he asked.

"What about them?"

"Well, you weren't interested in Bull, so I just wondered..."

"You just wondered if that applied only to Bull or to all guys," I finished for him.

He nodded, biting into a donut.

"There's not an easy answer for that," I told him. "I guess as a guy, I was a little like Bull. Don't get me wrong. I never forced myself on a girl, but I made love to a lot of them. Sadly, I never loved any of them, and I don't think they loved me. They were all more like the girl Bull wanted me to be.

"Your perception changes, though. Now, I look at girls, and I see friends or rivals, but they don't do anything for me. I tend to notice what they're wearing, or how they do their hair or makeup, but I don't look at their breasts or legs like I used to. As far as guys are concerned, I'm starting to notice." I blushed. "I'm starting to notice more every day."

Jack grinned at my embarrassment. "What do you notice?"

"Well," I started fumbling for words, "I've started noticing how they walk, and how they act more than how they look. I tend to notice an average guy who's confident more than a really good-looking guy who isn't. Unless the guy is really good looking, then it doesn't matter if he's a little shy..." My voice trailed off. I found I was getting lost in Jack's eyes. Did he know that last statement was about him?

"I've got some questions for you, too," I told him, once I was able to break the spell for a moment. "Where did you learn to fight like that?"

Jack sat back, reflecting for a moment. "I suppose it won't hurt to tell you now. You realize even when you were Marty, you didn't really know anything about me. I mean, we chummed around, drank a few beers and laughed a few laughs, but you didn't really know me."

"I knew you were from Chicago," I pointed out, taking a dainty bite out of my donut.

Jack shook his head. "No, I just told you I was from Chicago. I've been there, even worked there for a few months, but I'm actually from Baltimore."

"Why lie about that?" I asked. I was starting to realize I didn't know Brad at all. I had just spent a few days with Jack, and already I knew him better than in the months I had spent with Brad.

"Because I killed a man," he blurted.

"Killed?"

"Look, Myra," he said leaning forward, "you saw what I could do with Bull tonight. I could have killed him. I almost did. But back in Baltimore, there was nothing holding me back."

"So how did it happen?" I asked softly, placing my hand on his.

"I was raised by my sister," he told me. "My parents were children of the late sixties and early seventies. They got married young and had two kids, me and my older sister, Rita. Then dad died when I was about eight of a drug overdose. Mom did the best she could, but she had a drug habit of her own and not many skills. She worked the streets to make ends meet. By the time I was eleven, she died, too.

"Rita was seventeen by then. She made sure the social workers didn't find out about me and raised me herself. She saw what drugs did to our parents, so she stayed away from them and kept me away as well. She got little jobs—you know, waitressing and stuff like that. It wasn't much, but she kept a roof over our heads."

Jack had actually sounded happy for a moment, but now, his voice took on a more somber tone. "She had bad luck with men, though. Most of the guys she dated were just wastrels, but then, when I was sixteen, she picked up with a guy who was a lot like Bull. He'd treat her like dirt. Then, when she looked like she was going to drop him, he'd be so nice to her it made me want to puke. After he was sure he had her where he wanted her, he started physical force. It was little things at first, like Bull did to you. He'd pull her into the car, or grab her hard enough to leave a bruise."

He sipped more of the coffee, and I saw a dark look form on his face. "Then, one day after school, I came home and found out he had beaten her senseless. She was barely breathing. I tried to get to the phone and call an ambulance, but he stopped me. He told me, 'the stupid bitch will be okay. Just leave her alone'."

"But she wasn't okay, was she?" I prompted softly.

"No, she was dying," he replied. "Oh, she didn't die right away. That took months in a coma. Nothing could have saved her, but I didn't know that then. I had been taking kick-boxing lessons for three years, and I was getting pretty good. I delivered papers to get enough money for the lessons. It was the one thing I really enjoyed doing. I went after her boyfriend when he tried to stop me from calling for help. He was big and strong like Bull, but like Bull, he was slow and not very smart. I let up on Bull at the last minute tonight or I would have caved in his chest. That's what I did to Rita's boyfriend. The coroner said two ribs actually broke off and lodged in his heart. He died in seconds."

"But it was self defense, wasn't it?" I asked.

Jack shook his head. "Maybe for somebody else it would have been, but I ran up against a hotshot young Assistant DA who was looking to make a name for himself. I cooperated at first, until I realized they were trying to build a murder case against me. You see, the law believes that if you have training in a martial art like I did, it's the same as using a weapon. We were poor, too poor to get a fair chance in court. They had built up a case against me. I was the son of a hooker, and they would say my sister was probably a hooker, too. We had probably tried to roll her john, only she got hurt and he got killed."

"But nobody would believe that!" I protested.

"Maybe not," he agreed, "but show me a Public Defender who wouldn't have settled for manslaughter and walked away thinking he had done a great job. In the meantime, I would have done ten or fifteen years. It would have taken a good attorney to get me off completely, and I couldn't afford one."

"So you ran," I concluded.

"I ran," he agreed, drinking the rest of his coffee. "So now, you know who I am."

"I do," I smiled. "And I like who you are."

We found as we drove home that it was as if it had been Jack and I out on a normal date that night. We talked about Sam and Danny, and what good friends they had become. We talked about school which we both seemed to be enjoying. We carefully avoided anything to do with Bull, Mikki, or our transformation. We were just two teenagers at the end of a pleasant evening.

Jack walked me to my door, for which I was grateful. It had melted earlier in the day, then frozen again, and my heels weren't made for walking on ice. At the front door, he waited as I got out my key and opened the door.

"Hey, look," he said as I was getting ready to go in, "do you think we could maybe, you know, go to a movie tomorrow night?"

He was asking me out on a date! I felt an odd tingling sensation all over. "Sure," I replied quickly. "I'd like that."

He grinned. "Great. Six o'clock okay? We could maybe get something to eat first."

"Sure," I smiled.

"Great," he said again, stumbling away from the door.

It was an impulse, I knew, but I had to do it. "Jack!"

He stepped back up on the front stair. "What?"

I didn't say anything. I just put both arms around him and pulled him down to me. Then, I gave him a kiss—not a little sisterly kiss, but the deepest one I could manage. I could even feel a hardness in his crotch, but for the first time, I didn't mind. Eventually, we both had to breathe. I released him and started inside. Then, at the last second before I closed the door, I gave him my most feminine smile and said, "Thanks, Jack. I had a wonderful evening."

As the door closed on his bright smile, I realized it was true. I really had had a wonderful evening.

"So what happened then?" I heard Diana ask, snapping me out of my trance.

"I don't pick where the stories end," I told her. "It's like working for a movie director. He gets to pick the ending. I just show the film and sell the popcorn."

"I know that, silly," she laughed, "but what have you heard? That was just last Saturday. Are Myra and Jack an item now?"

"Yes, I'd like to know, too," another voice said from behind me.

I turned. "Susan!" I exclaimed. "I didn't see you come in." Of course, I had spent the last thirty seconds ago in a trance.

"I just got here," she said, sitting down beside me. "I dropped off some papers for the Judge and left them on your desk. They said you had left early, so I took a chance that you came by here first."

"You know me too well," I replied, only half joking. Since her transformation, Susan and I had become the good friends that everyone believed we were. They thought we had gone to school together. Little did they know we had only met a few weeks before.

"Anyway," she continued, "I heard you talking about Myra and Jack. May I join you?"

"Certainly," Diana answered. "Try the house Chardonnay. It's really great."

"Thanks," she said as a waiter came up to the table, "but I think I'll stick with Diet Coke."

Susan never drank alcohol. It would help her maintain that beautiful trim body she had been given. In her gray suit, she looked like a lawyer who had just stepped out of a TV show. Ovid had been very good to her. "So when do you start your honeymoon?" I asked.

"Tomorrow," Susan said triumphantly. "That's why I dropped those papers off today. In less than twenty-four hours, Steven and I will be on our way to Hawaii. Then, it'll be Christmas on Maui."

Lots of people take second honeymoons, I mused, but since Susan and Steven had been man and wife when Susan was a man, they were the only couple I knew who were taking their second one with their sexes reversed. Hmm, I'd have to talk Jerry into a second honeymoon some time since we had never really had a first one.

The waiter brought Susan her Diet Coke, and we huddled over the table like three sorority girls discussing their last dates.

"I don't really know that much," I began. "Jack lives just a block down from our house, and I've seen him walking hand-in-hand with Myra a couple of times. If they're not in love, it's a pretty good imitation."

"I've seen the same thing," Susan confirmed. "They came by the office to see Dori on Monday. I've never seen her look happier. She and her husband both like Jack. And the way Jack and Myra look at each other, I'd say they're an item."

"You might be interested in Mikki and Bull," Diana said coyly.

"What about them?" I asked. I guess when you're a goddess, you have access to information we mere mortals don't have.

"They're an item," Diana told us. "In fact, the kids all call them the Velcro Twins since they never seem to be apart."

"I guess it's better than the Asshole Twins," I commented dryly.

"True," Diana and Susan said together.

I took another sip of my wine. "Still, I hate to see a big prick like Bull make out. He gets a cute girl in Mikki, and a chance at a great college and professional football career. And Mikki does okay as a result, too."

“Don’t be too sure,” Diana cautioned.

We both looked at her, puzzled. She ignored us and took another sip of her wine, finishing the glass and signalling the waiter for another round. I really didn’t want another, but what the hell. I had to know what she was getting at. The waiter took our lunch orders and went back for our second round of wine. Susan, of course, stayed with Diet Coke.

“Okay,” I demanded when the waiter dropped off our glasses, “spill it.”

“Don’t you think our waiter has a cute little tush?” Diana smiled, ignoring my demand.

“Don’t worry,” Susan said, “I think I may know what she’s hinting at. That’s why I got called in on the case.”

Diana just smiled and listened.

“You see, Cindy,” Susan went on, “Marty and Brad weren’t even supposed to be here. You’ve heard the old expression ‘Man plans and the gods laugh?’ Sometimes, it’s the other way around. The Judge called the highway department knowing that Mack and Bear were in the area. Their supervisor dispatched them at once, as the Judge had planned. But the supervisor didn’t trust either one of them to get the job done right, so he sent two more men, Marty and Brad, as insurance.

“When Officer Mercer picked all of them up, the Judge found that Brad and Marty had been picked up in his trap, too. He determined that although both of them had a pretty good idea that Mack and Bear were pushing drugs, they had said nothing to anyone. This angered the Judge, because he hates drugs more than anything, except maybe child molesters. So Brad and Marty weren’t guilty of selling or using drugs, but they had stood by while it went on.”

“So this was one of the gray areas the Judge said he might use you on,” I surmised.

Susan nodded. “Exactly. Mack was supposed to become Myra, and Bear would be Bull. They would end up with each other, presumably unhappily ever after. Am I right about that, Diana?”

“Right on the mark,” Diana confirmed, raising her glass in mock salute.

“Okay,” I broke in. “So why did the Judge change things so Marty would become Myra?”

“Because,” Susan continued, “I asked him to. That was why the Judge and I had a long pre-trial conference. I asked the Judge to give Marty and Brad the opportunity to redeem themselves from both their pasts and doing nothing about the drug dealing. He determined that the best way to handle that would be to shuffle the deck a little bit.”

“Shuffle the deck?” I asked.

“Yes. Bear became Bull, as planned, and I think the Judge has something more in mind for him. But Marty became Myra instead of Mack. This allowed Myra a chance to escape Bull’s influence and be her own person. Mikki never could have done that, even if she was given the opportunity to remember who she had been. If Myra had used the same tactics she used as Marty, she would have been a dropout who couldn’t bring herself to fight Bull’s behavior any more than Marty fought Bear’s. The Judge created Mikki at the last minute, shade family and all, just to place her where she would have been as Myra if our new Myra redeemed herself.”

“Then Jack was a last-minute creation, too,” I guessed.

“Exactly,” Susan agreed. “The Judge found out about Brad’s brush with the law. Jack, or Brad, was right, by the way. In my old life, I handled murder cases. The system often runs over the poor since they can’t afford an adequate defense. At the very least, Brad would have spent time in prison for manslaughter, and that would only be if the Public Defender was a good one. It was a low profile case, so the odds of getting a good one were slim and none. In any case, Jack needed to come to grips with what he had done and win this time without displaying lethal force.”

“What would the Judge have done if Jack had killed Bull?” I asked.

Susan shrugged. "I'm not sure. It never came up."

"I can answer that," Diana said.

"Hey, wait a minute," I interrupted. "I thought two humans couldn't discuss the nature of any of the gods here in Ovid."

"They can't normally," she explained, "but when one of us allows it, it can be done. If I were to leave right now, you and Susan wouldn't be able to discuss it directly. It's for our convenience, not yours."

"So what would have happened?" Susan prompted.

Diana leaned forward again. "It would have gone very bad for Jack. Murder isn't allowed here in Ovid. The event would have been eliminated from everyone's mind, and a shade would have come in to play the part of Bull. There might have even been some tears in the fabric of Ovid, causing some of our changees to assume new roles. Jack would most certainly no longer be human."

I shuddered at the thought. On the surface, Ovid was an idyllic place, but just as Disneyland was honeycombed with concrete tunnels and the real devices that made the fantasy work, there was a honeycomb of rules and magic which made Ovid work, and some of that honeycomb was not pleasant. I knew that some of the oak trees in Sooner Park had once been human.

"Okay," Susan said, "but, Diana, set our minds at ease. What's going to happen to Bull?"

"Well, only one event is cast in stone," she explained. "Most of the other factors are variable. Mikki will probably get knocked up by Bull, but it won't be a happy union. Mikki will probably end up at Randy Andy's waiting tables and fending off pinches on the ass. She'll be unhappy, and she'll make sure Bull knows it."

"But I thought Bull was going to be a college football star and an NFL prospect," I pointed out.

"He probably would be," Diana agreed, "but in the third game next fall, the opposing defense will push the offensive tackles and guards out of the way allowing a linebacker to charge straight through knock Bull on his big butt. That's the event cast in stone. It will cause a bad exchange between the center and quarterback, resulting in a game-losing fumble. Bull's substantial weight will come down on that knee he just injured in wrestling. As a result, the knee will be too weak for college ball and certainly too weak for pro ball. Bull doesn't have the smarts to get into college, so he'll be stuck here in Ovid for the rest of his life."

"Doing what?" I asked.

Diana shrugged. "That will be up to him. It's too much trouble to try to pull all the strings. Who knows? Maybe he'll end up digging ditches for the City of Ovid."

We all had a little chuckle at Bull's expense. It couldn't happen to a nicer guy. Ovid had given some of us a new chance, even if it had changed our sexes, but for some, like Bull, there would be no second chance. Only now, instead of being content with the nowhere life he had as Bear, he would always wonder what might have been if his knee had stayed healthy. The same would be true for Mikki. It was a fitting fate.

"Well," Susan said seriously as she took another sip of Diet Coke, "I had no idea the Judge could be so manipulative. I'm certainly glad he didn't have a chance to manipulate me."

Diana and I looked at each other, momentarily stunned. Susan had most certainly been manipulated by the Judge into coming to Ovid and accepting her new role as a woman. Then, we looked at Susan, who was using the glass of Diet Coke to hide a coy smile. She knew! When...?

Diana began to laugh. It was infectious, and I began to laugh, too. But it was Susan who was laughing the loudest of all.

Ovid IV: The Bank Robbers

©1998 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

For the Captain

The light breeze that blew up my skirt as I crossed Main Street on my way to Susan's office was almost warm. One pleasant surprise for me in Ovid had been that spring came much earlier to Oklahoma than it did to Indiana. Here it was, only the last week of February, and already the sun had gained strength and the air was warming. We all knew it could still snow again before spring truly came, but the days would continue to get warmer in spite of further snows.

I had now been a woman for over four months, and I was starting to really think like a woman, I realized, as I contemplated a little expedition after lunch with Susan and Diana to March's Department Store to scope out the latest spring fashions. Maybe I could find something for Easter for both me and my daughter, Michelle. It was hard to imagine thinking this way just a few short months ago, but I had learned to be happy in Ovid. I had a wonderful loving husband and two great kids. So what if they had all once been my fraternity brothers at Notre Dame? They didn't know that; they remembered nothing of their past lives.

Besides, I had a great job, too. Being Administrative Assistant to the Roman God, Jupiter, was one heck of a job. Of course, officially, I was secretary to the Judge, but the growing community of changees in Ovid who remembered their previous lives knew what that really meant.

The Judge had cleared his calendar for the day, and since it was Friday, that meant an easy start to the weekend. Diana had called and asked me if I'd like to have a lunch of takeout Chinese in Susan's office. She had already cleared it with Susan, who had given her secretary, Dori, the day off. I had told her it sounded great to me, so we made the date. Now, here I was, hurrying up to Susan's office.

The outer office was empty, but I heard Susan call, "In here, Cindy."

Susan and I had gotten to be good friends, and our husbands were starting to get chummy as well, but until that day, I had never been in Susan's office. It looked very... well, lawyerly. The furniture was conservative and the walls were a nondescript tan, as was the carpet. One whole wall of her office was lined with law books. I was sure, as nice as it was, that it was nothing compared to the office she must have had in Dallas when she was a he and one of the top criminal lawyers in the country.

"You look nice today," she said with a smile, motioning me to a small conference table she had obviously cleared for lunch.

"Thanks," I said, taking the offered seat. After walking over from City Hall in heels, I was glad for the opportunity to sit down. I still forgot that high heels weren't made for long walks and my feet ached. "So do you." She did, too. She was wearing a very professional looking gray suit with a rose silk blouse. I, by contrast, was wearing a dark blue sweater dress, but then again, I didn't have the image of being a lawyer to maintain.

"Am I late?" a voice called from the outer office.

"No," Susan called. "Cindy just got here. Come on in, Diana."

A tall, stunningly beautiful American Indian woman, coal black hair in braids and wearing a traditional deerskin dress and moccasins entered the room. Incongruously, she was carrying a sack with a couple of bottles in it under one arm and a brown sack with Chinese characters on it under the other arm. "Princess Diana Wintermoon at your service," she said with a grin. As we watched, the dress resolved itself into a smart tan suit and the moccasins became three-inch heels. The braids unwrapped themselves and resolved into a mane of black, wavy hair. She asked, "So what do you think?"

"Do Indians really have princesses?" I asked.

She shrugged. "I think so. If they don't, they should. Now let's get this bottle of wine open. I really need a drink."

“So what have you been up to this morning that you need a drink?” Susan asked. As a teetotaler, I suppose Susan couldn’t really imagine why anyone, especially the Goddess Diana would ‘need’ a drink.

“Because I’ve spent the entire morning in a Council meeting.”

“But City Council doesn’t meet until Monday,” I pointed out.

She frowned. “Who said anything about City Council? This was the Olympic Council.”

“You’re on the Olympic Committee?” I asked without really thinking. There was still enough male in my mind to think of ‘Olympics’ as only sports.

Diana looked at me with a patronizing smile. “Was that a joke, or are you being uncharacteristically dense today?”

“Oh,” I said, abashed. “That Olympic Council.” It certainly explained where the Judge had been all morning. He had mentioned the Olympic Council to me shortly after I went to work for him. It was like a corporate Board of Directors meeting where all the gods got together to discuss the affairs of Ovid and whatever else came to mind.

“Yes, that Olympic Council,” Diana agreed. “We met this morning in San Francisco at the Fairmont. Thankfully, the meeting got out in time for me to get over to Celadon in Chinatown and pick up the food.”

I had wondered where she had gotten it. There wasn’t a Chinese restaurant in Ovid. I considered that a serious oversight on the part of the gods.

“Anyhow,” she continued with a tired smile, “the meeting was a particularly tedious one.”

Knowing Diana as I did, I realized any meeting which she was not in charge of was probably, to her, a tedious meeting. I think I would have found it very interesting. Apparently even many of the gods who had little to do with Ovid attended, so I imagined it would have been a very enlightening meeting for humans like me. Had I been there, I might even have learned why they were doing all of this.

“What happened?” Susan asked, removing a bottle of chilled white wine and a plastic bottle of Diet Coke from the bag. She then produced three tumblers from her credenza and poured for each of us, reserving the Diet Coke for her own glass.

Diana gratefully accepted her wine and took a satisfying sip. “Well, of course, some of it I can’t talk about. You two are my best friends in Ovid, so I’d love to tell you everything that went on, but the Judge would have my head on a platter if I did.”

Given the Judge’s background, that was more of a potentially real penalty than an outsider might have imagined.

“I can tell you, though, that both of you are on Marty Bachman’s enemies list,” she confided.

“Why?” I asked, taking a sip of my own wine. I hadn’t read the label, but it was an excellent Chenin Blanc. Diana had excellent taste.

“Because of Myra Smithwick,” Diana explained. “You helped her out, and Marty had his sights on her. He thought she’d be a fine waitress in his little place.”

Marty Bachman ran a dive called Randy Andy’s. Being recently cast in the role of a proper wife and mother, I had never been in the place. I had heard it was pretty tame by big city standards, but in Ovid, it had the reputation of being a den of iniquity. It was basically Hooters with even less class, if one could believe the stories.

“All we did was help Myra get pointed in the right direction,” Susan explained. Actually, I had done very little for Myra, but Susan was even considering having her work in her office over the summer.

“That’s the point,” Diana said. “Marty was at the meeting, and...”

“Wait a minute,” I interrupted. “What was he doing at a meeting of the gods?”

Diana frowned. “You mean you didn’t know?”

Both Susan and I shook our heads.

“Oh, well, there’s something you need to know,” Diana continued.

“Marty is one of us. He’s a god.”

“You’ve got to be kidding,” I blurted out. “There’s a Roman god running a sleazy bar?”

“It’s really not as unusual as you might think. On the whole, we’re a pretty earthy bunch. Besides, Marty is known as Bacchus in mythology. Do you know who he was?” Diana asked.

“Sure,” I replied. “Wasn’t he that fat little drunk god in Fantasia who kept falling off his donkey?”

Diana leaned forward. “If you ever talk to him, never under any circumstances should you mention that movie to him. He hated that movie so much that he completely destroyed all traces of the Disney movie, Hansel and Gretel.”

“But there is no such Disney movie,” Susan protested.

“Exactly,” Diana said with a sly smile. “Not anymore.”

Susan was still thinking about that when I asked, “Okay, so tell us about Bacchus.”

“Well,” Diana began, settling into her chair. She was really enjoying this. “Marty Bachman is the Judge’s illegitimate son, so he indulges the little idiot. Marty wanted a bar and strip joint, but the Judge wouldn’t go that far. Instead, he offered Marty a bar and, as long as it stays discrete, permission to do what little prostitution Ovid has.”

“He’s the Judge’s illegitimate son?” Susan echoed. “Our Judge? He has a bastard?”

“You sound surprised,” Diana observed with a wicked grin. “You must not have read much mythology when you were a kid.”

“I didn’t.”

“Then you wouldn’t realize,” she went on, “that the Judge and all the other gods around here were not exactly paragons of virtue. There was more philandering and incest on Mount Olympus than in a Mississippi trailer park. The reason the Judge went along as far as he did with Marty is just to keep the little shit where he can see him. He’s been nothing but trouble for centuries. Susan, you've been doing more reading about us lately. What's your impression of Bacchus?"

"Well," she offered, "if half the stories I've read about him are true, he's someone to steer clear of."

"Not only are half the stories true, but the stories don't even tell the half of it," Diana said darkly. "He's the flimflam man of the gods. He can talk someone into doing almost anything, appearing to be a friend, only to lead them to destruction. If you think about it, that's what happens to a lot of heavy drinkers. They do things under the influence of alcohol—or Bacchus—that they would never do if they were sober."

"He sounds like a pimp," Susan commented.

"He's been that," Diana agreed, "and worse."

"Well," I said hoisting my wine glass, "here's to the God of Wine. May he stay on his side of town."

Two other glasses clicked mine in agreement.

"Now, to other things," Diana said primly.

"Yes," I agreed. "You want a story, and I'll bet I know which one you want."

Diana smiled.

"I'll bet I know, too," Susan added. "Things were a little slow around here before the bank robbery."

"So let's get to it!" Diana exclaimed.

"Uh, will Susan be able to watch, too?"

"She just needs to position herself looking over my shoulder," Diana told me.

I relaxed in preparation for falling into the trance which would allow them to see the story. It started on a damp Saturday almost two weeks ago...

“So what do ya think of the family business, Little Brother?”

The brown landscape of an Oklahoma winter shot past us at eighty miles an hour as the nondescript ten-year-old white Dodge strained to keep at speed. It was hot in the car. Jimmy Ray liked it that way, so the searing heat from the engine pumped raw hot air into the car causing me to sweat. Or maybe it wasn't the only thing causing me to sweat.

“Waddaya say, Bobby Joe?” he said cheerfully though tobacco-stained teeth.

“Keep your eyes on the road,” I suggested with a quaver in my voice.

“Don't you worry none about that, Little Brother. Old Snow here practically drives hisself. He's gotten me out of a scrape or two. It's really Enos's car, and he keeps her purring.”

Enos, half asleep in the back seat, grunted at the sound of his name.

I didn't want to think about what he called a scrape or anything else my brother had been up to for the last fifteen years. I didn't even want to know what he was up to now. I just wanted to go home, but I knew deep down that home was probably not an option. I could never go home again.

The last time I had seen my big brother had been when I was only seven. Mom always said he took after my dad, and I knew now it was true. That last time, when Dad had left for good, taking Jimmy Ray with him, my last thoughts of them had been how much he really was like dad. He was tall and lanky, with a mean look in his eyes and a devilish grin stamped permanently on his face. If he hadn't been my big brother by five years, I would have hated to see him coming down the street toward me. I would have run the other way.

But for all of his faults, Jimmy Ray looked after me when we were boys. None of the other kids dared bother me, because they knew Jimmy Ray would have them for breakfast. When Jimmy Ray got a little bigger, even Dad thought twice about beating on me when Jimmy Ray stepped in the way. Of course, he never stepped into the way to help Mom. No surprise there. I knew even then that Jimmy Ray would most likely grow up to be a wife beater like our father.

Gus Malone, my Dad, was about the roughest of the rough on the near South side of San Antonio. In an area populated mostly by Hispanics and troubled by gang activity, most folks gave Gus Malone a wide berth. Sure, he was slim, but he was quick and deadly. One move in his direction could get you cut in a hurry. I think he actually delighted in seeing the fear in a man's eyes when he went at them with a knife. He made his living doing mostly odd jobs, including being muscle for some of San Antonio's most notorious underworld figures. He never talked about his work, for which I was later grateful. If I had known what he was capable of when I was a small child, I would probably have died from fright.

Jimmy Ray was probably the only thing that saved my mother and me from some awful fate at the hands of my father. If there was anything in the world that Gus Malone could be said to have loved, it was Jimmy Ray. They were just too much alike, and even as a small boy, I could see that my father wanted Jimmy Ray to be just like him.

Dad split on a rainy night fifteen years ago. He came home that night, his shirt covered in blood, and a look of disgust on his face.

"Goddamned piece of shit up and died on me," he muttered to my mother. "Now every fuckin' piece of shit cop in the state'll be looking for me. I'm out of here."

"But, Gus, where are you going?" my mother pleaded. "What are the boys and I going to do?"

"I don't much care," he said without any emotion. I was actually pleased and frightened at the same moment. I was pleased Dad was going to be out of my life. That meant no more beatings. But I was frightened because Mom was frightened. I was too young to know why.

Mom was frightened because as poor a provider as Dad had been, he was better than nothing. Mom had gotten pregnant when she was sixteen, so she had dropped out of school to get married and raise a family. Dad was the old-fashioned kind. No wife of his was about to work, so Mom had no education and no work experience. The sole support of her life, as poor as it was, was walking out the door, leaving her destitute with two boys to raise.

Then Jimmy Ray did something which probably saved Mom's life, although he didn't do it for that reason. At twelve, he was already man-sized, and he was proving himself to be, if not smart, at least sly. "Dad, take me with you," he said. In most twelve year olds, it would have been a plea. With Jimmy Ray, though, it was a business proposal.

"You're too young, boy," Dad said with a note of regret in his voice.

"I ain't that young," Jimmy Ray argued. "Sides, I can watch your backside. Ain't no cop gonna be lookin' for two. They'll think you lit out by yourself."

Dad was seriously considering it, I knew, even at seven. At last he nodded his head. "All right, boy, you get to the car. We gotta go now."

Jimmy Ray winked at me and bolted out the door, Dad right behind him, leaving me and Mom behind. It was the last time I ever saw my father.

Mom and I managed to get by after they left. The police did, indeed, visit us not an hour later. According to them, Dad had beaten a man to death over gambling debts. Mom told them truthfully that she didn't know where he had gone. When they left, life settled into something almost normal. In fact, it actually improved a little. Jimmy Ray had become quite a handful for Mom, so when he left, she seemed to actually have more energy than before. She did her best, getting a job as a waitress at a local coffee shop. It wasn't much, but it kept a roof over our heads.

For a while, life got better. Mom was a lot stronger inside than she looked. She took care of herself and me. She got neighbors to look after me while she worked as many hours as she could. Then, when she came home, she only had time for me. It was a hard life, but a happy one. We were a family, just Mom and me.

After a few years, though, the hours and the standing took their toll on her. She got more and more tired. By the time I was in high school, I could see the toll of the years in her face. It was lined with age, framed by prematurely gray hair, and by the time I had graduated from high school, she was a thirty-seven-year-old elderly woman. I know how that must sound, but anyone who had known her would have known what I meant. Her shoulders were stooped by the weight of the world, and her feet were so crippled from long hours standing and inadequate medical care that she hobbled rather than walked.

She died the summer after I got out of high school, just before her thirty-eighth birthday. The doctor said it was a weak heart, but I think she just got tired of living. She had forced herself to go on until she saw me safely graduate from high school, and I think that then, she decided she had done all she could in this life and gave it up gladly.

I had grown up to be more like my mother than my father. I don't mean that I was effeminate or anything. I was a normal boy with a healthy sex life. Of average looks and just six feet in height, I was slender with nondescript brown hair, and I got my share of girls, but not more than that. I ran a little track and played a little basketball, mostly sitting on the bench, but wasn't big enough or strong enough for the rigors of high school football in Texas, where it's more of a religion than a sport. I exhibited none of my father's dubious qualities, as I was neither strong nor cruel, and I had made the decision early in my life to get a decent education and make something of myself.

That proved hard to do for many reasons. College is expensive, and although I was a good student, I wasn't scholarship material. When Mom died, she left nothing behind but debts, so there was not even a modest inheritance to further my goals. I moved north after being accepted at Wichita State University in Kansas. There, I found a job as a bellhop at a local hotel and began to slowly further my education. I had decided to try to get by on as few student loans as possible, so my job was my primary source of funds. By the time I was twenty-two, I had managed to make it to the equivalent of my junior year. I figured I would be able to work and go to school with the goal of graduating by the time I was twenty-five.

My life came crashing down on a rainy February Friday night, but I didn't know it at the time. I had decided to stay home that night. I didn't have to work, I was between girls, and the weather was lousy. It was one of those storms that strikes the central plains in the late winter that begins as a cold rain which changes at nightfall into freezing drizzle, making the roads into a skating rink. I ordered a pizza in and decided to get ahead in my schoolwork. I was a business major, and business statistics was killing me, so it was a good time to buckle down.

About ten minutes after I ordered the pizza, there was a knock on my door. They were fast with the delivery, I thought, swinging the door open. To my surprise, there was no pizza man at the door. Instead, there was a man, just a few years older than me, who looked very familiar. He was tall and lanky, but at a glance, I could see strong arms and powerful hands. His hair was fairly short and the same color as mine.

The man grinned at me, hands in his pocket and freezing rain dripping from his hair. I could see he had a two-day growth of beard and a gold earring in his right ear. "Bobby Joe?" he asked suddenly.

I hadn't heard that name in years. I had gone by the name of Rob ever since junior high. Suddenly, I knew who he looked like. He looked like my father, only younger. There was only one person in the world he could be. "Jimmy Ray?"

"In the flesh, Little Brother," he laughed, pulling his hands out of his pockets and throwing them around me.

I had thought I would never see my brother again. As a child, I had fantasies about him coming back to see me. Then, the fantasy always turned into a nightmare as Dad would be with him. Remembering that, I looked over his shoulder, but the hallway was empty. He was alone.

I invited him in, of course. We had been close in spite of the difference in our ages. I had no illusions about being close again. I was sure we had grown well apart, but he was my only brother. In the words of our South Texas forebears, kin is kin.

In looking back on the events of that night and the day to follow, I can't say I was really happy to see Jimmy Ray. Time had healed the wounds of life with my father and Jimmy Ray, and his return had reopened those wounds. I had no illusions about what kind of a man Jimmy Ray had grown up to be, and I wanted him out of my life before whatever troubles surrounded him became my troubles as well. But to repeat myself, kin is kin.

The pizza came minutes later, and over pizza and beer, we got down to catching up at the kitchen table.

"So where's Dad?" I ventured. I might as well get that one out on the table, I thought.

Jimmy Ray shrugged. "We parted company a long time ago, Little Brother. Last I heard, he headed west. Denver is what I heard. Somebody told me he's doing time in Canon City."

"Canon City?"

"State pen, Bobby Joe. Armed robbery."

There was more to the story than Jimmy Ray was willing to tell me. Of that, I was certain. Had he been in on the robbery with Dad? Probably, I thought. I decided I didn't want to know any more. I would enjoy my evening with Jimmy Ray and send him on his way in the morning. I remembered that evening long ago when Dad had left with him, and how the police had come to the door hours after he left. Would they come to my door after Jimmy Ray left? It was possible. No, it was more than possible. It was probable. I wanted him out of my life quickly.

I brought him up to date on my life and on Mom's death. He was interested in my life, but Mom's death meant nothing to him. It rated only a disinterested shrug. He told me about his life as well, but I suspected little of it was true. He bragged of places he had been and things that he had done, but none made any sense nor was there any pattern to them. I was sure in my own mind that he had spent most of those years with Dad, involved in one illegal activity after another.

“So where are you off to next?” I asked him, hoping that he would take the hint and be gone quickly.

He grinned. He knew what I meant, I was sure. “Don’t worry, Little Brother. I’m just passing through. I’m heading south—maybe even back to San Antonio. First, I’ve got to hook up with a business associate down in Ark City.”

Ark City was Arkansas City, a small town an hour south of Wichita. Kansans pronounced it as if it were “Ark Kansas” instead of like the state. “So when do you have to go?” I asked as casually as I could.

“Going tomorrow if you can take me,” he replied. “I took the bus to Wichita and a cab to your place. I’d sure appreciate the ride.”

Why not? I didn’t have to work until Saturday evening, so I had the time. Besides, it guaranteed that he’d be out of my life again. I agreed to take him in the morning in time for a ten o’clock meeting with his partner who had gone on ahead of him to visit his own relatives in Tulsa. I didn’t ask what he and his partner did for a living. Whatever it was had to be illegal. The less I knew, the less I had to forget.

We got up early the next morning, stopped off for a big breakfast, which Jimmy Ray paid for, expansively leaving a nice tip for the waitress. He could be charming when he wanted to be. I thought he was going to charm the waitress right out of her uniform, and given the tip, maybe that’s what he had in mind. That was the last thing I wanted, though. I didn’t want him hanging around Wichita. I wanted him back on the road again.

The drive to Ark City was pleasant enough, taking us through several small towns along the way. Traffic was light since the weather was cold and gray. At least the ice on the roads had melted, but the clouds were threatening. A difference of only a few degrees might turn the roads into ribbons of ice. It was the perfect kind of Saturday morning to stay home in front of a warm fire with a cup of coffee and a good book. I thought when I got back home, I would do just that.

“Here we are, Little Brother,” Jimmy Ray said, indicating for me to pull into the parking lot of a small bank. “There’s the car over there, so Enos is here.” He had indicated an old white Dodge, maybe ten years old. “Come on in before you go, Bobby Joe. I’ll introduce you to Enos.”

“That’s okay,” I replied, anxious to get away. “I’ll meet him some other time. I...”

I looked down to see that Jimmy Ray was holding a pistol. It was aimed at me. “I want you to meet him now,” he said with a malicious grin.

Never in my life had someone held a gun on me. I felt my knees go weak. I didn’t really know this man. The Jimmy Ray I knew left home when he was twelve and I would never know him again. The man holding the gun on me was someone else. Jimmy Ray had become just like my father, I realized. “Why are you doing this to me?” I asked him, a quaver in my voice.

“Don’t be such a pussy, Bobby Joe. You’re my brother, and I want to show you what you’re missing.”

“I’m not missing anything,” I said.

“You’re missing everything,” he retorted. “You’re wasting your time going to school and waiting tables when you could be with me. I always looked out for you when we were kids. I’m gonna look out for you now. I’m giving you a chance to take Dad’s place in the family business. Shit, boy, I make more on a good afternoon than you’ll make in a year with that fuckin’ degree. Come on.”

The gun hidden in his jacket, we walked across the parking lot to the old Dodge. “I didn’t cab it to your place. I had Enos drop me off at your place last night,” Jimmy Ray told me as we walked. “We need three to make a team. Two of us can hit the bank while Enos stays in the car with the engine running. That old Dodge of his may not look like much...”

But she’s the fastest ship in the galaxy, I thought. Sorry, Jimmy Ray, but you aren't Han Solo.

"...but she's a hell of a fast car. Enos has had her for years, he tells me. He even gave it a name. He calls it 'Old Snow.' Now ain't that a kick in the ass? He loves that car like it as a woman, and he keeps Old Snow in prime condition."

"So you've been working with him for a long time?" I asked.

As we walked across the parking lot, Jimmy Ray laughed. "Naw. We just been workin' together for the last couple of months. Ain't too many long term partnerships in this business."

I imagined that would apply to me as well.

Enos got out of the car. He was a tall heavy black man with a dark complexion and a scar across his face. When Jimmy Ray had introduced us, he said, "I don't like for Enos to go in the bank. With his size and that scar, there's just too much of a chance someone will ID him. 'Sides, he don't like guns. Now I ask you, Little Brother, what good is a big ol' boy like Enos here without a gun? Well, I'm gonna tell you, old Enos here can drive like the wind, so he's gonna stay with the car while you and me knock over a bank. Now put on this mask."

He handed me a black ski mask. "Jimmy Ray, I don't want any part of this."

"You put on that mask or I'll put a slug in you right now!" Jimmy Ray growled, sticking the gun in my ribs for emphasis. "You got raised too long by our mama. You're nothin' but a mama's boy. Today, Little Brother, were gonna get you a set of balls. Now put on the fuckin' mask!"

I obeyed. He seemed just crazy enough to shoot me. I knew this was a turning point in my life. I don't know what would have happened if I had told him no. If he had shot me then and there, he would have had to make a run for it without robbing the bank. But I didn't want to take the chance. If I was wrong, I would be dead.

"That's better, Bobby Joe. Now here!" He thrust two large cloth sacks into my hands. "I'll do all the fancy work. You just keep your mouth shut, go over to the tellers and fill these bags with money. Now you understand?"

I nodded nervously.

"And don't get any ideas about being a hero. I'll shoot you down where you stand, Little Brother."

Enos stood by the car while Jimmy Ray and I, masks in place, walked into the bank. My life was going to change in that moment, I knew. Eventually, we would be caught, and no one would ever believe that I was as frightened of being shot by my brother as any of the innocent people in the bank. The charge would be armed robbery, and I would spend the next twenty or thirty years in jail, being rehabilitated for a crime I never planned to commit.

In that moment, I almost bolted. So what if my brother shot me? It might be merciful compared to the fate that awaited me when we were caught. Or maybe we would be gunned down by the police. Then, I would go to my grave as a criminal. No tears would be shed for me.

I was still feeling sorry for myself, trying to think of some course of action that would save me from the fate that eventually awaits most if not all bank robbers, when Jimmy Ray yelled, "All right, you mother fuckers! Get down on the floor and do it now!"

A guard wheeled around, fumbling to get his pistol out of its holster, but to no avail. Jimmy Ray shot him on the spot. The guard dropped in pain, holding his side as the gun slid from his hand. I was thankful it didn't appear to be a mortal wound, but I don't think it mattered to Jimmy Ray. He was shooting to kill and just aimed a little wide. I could see a look of malicious glee in his eyes. He lived for moments like these, I realized. I was afraid he would finish off the guard just watch him die, but he didn't. I think he just didn't want to waste another bullet.

No one else crossed us. Everyone got to the floor as quickly as possible, many making loud plops as they threw themselves down before Jimmy Ray could fire at them. I could hear soft crying from a couple of the women, and a baby was crying out in fear.

Jimmy Ray vaulted over the teller line and grabbed a young teller up by her hair. She screamed in pain and fear, nearly crumbling to the floor again in sheer panic. "Listen, bitch!" Jimmy Ray growled in her ear. "You help him fill these bags with money." He pushed her head around so she could see me standing there with the bags. I tried to convey through my eyes a feeling of sympathy, but I think she was too frightened to realize it. I was just one murderous robber wearing a ski mask.

Trembling, she went from cash drawer to cash drawer, emptying the money and dropping it into the bag I held. I wasn't able to see how much cash she had collected, but I knew it had to be substantial.

"Get the drive-up window too, bitch!" Jimmy Ray yelled as he glanced furtively around the room to make sure no one tried to be a hero. "And if I find a paint bomb in that sack, I'm gonna waste you right now!"

The bag was getting very heavy by the time we were done. I glanced at the clock. We had been in the building for less than ten minutes — minutes which would spell ruin for the rest of my life. I stood there stupidly, the bag drooping from my hands like the Halloween bag of some tired child.

"Let's get out of here!" Jimmy Ray whispered to me with a sharp punch on my shoulder.

Together, we bolted out the door and piled into the waiting car. Enos slammed the car into gear and we screeched away from the curb at a speed greater than I would have thought possible from the old car.

"Head south!" Jimmy Ray ordered as he pulled himself up off me. We had both jumped into the back seat at almost the same moment, landing in a pile in the center of the seat.

Enos kept his eyes on the road while Jimmy Ray looked out the back window. "First farm road south of town, head east," he ordered.

Enos grunted in reply. At the first opportunity, he skidded into a left turn and we disappeared from the view of the main highway, shooting down a dusty gravel road at seventy.

“You see, Little Brother,” Jimmy Ray told me, “they’ll have seen us heading south. They’ll figure we were on our way straight down toward Oklahoma City, so they’ll cover all the roads in that direction. They’ll never figure us to go east until it’s too late.”

“Jimmy Ray, you’re a worthless bastard,” I murmured, practically in tears of fear and hatred.

Jimmy Ray laughed to my surprise. He held up the bag. “Worthless, Little Brother? Why, I ain’t worthless at all. I’d say there’s about a sixty to seventy grand in this here bag. That makes me worth a bunch!”

Enos chuckled, too. “Where we goin’ Jimmy Ray?”

“Bartlesville,” Jimmy Ray said. “We can hit another bank before noon. Then, we make it look like we’re goin’ on east, but we’ll head south. We’ll be in Texas in time for supper.”

And so I was introduced to a life of crime. I thought it couldn’t get any worse, but when we got to Bartlesville, I found out how wrong I could be. Bartlesville was maybe three times the size of Ark City. I figured it was maybe thirty thousand people or so. We got there by a quarter after eleven, and like most small Midwestern cities, it was doing a brisk Saturday business. The bank Jimmy Ray wanted to hit was right on the main street. He had Enos discretely park the car around the corner and wait. Then, he and I strolled casually to the main door of the bank where we put on our masks.

“Same rules, Bobby Joe,” my brother warned. “You fuck this up and I’ll blow you all over the lobby. You understand?”

I nodded that I did. I was convinced now that he meant it. He was one sadistic bastard. There was no way I would cross him and live.

“Then let’s go.”

The robbery was a replay of the one in Ark City, except this time, the guard had the good sense to drop to the floor with everyone else. In less than ten minutes, we were on our way, speeding out of town. Once safely away from Bartlesville, Jimmy Ray took over the driving chores while Enos napped in the back seat. I could see no pattern to where he was going. It was as if he were compelled to go the directions he was going. He drove the old Dodge hard, heading first east and then south into the part of the state dotted with lakes, rolling hills, and small towns that all looked alike.

It was nearly one thirty when Enos roused himself in the back seat and mumbled, "Hey, Jimmy Ray, you gonna ever stop for lunch?"

"That's all you ever think about is that big gut of yours, Enos."

"Well, when we gonna stop?"

"It looks like there's a little town up ahead there," Jimmy Ray said. "We can stop and get gas there. Then we'll get you some lunch, Enos."

I wondered if this small town would be my opportunity to get away. Maybe if I could run out on them while they were eating or getting gas, I could make my way to the police. It was the only way I could think of that they might believe me. Otherwise, it was only a matter of time before I got caught with them. Then, no one would believe me.

The sign on the highway said 'Ovid - 2 Miles.'

"I ain't never heard of Ovid," Enos muttered, "and I was born and raised in Tulsa."

"Well, we can't expect a man of your culture and breeding to know the name of every little pissant town in the state, can we?" Jimmy Ray laughed. "How 'bout you, Little Brother? You ever hear of Ovid?"

"Only the poet; not the town," I replied.

"Poet?"

"Yeah," I told him. "He was a Roman poet. He lived about the time of Christ. He's the one who said 'the gods have their own rules'."

"So ain't you the educated boy? Tell me, Bobby Joe, what does that shit mean about the gods having their own rules? We're the ones that have our own rules. Fuck the gods." Jimmy Ray laughed again.

The rolling farmlands of Oklahoma gave way to the town of Ovid. The highway widened into four lanes as we came upon a strip of gas stations and fast food restaurants.

“Not a fuckin’ McDonalds in sight,” Enos mumbled.

“Well, that’s okay, Enos,” Jimmy Ray laughed. “Since we got us a college boy for a partner, maybe we should be a little more high class and sample the local cuisine.”

His idea of local cuisine turned out to be a modest place with a neon sign out front that proclaimed ‘Rusty’s Best Burgers.’ We locked up the car. I kept thinking about the money in the trunk. There had to be over a hundred and fifty thousand dollars of stolen money in there, and here we were, loping into a burger joint as if we didn’t have a care in the world. I realized that beyond being a basically honest person, I could never rob banks for a living. I’d always be frightened and insecure, looking over my shoulder at every opportunity.

The place was clean, at least, and somebody had actually fed the jukebox, so we were to be serenaded with the sounds of Waylon Jennings while we ate. If this place couldn’t be a poster for Small Town America, I didn’t know what could. Jimmy Ray had me sit on the inside of a booth—I guess so I couldn’t make a run for it—and slid in beside me. Enos plopped down nonchalantly across from us.

The waitress was a chipper-looking blonde, the kind you would expect to have saunter up to the table, chewing gum, and say “Wat’cha guys havin’ today?” She broke the bimbo stereotype when she smiled a friendly smile and said brightly, “Hi! Welcome to Rusty’s. I’m Myra. Can I get you something to drink?”

On second appraisal, Myra looked far too bright to be a bimbo. She wore a white blouse with the name ‘Myra’ sewed on it, a short black skirt which showed off sensational legs, and black flats that had a lot of miles on them, and her hair was as blonde as any bimbo I had ever seen. But there was intelligence in her eyes. Behind the friendly smile, there was a calculating mind. She had sized us up as trash. I wanted desperately to tell her that I wasn’t like them, but I knew she’d never believe me. No one would.

“Yeah, honey,” Jimmy Ray said with a glance at the menu. “These Rusty Burgers real good?”

“The best,” she replied.

“Okay, bring us a round of those—no onions on mine—and coffee all around.”

Apparently, I was not to be allowed even a choice of what I would eat when I was with Jimmy Ray. My brother hunched over the table and said in a loud voice, “What I’d really like is the sheepherder’s special. You know what that is, Little Brother?”

I shook my head, not really caring about the answer.

“It’s a glass of goat’s milk and a piece of the waitress.” He roared with laughter while Enos chuckled. I made no outward display, instead watching our waitress draw the coffee. From the red on her face, I was sure she had heard the joke. Surprisingly, the red looked to be more from anger than embarrassment. This Myra seemed pretty sharp.

“She too young for you, Jimmy Ray,” Enos mumbled. Yeah, I thought, and way too good for him, too.

“If they’re old enough to bleed, they’re old enough to butcher, Enos,” he laughed evilly. “You need to always remember that.”

Myra delivered the burgers and coffee quickly, agilely swerving to avoid Jimmy Ray’s lecherous butt pat.

The burgers were as advertised. I couldn’t remember the last time I had enjoyed a burger so much. So far, it was the only positive thing to happen to me on that day. And I don’t usually drink coffee in the afternoon, but the coffee was hot and flavourful—so much so that I gladly took a second cup. Myra poured us each an extra cup, again deftly gliding past Jimmy Ray before he could pinch her ass.

We were just finishing our coffee when Enos, facing the door, got very quiet. “Cop,” he muttered under his breath. Jimmy Ray casually reached up under his coat, ready to pull out his gun if the cop recognized us. I was determined that I wouldn’t let him shoot the cop, even if my brother shot me. Fortunately, that didn’t become necessary. Out of the corner of my eye, I saw the cop saunter over to the counter and take a stool. Myra smiled at him and poured him a cup of coffee.

We tried to be as casual as possible, leaving a nice tip for the girl. Jimmy Ray stood up at the counter and calmly paid the bill, but I noticed his hand never got very far away from his concealed weapon.

I actually got a good look at the cop. He looked professional, in his blue-gray shirt and blue trousers. I couldn't see his eyes, as he never removed his sunglasses, but just as I was getting ready to turn away, he turned toward me and, to my surprise, actually smiled. It wasn't just a friendly "Hi, how are you?" kind of smile. It was more of an ironic smile, as if to say "Next time." I smiled back, but inwardly, I shuddered.

"Why, this certainly is a friendly little town," Jimmy Ray said as we walked to the car. The sun was actually trying to come out, and the temperature was, if not warm, at least not terribly cold. "Let's go check this town out."

I had a bad feeling about this. "Come on, Jimmy Ray," I begged. "We've done enough damage for one day. Besides, it's Saturday afternoon. The banks are probably closed."

"Why, Little Brother, this is the nineties. Banks stay open longer. I wouldn't mind finding just one more before we head south. Sides, you worry too much. You're gonna like the family business just as soon as your balls grow a little bigger."

It wasn't hard to find the main business district. Like most small towns, all we had to do was follow the street we were on until we came to a traffic light. There was even a sign pointing to the business district. The Main Street of Ovid (yes, the main business street was really called Main Street) was bustling with activity, but as I looked around, I could see there was something not quite right. Jimmy Ray didn't seem to notice, but Enos did. "Spooks," he said.

"Why, Enos," Jimmy Ray laughed. "You ain't callin' yourself a spook, are you?"

Enos's face clouded. For the first time, I began to realize that Enos didn't really like Jimmy Ray. I had a feeling not too many people did. I knew I didn't.

"No," Enos said, "I mean look at some of those folks. They're like ghosts."

He was right. Some of the people looked perfectly normal, but the majority looked almost transparent. It wasn't like in the movies, where you can see things on the other side of a ghost. Rather, it was as if you could almost see through them, but not quite.

"You need more coffee," Jimmy Ray said. "You're seein' things. Keep your eye on us, though, 'cause I think I just spotted us a target." He nodded at a gray stucco building on the corner with a simple sign over the large brass and glass doors declaring it to be the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank.

"Saturday afternoon and the bank's still open," Jimmy Ray sighed. "Ain't the nineties wonderful, boys?"

Enos pulled up near the front of the building, but not right in front. A casual observer would have thought that he was waiting for someone to come out of the Radio shack next door, or out of the offices over the bank. He parked directly across next to a glass office door on which black letters had been freshly painted proclaiming it to house the Law Offices of Susan Jager.

Jimmy Ray handed me my mask and smiled. "It's gonna be just like the last two times," he told me. "I'll get their attention and you fill the bags. Then, we're off for Texas, Little Brother."

The bank lobby was a carbon copy of the last two we had visited that day. It was conservative and tasteful, but not as extravagant as city banks. Farmers and small town merchants never felt comfortable putting all their money in a bank that ostentatiously proclaimed wealth. They expected the bank and the bankers to be as goldarned Midwestern conservative as they were.

Being Saturday, many of the desks were empty, but the teller lines were doing a brisk business. Three were busily accepting transactions while a fortyish, distinguished man in a suit chatted with a fourth teller. I didn't blame him. She looked to be early twenties and very attractive, although I noticed she had that almost-transparent look about her. She was certainly coming on to him. Several people in the bank were too busy watching the little soap opera to worry about us.

My appreciation of the teller was interrupted when Jimmy Ray yelled out, "All right! Everybody down on the floor now!"

Again, there was momentary confusion, but in seconds, all of the customers and employees of the bank had dived for the floor. Again, the earlier scene was repeated. Jimmy Ray strode over to the attractive teller, yanked her to her feet, and ordered her to fill the sacks I was carrying. Up until then, everything had been working right for my brother, but as the last of the money was stuffed in my bags, we heard a shot outside and the squeal of tires.

Jimmy Ray looked out the main window of the bank in time to see his old white Dodge fishtailing away from the curb and down the street. "What the fuck?" he yelled.

"Drop the gun!" a voice demanded. Jimmy Ray and I looked in the direction of the voice, near the main door of the bank. Standing there, gun at the ready, was the same cop I had seen at the burger joint. Had he followed us? He must have, or he would never have zeroed in on us so quickly. It looked as if my life of crime was going to be much shorter than even I had suspected.

I could see from his eyes that Jimmy Ray didn't plan to give up. Even with his car gone and a presumably trained law officer holding a gun on him, he still thought he had a chance. I didn't think so, though. I dropped the bags and raised my hands.

When I yelled, "Jimmy Ray no!" my words were cut off by three quick gunshots. He fired point blank at the officer, but somehow, he missed. I thought for a moment that I could see the officer actually move out of the way of the bullets. It was like one of those subliminal studies you participate in during a psychology lab where a single frame is placed in the middle of a scene. In that single frame, the officer seemed to dodge out of the way of the oncoming bullets.

Jimmy Ray couldn't believe it either, but as he prepared to fire again, one well-placed bullet fired from the officer's gun struck Jimmy Ray's gun, sending it flying in a wide arc across the room. It was the first time since I had hooked up with my brother that I found him at a loss for words. He slowly raised his hands, completely dumbstruck.

The officer led us out to his cruiser, parked almost directly behind the spot where our car had been parked. Enos must have seen the cruiser come up behind him and hauled ass before the officer could get the drop on him. No, that didn't sound quite right. If the cop had wanted Enos, he was fast enough to stop him. It was us that he wanted. Enos could wait.

"Dumb jig," Jimmy Ray muttered under his breath as we were pushed into the caged back seat. "Wait 'til I get my hands on that nigger."

"Yeah," I returned. "In about twenty years."

"Jails can't hold me," Jimmy Ray told me as we pulled away from the curb. "That's the difference between me and Daddy. He let hisself get caught. Me? I got away."

Not this time, I thought to myself. It would be a couple of days, though, before I realized how prophetic I had been.

We were ushered into adjoining cells in what had to be the strangest jail I could ever imagine. The only police officer I saw was the one who had captured us. There was no one at the front desk, and no one in the halls or offices. I knew this Ovid was a small town, but surely it had more than one officer working at any given time.

"I'm Officer Mercer," the policeman said when we had been safely locked in our cells. "The Judge will see you both first thing Monday morning. Until then, if you need anything, you can talk to me."

"I want a lawyer!" Jimmy Ray snapped.

"You'll have appropriate legal counsel when the Judge thinks it's necessary," Officer Mercer said crisply.

“What the hell are you talkin’ about?” Jimmy Ray exploded. “That’s un-American. You gotta read us our rights and get us a lawyer if we demand it. I’m demanding it!”

Officer Mercer merely smiled and walked away.

“I’ll be outta this two-bit jail so fast it’ll make your fuckin’ head spin!” Jimmy Ray yelled at the departing officer, who appeared not to notice.

Jimmy Ray chuckled, “These local yokels don’t have no idea what they’re doin’. They didn’t read us our rights or nothin’. I’ll tell you, Bobby Joe, this Officer Mercer is gonna look plumb stupid when this judge has to let us go on procedure.”

I was sure Jimmy Ray knew what the proper procedure would be, but as I sank back onto the clean bunk in my dimly-lit cell, I thought to myself that procedure in Ovid might be very different. I was soon to find out how right I was.

Jimmy Ray finally stopped his ranting and raving, so the rest of the day went quietly. Officer Mercer even provided me with a few magazines to pass the time. I wasn’t happy to be in a jail cell, but anything was better than being an unwilling participant in a crime spree with my psychopathic brother. I was just thankful no one had been killed in our little crime spree, including me. I had had visions of the last scenes in Bonnie and Clyde where their bullet-ridden bodies jumped in slow motion as round after round was poured into them.

I wasn’t looking forward to jail time, though. This had been my only experience in a cell, and although the room was clean and the bed actually more comfortable than I expected, I still lived with the knowledge that if I went to the steel-barred door and pushed with all my might, nothing would happen. I was going nowhere, except to another cell. Midwestern states are the home office of law and order. I could expect no mercy from the courts. Jimmy Ray and I would probably serve the same long sentence, in spite of the fact that I was a neophyte at the armed robbery business and Jimmy Ray had been doing it for his entire adult life.

I had had a decent life to look forward to, but now, I had nothing. No one would believe me when I told them I had nothing to do with the robberies. How could I make them understand that I was as much a victim as the people lying on the floor in the banks we had robbed? I would just have to do what I could. I would tell the truth and hope for a miracle.

After a surprisingly good dinner of roast beef and potatoes and a little more reading on my bunk, I fell asleep. I dreamed of the past; I dreamed of my mother. She had been a wonderful woman, deserving of more than the hard life she had. How had she linked up with my father? I had never really known, and the dream did nothing to tell me. In the dream, my mother was back at her old job at the coffee shop. She was wearing that terrible pink waitress dress seen in half the coffee shops in the country. I was there, too, on one of the stools, drinking coffee and watching her work. She looked tired, almost worn out.

Then, I looked down at my coffee cup as she poured me another cup. I watched as the dark brown liquid cascaded down into my cup, swirling as it hit. It seemed to be moving in slow motion, as if the cup would never fill. Then, I realized suddenly that I was the one pouring the coffee. I was pouring it for someone else who was sitting at the stool where I had been. I had seen him before, but I couldn't remember where. He was about forty or so, balding slightly along the front, his hair a mixture of brown and gray. He was wearing a dark gray suit. Where had I seen him before? Then I remembered. He was at the bank. He was the one talking with the attractive teller.

He looked up and smiled. "Thanks," he said, then looked back at his coffee.

I turned and looked in the mirror, but all I could see was my mother's reflection looking back at me in shock, and...

"Seven o'clock. Time to get up."

"What?" I mumbled, stirring in my bunk. Where was I? I wondered. Then I remembered. I was in jail.

“What do you hafta do to get a cup of coffee around this shithole?” Jimmy Ray yelled from the next cell.

“Watching your mouth would be a good start,” the cop said. I realized it was the same officer who had arrested us. Didn’t he ever sleep?

Individually, we were led to take a shower and given fresh clothes, if orange prison coveralls could be called clothes. When we got back to our cells, breakfast was waiting for us. Again, the food was surprisingly good, consisting of orange juice, steak and eggs, and coffee. I really hadn’t eaten this well as a student. The Ovid Police department must have an incredible budget, I thought.

It was nearly noon when I was interrupted again. I had thought my lunch was about to be delivered, but Officer Mercer was empty handed. “Your lawyer is here to see you,” he told me.

I was puzzled. I hadn’t called a lawyer. I wouldn’t even know who to call.

“Where’s my lawyer?” Jimmy Ray demanded from the next cell. Had I detected a note of concern from him? It did seem odd that the lawyer had come only to see me. What did that mean?

“It’s been taken care of,” Officer Mercer told him.

I was led to a small, Spartan conference room where a very attractive woman was waiting for me. She had long brown hair and wore a beige silk blouse and a camel skirt which, as she rose to meet me, I could see was quite short, displaying a fantastic pair of legs. I was in love. She straightened her glasses and offered her hand. “Susan Hen... er, Jager.”

She wore, I could see, a sparkling new wedding ring. That explained her confusion over her own name, I was sure. I offered my own hand, surprised to find her grip was strong like a man’s. Most women I had known offered only a limp hand, as if I was supposed to take it to my lips and kiss it gently. I found myself liking Susan Jager at once.

“Now,” she began once we were seated, “what’s your side of the story?”

“The story?”

She sighed, “Mr. Malone, you and your brother have been charged with three counts of armed robbery. If we’re lucky, I might be able to get you less than twenty years, but I don’t know. Your brother tried to use an Ovid police officer for target practice, so it won’t be easy.”

“Is that why you’re not representing him?” I asked. “Is he being brought up on additional charges?”

She looked at me very seriously. “Your brother robbed a bank in Fremont, Nebraska, three months ago, killing a teller who tried to press the alarm. A week later, he was involved in a robbery in Pueblo, Colorado, where he murdered a bank customer. It appears that he told everybody to get down on the floor, but a customer who was deaf didn’t understand. Your brother shot him in the back.”

I was sick. I knew my brother was a bad apple, but I had no idea he was the man he was. Man? No, he didn’t even deserve to be called a man. He was a monster. I had seen it in his eyes. He wanted someone to challenge him, just so he could watch them die. He even wanted me to challenge him, and I had no doubt that if I had, he would have shot me where I stood.

“Are you all right?” she asked.

“Not really,” I replied. “I just... didn’t realize... I mean, he’s my brother.”

She patted my hand. “Look, Mr. Malone, the Judge knows you didn’t have anything to do with the murders. If you had, we wouldn’t be talking now. You’d be... Well, let’s just say you’d be facing a different fate.”

“So what happens now?” I asked.

“You’ll be taken into court tomorrow,” she told me.

“For arraignment?”

“Yes, and trial.” She noticed the shocked expression on my face.

“Justice is swift in Ovid. You’ll be tried and sentenced tomorrow.

That's what makes this meeting so important. I have to see the Judge first thing in the morning if we're going to have any chance."

I told her everything I could think of. I knew I was fighting for my freedom. Who would believe a bank robber? I had been caught red-handed, and now I was going to be the recipient of justice that seemed to come out of an old western movie. 'Come on, boys, let's take him down to the judge for a fair trial and then hang him! Drinks are on me!' I shuddered at the thought.

"What do you think?" I asked my attorney after I had told her the entire story.

"I think we have a case, but I'm not sure what the results will be. Justice is a little different in Ovid. Sometimes, it isn't what you've done that gets you in trouble, but rather what you haven't done."

I scowled. "I don't think I understand."

She gave a slight smile. "You will."

I was taken back to my cell after that. Jimmy Ray was leaning into the bars, obviously anxious to talk to me. "So you saw the lawyer, Little Brother. What did he say?"

"First of all, he was a she," I told him, "and she told me you're a murderer."

Jimmy Ray actually laughed. "You don't really believe that, do you Bobby Joe?"

"Yes, I do."

He was silent for a moment. Then, he said, "Bobby Joe, robbin' banks is a dangerous business. Sometimes, people get in your way."

"Like a deaf man who didn't know he was even in danger?"

"So? It happens, Little Brother. I started robbin' banks when I was fourteen. Then, it was Daddy and me. In all that time, I only had to shoot three people. Now, that ain't bad."

I couldn't believe what I was hearing. My own brother was justifying murder, and he actually believed he could make me understand. I couldn't. I never would. He had taken the lives of two innocent people, and now he was taking my life, just in a different way. Yet he still thought I would understand what he had done. There were actually tears in my eyes, but they were tears of anger.

"So what did the lawyer say, Little Brother?"

"Go to hell, Jimmy Ray."

To my relief, he said nothing. Me? I just slumped down on my bunk, feeling sorry for myself. I was too upset to eat lunch, and I just picked at my dinner. I went to bed early but didn't sleep well, worrying about my trial. Finally, I fell asleep and dreamed of my mother again, only this time, I was at her funeral. The service was apparently over, and I was standing before her casket, the only mourner.

Given my dream of the night before, I wouldn't have been surprised to suddenly find myself in the casket looking up. But that didn't happen. Instead, as I watched my mother at the start of her eternal sleep, her eyes suddenly opened wide. They searched the room, falling upon me. I wanted to run, but my feet refused to move. My mother was looking at me with tears in her eyes. Her lips formed words, but I couldn't quite hear them. Then, as I leaned down to hear her, a cold arm rested on my shoulder, and I heard my mother's voice saying, "Don't let it happen to you."

I was suddenly awake. It was morning—the morning of our trial. Today, I might be sentenced to many years behind bars. I was the accomplice of a hardened criminal—a murderer, no less. I hoped for some mercy, but I expected little.

We were given new clothes for our court appearance, consisting of white shirts, gray trousers, and black loafers. At least it felt good to be out of the jail coveralls, but I suspected it would be my last time in street clothes for many years.

The courtroom was at the opposite end of the long hall leading from the jail. Handcuffed and shackled, Officer Mercer led us past the city employees, bustling through their Monday morning. There was the smell of coffee in the air, and the sounds of conversation and even laughter. I longed to be one of them, living a boring life in a small town. I would have even been one of the transparent people, whoever or whatever they were. I would have been anyone right then, except myself and my brother.

Jimmy Ray affected a casual swagger, as if he didn't have a care in the world. There was even a grin on his face. I wondered if he had managed to 'beat the rap' before, and how he planned to do so having been caught with his hand in the cookie jar, as it were.

The courtroom was far nicer than I would have expected in a small town. It looked very much like the pictures I had seen of larger courtrooms in the big cities. Expensive wood panelling was in evidence, and everything from the carpet to the paint on the walls looked fresh and new.

Susan Jager was waiting for me. She looked to be the picture of the professional attorney in her navy blue suit, white silk blouse, and two-inch black patent heels. I fell in love with her all over again. She put on her glasses and motioned me to sit next to her. Jimmy Ray started to slide in on the other side of her, but Officer Mercer grabbed him and pulled him before the bench.

"Hey! Where's my lawyer?" Jimmy Ray whined.

"Quiet!" Officer Mercer snapped.

Jimmy Ray looked frightened, probably for one of the few times in his life. He slouched down and said nothing.

Officer Mercer then called for all to rise. That didn't take long. The only spectator in the gallery was a very attractive blonde woman in a lavender suit. I had no idea what she was doing there. Maybe she was a reporter for the local newspaper, or maybe she just had nothing better to do.

The Judge was an impressive figure. He was, perhaps, fifty with hair that was mostly dark with just a hint of gray. Even from where I stood, I could see his gold rimmed glasses were expensive. He was tall, certainly over six feet, and walked with the confidence of a man who knows what he is doing.

“First case is the people of Ovid versus James Ray Malone.”

“Very well,” the Judge said in a deep voice. “How do you plead?”

Jimmy Ray’s look of nonchalant confidence changed to one of confusion. “How do I plead? Ain’t you supposed to read all the charges? And where’s my lawyer?”

The Judge sighed. “In the first place, reading all of the charges would be a waste of time. There are simply too many to mention, starting with killing that little girl’s cat back when you were thirteen.”

“Hey, wait a minute,” Jimmy Ray ordered defiantly. “How did you know?... I mean, you don’t have any proof about that.”

“You want proof?” the Judge thundered. “Your presence in this courtroom is all the proof I need. You see, I know you, Jimmy Ray. I know you better than you know yourself. I know you are a thief, a bully, and a murderer, and I only wish it were within the power of this court to bring back your victims. from the dead. I know that what beats in your breast isn’t a human heart. You don’t deserve to even resemble a human. Now, it’s time for your sentence.”

What kind of a trial was this? I wondered. There was no prosecutor, unless you considered the Judge to be one, and no defense attorney, as the only lawyer in the room was Susan Jager who sat wordlessly beside me. There was an atmosphere in the room that was building by the minute. It was an atmosphere of something out of phase, as if reality were being swept down the drain, replaced by something else.

I looked at my brother. Gone were the swagger and the self-confidence. Except for his face, he seemed unable to move. His face had contorted into a mask of fear. Perhaps for the first time in his life, he really had something to be afraid of, and that something was an unlikely middle-aged Judge who, perched on his bench in starched black robes, seemed to be imbued with an unearthly power.

“You have forfeited the right to be human,” the Judge decreed, following this with something which sounded like Latin, but not like the Latin I had heard in school. This Latin had the sound and inflections of a living tongue, as if the way we had pronounced it for years was nothing but a pale imitation of the true sound of the language.

“Do you know the difference between a steer and a bull, Jimmy Ray?” the Judge asked.

Jimmy Ray managed to shake his head in fear.

“Of course you don’t. You were raised on the streets of cities,” the Judge commented. “I was raised in a more agrarian world, and I know the difference well. You see, Jimmy Ray, a bull is a male bovine, capable of reproducing his own kind. Dull and uncaring, he serves a purpose, but there can be few bulls in a herd. They are too possessive, too unfriendly to other bulls. So ranchers castrate many of them when they’re young. These are what we have come to call steers.”

The cloying air was pierced with an inhuman scream from my brother as he doubled over, clutching at his groin in pain.

The Judge continued his lecture. “In this way, they are useful for only one thing. They are raised to maturity where they are taken to the slaughterhouse. The men there who kill and butcher them, have no more concern for the lives of the steers than you did for your victims, Jimmy Ray.”

My brother’s body was beginning to warp in ways the human body was never designed to be. He fell to the floor, trying to stand, but unable to balance on his legs. As his clothing disintegrated, I could see that his legs were no longer human. Instead, the joint had been reversed, and his feet were merging into a solid mass. Similar changes were occurring to his hands, and his entire body was sprouting short, wiry black hair.

“Do you remember the other day, Jimmy Ray, when you said ‘if they’re old enough to bleed, they’re old enough to butcher’? A prophetic statement, I must say,” the Judge laughed.

How could he have known that? Jimmy Ray had said that to us after we had admired the young waitress in the restaurant.

Officer Mercer slipped a rope around Jimmy Ray's thickening neck. He left it loose enough that it wouldn't choke him in his changing state. My brother already looked more bovine than human.

"Enjoy the rest of your short life, Jimmy Ray," the Judge said. "Think of this as if more traditional justice had sentenced you. You would be sentenced to die, and after years of appeal, they would eventually execute you. You just wouldn't know when. The same is true for you now. You will be a steer, munching grass and dreaming of satisfying heifers you can never have. Then, one day, you'll be led to a truck and taken to the slaughterhouse. But there will be no last-minute call from the governor to commute your sentence. All this you will know and continue to know until the end, but you will be able to do nothing about it, for you are a steer, and you will act like a steer until the slaughterhouse ends your life as thoughtlessly as you ended the lives of your victims."

The thing that had been my brother let out a plaintive wail that was not quite bovine, but was certainly not human. With a jerk of the rope, he was led from the room, walking as best he could on newly formed legs. A tail was pushing its way out as he left, growing steadily longer and beginning to swish. It was the last I ever saw of Jimmy Ray.

"And now, it is your turn, Mr. Robert Joseph Malone," the Judge intoned.

Was this to be my fate as well? My attorney rose, gently pulling me to my feet as well. I was afraid I would not be able to stand, but somehow, I managed.

"What do you have to say for yourself, Mr. Malone?" the Judge asked, his voice still intimidating. I tried to speak, but nothing came out.

"What's the matter, Mr. Malone? Don't you want to tell us about how you had no part in these robberies. Don't you want us to know that you knew nothing of your brother's murderous past? Don't you want us to believe that you are just an innocent victim of your brother's nefarious schemes?”

Yes, I did, but I couldn't speak. No supernatural agency was preventing me from speaking; I was simply frightened. I knew in my heart that I would never be allowed to return to the life I had known. The only question was what shape my life would now take. Was I to become a steer like my brother, condemned to a short, meaningless life? Or would my sentence be lessened by mitigating circumstances, perhaps allowing me to be—what?

“Your Honor,” my attorney was saying, “I would like to point out to the court that my client has no record of previous arrests. There is sufficient reason to believe that he may have been an unwilling participant in these activities.”

“I suspect you are correct,” the Judge said calmly, much to my surprise, “but the Court must examine the consequences of these unwilling activities.” He turned to me and asked in a calm, almost friendly manner, “Mr. Malone, if you had not been apprehended on Saturday, what would have been your fate?”

What an odd question, I thought, but I managed to reply, “I'm not sure, Your Honor, but I prefer to think that I would have managed to get away from my brother.”

“But you had opportunities to get away on Saturday and didn't take them,” he pointed out. “I doubt of he would have shot you down when you stopped for lunch. In fact, the only place you were probably in any danger of being shot by your brother was during the actual robberies, wouldn't you agree?”

I didn't want to agree, but he was probably right. Jimmy Ray was too sly to bother to shoot me in a place where he couldn't make a clean getaway. In the restaurant, if I had made a move to get away, I could have gotten help from the police officer. But I hadn't. Now, I stood accused of the crime of indecision as well as that of robbery.

“I have heard your attorney speak on your behalf. She has presented valid arguments for mitigating circumstances,” the Judge said more gently.

My heart skipped in the hope of a dismissal, or at least a light sentence, but then, the Judge continued, "In light of these arguments, I sentence you to a loss of fifteen years. Sentence is to be carried out at once. Officer Mercer, you will escort the prisoner to the appropriate place where the sentence will be administered."

"Yes, Your Honor."

I looked at my attorney. "That's it? I have to do fifteen years in prison? Isn't there any way to appeal?"

Ms. Jager shook her head. "We can talk about it some time when you're settled in."

"Settled in? Where are they taking me?"

My questions went unanswered. As the Judge's gavel rapped the adjournment of court, I was led by the iron grip of Officer Mercer out of the courtroom. No one would say a word to me. I suppose I should have felt grateful. I had seen the strange magic the Judge could perform. I could have been on a truck with my brother, facing a short life as beef on the hoof. Fifteen years in jail was certainly more preferable, if somewhat more mundane than I had expected.

I was led out of the building to Officer's Mercer's waiting patrol car. As I was pushed gently into the back seat, I fully expected to be driven immediately to a prison. At least, I was still human. What possible agency could change my brother from a human to a steer? It was beyond anything I had ever imagined. It was... magic. There could be no other word for it. I was majoring in biology, and I knew what it would take to change a human into another creature. It was beyond the realm of any scientific process that could even be imagined. Yet, it had been done. Perhaps, I thought, consoling myself, my sentence to prison was not so bad after all.

As Officer Mercer pulled out of the parking lot and onto the streets of Ovid, I began to realize that I was not feeling well. At first, I thought it was just the aftershock of my brother's transformation and my sentence, but then, I began to realize it was more than that. Every part of my body seemed to be undergoing minor spasms, as if it was undulating like molded Jell-O. I lifted a hand to my face with difficulty. It was as if my limbs would no longer obey my commands. Was I having a stroke, brought on by the intense pressures of the last few days?

To take my mind off the spasms, I looked out the window of the car. We were travelling through a residential part of town with very nice middle-class houses. Surely this was not the way to the prison. Prisons are never built in pleasant residential areas, and the street did not look like a main thoroughfare leading to another part of town. In fact, the street got narrower, more like a country lane, and the houses became even larger and more opulent.

At last, we came to a halt in the half-circle driveway of one of the largest houses. It was a white two-story, with columns in front. Although a fairly new home, it had obviously been designed to remind one of the days of Southern plantation homes. If this was to be my prison, I thought with an ironic smile, the Oklahoma Department of Corrections was given too much money.

Officer Mercer opened the car door, allowing fresh, cool air to wash over my face. "I don't think I can stand," I told him, trying without success to pull myself out of the car.

"I'll help you," he replied, gently taking my arm. It was as if a sudden burst of energy coursed through my system, and I was on my feet, albeit unsteadily, in moments. He escorted me up the stairs to the large double doors. He then pushed open the door, which I was surprised to see was unlocked, and led me into the house.

If the exterior of the house had been impressive, the interior was even more so. Everything about the house, from the carpets and drapes to the ceramic figures on walnut tables, spoke of money, and not just new money, but generations of money.

Officer Mercer led me to a large, circular staircase. I shook my head, though, and said in a voice which cracked oddly, "I don't think I can make it up the stairs."

"Yes, you can," he said confidently. "Here, let me help you."

To my surprise, he put his arm around my waist, much as he might have with a woman. Again, I felt a small burst of energy course through me, and with his help, negotiated the stairs. He led me to a bedroom which was larger than my entire apartment. With the last of my strength, I fell onto the large king-sized bed with a sigh. Officer Mercer carefully straightened me out on the bed, until my head rested on a large, fluffy pillow.

“You’ll feel better in a little while,” he predicted with the first smile I had seen him give since the restaurant. I didn’t reply, though, for my eyes closed and the world became dark.

I awoke to the sound of a slamming door. As the sleepiness retreated, I felt... different. There was a tickling sensation at the sides of my jaws, extending down to my neck, and I felt a strange weight on my chest. Slowly, I opened my eyes. In what I was to discover was late afternoon light, I looked down at myself. Two large mounds stood like symmetrical hills on my chest. I knew at once what they were. I gasped, hearing a higher pitched voice than I was used to. I pushed myself upright and saw the rest of my body. I was wearing a pale blue dress of some silky material, and my breasts as gravity pulled on them looked even bigger than they had when I was lying down. I looked below the dress. From the bottom of the knee-length skirt, two well-proportioned, slim legs covered in nylon dangled, barely touching the floor.

I raised my hands and stared at them. My hands were small and patrician, with long graceful fingers ending in long shaped nails painted a delicate pink. As if this wasn’t bad enough, there was a wedding ring with a large brilliant diamond on my left hand.

I jumped to my feet and rushed to a full-length mirror, feeling the odd sensation of my breasts swaying inside the cups of my new bra. I stared into the mirror, and an attractive older woman looked back at me. She—I—was perhaps forty, with medium length dark blonde hair, laced here and there with a silver strand of hair. My face was attractive, the makeup subtle, with just a hint of crow’s feet at the corners of my hazel eyes. I was well built, and I realized that as a younger woman, I would have turned heads. Unlike many women of forty, I had kept my figure, it appeared. I looked to be about five six or so.

There was a purse on the bed. I walked over to it and withdrew a wallet from it. There it was, my driver's license. I looked at it, seeing my new face smiling back at me in a reasonably decent photo. My name was Rachel Tilton, and I was not forty, but only thirty-seven. I thanked god for the three years. It was better to lose fifteen years than eighteen.

Lose fifteen years—where had I heard that before? Then I remembered. The Judge had sentenced me not to fifteen years in prison, I realized, but rather to the loss of fifteen years. He had taken away my youth as surely as a prison sentence would have done. He had not only changed my sex, but my generation as well. I was practically as old as my mother would have been if she had lived. I shuddered at the sudden realization that I was now the age she had been at her death.

I grew up listening to Depeche Mode and Smashing Pumpkins. Now, I was part of a generation that had grown up with ELO and Steely Dan. I was a Baby Boomer. Instead of growing up with Mad About You and Seinfeld, I belonged to a generation that had been weaned on shows now seen only on Nickelodeon. It was ironic. If I had been turned into a girl my original age, I might have been able to cope, but now, how could I pass myself off as an older woman? I simply lacked the experience.

My wallowing in self-pity was interrupted by a sudden knock on my door. "Are you all right?" It was a girl's voice, young and sweet. I didn't really know how to answer her. Was I all right? Hell no, I wasn't. I was supposed to be a man. I had done nothing to deserve this fate. Even fifteen years in jail didn't seem so bad to me now as long as I had those fifteen years to live and kept my penis as well. On the other hand, if I lived in this house—and I assumed that I did—I was very well off. I might be a woman, but I was apparently a very well-to-do one.

The door opened. I turned and saw a young girl of thirteen or fourteen staring at me. She looked like a younger version of the woman I had become, perhaps three inches shorter than my new height, her hair short to mid length and blonde surrounding an angelic face. She wore only a minimum of makeup, but she didn't need much. Even the ragged jeans and the red and white University of Oklahoma sweatshirt she wore could do little to disguise the fact that she was a beautiful young girl well on her way to becoming an even more beautiful young lady.

She looked at me, eyes wide, and blurted, "You're real!"

"I suppose I am," I replied with a sigh, then added, "whatever real is."

"Do you..." she began hesitantly. "Do you remember who you were?"

Anywhere else but Ovid, it would have been an odd question, but here, I knew what she meant. "Yes," I responded with trepidation. Was everyone in Ovid originally someone or something else?

The girl sat down on the bed. "Well isn't this a kick in the ass?" she muttered to herself, quite out of character for a young girl, I thought.

"What's going on here?" I asked, sitting on the bed next to her.

"Well, for starters, you're my mother," she responded with a sly grin.

"Of course, you know you're not my mother. That's better than the shade who was my mother before. She thought she was really my mother. That was a pain in the ass, I can tell you."

"Shade? What's a shade?" I asked.

"The people you can sort of see through," she replied.

So that was what Enos had called ghosts just a couple of days before.

"But what are shades? I mean, where do they come from?"

She shrugged. "Who knows? They're sort of like zeroes in a big number. They're just placeholders until you put a real number in their place."

"That's pretty good math for —what?—a thirteen-year-old?" I observed.

“Please,” she said sarcastically, “I’m no more a thirteen-year-old girl than you are my thirty-seven-year-old mother. And besides, I’m fourteen and a freshman in high school. At least that’s what I am now. Before, I was majoring in education in college with plans to be a high school football coach and math teacher. So much for that idea, huh?”

“But how can this be happening to me?” I wanted to know.

“The question should be how can this be happening to us? You know the answer to that. You’ve already been introduced to the Judge.” It wasn’t a question. Apparently she had met the Judge well before I had.

“So how can the Judge do this to me—us?” I asked. “How can he have magic powers? This isn’t possible.”

She stood up and pulled me to my feet, leading me to the mirror. “Just take a look at yourself, sweetheart, and tell me again how this is impossible. You know damned good and well that it’s possible. Oh, you’ll wake up a morning or two and hope before you open your eyes that it was all just some weird nightmare brought on by too much pizza and beer, but then, you’ll open your eyes and see those breasts in front of you and look down to see what’s missing between your legs and you’ll know it wasn’t just a dream.

“As to your questions about the Judge, you’ll have to figure out that for yourself. The Judge doesn’t like his real identity discussed by anyone. I can’t tell you any more than that. It won’t take you very long to figure it out.”

“All right,” I agreed. I suppose it didn’t really matter for the moment anyhow. “So I assume you’re supposed to be my daughter?”

She actually smiled at me. “Hey, I like that. ‘Supposed to be.’ That fits. Yeah, you’re supposed to be my mother. In this little fantasy world the Judge has cooked up, I’m Jennifer Tilton, only child of Charles and Rachel Tilton, one of Ovid’s finest old families. But I remember who I really was, even if the poor person who became Charles Tilton doesn’t remember a thing of his past life. It’s been enough to drive me crazy, with that shade of a mother and my clueless imitation father constantly wringing their hands and demanding that their dear little daughter be more feminine.”

“I assume you don’t want to be more feminine,” I commented, sitting once more on the bed.

“Of course not,” she said, hands on her hips. “Before Ovid, I wasn’t even a girl. I was twenty-one and about to graduate from college. I played football for Northwest Missouri State. I was a starting tackle for the team, so you can imagine my size as a male. Then, our plane got forced down in Ovid a little over a year ago last fall. The next thing all of us knew, we were changed into other people. I really got the short straw, though.”

“How do you figure?”

She looked at me, startled. “What do you mean? Haven’t you been listening. I was a man.”

“So was I,” I countered.

“And you don’t mind being a female?” she asked derisively. “What were you—a fruit?”

I felt my face turn red. “No, I wasn’t a fruit. I was completely heterosexual. What I meant was that you’re healthy, attractive, well off, and young. You actually gained a few extra years to live,” I said, feeling the bitterness creep into my voice. “I got the same dose you got, only I’m fifteen years older than before.”

“How about that,” she muttered softly. “That means you and I must have been about the same age before Ovid. Were you in college, too?”

“Wichita State,” I replied.

“We were supposed to play you in football sometime.”

“Next year, I think,” I agreed.

“Isn’t that weird?” she said, shaking her head. “We both go from college guys to cunts in the wink of an eye.”

I winced at the word 'cunt.' I had never liked the term; I had more respect for women than to use the word loosely. Also, I didn't like the fact that I now had one of my very own.

"What's the matter?" she asked, seeing my displeasure.

"I don't like to think of myself as a cunt," I told her.

"But that's what you are," she countered. Then, her shoulders sagging, added, "and so am I."

"Wait a minute. When you were a guy, did you call yourself a dick?" I asked.

She looked a little startled. "Of course not! If a guy is a dick, he's... he's..."

"Something of an asshole," I finished for her with a laugh.

She grinned in response. "Well... yes."

"So why should you consider yourself a cunt?" I asked seriously.

She was silent, but I could see she had never stopped to consider this line of reasoning before. I broke the silence for her.

"Look, I'm going to need your help. You've been here for more than a year. I guess that means you're stuck being Jennifer forever and I'm stuck being Rachel and your mother. Why don't we try to help each other?"

"How?"

I sighed. Jennifer had been so busy being angry for the past year that she had never considered the positive side of things. I would have given anything to take her place. True, I would have still been a girl, but I thought I could have coped with that in exchange for having my teen years over again as the privileged offspring of a wealthy family instead of the underprivileged son of a woman who was killing herself just trying to keep her family fed. For that matter, there were probably others in Ovid who would have gladly exchanged the life the Judge had given them for Jennifer's life. I couldn't tell her that, though. She was too bitter to accept the truth.

“Well,” I began, choosing my words carefully, “I think you can help me to understand who Rachel Tilton really is. You can help me fit in. You’ll have to help me be a woman. I mean, I don’t know the first thing about being female.”

She studied me for a moment before asking a little defiantly, “Okay, if I do that, what’s in it for me?”

“A fair question,” I replied. “I gather you haven’t gotten along very well with your shade mother.”

She snorted, “That’s an understatement. She was nothing but an aging bimbo.”

I felt an uncomfortable turn in my stomach as I visualized what that must have meant. I don’t know which bothered me more—the bimbo part or the aging part.

“She wanted me to be the same way she was when she was my age,” Jennifer went on. “She wanted me to wear dresses and more makeup and defer to all the boys. She even tried to pick out the right sort of boy for me. Do you know who she picked?”

“She picked Chester Thurman! Can you imagine? No, I know you can’t. Chester is really Chester Martin Thurman the Fourth, son of Ovid’s richest man. And he’s an idiot! He thinks he’s... he’s god’s gift to women. He thinks a girl should just fall down on her knees in front of him and suck on his dick! I can’t stand him!”

“What does he think about you?” I asked.

“Think about me? I don’t think he ever thinks about anyone but himself. Barry says it’s a good thing he’s just a shade or...”

“Wait a minute!” I pleaded. “You’re going too fast! Who is Barry?”

“Barry is one of the guys I played football with before Ovid. He’s one of the lucky ones.”

“Lucky? How?” I prompted.

“Well, for starters, he’s still a guy. Even though his dad is just an assembly worker out at Vulman Industries, he got to be a guy instead of a little Miss Rich Bitch like me. And, he remembers who he was.”

“Doesn’t everybody?”

“Nope,” she said. “Maybe one in four or five people remember who they were. Charles Tilton, your husband, is one of the ones who doesn’t have a clue who he was before. I don’t know either. I just came home one night and he was real, but he acted just like the shade he replaced.”

“So what’s he like?” I wanted to know.

“Wait a minute. I asked what was in it for me, and the next thing I know, I’m giving you all of this for free.”

“Okay,” I sighed, “here’s the way I see it. You’ve been changed into a thirteen-year-old girl, and you...”

“Fourteen.”

“Okay, a fourteen-year-old girl. Anyhow, that means your parents still pretty much have control of your life, especially in a small town like Ovid. Am I right so far?”

She nodded carefully.

“So,” I concluded, “I can make life a lot easier for you. I mean, we were both young men and now we’re women, so we should be natural allies. I don’t want to be a bimbo, aging or otherwise, and I’m not going to turn you into one either.”

“That sounds fair,” she agreed, sitting beside me on the bed again. “I just see one problem in all of this.”

“What’s that?”

“Well,” she began slowly, “I think you should know, Charles may be about ready to break up this happy home of yours.”

I felt that sinking feeling again. “What do you mean?”

“You two aren’t exactly on the best of terms. Rachel has her own life of women’s groups and too much wine at dinner, and Charles has his work and probably has a girl friend. You two don’t even sleep together anymore.”

“We don’t?”

She shrugged again. “It’s a big house. He took one of the other bedrooms last fall.”

I wasn’t anxious to play the dutiful wife, fulfilling my husband’s every sexual fantasy, but I wasn’t ready to play the aging, drunken jilted wife either. I had watched my own father leave my mother, and although Mom and I were glad to see him go, there were many difficulties as a result.

“If there’s a breakup, who would get custody of you?” I asked cautiously.

“Well, Charles has all the money and all the power. He’s got the sharpest lawyer in Ovid, he plays golf with the Judge, and he thinks he loves his dear little daughter, so figure it out.”

I could figure it out with ease. I would be portrayed as the drunken wife, a poor mother who couldn’t control her daughter, and I would be out on my ear. It wasn’t a pleasant prospect, and I didn’t really have a clear game plan as to how to prevent this worst-case scenario from occurring. I really knew only one thing: if I was to succeed in my new role, I would need not only information from Jennifer, but her cooperation as well.

“Look,” I began, “we can really help each other. If I’m going to be able to help you, I need to be here. If it looks like you and I have a good mother-daughter relationship, my case is strengthened. Then I can concentrate on keeping Charles in check. Do you agree?”

“I think so,” she said slowly, tossing her head in an unexpectedly feminine manner to sweep her hair away from her face. “You think that if I play along and act like a good girl, you can make my life a little more pleasant.”

“That about sums it up. I think we really need each other. Is it a deal?” I asked, holding out my hand.

She thought about for a moment. Then, a reluctant smile came over her face and she gripped my hand in her smaller one as strongly as her feminine muscles would allow. "It's a deal."

Our eyes met. She had soft brown eyes, and I could see the pain in them. There were actually small tears forming in them. She broke her grip and looked away suddenly. "Well, okay then," she said with a little quaver in her voice. She gulped and brought her voice back to normal. "If I'm going to help you, I need to know more about you. I know you were male and in your early twenties, but what did the Judge bring you to trial for?"

"Well," I answered reluctantly, "do you remember the bank robbery last Saturday?"

"Of course." Her eyes suddenly became wide. With a gasp, she said, "You mean you were one of the bank robbers?"

"Yes," I admitted.

To my surprise, she began to roar with laughter. "This is rich!" she said between spasms of laughter.

"What's so funny?" I demanded.

"Well, for starters, you're married to the president of the bank you robbed!"

I couldn't help it. I began to laugh, too.

It turned out that Charles would be home late that night. The monthly Board of Directors meeting for the bank was being held at the Ovid Country Club, and spouses were thankfully not invited. That meant Jennifer had plenty of time to brief me on a number of subjects, from feminine personal hygiene to makeup and clothing to hairstyling. In spite of the fact that she had done everything in her power to deny her femininity, she was surprisingly knowledgeable on each of the subjects.

"There were about half a dozen of us who were changed into girls and remembered who we had been," she explained. "We each knew we'd have to do what we could to fit in. Some did a better job than others. It's hard for me to understand, but I think a couple of them actually prefer being girls.”

“So you worked together to figure out how to be girls?” I asked.

“Pretty much. We had been teammates, so it was natural for us to work together. Sam Wallace was pretty much our leader.”

“Sam?”

“It’s short for Samantha,” she explained. “She’s one of the ones I told you about who actually seems happy to be a girl.”

“Well,” I ventured, “if she’s going to be one for the rest of her life, I guess she figures she might as well enjoy it.”

“Is that what you plan to do?” There was suspicion in her voice. She didn’t really want me to be happy being a woman. Misery loves company.

“I really don’t know,” I told her truthfully. “I guess all I want right now is to get through the first few days without making an ass of myself.”

She relaxed, accepting that answer. “I felt the same way. Then after a while, I realized it wasn’t going to work for me. The rest of my teammates starting talking about clothes and boys and giggling just like the ones who didn’t realize they had been changed. It was scary. By Christmas, none of them even wanted to talk about their old lives. I was pretty much alone.”

“It must have been hard for you,” I sympathized, instinctively putting my hand on her shoulder.

“It was,” she agreed, making no move to get away from my comforting hand. “Oh, Rachel, you have no idea how hard it’s been to... to...”

Her voice was breaking and there were big tears in her eyes. “Damn these female hormones anyway!” she snapped. “Everything I think about seems to start me crying. And if I don’t keep on my toes, I find myself acting like a girl.”

“What do you mean?” I prompted.

“I’ll give you an example. Your lipstick is smeared a little. Here.” She handed me a tube of lipstick.

“What am I supposed to do with this?” I asked.

“Just let yourself go. Don’t think about anything. Just relax.”

I did as she suggested, allowing myself to ‘veg out.’ I just stared at my reflection in the mirror. I found myself looking critically at my face, and without a thought, I had uncapped the lipstick, and carefully reapplied a thin coat to my lips, blotting it daintily with a tissue. The spell was broken when she said, “Do you see what I mean?”

“Wow!” I breathed. “It all seemed so natural to me. I felt as if I had been doing that all my life.”

“It’s part of the spell on you,” she explained. “At first, it helps you over the rough spots so you can function like the person you’re supposed to be. You’re actually thankful for it at first. But I think after awhile, it becomes the master instead of the slave. You start to actually think like the person you’ve become. You start to lose yourself in your new role.”

I could hear the fear in her voice. She didn’t want to lose her old self. Maybe she didn’t have to, I thought. After all, self is nothing more than the sum of all of our experiences and how we deal with them. I was still Robert Joseph Malone, and all of the things that had made me that person were still there. I was one of the lucky residents of Ovid, I realized. I knew who I had been, and I had nothing to be ashamed of, except for my sorry performance that had led me to this fate. I planned to keep on being who I was, even if I was now called upon to be Rachel Tilton.

“Tell me about your old life,” I suggested.

“Why?”

“It might make you feel better to know you still remember it,” I explained.

“Well,” she began, “I grew up in Iowa, around Des Moines. My name then was Jason Albright. I was kind of a big kid from a big family. Dad was a farmer. So I grew up on a diet of hard work and beef and potatoes. I was a pretty good student, too. I was especially good in math, so when I graduated from high school, I decided to be a math teacher. I had played a lot of high school football, so I was able to get an athletic scholarship at Northwest Missouri State."

"It sounds like a pretty good life," I commented.

"It was," she sighed, "and I really miss it."

"What do you miss the most?" I asked.

"I don't know," she responded. "I'm just too little and weak now. I think I could deal with this girl stuff if I were bigger."

I said honestly, "I don't think you'll get much bigger. Maybe you'll be as tall as me, but that's about it. What about the other stuff?"

"Other stuff?"

"Are you still a good student?"

"Sure, I do well in class." She suddenly looked uncomfortable. "Oh god! I forgot to tell you, though. The school psychologist wants to meet with you tomorrow morning at ten. I said that was just before your Ovid Women's Club meeting at the Country Club, but she insisted."

"Do you know why she wants to see me?" I asked.

"Why do you think? I'm a square peg in a round hole," she said evasively.

"All right," I agreed. "But you'll have to write down instructions so I can find your school."

She did, and then we went over a few other details of my life.

Apparently I had a college degree, which was a pleasant surprise for me. Of course, I didn't feel like I had earned it, but at least I had it, and from a good school, too. It turned out that I had gone to Tulane and majored in Psychology. I had been raised around Houston, so my Texas accent hadn't changed much. It was in college that I had met Charles, and we were married right after school.

She told me about Ovid as well. By the time she was finished, I at least had some idea of where things were in Ovid and who was who. I was grateful for her help. I was sure most people who were transformed had to learn everything the hard way, or at least those people who remembered who they were before.

After another hour or so of briefing, I was beginning to think I could pull off the masquerade. Of course, I had yet to meet Charles, and Jennifer wasn't much help in determining what was going wrong with the marriage. Apparently, Charles and Rachel Tilton were already having difficulties when she was placed in her role.

"I feel as if my head will explode if I learn another thing," I said with a groan. It was already dark outside, and the nearest clock said it was six o'clock. "Maybe we'd better get something to eat."

"Sounds good to me," Jennifer agreed. "Uh, you can cook, can't you?"

I grew up cooking. Since Mom often had to work late, I had become a pretty decent cook. With my limited budget, I had been able to whip up some pretty decent meals when I got to college, too. I didn't want to let Jennifer off the hook, though. "I can cook a little," I finally answered uncertainly. "I mean, mostly what I cook comes out of a box."

"Well, I guess the two of us can figure out something," she replied reluctantly. "I had to take Home Ec this year, so I can do fairly well in the kitchen."

She could, too. She prepared a great chicken dish with just a couple of chicken breasts, bottled salsa, and plain yogurt. I thought it smelled great as I made up a couple of simple salads for us. In short order, we had a very tasty meal in front of us. It was one of the most fun dinners I had had in a long time. We talked about everything we could think of. Both of us liked sports, so we avidly discussed basketball, both of us agreeing that Utah would knock off Chicago in the NBA Finals later that spring. But it was football that was Jennifer's real passion. I began to think she knew the name of every guy who had ever played the game.

"Were you a pro prospect?" I asked over the last bite of chicken.

She shook her head with a shy smile. "No, not me. I was just a big old farm boy who was too strong to get pushed out of the way. That's why I was on offense. All I had to do was stand there and make sure nobody got to the quarterback. I was good at it, but not good enough to make it to the pros. Hell, Northwest Missouri State was the biggest school to offer me a scholarship. Barry was about our best pro prospect. Of course, his name wasn't Barry then. But he was a great halfback. He still is, the lucky stiff. He's still good in all sports. He's the same year in school that I am and he's already playing varsity football and basketball."

"What's this Barry like?" I asked, pushing back from the table so I could cross my legs. I remembered to do so in a demure, ladylike fashion.

Her smile got even wider. "Oh, he's really nice. We were good friends in college, and now he's about the only friend I've got. Sometimes when I'm with him, I sort of forget that I'm a girl. It's just like old times."

"Jennifer, I'm very new at this," I confessed. "What's it going to be like, being a girl?"

"Well," she said, the smile growing a little mischievous, "it's going to be a little different for you. I'm still a sweet young virgin and you're a married woman."

There was a question I wouldn't be able to ask her: what was it like to have sex with a man? It was the first time I had even asked it of myself. Of course, deep down, I had known that if I was to make this marriage work, there would be a time in which it had to be consummated. I didn't look forward to that time.

"Okay, but besides that," I clarified. "You don't seem to like it much."

"I don't like the helplessness of it. I don't like being tied down on the railroad tracks by the villain and have to wait for the hero to show up and rescue me."

"Is that the way it is for girls in Ovid?" I asked. "It sounds like the way it was a couple of generations ago."

She shook her head. "Don't be fooled. Ovid is just like any other town in that regard. When I was a guy, I thought there was equality of the sexes, too. I mean, you heard about it all the time. There were women doctors and lawyers and even women jet pilots. But the prejudices are still out there. Look at me. I'm a natural at math, but do you know what happened to me when I turned in my first A math paper? The teacher said it was so good he wanted to know which of the boys in the class had been helping me. Hell, I was helping most of them!"

Our conversation was interrupted by the sound of a garage door going up.

"Oh-oh," Jennifer said with a start. "It's time to go into our act. Charles is here."

Moments later, a dapper man of about forty stepped into the house from the garage. He wore a well-tailored dark blue pinstripe suit and conservatively patterned red tie over a still-crisp white shirt. He had receding light brown hair just starting to go gray at the temples. He was very distinguished-looking, and a new part of me that had never been there before noticed that he was quite attractive as well. He was also the man I had seen in the bank talking in such a friendly manner to the attractive young teller. So this was Charles Tilton. "Hi," was all he said, to no one in particular.

"Hi, dear," I said in as casual a manner as I could muster. I was trying to hide the fear that he would look at me and scream, "Impostor!" He did look at me quizzically. I suddenly realized that it had probably been a long time since Rachel had called him 'dear.' I found myself wondering if the attractive teller at the bank was his mistress.

"How was the board meeting?" Jennifer asked. I noticed she didn't call him 'Dad.'

"All right," he said noncommittally, resting his brief case against the kitchen island. He looked at the remains of our dinner. "Rachel, are you feeling all right?"

Now what had I done wrong? "I'm fine. Why?"

“I don’t see any wine out on the table. I thought you always had wine with your dinner,” he explained.

I shrugged. “I just didn’t feel like drinking anything tonight. Jennifer made a great chicken dish, and...”

“Jennifer made dinner?” I think this was a greater shock for him than the absence of wine. “Did I walk into the wrong house?”

I don’t know what possessed her to do it, but a wicked flash shot through Jennifer’s eyes as she got up from the table and gently hugged Charles. “Oh, Daddy, I love to cook. I learned this recipe in Home Ec. There’s more chicken if you want me to fix it for you.”

She said it in such a dreamy, little girl voice that it was all I could do to keep from laughing. I knew she had never treated him this way in her short existence as Jennifer.

“Uh no, thanks, honey,” he stammered. “I ate at the club. I’ll be in my study if anyone calls.” He rushed out of the room before we could reply.

I grinned at Jennifer. “What do you think you’re doing?”

“Just helping you out,” she grinned back. “If this whole idea of yours is going to work, I probably need to play the perfect daughter to your perfect wife. It was actually kind of fun to see him squirm like that. This could be the most fun I’ve had since I came to Ovid.”

“Then why don’t you do the dishes?” I suggested. “That will really blow his mind.”

“That’s a dirty trick!” she laughed, but she started loading the dishwasher anyway.

I made good use of the time. We had Charles off balance. That was a good start. It was time for me to confuse him even more. I hadn’t changed out of my skirt yet, so I decided to give him the full treatment. I tiptoed up to my bedroom and put on a pair of two-inch heels. Jennifer had made me experiment with them earlier, so I was fairly confident of my ability to negotiate the stairs in heels.

Charles was busily entering data on his computer as I walked in. He looked up, almost in amazement as I slowly walked across the room, trying not to look too obviously sexy. I walked behind him and put my hands on his shoulders. His muscles were tense, like my Mother's muscles had been after a long day of waitressing.

"You shouldn't still be working," I told him in a low voice as I rubbed his shoulders and neck. I was surprised to find that this activity was actually causing some interesting reactions in my own body. I felt my nipples stiffen and an unexpected tingling between my legs. I had no idea this body could get turned on so easily. I would have to be careful. "You've been working all day."

"I know," he agreed gruffly, "but I have to get this done tonight. I'm meeting with Eric Vulman of Vulman Industries in the morning. He wants us to finance a big military contract for him. It's the biggest deal we've ever done with him, so I need to get this finished."

"Well, would you like some hot tea?"

He turned and looked up at me. I thought I could sense his expression softening. "Yes, I would. That would be very nice."

I turned to go. "I'll get it for you right now."

He suddenly, gently, grabbed my arm. "What's with Jennifer?" he asked as I turned back to him. I was sure he really wanted to ask what was with me as well.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, she never calls me 'Daddy.' Hell, she never calls me anything. It's as if she doesn't even consider me to be her father. Now, here she is, fixing dinner and hugging me. If she had been wearing anything but those rags she always has on, I would suspect that someone had replaced her with the Stepford Daughter or something."

"I think that was Stepford Wives," I smiled. At least he had a sense of humor.

"That's another thing," he went on. "There's something different about you, too."

“Me?” Little old me?

“Yes,” he continued. “You seem more... affectionate—more alive.”

This was a critical moment, I knew. I needed to tell him to come upstairs and I’d show him just how alive I really was, but in that moment, I froze. I just couldn’t do it. I knew in my heart that I was physically a woman, but I hadn’t seen what was between my legs with my own eyes yet. Hell, I hadn’t even gone to the bathroom yet. The thought of having a man down there was just too much for my overloaded mind to take.

The, suddenly, the moment was gone. The light that had begun to shine in his eyes retreated, and he gently released my arm. “Well anyhow, I like it. Now I have to get some work done.”

“Okay,” I said meekly, and I left him to his work.

Back in the kitchen, Jennifer was just finishing the dishes. “How did it go?”

“How did what go?” I asked.

“You and Charles,” she said softly so as not to be heard by him. She frowned. “It didn’t go all that well, did it?”

“I wouldn’t say that,” I replied, sitting down at the kitchen table, relieved to not be standing in heels. “It’s just that... just that...”

Now I knew how Jennifer had felt that afternoon. I could feel tears welling up inside me. Softly they spilled out. Jennifer rushed to my side and took my hand. “Come on, Rachel, what’s wrong?”

“I don’t think I can do it, Jennifer,” I sobbed softly. “To save this marriage, I’m going to have to go to bed with him, but I just don’t think I can.”

“I understand,” she said, squeezing my hand. “I’m not supposed to be going to bed with guys at my age, but I’ve thought about how I’m going to handle that when I’m older. I don’t think I can do it either. But what are we going to do? If you don’t—can’t—we’ve lost our chance. He’ll take me away from you, Rachel, and I couldn’t stand that. I’ve felt better having you around today than at any time since my transformation.”

I knew what she meant. In the short time that I had known her, I had felt myself becoming very close to her. Without her near me, I was afraid I would become just like she had been—bitter and resentful over what had been done to me.

With nothing better to do, we sat together in the den and watched television. As two former males, we sought out the sports channels and had soon lost ourselves in a basketball game. The game had just ended when Charles stepped in the room. “What are you two watching?”

“A basketball game,” we said together, then started giggling at our identical answers.

Charles shook his head in confusion. “Well, I’m off to bed. Tomorrow will be a busy day at the bank. Good night, ladies.”

We both mumbled good night and sighed as he left. “This evening could have gone better,” I commented.

Jennifer patted my leg. “Tomorrow will go better.” Then she was off to bed.

I stayed up for another hour, idly surfing through the channels. The Tilton home was equipped with a satellite receiver, so I had more channels to surf through than I had even known existed. The Tiltons lived well, I realized as I shut down the set and headed off for bed. They lived well, but not happily. That had to change, I understood, and I was going to be the only one who could do it.

Using the toilet for the first time was a new experience for me, and really the first time I had a chance to be completely aware of the strange absence between my legs. Sitting to pee wasn’t so bad; every male did it occasionally. The odd sensation was that of having liquid practically spill from my body like an overturned glass rather than the pressure of liquid I had felt as a male.

As I got ready for bed, I finally took the time to privately examine this body I had been given. Whatever misuse this body had experienced from too much wine, there was no apparent damage. I suspected the drinking was part of a vicious circle. Perhaps Charles began to ignore Rachel and she was forced to find solace in a bottle. As the drinking got worse, he began to ignore her more. Add to this the strain of a daughter with problems of her own which the parents couldn't even imagine and you had a runaway truck about to hit a brick wall. Dysfunctional didn't even begin to describe the Tilton family.

I stood naked in front of the mirror carefully appraising my assets. My breasts were still round and fairly firm with little evidence of middle age sag. Likewise, my hips were maybe a bit wide and the waist an inch or so thicker than I might have wished for, but it was a body which would still turn a few heads if you dressed it in a two-piece swimsuit.

When I had been a young man in my early twenties, late thirties had seemed like the age to buy a walker and check into cemetery plots. I even had personal evidence of that. I had seen my mother hobbling about in her last year or two, and she never lived to see forty. Now that I had suddenly been advanced to my late thirties, I didn't feel as if I looked all that old. I wondered if I was just unusual or if most women in their late thirties were still somewhat young in appearance.

I slipped on a nightgown and got ready for bed. I still wasn't tired, so I looked around for something to read until I got sleepy.

Then, on a bookshelf in my bedroom, I spotted an almanac. I had always enjoyed thumbing through them, and I knew they usually had a list of the birth dates of famous people. It wouldn't hurt, I thought, to take a look at who my new contemporaries were. Demi Moore was a little older, I thought. I looked her up. No, she was younger, but only by a year. Then I spotted Michelle Pfeiffer. To my amazement, she was actually over forty. How could that be? Catwoman was over forty? Jane Seymour was even older. She was a good ten years older than me. And what about Meg Ryan? Everybody's favorite girl next door was my age!

I wasn't sure who my competition was for Charles, I thought as I drifted off to sleep, but a woman Meg Ryan's age certainly should have a fighting chance.

"Rachel!"

Who was Rachel? I didn't care. I was warm and cozy in my bed, although something didn't seem quite right...

"Rachel, wake up!"

"Huh?" I mumbled, suddenly remembering in the back of my mind that I knew someone named Rachel. I sat up, feeling the odd sensation of my breasts dropping and my nipples running across the silky nightgown I wore. Oh yeah, I remembered. I was Rachel.

"I didn't want you to oversleep," Jennifer explained, smiling as I opened my eyes. To my delight, she was holding out a glass of orange juice for me. And to my surprise, she was attired in a very feminine fashion. She wore a white cable knit sweater, a gray skirt which came a couple of inches above her knees, white tights and gray shoes with just a small heel. She even wore a gold necklace and matching earrings.

"A new image for you?" I asked, sipping my juice. It was sweet and cold, just the way I liked it.

"Pretty much," she admitted. "Old Charley actually seemed to like my little girl routine last night. I thought I'd give it a try at school. I suppose if I look like the nice feminine daughter, it makes you look like a more fit mother."

"I suppose it does," I agreed, standing up and stretching. "Is Charles up?"

"Up and gone," she replied. "He had a breakfast meeting. Don't worry, though. Rachel never got up to fix breakfast. Charles is a cereal and juice kind of guy in the mornings."

"Did Rachel and Charles ever talk?" I asked, searching through my closet for something to wear. How did women ever choose the right outfit when they had such a variety of clothing to pick from?

“Not very often,” Jennifer said, picking a tan two-piece suit and a brown blouse for me. “Wear the two-inch brown heels over in that blue box on the shelf.”

“You know,” I observed, “for someone who doesn’t like being a girl, you seem to have figured out how to be one.”

“I would probably have been locked up if I hadn’t,” she countered, selecting a beige bra and panties and tan pantyhose for me.

I slipped off the nightgown and picked up the panties.

“Uh,” Jennifer began, “before you put those on, you probably should shave your legs.”

I looked at my legs. There was only a tiny trace of stubble there. “Do I have to?”

“Only if you don’t want to look like the Bride of King Kong,” she grinned. “The easiest way is in the bathtub. Then, you can take a bubble bath. I hate to admit it, but I’ve come to like bubble baths. You probably will, too.”

“All right,” I sighed, turning on the water and adding some bubble bath. It smelled like lilacs.

“I’ll see you after school,” she said, tossing her hair back. “Do you have the directions to the school?”

“In my purse. Oh, is this psychologist real or a shade?”

“Just a shade,” she said over her shoulder. “Got to go or I’ll miss my bus.”

I heard the door slam just as I stepped into the tub. This was really my first time to be completely alone and reflect on what had happened to me. The day before, I had been practically in shock, and the long sessions with Jennifer had stuffed my brain with so many new facts that I hadn’t had much time to reflect.

As I eased my new body down into the tub, I could feel muscles I thought were permanently tight begin to loosen. As I sank into the water, the weight of my new breasts seemed to lessen, and I felt a pleasant sensation between my legs as the warm water caressed my vagina.

What would it feel like to have a man enter me there? I wondered. The water washing against my new sex actually felt pleasant. Would a penis be a pleasant sensation as well? I touched my clitoris and felt a sudden shiver of pleasure. I had touched a clitoris on several occasions as a man, but of course, it hadn't been mine. I wasn't the most experienced male lover in the world, but I suspected I had gotten my share. The girls I had been with had enjoyed being touched there. I now understood why.

Would I be able to play my new role all the way and make love to Charles? I still wasn't sure. I doubted if Rachel and Charles indulged in sex often if at all, but I knew I would have to do it if I was to save the marriage. Was it really that important, though? I was now a college graduate. I wasn't helpless. Even though Charles was a powerful man in Ovid, I might be able to get custody of Jennifer. We could leave him. Let him have his girlfriend, whoever she was. The more I thought about it, it had to be that young teller I had seen him with at the bank.

As I slowly stroked my new clitoris, I reconsidered those thoughts. Charles didn't seem to be a bad man—just a preoccupied one. Who could say what had driven him to be so distant with his family? Between Rachel's drinking and Jennifer's reluctance to play the role of his daughter, perhaps he had been driven to seek comfort elsewhere. Perhaps deep down inside, he was really a sensitive, caring lover and... oh god!

A wave of pleasure washed over me, and I felt my entire body melt into the water. I felt my face flush. I had just given myself an orgasm. I hadn't really intended to do it. It was a new experience to accidentally masturbate. As a male, when you masturbated, you did it on purpose.

Was that what it would feel like to have Charles in me? Would I feel such pleasure? If it was like the male experience, the real thing was always more pleasurable than Rosy Palm. If that was true for me now in this new form, I had something to look forward to. But enough for now, I thought. There were other things to be done that day. I had to go to Jennifer's school and then attend a women's luncheon Jennifer had told me about. I was going to have to play the role of Rachel Tilton, I realized, picking up a razor, and I might as well do it with smooth legs.

I had to use the technique Jennifer had shown me to get ready. If I let myself go, my body seemed to function automatically, shaving legs, donning clothes, and applying makeup. It wasn't hard to reassert control, either. As I was running a brush through my hair, I took control once more. Now in control, I gave myself one last critical look in the mirror. Not too bad for an old broad, I thought to myself. Maybe being thirty-seven wasn't being old after all.

I got to Ovid High with time to spare. After living my entire life in San Antonio and then Wichita, I was used to the distances in cities. Ovid was small, though. I guessed it was probably no more than fifteen thousand people, most of whom seemed to be shades. I parked my car—a nice little Chrysler Cirrus—in front of the high school. The school had a fifties look to it. It was a one-story building which sprawled out over the better part of a city block.

Inside, classes were in session, so I found the administration office with no trouble. A shade secretary seated under a black and gold banner which proclaimed 'Go Eagles' smiled at me and directed me to the school psychologist's office. I was relieved that the secretary didn't seem to find anything amiss about me. I looked like just one more mother going to check on her child.

"I'm Hanna Williams," the psychologist said, offering me her hand. We shook in a light, feminine fashion. I was relieved to find that although they were semi-transparent, shades were solid to the touch. I didn't want to have to be careful not to pass through them. Apparently, that wasn't to be a problem.

Hanna Williams was about my age—my new age. She, too, was quite attractive, her mostly brown hair graying only a few strands at a time. She was slim and well built, dressed in a tailored gray suit. She reminded me of an older version of Susan Jager, my lawyer.

“Would you like some coffee?” she asked, motioning me to a seat.

“I’d love some,” I replied with a smile. I meant it, too. It had taken me so long to get ready that I had had nothing but the glass of juice Jennifer had brought me.

“Well,” she said primly when I had my coffee, “I suppose you’re wondering why I asked you here today, Mrs. Tilton.”

I smiled. “Please call me Rachel.”

“Yes, thank you, Rachel.” I noticed she didn’t ask me to call her ‘Hanna.’ Apparently, it was Dr. Williams who was going to give me the bad news.

“Several of Jennifer’s teachers have noticed for some time now that Jennifer does not seem to be... happy,” she began, her hands folded in front of her on the desk.

“Is she doing poorly in school?” I asked with mock concern. I knew from Jennifer’s briefing that she was an A student.

“Oh no! In fact, her grades have actually improved over the last year or so—particularly in math and science. Her grades aren’t an issue; rather, she doesn’t seem very happy with her life.”

“Her life?”

Dr. Williams fidgeted in her chair. “That’s right. Here she is, a very attractive, intelligent young girl from a presumably well-to-do family.” She looked up at me, as if to confirm that we were well to do. I gave her no visual clue and said nothing, so she went on, “She just seems to be unhappy being who she is. She affects very unfeminine attire and manner. If I didn’t know better, I would assume when I talked to her that I was talking to a boy.”

“She has always seemed to be something of a tomboy,” I admitted. If only you knew the truth, I thought to myself. I wondered what she thought of my performance. After all, in a way, she was talking to a boy now.

She shook her head. "It goes beyond that. Many girls are tomboys at her age, but she seems to think she would be happier being a boy."

"Did she tell you that?" I wanted to know. Surely Jennifer had more sense than to confide in this woman.

"Not exactly, no," Dr. Williams backpedalled. She stopped for a moment to collect her thoughts. "Sometimes in my profession, we see patients who would seem to want to be the opposite sex. The most chronic of these seem to be males who want to be female. A little of this is just natural curiosity—men who would like to know what it's like to be a woman, and women who are curious about what it must be like to be a man. Everyone imagines what it must be like. Have you ever thought what it must be like to be a man?"

"Of course," I answered smoothly. Until yesterday, I had thought about it all the time.

"But with Jennifer, the need to be male seems stronger," she continued.

"Are you suggesting that my daughter is a—what do you call them? —transsexual?" I asked, trying to sound indignant. In truth, I was rather enjoying this. I wondered what the good doctor would have said if I had told her that until a year and a half ago, my daughter had been as male as male could be. Given what Jennifer had told me about the Judge's proclivity for changing the sex of his victims, I imagined Dr. Williams would be dumbfounded if she knew how many of her acquaintances had changed sex. Transsexual indeed!

"I don't know," she said, surprising me with her candor. "But I do know that sometimes girls feel powerless. They question their worth in society and think it might have been better if they were born male and more in control of their lives. This can be especially true if they don't have any strong female role models in their lives."

Whoops. I knew now where this conversation was going. Rachel Tilton had been anything but a strong female role model. From what Jennifer had told me, she drank too much, spent most of her free hours either with equally frivolous women at the Country Club or shopping for clothes she didn't need and seldom wore. When it came to her marriage, she was oblivious to the danger that she was about to lose her husband, probably to a girl who reminded him of all the things that had originally attracted him to Rachel: intelligence, poise, and good looks.

"Are you suggesting," I asked quietly, "that I am not a suitable role model for Jennifer?" I was sure it might someday be suggested in a custody battle. I had visions of this woman being called to the witness stand to infer that I was not a fit role model. Her testimony would be damning.

"Please, Mrs. Tilton," Dr. Williams said sympathetically, "I'm merely making you aware of a problem I see in Jennifer. Perhaps if you're aware of the problem, you and your husband can do something to alleviate the situation."

It was actually good advice, I thought as I made my way back to the car. I doubted if the shade who had been Rachel would have paid much attention to it. She would probably have stuck her head in the sand and continued her bad habits. I resolved to do better. Rachel wasn't, in reality, my daughter, but she had quickly become my friend. I knew—as did she—that she would be female for the rest of her life. It was up to me to ensure that her life was a pleasant one.

That meant it was more important than ever that I provide her with the positive sides of being female, but to do that, I would have to discover what they were. At that moment, I thought as I slipped into the car, consciously being careful to keep my legs together and my skirt down, I would have gladly given up another fifteen years just to be male again. In fact, if the Judge would do it for me, I would be happy to be transported to a prison cell as my old male self and cool my heels for fifteen or twenty years. But since that wasn't going to happen, I would have to try to be the best Rachel Tilton I could be.

I looked at my watch. The appointment had only taken half an hour. It would only take me ten minutes to get to the Country Club. I decided it was time to visit Charles and beard the lion in his own den. As I pulled up in front of the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank, I remembered all the old clichés about the criminal returning to the scene of the crime. It seemed like an eternity ago when Jimmy Ray, Enos and I had pulled up in front of the bank. I wondered what had happened to Enos. I couldn't imagine him being able to get away. Maybe the Judge just considered him to be too small a fish to catch. Or maybe he was out in some pasture chewing grass with Jimmy Ray.

As I got out of the car, I noticed Susan Jager's law offices were located over the bank. I wondered for a moment if Susan could be Charles' girl friend. If I were Charles (and I wished that I were), I'd be interested in her. Of course, she had that new wedding ring, so I doubted if she would be interested in him. My money was still on the teller.

Judy Cartwright was Charles' secretary. Jennifer had given me a rundown on her. She had been his father's secretary when he had been President of the bank and had been Charles' secretary for the three years he had been President since his father's death. Of course, how much of that story was real, I had no way of knowing. She was a shade, about fifty-five or so, I guessed. She had the gray hair, patrician manner, and conservative dress which made her the textbook example of a bank president's secretary. She smiled pleasantly when she saw me. "Mrs. Tilton, how nice to see you. We don't see you nearly often enough here."

It was said as a pleasantry, but she emphasized the correct words just right. She was waving a red flag, warning me to be careful. "It's nice to see you, too, Judy," I replied. "Is Charles in?"

"Just a moment," she said, touching the intercom key. "He's in a meeting." She looked delighted to have an excuse to break up his meeting.

The meeting involved a closed door. I wondered who was in there with him. I was pretty sure I was going to find out soon.

Charles rushed out of his office. "Rachel?" he asked. "Is something wrong?"

"Oh no," I told him pleasantly, grabbing his hand in a loving fashion. "I just had some time before my meeting and thought I'd see how your morning meeting went."

He was on familiar ground, so he visibly relaxed. "It went very well. Come in and I'll tell you about it."

As I entered his office, I wasn't surprised to see the pretty young teller I had seen on Saturday. She looked up at me from her seat across the desk from Charles' seat. She was about my old age, with long brown hair that shined with vitality. Her blue eyes were alive and sparkling. As she stood, I could see that she was not just pretty—she was beautiful. Her outfit was businesslike, but fit tightly in all the right places, and if I thought my skirt at an inch above the knees was short, hers seemed to go practically to the top of her thighs. She smiled what was meant to be a pleasant smile, but I was reminded of the smile you see in the horror movies when the vampiress looks up from her prey.

"Rachel, I don't believe you've met Courtney," Charles said smoothly. "Courtney Francis, this is my wife, Rachel."

She extended her hand and gave me a smile so artificial she could have earned an award for poor acting. "I'm pleased to meet you, Rachel. Charles has told me so much about you."

I took her hand, returning her smile with as much venom as I could muster. I was sure Charles had told her all about me, starting with my wife doesn't understand me. There was no doubt that this was my competition. The only question running through my mind was had he taken her to bed yet? She was obviously playing the you're so wonderful game with Charles, and he was obviously falling for it. Well, why not? As nearly as I could tell, Rachel hadn't done much to save the marriage. That was about to change, though.

"I'm glad you dropped by, Rachel," Charles said, unaware of the contest of wills that was shaping up in front of his desk. "I was just getting ready to call you. Eric Vulman wants us to have dinner with him and his wife, Grace, tonight at Winston's. We're going to celebrate. He has a new military contract that we're going to help him finance. He wants us to meet them there at six thirty."

I smiled a loving smile at him, as much for Courtney's consideration as anything. "It sounds like fun."

"Fine," he said formally. "Now, if you'll both excuse me, I need to get ready for my next appointment."

"Of course, darling," I practically breathed at him. From the corner of my eye, I could see Courtney silently fuming. I suspected I might have interrupted her next move in the game.

Charles came up and took my arm. When Courtney was out of hearing range, he turned me to face him and said sternly, "I just wanted to make sure you were careful at your luncheon today."

"Careful?"

"Damn it, Rachel, I mean watch the wine. This dinner tonight is very important."

I leaned over and kissed him gently on the cheek. It was my first experience kissing a man. I must admit I wasn't sure I liked it. "Don't worry," I told him softly. "I'm not the same woman anymore." Truer words were never spoken.

I waved a cheery wave at Courtney on the way out and caught Judy's knowing smirk. Judy and I exchanged friendly goodbyes by looking gratefully into each other's eyes.

Even with my stop at the bank, I was early for the luncheon. What I didn't realize was that Ovid's leading women always arrived late for events so they could make a suitable entrance. The Ovid Women's Club was an exclusive body, Jennifer had told me. It consisted of only twenty-five members, all leading Ovidians. Most were there because of whom they had married, but there were a few exceptions.

Since I didn't really know any of the women, I was forced to fake it, echoing cheery greetings and making small talk. Most of the women were very much like I suspected the original Rachel Tilton had been. They were snooty and shallow, caring only about being lauded due to the status of their husbands. I hoped Charles didn't need me to befriend any of the women in the club, for I found almost all of them boring.

There were two exceptions, however. The first was an attractive, matronly woman roughly my new age. She had short brown hair, just beginning to gray and a pleasant smile which radiated both humor and intelligence. By listening carefully, I determined that her name was Betty Vest. She was the President of Capta College, a small liberal arts school I hadn't realized existed in Ovid. I made it a point to move into the circle that was talking with her. It was like being back on campus at Wichita State, listening to someone who could think without straining something.

The other exception was our guest speaker. She was Dr. Carolyn Miner, the Superintendent of Ovid's schools. Like Betty Vest, she was poised and friendly, exuding an air of intelligence. She was a little older than Betty, but equally vibrant. I resolved to age as gracefully as she was.

When we were all seated for lunch, a young waiter, about my former age, set a martini in front of me. "What's this?" I asked.

"But Mrs. Tilton, you always have one," he explained, confused. "You told me last fall to always place one at your table without being asked. Is there something wrong with it?"

"No," I sighed. "Nothing is wrong. I just don't believe I care for one today."

This statement was met with surprise from most of the women, but I noticed that both Betty Vest and Carolyn Miner, sitting down and across the table from me, had pleased smiles. There was more to them than met the eye, I thought.

The waiter then took our orders for lunch. The choices were a chicken breast or a luncheon steak. Given what had happened to Jimmy Ray, I had decided to swear off beef for a while. Of course, I realized grimly, there was an equal chance that the chickens in the area hadn't always been chickens, either. Maybe I would become a vegetarian. It would be good for my figure if nothing else.

I survived the luncheon small talk, and even managed to cull out the names of the women seated around me. Most were shades, and I began to realize that their identities would probably eventually be taken by more victims of the Judge. I suspected he would not rest until he had populated the entire town. One of the women seated across from me was real. She was the wife of the mayor of Ovid, and she seemed to have no memory of her previous life. I found myself wondering who she had been. Maybe she had been a man as I had been. In any case, she seemed as vacuous as most of the other women in the group. What had Rachel ever seen in these women?

She did do one thing for me though. She introduced me to Betty Vest, who was sitting on her left. "Yes," Betty said, "Rachel and I worked together on the United Way campaign two years ago, didn't we, Rachel?"

"Yes," I replied glibly. I could see in Betty's eyes that she somehow knew that I was not the Rachel Tilton she had worked with before.

"I haven't seen much of you at civic functions lately," Betty went on.

"I'll have to get involved again," I promised, picking up my cue.

It was obviously the answer she wanted, for she suggested, "If that is the case, I have something which may be of interest to you." She handed me her business card. "If you could make a meeting in my office tomorrow at nine, I'd like to discuss it with you."

"I'd like that," I said, taking the card.

After lunch, I rushed home and wrote out notes on everyone I remembered at the luncheon. As one of Ovid's leading women (at least by marriage), I would be expected to know them all. Frankly, I found them all dull with the exception of Betty and Carolyn. Carolyn had actually been the luncheon speaker, and I had found as I listened that she was, indeed, an intelligent woman. She spoke of the need for providing an education for Ovid's children which would prepare them for the real world, learning real world skills and preparing for life. I had heard it all before, but when Carolyn spoke of those things, I believed she would really do them and not just talk about them like so many educators did.

I was excited about the opportunity to do something at the college. I could see already why Rachel had turned to a life of shopping and drinking and attending boring women's meetings. There had been nothing else for her to do. Oh, I realized that was at least partially her fault, but it was easy to see how a woman could fall into the trap of meaningless activity. I actually felt sorry for most of the women who were there. Shades or not, their lives seemed empty. That wasn't going to happen to me.

It was nearly four, and I was in my bedroom wondering what outfit to wear. I had simply too little experience and resolved to ask Jennifer. I heard the front door close. "Jennifer?"

"Yeah, it's me, Rachel."

"I need your help," I called.

She walked into my room, still looking absolutely lovely. I don't think she had any idea just how attractive she really was. She looked at the three outfits that I had laid out on the bed.

"I need to know which one I should wear," I told her.

"To what?"

"Oh. Your fa—Charles and I have to go to a dinner tonight at someplace called Winston's," I explained. "Since I didn't know anything about the place, I wasn't sure how fancy it was."

"Well," Jennifer told me, "it's not all that fancy, but it is the best place in Ovid. They have fantastic steaks. I just wish this little body I have now could do justice to them like my old one. I can barely eat half of their smallest steak now."

Steaks! I hoped they had something else on the menu as well. I didn't think I could ever eat another steak.

"So who are you going with?"

"Someone named Vulman."

She nodded. "That would be Eric and Grace Vulman. Vulman Industries is the biggest business in town. So did Charles' meeting with Vulman go well?"

"Apparently so," I said. "That's the reason for the dinner."

"Well, then none of these outfits will do," she told me, scooping them up by the hangers and hanging them back in my closet.

"But they all looked nice," I protested.

"For day wear, yes," she called from the closet, "but you need something for evening wear. Here."

She had returned with a dark blue cocktail dress which had a subtle sparkle to it. It appeared to be about the size of a large handkerchief.

"Where's the rest of it?" I asked, only half joking.

She gave me her wicked little smile. "This will look great on you. You know, for an old broad, you look pretty good."

"Thanks," I said dryly, "I needed that."

She was right, though. As she helped me get ready, it became apparent that the dress really did look great on me. It was the shortest thing I had worn in my short time as a woman, but I had to admit, I had the figure for it. It was questionable what part of me men would notice first in the dress—the full breasts that peeked out over the top of the dress or my long, slim legs which looked great in the black heels and smoky nylons Jennifer had convinced me to wear.

"Charles will jump me the minute he comes in the door," I told her as I finished off my outfit with a pair of diamond earrings and a gold necklace with small diamonds in it.

"Isn't that the idea?" she giggled. "If this outfit doesn't save the marriage, Charles must be gay."

"I'm sorry to leave you alone tonight," I said.

She shook her head. "Don't worry about it. I was going to go over to Barry's and study. We planned to split a pizza. Now, go ahead and get ready to wiggle your little ass in front of Charles when he gets home. I know he'll like that outfit."

Charles did appreciate the outfit. In fact, his mouth dropped open when he saw me in it. He slipped his arm around me and said, "You know, I don't know what's come over you the last day or so, but I hope it keeps on coming over you."

"What do you mean?" I asked innocently.

"Well," he began, "I notice you haven't been drinking. It seems to have changed your whole personality. Now, you're more like the girl I married."

I didn't know about that, but I had been until the day before about the age Rachel had been when she married Charles. I began to realize that I had brought to Rachel a youth in spirit which she had apparently lost. I also began to realize that Charles wasn't such a bad guy after all. In fact, he was really nice looking.

Now what had made me think that? I wondered as I leaned into his arms and gently kissed him. It wasn't like the kiss the night before. This one was more meaningful, and I had to admit, it wasn't as bad as I had thought it would be. In fact, if I was completely honest with myself, it was rather enjoyable.

Charles broke the mood, though, when he said, "We'd better go or we'll be late. Is Jennifer going to be all right by herself?"

"She's already gone," I told him. Then I explained that she had had an invitation from Barry to have dinner at his house and study together.

"She said she'd be home about ten."

Charles frowned. "Jennifer is with a boy? I didn't think she was ever going to be interested in dating. Now that she has a date, I'm not so sure I like the idea."

I laughed, "You're going to have to get used to it, but she doesn't think of it as a date. She and Barry are just friends. Besides, they'll just be studying at his house." I was sure I was right. Jennifer had mentioned that Barry was one of her old friends. If she said she was going to Barry's to study, then that was what she was going to do—nothing more and nothing less. I just wondered to myself if studying was all that was on Barry's mind.

As we drove to Winston's, Charles was in a very good mood. And why shouldn't he be? I thought. Business was going well, and for the first time in recent memory, he seemed to have an ideal family. I found myself hoping it would be enough to overcome Courtney's machinations, but I knew I had a long way to go.

Winston's was a modest little steakhouse on the edge of town. Situated on a small wooded hill, it enjoyed a view of Ovid spread out in the valley below. I hoped they had something besides steak on the menu. I didn't know when Jimmy Ray would meet his fate, but my stomach turned at the thought of steak. The restaurant was surprisingly fancy inside, complete with carpet, drapes, soft music that sounded classical and table linen.

The Vulmans had just arrived, so Charles introduced us before we were seated, or I should say re-introduced us since apparently Rachel knew them but not well. That seemed odd to me for a moment, but as I was introduced to them, it became obvious to me that Eric and Grace Vulman were not the type of people Rachel Tilton would enjoy. They were too bright. There was something else about them as well. They weren't shades, but it was almost as if they were larger than life. I got the same feeling around them that I got around Betty Vest or Carolyn Miner—or for that matter, around the Judge. What was going on in Ovid anyway?

Eric Vulman was perhaps fifty, tall and a bit on the heavy side. He was not handsome by any means, but he was absolutely charming. Although he was dressed in an expensive suit, he looked as if he would be more at home in less formal attire. He walked with a pronounced limp, but seemed to have no trouble walking to our table. He was very friendly and very down to earth, and I could see how Grace, or any other woman for that matter, could be attracted to him. I found myself being attracted to him, too, much to my remaining masculine chagrin.

That was the oddest thing I had noticed yet in my new identity. I still considered myself at heart to be a heterosexual male, but something was subtly changing my outlook. I was starting to notice women less for their sexual attributes and more for how they deported themselves. Rather than viewing them as potential mates, I was starting to size them up as potential friends. Men, on the other hand, were more... stimulating to me. Well, to be honest, they were becoming more attractive to me. I was starting to see Charles now not as just an obstacle who had to be overcome, but as someone I might actually enjoy going to bed with. It was still an odd thought, but no longer a completely repugnant one. It was more like the feeling I had the first time I went off a diving board. The idea of diving was not so bad. What was bad was taking that very first step.

Grace Vulman was one of those women I sized up as a potential friend. She was attractive—one of the most attractive women I had ever met. She appeared to be about my age, but I looked like a hag compared to her, and I was no slouch. The way she talked and moved reminded me of the old song 'Poetry in Motion.' Grace was not simply her name; she was grace itself. We made an interesting contrast at the table—me a blonde in my dark blue cocktail dress and dark shoes and stockings, and Grace, a stunning brunette, in an equally revealing white dress with pale stockings and winter white shoes. I was thankful the weather was fairly mild for February, or we would have probably both be shivering while trying to look sexy. I take that back. Grace would have found a way not to shiver, no matter how cold she was.

Fortunately, there was a variety of non-beef dishes on the menu. I chose a chicken in a wine sauce. After we had all ordered, Grace announced she needed to make a trip to the ladies' room. I realized as she looked expectantly at me that this was my cue to join her. I was about to be initiated into the strange ritual of going to the ladies room with another woman.

Once we were in the ladies' room, she said, "Your dress is really terrific. Did you get it at March's?"

"Uh, I really don't remember," I replied evasively.

She then surprised me by giving me a knowing look and a sparkling laugh. "Oh, that's right. You're a little new at this being a woman thing, aren't you?"

"You know?" I gasped. How many other people knew? Was I the laughing stock of Ovid—the man who had been turned into a woman? Was it a headline in the local paper? No, that couldn't be. Jennifer said there were many others who had suffered the same fate, and she had mentioned that it was usually not talked about. "How?"

She laughed again, but it was the sort of laugh that made you feel comfortable. "You'll figure it out before long. Everyone does. Let's just say that there are four types of people in Ovid. There are the shades, people who don't remember who they were, people like you, and people like me."

"So you are—what? —like the Judge?"

She smiled warmly. "No one is quite like the Judge. But yes, my husband and I are something like him. You'll meet others like us as well."

"But who are you?" I asked.

She shook her head. "That's something even I can't tell you. You have to discover it for yourself. But don't worry. You will. I do like the dress, though. Since you didn't get it from me, you must have gotten it from Vera."

"Vera?"

"Vera March. She's the wife of the owner of March's Department Store. Since I own a women's clothing shop, she and I are something of competitors. She and I go way back." She smiled enigmatically.

"Way back."

"Oh."

"So how do you like it?"

"It's a nice restaurant," I replied.

There was that beautiful laugh again. "No, silly, I mean how do you like being a woman?"

"I don't know," I said truthfully. "It happened so fast, and it's all been so new to me."

She placed her hand lightly on my arm. Even her touch had a quality that was hard to describe, but I felt as if something of her was suddenly infused in me. "You'll get used to it. You're the son of a strong mother. Ovid needs women like you."

As we returned to the table together, I had a feeling (woman's intuition?) that Grace and I would be good friends. I even promised to drop by her shop sometime. Charles sensed it, too. On the drive home, he told me, "Eric Vulman likes you very much. He said that his wife liked you very much, too. The two of you were chatting like old sorority sisters."

"I liked them, too," I said truthfully. My opinion of the forces that controlled Ovid had gone up a notch or two. Of course, I had really had only the example of the Judge to form an opinion. It wasn't that the Judge was bad in my estimation. He was just so... omnipotent that it was hard to think of him as less than a god. A god? Was that what he was? Then that meant...

My thoughts were interrupted as we pulled into our garage. The house was dark, so Jennifer must still be with Barry, I thought. I looked at my watch. It was nearly nine. That meant Charles and I had an hour to ourselves. I wondered...

It was now or never, I thought as we climbed the stairs together. I had faked a turned heel to get him to put his arm around me as we went up the stairs. He held me closely, and when we got to the top, I smiled and said, "Do you want to come in for a little nightcap?"

His eyes lit up and he smiled as he caught my meaning. "Yes, Rachel, I'd like that very much."

It would, of course, be my first time to make love as a woman. I was still not certain I would be able to go through with it, but I had to give it my best shot. We held each other closely, feeling the friction of our bodies through our clothes. Charles kissed me, his tongue in my mouth, and I found I liked it very much. I was beginning to feel my nipples becoming erect, and there was a strong sensation of something wet between my legs. I pictured myself on that diving board again, trying to step off the end. We started to grab at each other's clothing.

It was then that we heard the front door slam so hard that I thought it must have pulled the frame loose.

"Jennifer!" I whispered, releasing Charles. He let go of me as well as we stood there, looking like two young children who had been caught raiding the cookie jar.

"Maybe later?" he said shyly.

"Definitely," I breathed, turning to see what was wrong with Jennifer.

I heard her storming up the steps, but she didn't turn toward my room. Instead, she made a beeline directly for her own room and slammed the door.

I rushed to her door, but paused before opening it. "Jennifer?" I called softly.

"Leave me alone!" she sobbed.

I didn't obey, of course. I slowly opened the door to see her lying on her bed, her face buried in a pillow. She was still wearing the sweater and skirt she had worn to school. If ever there was a vision of a lovely young teenage girl in emotional distress, it was Jennifer. I sat next to her on the bed and put a hand on her quaking body. "What's wrong, sweetheart?"

I couldn't imagine myself talking to her this way just after we had met, but the image was too strong. I was her mother now, whether I liked it or not, and it hurt to see the girl I was rapidly beginning to think of as my own child crying so.

"Oh, Rachel," she sobbed again, "it's Barry!"

"Barry? What did Barry do?" I imagined the worst, but the answer was almost laughable.

"He asked me out on a date!" she wailed. "And I thought he was my friend!"

"A date, eh?" I prompted, rubbing her back.

"Yes," she sniffed. "There's a dance at the Country Club Friday night. Barry's folks don't belong, but it's a dance honoring the basketball team, so they're all invited. Barry... Barry asked me to go with him!" Another sob heaved through her body.

"But why should that upset you?" I asked, truly puzzled.

"It means he thinks I'm a girl!" she moaned. "And I thought he was my friend! I knew I shouldn't have dressed in a skirt today!"

"You know," I told her, "if you lift up that skirt, I think you'll find you are a girl."

"Very funny."

I sighed, "Look, Jennifer, like it or not, you're a fourteen-year-old girl and Barry's a fourteen-year-old boy. Just because he does the normal thing and asks you out for a party doesn't mean you have to marry him. Friends date friends all the time."

At least the sobbing had stopped. Finally, she turned over and looked at me, her beautiful eyes red from crying. "Do you really think he's just asking me as a friend?"

"Of course," I assured her. "Why not just go to the party with him and have a good time?"

"But what if he tries to kiss me?"

"That's up to you. You're in control. If you don't want him to, tell him so. Didn't a girl ever tell you no?"

"Yes," she replied softly, "but lots of times, I didn't listen. I kissed her anyway."

So here was the real problem. She was afraid to be at the mercy of someone who was like her male self. This was the control issue that the school psychologist had talked about. I knew there were men who wouldn't take no for an answer, but most would. From what she had told me about Barry, he wasn't the kind of boy to do anything she didn't want him to do.

"Do you think Barry would?" I asked.

She shook her head. "I don't think so. He had a girlfriend when we were in college together, and he seemed to have a lot of respect for her. Come to think of it, I even look a little like his old girlfriend. He seems to be the same kind of guy now, just a little younger."

"So what did you tell him?"

She sighed, "I told him I'd think about it and tell him tomorrow evening before I go over to Sam's."

She had another boy on the hook? "Who is Sam?"

"Oh! I told you about her. Samantha Wallace. She's a friend of mine—an old friend, if you know what I mean. She was one of the guys who became girls who accepted it that I told you about. She's two years older than me. I mean, she's two years older than I am now. We used to be the same age. Damn! This gets so confusing sometimes."

"Why are you going to her house tomorrow?" I asked. I knew it was off the subject of Barry, but I wondered why Jennifer was suddenly developing girl friends. Not that I minded, I thought. It was just—what?—a mother's curiosity. I seemed to be falling into a 'mom' routine. I wondered why it was so easy for me.

"Sam has asked me to be one of the freshman representatives on the prom committee," Jennifer explained. Even though the tears hadn't quite dried, she managed an ironic smile. "Sam was so surprised to see me in a skirt today, I think she decided to work on me again before the mood went away. Working with her on the prom committee was the best way she could think of to do it since we don't have any classes together. See, she was one of the first to really accept what had happened to all of us. I mean, there she was one day, a football player with the girls hanging off of him. Then the next day, he's Samantha Wallace and dating Danny Mitchell and everybody's vision of the girl next door."

"Gee," I mused, "I wonder why she accepted it so fast and it took others so long."

"Others like me?" To my relief, she was smiling as she asked.

I smiled back. "Well, I wouldn't want to mention any names."

She sighed, "I don't know, and I really don't think I've accepted it yet. I have to admit, though, it's been a big help talking to you, Rachel. I mean the way you've accepted it is... well, great."

I didn't know if I had really accepted it or not. I still had a long way to go before I considered myself to be Rachel Tilton, thirty-seven and female, but I knew I could do it. I guess it helped that I had been raised by my mother. I knew, as Jennifer didn't, that a woman could be strong. I watched my mother keep a roof over my head and food in my stomach all by herself, in spite of a limited education and a background of spousal abuse. If that wasn't strong, what was? I knew if she could see me, she'd be proud of what I was trying to do. I only hoped I was up to the task.

We gave each other a gentle hug, and to my relief, Jennifer headed off to bed with a confident smile on her face. I still didn't know what she would tell Barry the next day, but I knew that whatever she told him, she could be comfortable with the decision.

Charles was still in my room, only his coat and tie on the bed. There would be no sex tonight, I thought. The mood had been broken. Besides, Jennifer might pop in any minute. We didn't have to explain it to each other; we both knew our sexual reconciliation had been postponed. I just hoped I would be able to muster enough courage to go through with it the next time the opportunity presented itself.

"Well," Charles said, "I guess I'd better go back to my room."

"You don't have to go," I told him. "You could sleep here tonight." If he did, we might still be able to get back in the mood.

But he shook his head. "I'd better not. Not tonight. Besides, I have to get up early tomorrow for another meeting, so I'll be up before you."

I tried a brave smile. "Come back any time, sailor."

He gave me a tired smile. Then, to my surprise, he bent over and kissed me gently but meaningfully on the mouth. Putting my arms around his neck, I returned the kiss, and to my bewilderment, I found that as good as the kiss was, I wanted more. I was still pondering that thought when I fell asleep twenty minutes later.

The house was quiet when I got up on Wednesday. Charles had already left for his early meeting and Jennifer had left for school. I looked outside. It was a beautiful morning, the skies blue and the sun bright, and as I opened the window, I smelled the brisk clean air which held a hint of spring. I felt good—perhaps better than I had felt in a long time. Sure, I was fifteen years older than I had been a few days before, but I was starting to learn that thirty-seven wasn't really very old at all. Maybe age was more in the mind than in the body.

I showered and dressed in a forest green suit and beige blouse for my meeting with Betty Vest. I was getting everything down to a routine, for even with all the new things I had to do to get ready as a woman, I found myself half an hour early for my appointment.

Capta College was pretty much what I expected it to be. It was a small, tree-lined campus with a collection of buildings which looked to have been built at least seventy five years ago. The Administration Building where Betty had her office was located near the center of the campus, right next to the library. Since I had a few minutes, I decided to check out the library.

Wichita State's library is pretty modern, but Capta's was quite old, though inside, it seemed to be fairly well stocked. On a whim, I decided to look in the mythology section. The Judge had godlike powers, so I thought I might find something on a god who resembled him. I know it sounded crazy to think of the Judge as a god, and I might have thought it was a terrific leap of logic, except for the fact that who but a god could have changed me into a woman and my brother into a steer with a wave of his hand and a few incomprehensible words.

I didn't have to look long. I decided to start with something fairly familiar—the Greek and Roman gods. No sense in getting bogged down with Hindu or Norse gods. Those peoples had never had a poet named Ovid, but the Romans did. I only had a few minutes to read, but I scanned Edith Hamilton's Mythology, Bullfinch's Mythology, and Graves' Heroes of the Greeks and Romans. Allowing myself five minutes to reach the Administration Building, I learned enough to be confident that I was dealing with the Roman gods. I thought I took the revelation calmly, but I guess when you wake up from a nap to discover you have breasts and a vagina, not much can shock you.

The Judge had to be Jupiter, the most powerful of the gods. Officer Mercer owed his ability to dodge bullets to his powers as Mercury, the messenger of the gods. Eric Vulman had to be Vulcan, and his wife, Grace, was the personification of the three Graces. Carolyn Miner was apparently Minerva, and the woman I was about to meet was probably Vesta.

The books weren't much help in learning about Betty Vest, though. It seemed although she was an important goddess, little was known about her. I would just have to get to know her the old-fashioned way.

Betty Vest's office was a stereotypical college executive's office. Oak panelling and thick carpets gave the room a warm, almost homey touch, and the large oak desk and tan leather chairs made it look almost like an English gentleman's club. It was no gentleman who sat behind the desk, though. Betty Vest rose and greeted me warmly. When I had been given a cup of coffee and her secretary departed, we got right down to business.

"I'm very pleased with the way you've adapted to Ovid," she told me.

"Did I have a choice?" I asked calmly.

She only smiled. "You were in the library a short time ago. I assume you know who we are. Don't worry, you can talk about us freely as long as we permit it."

I shifted in my chair, remembering at the last second to pull my skirt down. “Yes. It wasn’t that hard to figure out. But shouldn’t Minerva be in charge of the college?”

She shook her head. “No, she thought it was more important to be in charge of the public schools. Several of us have had to stretch our abilities to fit in our roles—not unlike the situation you’re faced with.”

“So the Judge assigned you a role, too?” I asked.

“No, not really. Jupiter counselled each of us as to which roles he felt would be best for us.”

“But why bother?” I asked. “What possible reason would the Gods of Olympus have for taking on roles in a small town in Oklahoma?”

“That will be discussed at the proper time, Rachel,” she replied. “Now, enough about us. I asked you to meet with me because I would like to offer you a job.”

“A job?” I asked, truly surprised. “What kind of a job could I possibly do for you?”

“I would like you to teach here at Capta. Of course, I would have to enhance your skills. I could easily give you the equivalent of a Masters in Psychology. Then you could teach for me. You would, of course become Rachel Tilton entirely.”

“I thought I was Rachel Tilton entirely,” I replied. What was she getting at?

She peered at me. “What about the part of you that is still Bobby Joe Malone?”

“What about it?”

“That part is making your task much more difficult.”

“But I’m learning to adjust,” I protested. “I’m trying to fit in as a woman. It’s just that it’s difficult sometimes.”

“Rachel,” she began, folding her hands and leaning forward toward me, “you have done an excellent job. We’re all proud of you. Most of our changees who remember their past lives are given something a little closer in age than you were, and the ones with a drastic change in age are usually not saddled with a sex change as well. I talked to the Judge, and he agrees. If you allow us to change you completely, you will really be Rachel Tilton. You will have a past that you remember and which will serve you well in attempting to save your marriage. Without the change, you may lose in your efforts to keep Charles. We're proposing to do you a favor. You won't be like the Rachel Tilton who existed before you came to Ovid. You'll be a strong, confident Rachel Tilton."

"But what about the old me?" I asked. "You're proposing to make the old me go away completely."

She nodded. "That's true, but would that be so bad? Think of your situation if you lose Charles. There aren't many opportunities for a woman approaching middle age with no useable skills and a history of being an aimless drinker."

Is that how Rachel Tilton was really perceived? The Judge had changed me into this woman as a punishment. I suddenly realized that losing fifteen years wasn't my only penalty. He had intended that I be the weak Rachel Tilton, losing her husband and having no control over her daughter. What he hadn't reckoned with was my experience growing up as my mother's son. I knew what a strong woman could be like. I had a role model that served me well when my sex was changed. Now, my punishment wasn't any fun for them anymore. They knew even if I did lose Charles, I would find a way, just like my mother did. They couldn't stand that. It was time to erase all trace of Bobby Joe Malone and his mother's memory from Ovid. Well, it wasn't going to happen.

"I appreciate your offer," I said as calmly as I could, "but I must decline."

"Would you mind telling me why?" she asked quietly.

"Well, for one thing, Jennifer needs me. She can talk to me, but she couldn't talk to the Rachel Tilton you are proposing to turn me into," I explained. “The other reason is that I am content to be who I am. I’ll admit I’m still not that comfortable with the idea of sex with Charles, but I’ll find a way. As Bobby Joe, I made a mistake. I should never have followed my brother, even at the risk of being shot. I ran away from who I really was, just to be safe. You’re offering me the same fate in a different package. Now, I can run away from who I really am—or have become—just to be safe. I can’t do it.”

To my surprise, she smiled. “You really are strong—stronger than I had imagined. I hope it works out for you, Rachel. I really do.”

She actually gave me a parting hug. I felt that she really respected my decision, but I wondered if the Judge would. I had no doubt that he could change me into the woman Betty Vest had proposed without my consent. I only hoped that he wouldn’t.

Before going back home, I decided to explore March’s Department Store. I had an idea for helping Jennifer, and March’s probably had a sporting goods section. I felt that one of the biggest reasons she was down on herself was that as a male, she had seen herself as an athlete. Even though she knew she’d never make the pros, there was a status to be gained from displaying athletic prowess. Now, as a weak girl, she felt that facet of her life, with all the status that implied, was gone. True, her football days were over, but there were other sports open to her. Women’s basketball was starting to take on a life of its own around the country. Schools which had mediocre men’s teams might suddenly rally behind a successful women’s team. In basketball, she might find at least part of that status she felt she had lost.

March’s Department Store was small by city standards. The Dillards in Towne East in Wichita could have swallowed up all three stories of it and had plenty of room left over. But the store was at least adequate. I had no trouble finding the small but relatively complete sporting goods section. Although there wasn’t a wide variety, there were two brands of basketballs to choose from.

“The Wilson is our best basketball,” a woman said from behind me. I turned, expecting to see the usual pert, young, and from her voice, good-looking sporting goods clerk. Instead, I saw one of the most beautiful women I had ever seen in my life. If I were still male, I think I would have proposed to her on the spot. I could easily have lost myself in her deep blue eyes. Her hair was the color of spun gold, looking incredibly lush and warm even in the mediocre department store lights. She was perhaps five six and magnificently proportioned. She was wearing a conservative navy suit, but I noticed little about it, imagining the incredible body it did little to hide. A small store nametag identified her as Vera March.

“Uh, yes,” I managed. Good lord, I was a woman myself now, and yet I couldn’t help but think that I would give anything to make love to her, even without a penis. For her, I’d find a way. I felt less like a married woman and more like a young schoolboy. “I think I’ll take it.” I fumbled in my purse for my wallet.

Vera March gave an amused laugh, making it seem like the most romantic sound a woman could make. “I’ll just charge it to your account, Rachel. I realize you’re new at this, but you do have an account here.”

I stopped fumbling in my purse and looked at her amused face. “Then you know who I am? Who I was?”

“Of course,” she replied without elaborating.

The gods ran Ovid. As I recalled my mythology readings, the most beautiful of the gods was Venus. There could be no doubt that I was in the presence of the most beautiful goddess of them all. Where the Judge had an intimidating presence, and Betty Vest had an aura which made her seem like an old friend invited into my home, Vera March—Venus—exuded an aura of pure passion and desire. Whatever she asked of me, I would do.

“Before you go, though, I’d like to show you something new; it’s just arrived,” she said almost hypnotically.

“Surely,” I replied from a nearly dreamlike state, following her without question into the women’s department.

She gently pulled something small and pink from one of the racks. It was a baby-doll nightie, accented in white lace and sexy—the kind of nightie I had seen on the models in Playboy. “This would look terrific on you,” she told me. “You don’t even have to try it on. It’s a perfect fit.”

“Yes,” I agreed, not really understanding why.

“With these stockings and shoes,” she continued, pulling them seemingly out of the air, “Charles won’t be able to resist, will he?”

“No,” I said in rapt agreement.

I have never determined exactly what happened next. The next thing I remembered, I was sitting in my car, staring out into space. On the seat beside me were several March’s sacks. I examined them briefly, finding the baby doll that Vera March had shown me, as well as a garter belt, white stockings, and a pair of high-heeled shoes. The heels were four inches high, and I had no idea how I would ever balance on them. Well, I supposed I had managed on two- and three-inch heels. Four had to be the limit, though.

Oh, and the basketball was in its carton on the floor. I moved it to the trunk when I got home and dropped the other packages from March’s on my bed.

It was only noon, so I went made myself a quick lunch. I noticed as I ate my tuna on whole wheat, accompanied by a banana, that my eating habits were quickly changing, and it wasn’t just to avoid unknowingly finding part of Jimmy Ray on my plate. My new body actually craved foods that were good for me. Well, that was all right with me. If I had to be a woman, I planned to be a healthy woman.

I puttered around the house for most of the afternoon, peering out occasionally to make sure it was still sunny. I planned to take Jennifer over to a nearby park I had discovered and surprise her with the basketball that was now in my trunk.

She knew something was up when she walked in the door from school. She was wearing jeans, as was I. She was back to wearing sneakers and a sweatshirt, but this time, I was actually glad. For that matter, I was wearing a similar outfit.

“Doing your Jennifer Tilton imitation?” she asked, looking at how I was dressed.

“It’s for a reason,” I told her, walking toward the garage. “Come on.”

She did, out of curiosity rather than obedience. We drove to the park where I pulled up to the curb and opened the trunk.

“Just what are you up to?” she asked, following me to the rear of the car.

I didn’t answer. Instead, I pulled the ball out of the trunk and threw it at her, yelling, “Think fast!”

She did. Two small, delicate hands wrapped themselves around as much basketball as possible. There was nothing wrong with her reflexes.

“Did you play basketball in high school or college?” I asked.

She shook her head. “Not me. I was too big and bulky for that.” Then she grinned. “I guess I don’t have that excuse anymore, do I?”

“I’m afraid not,” I replied. “How about a game of horse?”

Actually, we played four games before the February sun dropped so low in the sky that we were beginning to get cold, in spite of our physical activity. I won the first game, but I had played a little high school basketball. Even in my new oddly balanced body, I found I could make most of the basic shots without much trouble. It was an odd sensation to feel my breasts bounce with each shot. If I did this more regularly, I would have to invest in some sports bras.

Jennifer won the second game, but just barely. Then, after that, it was a walk away. Apparently, some of her old athletic talent had survived the sexual transition. By the fourth game, she was making shots I would have found difficult even if I had been in my old body.

“I’m impressed,” I told her, gasping for breath as she finished me off in the fourth game.

She wasn't even breathing hard. Of course, although we had started out in life as about the same age, she was now less than half my age.

"I thought age and treachery could beat out youth and talent any time," she chided me with a contented smile as she bounced the basketball as we walked.

"It can," I gasped. "I just wasn't feeling very treacherous today."

"You can't win them all."

"True," I agreed. "Now I'm too winded to fix dinner. You'll have to do it."

"Aha! Your treachery is returning," she observed.

I wasn't really joking. She had worn me out. I guessed losing fifteen years in an afternoon would do that to you. I still felt good, and I was beginning to realize that thirty-seven was still relatively young, but I didn't have nearly the stamina of the twenty-two year old man I had been.

We fixed dinner together, though. It was a simple meal of pre-packaged turkey breast with the usual quickie stuffing and cranberry sauce. I made a vegetable while Jennifer took care of the turkey. Charles would be home any time, I realized, unless he worked late, or whatever he did with little Courtney.

"You haven't asked about what I told Barry," Jennifer said while setting the table.

"I figured you'd tell me when you got ready," I explained without looking up from the green beans I was fixing. Actually, I was dying to know. There was no way I was going to be the prying mother, though.

"Well, I said yes."

She said it in a neutral tone. I think she knew I had wanted her to accept Barry's invitation, and I may have influenced her. What she was afraid of was that I would gush about her acceptance and become the matchmaking mother she had experienced before my arrival. I was determined not to do that, though, even though I was pleased.

“Are you comfortable with that decision?” I asked nonchalantly.

“Not entirely,” she said truthfully, “but I guess I have to try sometime.”

I had never been around teenage girls much before my change, but I suspected that there were a lot of tomboys out there roughly Jennifer’s new age who had reacted to a boy who had been a friend suddenly asking them out on a date in the same way she had reacted. They didn’t have to experience a sex change to be confused by female hormones.

Before I could answer, we heard the garage door go up. Charles was on time! That meant he hadn’t stayed to work or to be with Courtney or for any other reason. I found myself being unexpectedly pleased by that.

We ate a stereotypically family meal that evening for the first time since my transformation. I found I actually enjoyed it. I was getting used to being Rachel Tilton, and a family dinner was part of the normalization process. I could see Jennifer felt it, too. She treated Charles as if she considered him her real father. He seemed to beam with pride when she told him about her day in school and the prom committee meeting she was getting ready to attend.

Charles told us about his day. It sounded as if it was both productive and interesting. The Navy was apparently sending someone to look over Vulman’s new product, but Charles could only speak of it in generalities since the government had already classified it. I hoped whoever the Navy sent was careful in Ovid. There was no telling what the Judge would do if the town allowed a stranger in who wasn’t under his control.

We had just finished dinner and the dishes when the doorbell rang. “Could somebody get that for me?” Jennifer asked, bolting up the stairs. “I need to get a jacket.”

Since Charles had already settled in his favorite chair to go through the day’s mail, I was elected. I opened the door to find a very attractive girl of perhaps sixteen. Her hair was auburn and flowed in slight curls half way down her back. She was dressed in a sweater, jeans and sneakers, but she still managed to look very feminine.

"Hi, Mrs. Tilton," she said with a bright smile. "I'm Samantha Wallace, Jennifer's friend, but you're supposed to know me already."

"I'm pleased to meet you, even if I'm supposed to already know you," I returned.

"I offered to give Jennifer a ride over to my house because I wanted a minute to talk to you. I'm glad we're alone," she said. "Otherwise, we couldn't be talking about this. I just wanted to thank you for what you've done for Jake. I can't believe the change in him over the last couple of days."

"Jake?"

She blushed. "I'm sorry. I shouldn't do that. Jake was Jennifer's old name. We were very good friends back in college, but she just couldn't accept her new life here until you came. I think you've given her a good role model."

"Well," I said modestly, "I've done what I could."

Jennifer shot down the stairs. "I'll be home by ten," she called over her shoulder.

As Samantha's car drove away, I realized now was my opportunity to seduce Charles, but I was having a hard time bringing myself to do it. As Charles puttered around in the family room, I found myself retreating upstairs. Maybe if I thought about it for a while, I told myself, I could work up the courage. The thought of having someone's penis thrust into my body was still difficult for me.

In my room, I decided to find a book to read. Maybe, I thought, that would relax me. But before I could find a book, I noticed the sacks from March's. I had absently dropped them beside the bed when I had gotten home for lunch. The sight of the sacks triggered something in my mind, and I found myself opening them, nearly in a trance.

I opened the sack with the baby-doll first. At a glance, it seemed almost too small for me. It looked like just a handkerchief-sized piece of pink nylon accented with white lace. I held it up in front of me in the mirror and tried to imagine what it would look like on me. Without another thought, I found myself peeling off clothes and slipping the nightie on. It fit snugly, but it fit. I was amazed at the way it showed off my figure, accenting my significant breasts.

I slipped on the garter belt next, then slipped on the matching thong. As I slipped on the white stockings and attached them to the garter belt, it was as if I had done this all my life. It seemed natural and... right. I felt my nipples and crotch tingling at the feel of the material. My body wanted something, and my mind had been pushed aside to let the body have its way.

Finally, I put on the high heels I had bought. They were the highest I had ever worn, and I fully expected to fall over in them, but I wore them as naturally as if I had been wearing them my entire life.

I looked at myself in the mirror. I might have been thirty-seven, but I thought I looked much younger. My skin was smooth and my hair soft and shiny, and my figure betrayed little evidence of childbirth or the abuses of alcohol. I was thankful I had been placed in this role before the shade I had replaced had had a chance to wreck this body. If I had to have a word to describe what my new body was, that word would be desirable.

With a little kiss to the image in the mirror, I walked with purpose to the room where Charles sat, still going through the mail. He couldn't see me come up behind him, but he felt my touch when I put my hands around his shoulders and began rubbing his chest. He turned and looked up at me. I returned his look of surprise with one of adoration. It was as if this was the most natural thing in the world for me.

I know as I look back on that night that Vera March put a spell on me. What would have been more natural for the Goddess of Love? Believe me, it helped. I don't know if I could have gone through with it without that extra help.

That seems silly to me now, for I have learned to approach sex as a woman not with trepidation, but rather with joy. Charles was not the staid banker I had come to know over the last couple of days. Instead, he was a thoughtful and gentle lover. When Charles entered me, it felt different, of course. I was used to doing the entering. But the feeling of exhilaration was unlike anything I had ever experienced before. Charles was amazingly good at foreplay—much better than I had been as a man. Maybe that's one more reason why young women are attracted to older men. Too many young men know only how to please themselves, while older men have learned the extra pleasure to be obtained from pleasing their partners. In any case, by the time he actually entered me, I would have done anything for his love.

We managed a second time as well, and if anything, it was even better than the first. We fell asleep on my bed, his penis still in me. Well, I thought to myself as I drifted off into a euphoric sleep still warmed by not one, or two, but three orgasms, I had a penis again, all of my very own. It just didn't happen to be permanently attached to my body.

When I woke up, Charles was in the shower. My god! I realized I hadn't even heard Jennifer come in. What must she have thought? I was to find out soon. When I threw on a robe and went down to the kitchen to get a glass of juice, Jennifer was already there, a playful smile on her face.

"So you guys got it on last night," she said. It wasn't a question. I noted she was wearing a skirt, and a short one at that.

"Should I be parental and tell you it's none of your business, young lady?" I asked lightly, pouring a glass of juice for myself and sitting opposite her.

"So what was it like?"

"It was... different," I said, sort of staring out into space.

"Uh-oh," Jennifer muttered. "It sounds like you're getting into this."

"I might as well," I agreed. "It appears I'm stuck with it. I might as well enjoy it.”

“But do you have to enjoy it so much?” she asked with mock innocence as she backed away from the table to get ready for school.

“I’ll see you tonight. And by the way, any problem with me inviting Barry over after dinner? He and I need to study for a math test.”

“So what made you decide to go out with him?” I asked.

“It appears I’m stuck with it,” she said parroting me. “I might as well enjoy it.”

“Just don’t enjoy it that way for a few years,” I warned her.

“No danger of that!” she said, laughing all the way to her room.

I was glad she had decided to go with Barry. It was a good sign that she was getting used to being a girl. I think she had really gotten used to it long before she knew me, but my acceptance of the new sex allowed her to do the same thing.

Charles was in a good mood, too. “I was surprised to find you up,” he said with a gentle kiss on my cheek. He was all ready for work in his banker blue pinstripe and conservative tie. It was hard to believe that just a few hours ago, this paragon of conservative businessmen and I had been rutting like wild animals on my bed.

“I decided mornings aren’t so bad after all,” I told him. “Do you want me to fix you some breakfast?”

He shook his head. “No, I’ll just get some cereal and juice. I have to watch my waistline.”

“And you have your dinner at the country club with the guys and your card game tonight,” I reminded him. Jennifer had briefed me on that. Every Thursday, Charles ate dinner and played cards with some of the other town movers and shakers.

“Not tonight,” he said. “I asked Tom Watson to sit in for me, so I’ll be home on time.”

He said it casually, but I knew there was more to it than he was letting on. He had said nothing about not going before. It was as if he had planned something and was now going to cancel it. What was it? Probably an evening with Courtney. Did that mean I had won? I didn't really think so, but it was a step in the right direction.

Charles left for work, leaving me alone again in the house. I decided to make good use of my time. I spent the morning moving Charles' stuff back into my room. I was on the offensive, and I planned to make the most of it. It was time Charles and I slept in the same bed.

I was pleased with myself for getting the hang of this married woman role so quickly. I guess being a man before meant I had a better idea of what made guys tick. I knew that women faced with losing their husbands to another woman often withdrew from them, which made the problem even worse. I had just done to Charles the very thing that would have made my male self follow the girl who had done it anywhere. I had shown I was interested in him. With a little help from Vera's spell, the rest had been easy.

It was time for the next part of my plan. I called the bank late in the morning and asked for Charles. Judy answered the phone. "I thought I'd take Charles to lunch," I told her, "if he's not busy."

She caught my meaning. "Oh, he's not really busy at all, Mrs. Tilton. I'll tell him to meet you at the Greenhouse at noon. I'll make sure they keep a table for you."

"Thanks, Judy," I said. "I appreciate your help."

"And I yours, Mrs. Tilton," she said, hanging up.

I wondered if poor little Courtney knew she was losing ground. I needed to make sure. I decided to pick Charles up at the bank so Courtney could see the two of us together. According to the phone book, the Greenhouse was only a couple of blocks from the bank, and it was a beautiful early spring day in Ovid, so we could walk there from the bank.

I got to the bank about a quarter until noon. Charles was just getting ready to leave for lunch. Courtney was hovering in front of his office, ostensibly reviewing something with Judy. I breezed past them with a friendly “Hi” and walked into Charles’ office. “Hello, darling!”

Before he could reply, I wrapped my arms around him and kissed him deeply, making sure I did it in sight of Courtney. Just for the fun of it, I even lifted one high heeled foot like they do in the movies. As Charles happily returned my kiss and hug, I could hear a small gasp from Courtney’s direction.

Lunch was fun. Charles was relaxed, and we talked about a number of things. He even blurted out, “You know, Rachel, suddenly you seem younger. You act more like you did when we were back in college.”

I smiled. “I’ll take that as a compliment.”

He placed a hand over one of mine. “It was meant as a compliment. You know, we bankers are supposed to be serious people. But deep down, I really haven’t changed since college. Remember when you and I made love in the library?”

“Who could forget?” I said with a giggle. Of course, it was just acting. I didn’t have Rachel’s college memories. But it was interesting to learn that Charles wasn’t really a stuffy banker after all. As we talked more, I realized who he was—or given the nature of Ovid, who he thought he was. He was a third generation bank president, running the bank founded by his grandfather. He never really wanted to go into the banking business. He had really wanted to be a history teacher, but his father gave him no options. That’s why he worked so hard. He tried to make up in effort what he lacked in interest.

I learned more about Rachel, too. She was a college sweetheart, and the more Charles talked, the more I realized they were supposed to have been a fun-loving couple. She had followed him back to Ovid as his wife, but quickly became bored with Ovid and, since he was a part of Ovid, bored with Charles. I wouldn’t have been surprised to learn that Rachel had had an affair or two on her own. I hoped I never found out, either. Thank god her drinking problem was a relatively new one. It had kept her from ruining a body that I was beginning to appreciate more with each passing day.

We embraced and kissed in the lobby of the bank before going our separate ways. I took a moment to look around the lobby. As hoped, there was a frown on Courtney's face and a smile on Judy's.

I spent the rest of the day walking down Main Street, greeting people I was supposed to know and just looking in the windows. I actually did see two people I knew. The first was Grace, who was hurrying back to her shop from lunch. She smiled and waved at me. The second was the Judge. He had just parked his large white Lincoln in front of March's. He greeted me with a slight nod of his head, just saying, "Rachel."

"Judge," I returned with equal reserve, and we went our separate ways. The less I had to do with the Judge, the better I liked it, I thought.

After dinner, Charles and I settled in to watch a movie on TV. Jennifer had taken Barry to the kitchen, where the two of them were studying for a math quiz.

"That Barry seems to be a good kid," Charles remarked as we snuggled together on the couch. We had decided to watch The Sting on cable. It was a movie we were supposed to have watched in the theaters when we were in high school. I had seen it, but it played in the theaters about the time my male self had been born.

"He is a good kid," I agreed. Alone with Barry in the kitchen earlier, he and I had had a chance to talk about Jennifer's acceptance of his date. He admitted to me that had long forgotten Jennifer's male self, and was infatuated with the young woman she had become. It had taken a lot of nerve on his part to ask her out, knowing that it could have ended their friendship as well. I told him I was glad he had taken the chance.

Charles and I headed upstairs after the movie, leaving the family room to Jennifer and Barry, who had just finished studying. While the two of them watched a movie, Charles and I quietly closed our door and went to bed together, but for about an hour, we didn't get any sleep. Sex as a woman was getting to be habit forming.

“I haven’t got a thing to wear!” Jennifer’s voice carried all the way down the hall from her room. I opened my eyes. Charles had another early morning meeting, so Jennifer and I were alone in the house. She came rushing into my room and repeated, “I haven’t got a thing to wear!”

“Do you have any idea how feminine that sounds?” I asked her sleepily.

“But Rachel, I looked in my closet. I just assumed there would be a party dress there—something I could wear tonight.”

“There isn’t?”

“Nothing like any of the other girls are wearing. They’re all going to wear something short and sexy. I mean, I don’t really want to look that sexy, but I’d like to fit in.”

I could see her point. High schoolers were very conformist. If she wasn’t wearing the same type of outfit as the other girls, she would be viewed as not one of them. For the first time since her change, it was becoming important to her to be just like them.

“I’ll call Grace Vulman and see if she had something for you. I’ll pick you up after school and we can go get it,” I told her. I thought I’d give Grace’s shop a try. Given what Vera March had done to me, I didn’t think I wanted some sort of love spell cast over Jennifer, so March’s was out.

I got a hug for my efforts. “Thanks, Mom!” she gushed. Then, she broke the hug and looked at me wide eyed. “I’m sorry, Rachel, that just kind of slipped out.”

“Don’t be sorry,” I told her with a smile. “To be honest, I kind of liked it.”

The grin was back. “Okay... Mom!”

A call to Grace after the stores were open confirmed that she had a nice selection for Jennifer. I was sure she did. Grace was not in the same league with the Judge, I knew, or even her husband from what I had been able to read. She was certainly one of the Graces, or maybe all of them in one body. The three Graces of mythology were supposedly inseparable.

After school, as promised, I picked Jennifer up, and we were off to Grace's shop. Like most of the businesses in Ovid, it was on Main Street, just a block up from the bank. A tasteful sign in front said simply 'Grace's Fashions.'

"Are you sure about this?" Jennifer asked. "I hear this shop is pretty expensive."

"Let's see what they've got," I replied. It would be worth the price to avoid Vera March's spells.

Grace was pleased to see me, but she seemed particularly pleased to see Jennifer. As I had hoped, she had just the thing for her. It was black and actually crocheted with a scooped neckline that was revealing without being too revealing. Jennifer rushed to try it on.

"I can hardly believe the progress you've made with her," Grace remarked when we were alone. "I could have never imagined her in here trying on a dress like that before you became Rachel."

"I think she was just tired of fighting it," I told Grace.

"But you didn't fight it," she noted.

"No, but after the escapade with my brother, I think I was just happy to be alive and free, even if I had to be an older woman to do it. Besides, I get the idea that I didn't have a choice."

"You could have been a different Rachel, though. I would guess that you could have gotten by without turning into a proper wife and mother."

"I suppose," I said, "but Jennifer quickly became a friend. I didn't want to see her hurt. Maybe that's what motherhood is really all about. Mothers and daughters should be friends."

Before Grace could reply, Jennifer was back in the room. Even without heels or accessories, the dress looked perfect on her. She was a lovely young woman, and from the expression on her face, I could see she was proud of the fact. We ended up buying the dress, dark hose to go with it, and a pair of pumps with a two-inch heel. On the way out, Jennifer spotted a necklace that went with it, so before we left, we had added that and a matching bracelet and earrings.

“Not bad for somebody who didn’t even want to be a girl,” I commented on the drive home.

“If I’m gonna do it, I’m gonna do it right,” she said with a grin.

She did it right. When Jennifer came down the stairs to meet Barry for her date, no one would have ever dreamed that she had once been a beefy lineman on a college football team. She moved with an almost supernatural grace, but of course, given Ovid’s background, that probably wasn’t very unusual. She still had some filling out to do, but the girl in the short black dress showed more than a hint of what she would be in just a few more years. The look on her face was the look of a girl who was proud to be beautiful. She had come so far in the few days that I had known her. I was proud to be her mother, for that’s what I had become.

As we watched Jennifer take Barry’s arm, I suddenly realized that only Charles didn’t realize the magnitude of this moment. Yet even he was pleased. In his mind, changed by his transformation in Ovid, he was a concerned father who had suddenly watched his tomboy daughter emerge into a beautiful young woman. I suppose his joy at her psychological transformation was none less than mine or Barry’s—or Jennifer’s for that matter.

Charles and I had our own party while Jennifer was at the dance. Every time I made love with Charles, I began to feel a little more comfortable in my new role. I was actually enjoying being a woman. Now, if I could just eliminate the Courtney problem, life would be a dream.

Charles had gone to bed (still my bed) by eleven, but I had stayed up, sitting in the den in my robe with a book, waiting for Jennifer to come home. I suppose it was a natural thing for a mother to do. I remembered my own mother staying up to be there when I got home from a party. Even more importantly, I wasn't sure what would happen to Jennifer. Her female persona was still fragile, and I had not had the chance to talk to Barry alone to determine what kind of a boy he was. If he tried to push Jennifer too quickly, she could easily return to fighting her sex.

Jennifer had told me that Samantha Wallace and her boyfriend would bring her home. I didn't know Samantha's boyfriend, but I trusted her, so I was sure it was all right. It would be interesting to be in the car with them. Since according to Jennifer, only two transformed people could discuss their changes, the four of them in the car would be limited in what they could say or do. Yet all four of them had been football teammates at one time. Here they were, still friends, but the social dynamics had changed so much.

I heard a car pull up in front of the house at eleven fifteen. There was suddenly the sound of high heels clapping on the sidewalk to the front door, and a girlish giggle followed by a lower male chuckle. Then, there was silence. I could still hear the car engine idling, but there was no sound at the front door. What was going on? I wondered. Then, I heard a feminine "G'nite" followed by a male one, and the front door opened.

She seemed surprised but pleased to find me up. "Hi, Mom." The title came naturally to her now. "Why are you still up?"

I smiled at her. "I think you know why."

"Worried about me?"

"Concerned."

She sat next to me, not bothering to pull the dress down to cover her magnificent legs. "It was fun."

"Just fun?"

"Okay," she allowed, "it was great. Barry was... different. I mean, I still felt like he was my friend, but it was as if he was more than that. Does that make any sense?"

Actually, it did. I was beginning to feel that way about Charles. Maybe that was what a successful marriage was all about. To be a successful wife, you had to be a lover and a friend. "Yes, it does," I replied knowingly.

"Well, anyway, he asked me to go to the movies with him tomorrow night, so you and Dad can have the house to yourselves again."

So it was 'Dad' now as well.

I gave her a hug. "I'm glad you had a good time," I told her truthfully.

"I did," she replied, just a little dreamily.

I went to bed feeling very confident. One of the two problems threatening to pull my adopted family together had been solved. Now, if I could just solve the other one.

I woke the next morning to the sound of the phone ringing. I looked at the clock. It was eight. Who in their right mind would call at eight o'clock on Saturday? As I rubbed the sleep from my eyes, I could hear Jennifer rushing to the ringing phone. I heard her pick it up and say expectantly, "Hello?" This was followed by some unintelligible words and a couple of very feminine giggles. Then I heard her say, "Bye!"

Within moments, Jennifer was in my room. She gave me a warm hug and a kiss on the cheek. "Good morning, Mom!"

"What are you so happy about?" I asked.

"That was Barry. He wants to hang out with me downtown this morning."

I found myself suddenly thankful that Ovid was too small to have a mall. Downtown Ovid was still a little brisk in February to encourage much 'hanging out.' Still, I was glad to see her acting normally.

"So what time?"

"About ten. Can you drive me down to meet him? He wants to meet at Porter's," she pleaded.

"What is Porter's?" I asked, getting up out of bed and slipping on a robe.

"It's a drug store, only they never took out the soda fountain. You can even get lunch there. It's like something out of the Twilight Zone," she explained.

"Show me something in Ovid that isn't out of the Twilight Zone," I pointed out.

"That's for sure," she said, "but at least this is one of the happy Twilight Zone episodes."

Unless you're a steer waiting for the slaughter house, I thought to myself. Well, Jimmy Ray had brought it on himself. Maybe all of us in Ovid brought our fates on ourselves. Some of those fates were just more pleasant than others.

"Okay. Let's get a bite of breakfast and I'll take you downtown."

We ate lightly. Jennifer expected to join Barry in a soda, and I was going to try to talk Charles into taking me to lunch. Every hour I had him away from Courtney was a little victory. I dropped Jennifer off at Porter's, parked the car closer to the bank, and entered the bank. It had been exactly one week since Jimmy Ray and I had strode into the bank to rob it. Now, here I was going into the bank again, only as a very different person, complete with a dress and nylons and high heels. It was a little overkill for Saturday, but I wanted to look good when I was standing next to Courtney.

I looked out at the curb. There was a large white Lincoln that looked like the Judge's car parked just where Enos had parked Old Snow the week before. I wondered if he had gotten away, or if Officer Mercer had captured him later and taken him before the Judge. If that had happened, he might be anyone or anything in Ovid. He might not even remember being Enos. I secretly hoped he had gotten away. Otherwise, he might be out in a pasture munching grass with my brother.

Charles was out on the bank floor and had just finished talking to a customer. "Rachel! What are you doing downtown this morning?"

“I had to drop Jennifer off to meet Barry,” I told him honestly while giving him a kiss.

“It’s a little early, but did you want to stay for lunch?” he asked. My thought exactly!

“I’d love to,” I replied, looking around for Courtney. I was disappointed that she was nowhere to be found. It took the triumph away of taking Charles to lunch. Saturday looked like a short staff, though, so maybe she was off. I couldn’t leave it at that, though. I had to ask, “Where’s Courtney today?”

“She’s no longer with the bank,” Charles said very matter-of-factly.

“What? I thought you thought very highly of her.”

Charles shrugged. “She was all right, but yesterday, she came to me with an ultimatum. She demanded Judy Cartwright’s job. Can you imagine? Judy had been with the bank eight years and is doing a terrific job. I couldn’t run the bank without her. I thought Courtney was happy as a teller. She wasn’t ready for a promotion.”

I wondered if she would have been considered ready for a promotion if I hadn’t brought Charles back to his family. I suppose it was possible that there never was anything between Charles and Courtney. Maybe I was just being paranoid. Maybe I had nipped the relationship in the bud before it had gotten out of hand. In any case, Courtney had overplayed whatever hand she had been holding, and now she was gone. I had won!

I agreed to go shopping for an hour or so and meet Charles back at the bank for lunch. Lunch would be a victory celebration, but Charles would never know it. I also knew that I had won only a battle and not the war. I knew it wasn’t enough to just be Charles’ wife. I would have to be his lover as well. Oh well, I thought to myself with a smile, it was just something I’d have to put up with. It was a good thing sex was so much fun.

I was thinking about getting something slinky for our night together and wasn’t watching where I was going when I reached the street. As a result, I almost ran into the Judge who was just coming in the bank. To my amazement, this wasn't the stern Judge who had sentenced me to a life as Rachel Tilton. He was actually smiling as he gave me a slight nod of his head. "And how are you today, Rachel? Is everything going well?"

"Very well, Judge," I replied coolly.

"I'm pleased," he said. Then, before I could respond, he put up his hand for me to be silent. "I know, you think I changed you so you would fail as Rachel. That was a possibility, but I'm glad you didn't fail. That's why I changed you into someone who could use your strengths and not be hampered by your weaknesses. Consider it a second chance."

"You know everything that's happened to me, don't you?" I asked, knowing the answer.

He nodded. "Yes, and I know everything that would have happened to you had I not intervened. I am, in fact, your friend, Rachel, in spite of what you think."

I was puzzled. "What do you mean when you say you know what would have happened to me?"

He shook his head with a slight smile. "Now, that's not something you really need to know, is it, Rachel?"

I supposed he was right. I was happy the way I was. Why worry about could have beens?

"Can I offer you a ride?" he asked, motioning to his car.

"No, thanks. I'm parked just a block away," I replied. Then, with a smile of my own, I added, "Besides, a woman my age needs the exercise."

"Then have a pleasant weekend," he said, opening his car door and stepping in.

"I will," I promised, meaning it.

As he drove away, I did a double take. Just for a moment, I thought it was an older model Dodge pulling away from the curb instead of the Judge's Lincoln. And inside the car, I could have sworn it was a tough looking black man who waved at me instead of the Judge.

But that couldn't have been, could it?

I blinked and was back in Susan's office again as Susan and Diana stared at me.

"Wow!" Susan suddenly said. "It was as if I had really experienced everything Rachel Tilton did. It's weird to see myself through someone else's eyes. Do I really crinkle my nose like that in court?"

"You do," I told her, "but keep it up. It's cute, and I think the Judge likes it."

Diana laughed, "You two had better both be glad he's changed his tune over the last few centuries. There was a time when that old reprobate would have had both of you in bed at the same time for intentionally doing something cute in front of him."

"The thing I don't understand," Susan said, "is if the Judge was Enos, why didn't he stop Jimmy Ray before he picked up his brother? As Enos, he was an additional intimidating factor. Bobby Joe might have been able to get away from his brother, but it was two against one when you consider Enos."

"Because," Diana said, "it was Bobby Joe that the Judge really wanted. Jimmy Ray wasn't suitable material for Ovid. That's why he's out in the south forty waiting for the butcher's cleaver right now. And in case you haven't figured it out, he only takes people when their lives are nearly at an end. And only people with real potential get to keep their memories. That isn't random. Bobby Joe had been raised by his mother. Even though he was as male as male could be, he had a female role model he could easily emulate. The Judge knew that once Jimmy Ray hooked up with Bobby Joe, they were both going to be killed. If Enos hadn't caused them to drive to Ovid, they would have gone directly to Tulsa where they would have been killed in the next robbery, along with two innocent bystanders.”

“Okay,” Susan said slowly. “I think I understand.”

I realized what she was really coming to understand was that her old male body would not have survived much longer if she hadn’t been lured to Ovid.

Susan continued, “But if the Judge had already decided what to do with Bobby Joe, why did he order me to defend him? It seems like it was a waste of everyone’s time.”

“Who knows?” Diana shrugged. “Maybe he wanted it to look like a real trial. Or maybe he wanted to make sure about Bobby Joe. If you argued eloquently enough for him, the Judge would know he had the right man to be Rachel.”

“Is that what he’s using me for?” Susan wanted to know.

“Sometimes,” Diana admitted.

“So what about Courtney?” I asked. “Was Charles really having an affair?”

“Yeah,” Susan chimed in. “Was he, or was that just Rachel being paranoid?”

Diana rolled her eyes and sighed, “Spoken like former men.”

Susan and I both blushed.

“Look,” Diana said, pouring herself more wine, “all men are vulnerable to the lure of a sweet young thing who tells them how wonderful they are. If they weren’t having one, they would have had one shortly. The only thing that matters is that sooner or later, Courtney would have won. The old Rachel forgot that wives should be lovers, too.”

“Like the old song,” Susan offered.

“What old song?” I asked.

“You’re too young,” Diana said to me. Then, turning to Susan, she sang, “Hey little girl, comb your hair, fix your makeup. Soon, he will open the door.”

Susan got into the spirit of thing by singing back, "Don't think because there's a ring on your finger, you needn't try anymore."

"It's an old Jack Jones song," Diana explained. "It's older than your old self was."

Together, pointing at me, they sang, "For wives should always be lovers, too. Run to his arms the moment he comes home to you." Then, they both broke out laughing. I joined them in their laughter.

Finally, I asked, "So what happened to Courtney?"

"Oh," Diana said dismissively, "she got a job as a checkout clerk at a supermarket."

My heart leaped into my throat. "She's working at Duggan's, isn't she?" That was the store my husband managed.

"I think so," Diana said slowly, unable to hide an impish smile.

"Okay," I said, putting down my wine glass and grabbing my purse. "Let's go."

"Go where?" Susan asked.

"We were going to March's, remember?" I replied. "I want to see if Vera has any more of those baby dolls left!"

Ovid V: The Jet Jockey

©1998 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

It was a pleasant spring Saturday in Ovid. The sun was shining and the temperature was nearing seventy. Jerry and I had decided to make it a lazy day at the Patton household, letting the kids watch TV and play while he and I puttered at various small projects around the house. Jerry fertilized the yard, stopping at least twice for another beer. I did a little ironing and sewed a couple of missing buttons on the kids' shirts. All in all, it was just another domestic weekend in small town America. The only thing that made it a little unusual is that about six months earlier, all the members of the Patton family had been fraternity brothers at Notre Dame.

I was the only one in the family who knew this. My husband, Jerry, thought he had always been Jerry Patton, currently the manager of Duggan's IGA out on the edge of town. The twins, Mike and Michelle, were nearly seven, and they were as normal as kids could be. Me? I knew what had happened to us. I knew we had been turned into a model Midwestern family. I knew my sex had been changed. But you know what? I didn't care anymore. It was a good life. Jerry and I both had good jobs, the sex was surprisingly great, and I wouldn't have changed any of it for the world.

Jerry was in the den with the kids watching something on TV when the doorbell rang. Since I was on my feet and closest to the front door, I answered it. At the door was a woman I had never seen before, but I knew her instantly. She was a tall blonde, her hair cut in a pageboy style. She had fair skin and Nordic features. She was wearing a pair of denim shorts and sandals which displayed incredible legs. Her top was a white knit, showing off a set of perfect breasts. I found myself envying her. I was dressed about the same, but next to her, I looked like a boy. I should point out that in reality, I looked nothing like a boy.

"And your name is?" I asked, knowing that she would have a new one.

“Diane Mane,” she responded with a smile. “Goddag.”

“Goddag?”

“Swedish for hello,” she explained.

“Aren’t you a little out of your territory?” I asked. After all, Diana—or Diane as she now called herself—was one of the gods from Greek and Roman mythology, not Norse.

“I don’t think anyone will mind,” she said with a smile. Then, looking me over, she added, “Nice outfit. You look like one hot babe.”

“So do you,” I laughed. “Come on in.”

We holed up in the kitchen, the rest of my family oblivious to our conversation. I had a hunch Diane had something to do with that, but I didn’t ask. I fixed us each a glass of lemonade and sat down at the kitchen table with her.

“So what brings you here?” I asked. “I thought you usually left town for the weekend.”

“Usually,” she agreed, “but something interesting just happened and I wanted to see it while the story was fresh.”

I knew the story she meant. I was the repository of the stories of Ovid’s newest citizens, and already four of the major gods, the only ones who were allowed to see the stories, had come to see me about it. After all, it was really several days old. I didn’t tell Diane that, though. She would have been heartbroken to learn that some of the other gods had seen the story first.

“Which story?” I asked innocently.

She sighed, “You’ve been a girl too long. You’ve learned how to be coy.”

I smiled, “Do you think so?” I batted my eyelashes for good measure.

“Do I get to see the story, or do I have to turn you into a toad?”

“Well, since you put it that way,” I replied and went into my trance...

A casual observer, walking along the cloud tops, would have been startled as three silver arrows burst through the fleecy layer on a course that would seem to take them straight into the sun. The triple blast of explosive exhaust cracked across the sky, mixed with the air itself, compressed and pushed aside by the supersonic speed of the three arrows. When he had regained his composure, the observer would have seen the three arrows for what they were—F18 Hornets streaking to their assigned altitude on patrol.

Of course, there was no observer walking casually through the clouds, although I almost imagined one being there. Instead, there were only the six of us who manned the fighters, and we were too busy doing our assigned duties to appreciate the aesthetics of our situation. Flying a jet fighter is a dangerous business, requiring all of the pilot's skill and attention. A mistake at supersonic speeds can cost the loss of a multimillion-dollar aircraft and, more importantly, the lives of the two pilots.

We were on patrol over the Gulf, three powerful warbirds that could carry enough firepower to sweep any known enemy from the skies. Our task was to enforce the 'No Fly' zones in southern Iraq. Our standing orders were to use whatever force was necessary to maintain absolute control of the skies. We took our jobs seriously.

"Boxer One, Control," a voice barked in my ear.

"Boxer One, aye," I responded. That was my designation for the mission. I was in the lead aircraft, Boxer Two off my left wing and Boxer Three off my right.

"Bogey bearing two niner five at twenty six. Range two hundred, speed four four oh. Do you copy?"

"We copy," I replied to the voice. Control was an E-2C Hawkeye off the Eisenhower with AWACS capability. The incredibly powerful radars she sported could have probably picked up a paper airplane sailed out of the window of the Defense Ministry in Baghdad. I reported our actions to Control as I gave the order to my patrol to turn to meet the threat. Battle was imminent. At our speeds, we would be on top of each other before...

"Boxer One, break off and return to base. Boxer Two, you have con."

I was being told to turn tail and run, leaving my two wingmen to face the threat. That didn't seem possible. "Repeat, Control!"

"Break off now, Boxer One! Return to base."

The real world isn't like Tom Cruise in Top Gun. You don't say, 'The hell with orders,' and go blazing into combat if you ever want to sit in the cockpit again. "Boxer One, aye. Breaking off."

I did allow myself one private message, though. I called Boxer Two and Three to wish them luck.

"What's going on, Rich?" Terry Brooks asked through the intercom from the seat behind me.

"You've got me, Terry," I grumbled. This was it, my first chance at actual combat. I had paid my dues, damn it! What the hell was going on? I needed to be tested. I needed the combat experience if I was ever going to achieve my goals.

My goals, I thought. My goals had begun to come into focus when I was ten years old back home in the Boston suburbs. Dad took my two brothers and me to an air show. The featured activity of the day was a performance by the Blue Angels, the Navy's crack precision aviation team. I stood there on the hot tarmac with thousands of other people, my mouth open in awe as the best pilots in the world thrilled us with seemingly impossible stunts in the skies above. I knew at that moment that I wanted to fly. I wanted it more than I had ever wanted anything else in my life. I was going to fly or know the reason why.

I studied my ass off in school. Math wasn't easy for me, but I knew I'd have to get good at it if I ever wanted to be in a military cockpit. By high school, I was an A math student, as well as in all my other classes as well. Good grades alone wouldn't get me where I wanted to go, though. My family lived in a small town in Massachusetts, so I had plenty of opportunities for extracurricular activities. I made the football team, starting by my sophomore year as a tight end. I made the basketball squad, too, although even my slim six two frame wasn't enough to get me on the starting squad. When it came to track, though, I could run like the wind, setting two conference records and coming within four seconds in the 5k of breaking the state record.

I found time to be popular, too. I was on class council every year, and my senior year, I was Vice President of the student body. So there I was, smart, popular, and athletic, so needless to say, I enjoyed a successful social life as well. There weren't too many girls in high school who wouldn't have liked to land me right out of high school, but as much as I enjoyed them, I had no plans to marry for at least four years.

Why four years? Because that's how long it would take me to get through the Naval Academy. I don't think Dad ever figured out why I would want to go to the Naval Academy. He had been an engineer in the high-tech industry for his entire adult life, and he told me that with my abilities, I could make big bucks doing the same thing. Besides, he told me, he and my mother could afford to send me to college. I didn't need the free ride at Annapolis to get a good education. I knew that, but I knew what I wanted. My acceptance at the Naval Academy would put me on the fast track for that jet I had wanted since I was ten. No amount of money would make up for losing that.

Four years at Annapolis can be hard on the best of men and women. You're surrounded by young people who are every bit as smart and motivated as you are. When you graduate, you're given more responsibility right out of school than many of your civilian counterparts garner in a lifetime. But I thrived on the competition. I didn't make Battalion Commander, but I spent time as both a Company Commander and a member of Battalion Staff. I was in the top ten percent of my graduating class. Of course, I requested Aviation.

My record continued throughout Flight School, and when I made it to my first squadron, I had already been identified as an up and comer. Squadron COs shoved as much work my way as they could, knowing I would do whatever it took to reach the top. To me, the top was eventually to have my own squadron. No goal above that seemed worth the price. As a squadron CO, I would still spend time in the air. Above that, it would all be paperwork. Why make Admiral when you have to stay on the ground?

As my plane made its lonely way back to the carrier, I realized that I had just experienced the biggest setback of my military life. Combat missions were rare, even in the Gulf. In the air, Iraq was like a mosquito. It could irritate you, even make you bleed, but in the final round, it would be squashed flat. The Iraqi leadership knew that, too, so there weren't many challenges to US air power. Now, I had missed my chance at one of those challenges. I might never get another one. With combat under my belt, I would stand ahead of my compatriots when selection for further responsibility came along. On that day in the future when I stood for squadron CO, I might lose out to a man no better qualified, but with combat experience. It wasn't a pleasant thought.

I had to take my mind off my problems, though. Down below, there was an aircraft carrier, and the most dangerous part of a mission was still ahead of me—the landing. Even experienced pilots in the other services cringe at the thought of what a Navy pilot goes through to land a plane on a carrier deck. An Air Force pilot lands his aircraft on a strip of concrete approximately a hundred feet wide and a couple of miles long. A Navy pilot doesn't really land his plane. He actually initiates a 'controlled crash' on a forty foot by sixty foot section of metal deck which is pitching and rolling with the motion of the sea. To make it even more fun, your tailhook has to catch one of four steel cables called 'wires' which will reduce your landing speed from about a hundred and seventy knots to zero in a little over two seconds.

I was on final, listening to the LSO—the Landing Systems Officer—give me commands while I watched the 'meatball,' a lighted optical device which showed me exactly where my plane was in relation to the moving deck. Seas were calm and winds light as I brought my plane in toward the deck. It looked to be a textbook landing, but I was still ready to throw on the afterburners if I missed any of the wires. I didn't have to throw them on, though, for the landing was a pretty one, catching the number three wire like something out of a Pensacola training film. The powerful fighter came to a smooth but abrupt halt, and I powered back to taxi in.

"Short hop," my Crew Chief yelled over the noises on the carrier deck as I scrambled down the ladder.

"What's going on?" I yelled back when I was on the deck. "Why did they recall us?"

The Crew Chief shrugged casually. Contrary to what many non-military people think, there is a lot of mutual respect between pilots and their enlisted ground crews. They're part of a team, so there's not a lot of time for excessive military formality. "Don't know, sir. The skipper doesn't always consult with me. He's waiting for you in the forward ready room."

When he spoke of the skipper, he was not referring to the ship's captain. Rather, he was talking about Commander Murchison, our Squadron Commander.

"We're on our way," I said, motioning for Terry to follow.

"No, sir," the Crew Chief said. "He wants to see you alone. Mr. Brooks isn't invited."

My stomach dropped a few thousand feet. Why would the skipper call me back from a mission just to talk to me privately? What was so important that it wouldn't wait until we got back from the mission? Whatever it was, I had a feeling I wasn't going to like it.

The skipper was, as promised, in the ready room. I was happy to see he looked relaxed. Whatever was up wasn't bad or he would have been standing. Instead, he was seated in one of the high-backed chairs, reading what appeared to be a set of orders. He looked up when he saw me at the door and said, "Come on in, Rich."

I was still in my flight suit, but he didn't comment on my recall. He got right down to business before I could ask any questions. "You're being reassigned, Rich.”

“Reassigned?” I asked. The squadron was a three-year tour, and I had only been on board for eighteen months. “What’s going on, Skipper? Why call me back from a mission just to tell me I have orders eighteen months early?”

“Because we were told to,” he replied, handing me the orders, “by your new boss.”

I looked at the orders. Cutting through the bureaucratic double talk on the orders, I saw the key sentence: “You are ordered to report to NAVINTEL Code 146 by 0730...”

I looked at the date. “That’s tomorrow.”

He nodded. “Your bags have been packed for you and the COD is waiting.” COD stood for Carrier Onboard Delivery. It was a C-2 aircraft that ferried men and material out to the ship from a shore base.

“Sir, I know what NAVINTEL is. That’s Naval Intelligence, but what is Code 146? I thought all the code designations were two digits.”

“Your guess is as good as mine,” he said. “Now, you had better get up on deck. As soon as you get ashore, there’s a plane waiting to take you to Washington.” He handed me my orders and stuck out his hand. “I hate to lose you, Rich. You’re one hell of a fine officer. If I can ever help you, let me know.”

I accepted his hand. “Thank you, sir.”

Fifteen minutes later, I was shot off the deck of the carrier as a passenger on the COD. It felt odd to leave my ship that way. In the COD, you’re strapped in facing backwards, so the catapult shot throws your body into the crossed straps rather than pushing you back in your seat.

I was the only passenger, so I had some time to think. I wasn’t an Intel officer, so why in hell was I being ordered to an Intel unit? Were they going to park me at some little cubicle in the Pentagon? I shuddered at the thought. Navy captains were a dime a dozen at the Pentagon where only an admiral had any real status. Lieutenants like me? They kept us around to shine shoes and open doors. This wasn't going to be a good way to get my ticket punched for squadron commander.

I changed my mind a little when we landed. The plane waiting for me was a Navy C-9, the Navy version of the DC-9. I was being ferried to Rome where I would be sent to Washington on a commercial airliner. Again, I was the only passenger on a special flight. What was so important about me that I rated air service normally reserved for an admiral?

In Rome, something even more remarkable happened. Now dressed in my dress blues, I was ushered by two civilian security guards to a waiting TWA flight bound for Washington. One of the security guards handed the flight attendant at the gate my ticket and boarding pass. She looked at me, obviously surprised. "Someone must think you're pretty important, Lieutenant," she remarked.

"You mean the guards?" I asked, nodding toward the two departing security men.

She smiled. "That and the fact that we've had to delay our departure for thirty minutes waiting for you."

It was one thing to have Navy aircraft standing by for my use, but it was quite another thing to delay the departure of a commercial airliner. Who was my new boss? I wondered, and why did he have so much clout? Code 146 must be one of the most important departments in Washington, I thought.

To my continued amazement, my seat was in First Class. Several passengers gave me curious looks obviously wondering how a lowly junior officer rated such treatment. I wanted to tell them that I wondered myself, but I just quietly settled in, ordered a drink, and slipped on a set of earphones to listen to music. After a sumptuous dinner—probably the best I had ever had in the air—I settled down as the skies darkened and got as much sleep as I could. I had to report first thing in the morning. It was going to be a busy day.

We touched down at Dulles at a quarter after six the next morning. Fortunately, I had had the chance to shave and wash up a bit, but my shirt was looking a little wilted after the transoceanic flight. It would have to do, I realized as I got off the plane.

“Lieutenant Baxter?”

As I turned to see who was calling me, I spotted a very pretty young yeoman. She was motioning for me to talk to her. “Sir, are you Lieutenant Baxter?”

“Yes,” I replied.

“Sir, your luggage is being picked up now from Customs. I have a car waiting to take you to the Pentagon. If you’ll follow me, sir.”

She was as professional as she was pretty. “Wait, Yeoman,” I called. She turned to face me. “Don’t I have to clear Customs?”

She smiled in relief. “Oh, no sir, it’s all been taken care of. Now, if you’ll follow me.”

She led me to a nondescript black navy sedan. With the VIP treatment I had been receiving, I was actually surprised it wasn’t a Lincoln or a Cadillac, but instead, it was your standard Ford sedan. A skycap was loading my luggage in the trunk as I got in the back seat. There was a small package waiting for me.

“I thought you could use a fresh shirt, sir,” the yeoman explained.

I unwrapped the shirt, putting it on as we pulled away from the curb. “Can you tell me what’s going on?” I asked.

“I really wouldn’t know, sir,” she responded. “I’m just the delivery service.”

And an attractive delivery service she was, too. I had to remind myself that the Navy had some serious regulations against fraternizing with enlisted personnel. If not for that, I would have probably asked her out. She was an excellent driver as well. She wove her way through the early morning traffic with ease. We arrived at the Pentagon at 0715. I had fifteen minutes to spare.

Another yeoman—this one male—was assigned to take me to the offices of Code 146. I was grateful for the guide. The Pentagon is actually the largest building on the planet. It consists of pentagonal rings of buildings, so rather than one large enclosed structure, it is actually a series of interconnected structures, so getting around is not easy. I have had friends who have been assigned there who learn their way to their office, the head, and the nearest cafeteria and after a year still get totally lost trying to find anything else.

“What exactly is Code 146?” I asked the yeoman as we continued at a brisk pace through the labyrinth of America’s military headquarters. I was sorry I hadn’t brought along some bread crumbs to drop so I could find my way back.

The yeoman looked back at me and grinned. “I don’t rightly know, sir. If you find out, maybe you can tell me.”

“But there really is a Code 146?” I asked.

“Oh, yes sir. It’s headed up by an Admiral Nepper. Nobody knows anything about Code 146—or about Admiral Nepper for that matter. I think he’s a Vice Admiral, though, so whatever Code 146 is, it must be important.”

It would have to be to pull the strings I had seen pulled in the last twenty-four hours. Special orders, aborted combat missions, waiting airplanes, and generally first class treatment smacked of something very big. I was almost over my pique at losing a chance for combat; it had been replaced by extreme curiosity about what was going on and what my role was going to be in it.

The Pentagon is a busy place. The halls are filled with people hustling from one place to another day and night, yet the yeoman had led me to an empty corridor. I hadn’t imagined that there was such a thing in the Pentagon, but I was apparently wrong. Then, he turned into an alcove. As I followed, I almost thought I smelled something briny, as if the ocean had invaded the air conditioning system of the building. Suddenly, I found myself in a small waiting room, furnished only with a Spartan Navy issue couch, guaranteed to be uncomfortable, and a reception desk.

Behind the desk was an absolutely stunning brunette. She wasn’t military, so I immediately looked for traces of a wedding ring. Finding none, I gave her my most winning smile as the yeoman excused himself and headed back to his post. "I'm Lieutenant Richard Baxter, reporting as ordered," I said formally. Then, more friendly, "I'd appreciate it if you called me Rich."

She gave me a knowing smile, leaning toward me with a teasing view of an incredible pair of breasts that her low neckline did little to disguise. "I'm pleased to meet you, Lieutenant," she said, putting my libido on hold. "Admiral Nepper will be with you shortly. Please have a seat."

I took a seat on the couch which afforded me an excellent view of the receptionist. She had a face like an angel, framed by brown hair which actually sparkled. I thought it must be some popular new hair treatment. When you're on deployment and away from the United States, you tend to lose track of new trends. As I've already mentioned, the low-cut tight blouse did nothing to hide an absolutely beautiful set of breasts. The desk hid legs that I was sure must be stunning. I could only see down to her waist to observe that she was wearing a skirt which appeared to be molded to her body. It was made out of a shimmering gray-green material that I had never seen before.

"Look," I ventured, not ready to give up on this beauty, "I may be in town for a couple of days, and I don't really know anyone. Would you like to have dinner with me?"

For a lot of guys, the line never works. They say it with shyness bordering on embarrassment. Jet pilots usually have egos as powerful as their aircraft. There was nothing shy or embarrassed about my question. I had a pretty good hit rate with the line.

Not this time, though. She simply smiled at me and said calmly, "I don't think you're my type, Lieutenant."

"I might surprise you," I told her.

The smile grew even bigger. "And I might surprise you," she returned. Before I could answer, a deep voice boomed through the intercom,

“Ask Lieutenant Baxter to come in.”

I wondered how he knew I was waiting. His receptionist had never told him I was there.

“Go right through that door,” the receptionist pointed, making no move to show me in.

I tentatively opened the door. “Come in, Lieutenant.”

Most senior officers have nice offices, and Admiral Nepper was no exception. The motif was a combination of professional and personal mementos. Naval scenes dominated the pictures. They were mostly paintings of old sailing ships. On the desk and the conference table were bronze statues of horses—noble steeds with dashing poses. They looked ready to run from the tables at a moment’s notice.

“Did you have a pleasant flight, Lieutenant?” the Admiral asked, coming from behind his desk to shake my hand. He was a large man. I was six two, but he was taller than me by at least three inches. His dress blue jacket was almost straining from the size of his wide shoulders and expansive chest. His hair was gray and shone even more than the receptionist’s hair. If an actor were to portray him, it would have to be Charlton Heston in his prime.

I took his hand. His hand was larger and stronger than mine, but the handshake was firm without being uncomfortable. I met his icy blue stare man to man. He seemed to like that. He gave a nod to the conference table. “Have a seat, Lieutenant.”

“Yes, sir.”

“I suppose you’re wondering why I sent for you,” he began, taking a seat at the head of the table when I was seated.

“Yes, sir. I am curious,” I agreed.

He sat at the head of the table and slid a sheet of paper in front of me. “Do you know what this is?”

I looked at the sheet. It was an engineering document with a red Top Secret stamp in the corner. “Yes, sir,” I replied. “This is a fuel pump for an F-18." I had been Maintenance Officer for the squadron. I had seen dozens of those pumps. They ensured that the right amount of fuel reached the engine at all times.

"Very good, Lieutenant," the Admiral said with a slight smile. Then, he pushed another sheet in front of me. "And this?"

Similar to the first sheet, it was an engineering document. It was also labelled Top Secret. At first glance, it appeared identical to the first pump, but on closer inspection, there were subtle differences around the nozzle and the vanes. "It looks like the same pump, only there are some small modifications. Look here, sir, at this nozzle. It looks almost as if there are multiple nozzles there. The only way to control something like this would be with an extremely complicated computer chip. This won't work."

"No, Lieutenant," he said, pushing a third document under my nose. It appeared to be the same drawing, but the writing was all in Chinese. "This is the one that won't work. It lacks the right chip."

I looked up at him in astonishment and pointed at the second drawing. "Then are you telling me, sir, that this one works?"

"With the right chip, it most certainly works," he confirmed. "Of course, it doesn't work by itself. The F-18 has to be modified to make the finely tuned maneuvers this pump allows. When this new pump is installed in our F-18s, not only will the plane outmaneuver any other plane in the sky, but its range will be increased by ten to fifteen percent."

The increase in range was almost more important than the increase in maneuverability. With a longer range, targets previously too far inland for carrier strikes would be accessible. Range could be sacrificed for a bigger weapons load on coastal targets. With the changes in avionics built into the latest generation of F-18s, the new fuel pump meant an increase of at least five years in the life span of the fighter. There was just one problem—the Chinese document.

"So the Chinese know about this?"

“They know,” the Admiral said. “Their spy network is better than we had supposed. They could just as easily use this pump, or one similar to it, to extend the range of their own aircraft. All they need is the chip to make it work. And it is virtually impossible for them to develop the chip.”

“Unless they steal it, too,” I concluded.

The Admiral nodded. “I knew you’d understand. That was part of the reason I chose you for this mission. You have a quick grasp of technical matters, and you’ve flown the F-18. I can send you into the factory as an observer. It will be your job to determine where the leak is.”

“Sir,” I began, “I’m flattered, but I have no experience in espionage. Surely one of your Intel people would be better at this.”

“I can’t use my own people,” he said simply. “Code 146 is... highly secret. We have a small staff, and I have reason to believe that staff have been compromised. I need a fresh face at that plant—someone the enemy has never seen before. It has to be someone with the technical skills to understand what is at stake.”

There was something he wasn’t telling me, but I really couldn’t ask what it was. I had protested that I wasn’t qualified, but he had assured me that I was. If I protested further, I wouldn’t be helping my career. Still, I couldn’t help but wonder what was going on. There had to be dozens of Intelligence officers from other sections with a much better background than mine. There had to be reasons for my selection that I hadn’t been told, but Admiral Nepper had no plans to tell me what they were. I had reached the point at which all I could do was accept the mission and hear him out.

Satisfied that I would not offer further protest, he continued, “The chip is the product of Vulman Industries. It’s a manufacturing company with headquarters in Oklahoma. They do manufacturing in several locations, but the chip was developed by a small research team at the Oklahoma headquarters. Your cover story will be that you have been sent to look at the chip and how it works since you will be the first pilot to field-test it.”

“Is that true, sir?” I asked suddenly. If it were so, that meant I would have the status of a test pilot. That would be a career-enhancing assignment which might even lead to something like astronaut training. I wouldn’t have my own squadron, but I would gladly shelve that idea to be an astronaut.

The Admiral dashed my hopes, though, when he said, “No, Lieutenant, it isn’t true. In fact, your cover will be that you are a civilian test pilot. You will leave all Navy identification with Mr. Vulman. But don’t worry. I can assure you that you will get a meaningful assignment out of this. Your future will be far better than it would be if I hadn’t selected you for this mission.”

I didn’t really understand the point he was trying to make, but again, I knew I would have to accept what he said.

“I’ve arranged a room for you at a nearby Marriott for this evening,” he went on. “There is a driver waiting for you in the passageway now to take you there. Then, in the morning, you will be picked up at the hotel at 0800 by Eric Vulman, the president of Vulman Industries. He will give you a full mission briefing. He’ll also fly you to his headquarters in Ovid.”

“Ovid, sir?”

“Yes,” the Admiral nodded. “Ovid, Oklahoma, is the headquarters of Vulman.”

“Exactly where is Ovid, sir?” I had envisioned a facility in Oklahoma City or Tulsa. At least, there would be a little nightlife. Instead, it sounded as if I was going to have to spend the next few days or weeks stuck in some little one-horse town on the Oklahoma prairie. Bummer.

“It’s a little hard to explain,” the Admiral said evasively. “Let’s just say it’s in eastern Oklahoma and leave it at that.”

What the hell is going on? I wondered. Of course, the Admiral was Intel. The intelligence community won’t even tell you what time it is if you can't prove that you're cleared for it. Besides, I couldn't ask anything further. The Admiral had risen from his seat, requiring me to do the same. He offered me his hand as further evidence that my interview was over.

"Good luck, son," he said to me as I took his hand. "Just remember, this is a very important mission. Eric Vulman has my full confidence. Do whatever he says. Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir."

The beautiful receptionist was still at her desk. She smiled and I smiled back. "Last chance for a night on the town with me," I told her. She laughed, "You don't give up, do you?"

No, I really didn't. As a breed, Navy pilots are used to getting their way, and that includes with women. They don't call Navy wings 'little golden leg spreaders' for nothing. Secretaries are the best targets for pilots. They lead relatively boring lives, shuffling paper and taking orders from everybody. They think pilots live glamorous lives, filled with adventure and excitement, so they seem to be naturally attracted to us. All pilots are aware of that, too. "So what do you say?"

Still, pilots don't win them all. With a staged look of disappointment, she replied, "I really am sorry, Lieutenant. I have another commitment. I'm going fishing with some friends tonight."

I shrugged, "Well, then maybe next time." It was early in the day. I had plenty of time to find another girl. I wasn't about to waste the evening, though. Here I was, back from a month at sea. I had one night in the big city before being hustled off to the hinterlands, and I had no intention of wasting it.

The driver was waiting as promised. We had walked only a few paces when I stopped. "Wait a second. I left my cover." Cover was the Navy term for a cap. I had left my cap in the reception area and had forgotten to pick it up when I left. It was a common error since I had just come from being on a ship where caps are seldom worn below decks and never on the flight deck during operations.

As I walked back to the reception area, I could have sworn I heard a splashing sound. When I entered the reception area, the beautiful receptionist was nowhere to be seen, but my cover was still on the table next to the couch. I picked it up and prepared to leave when something odd caught my eye. There was something around the base of the reception desk. I looked at it closely. It was something wet. She probably spilled something and went to get something to clean it up, I thought.

Then I looked at the liquid more closely. It appeared to be water, but it was foaming slightly. I touched the liquid with the tips of my fingers and held them to my nose. There was an odd smell, but one I recognized. It was the smell of kelp. The water was ocean water. What was she doing with ocean water at her desk? Shaking my head, I left. There was certainly something strange about Code 146. I just wished that I knew what it was.

The room at the Marriott was comfortable, and the staff were accommodating. Even though it was still early, they got my room ready, and I was in it by eleven in the morning. In the room, there was a suitcase, open on the bed. It was a nice one, favored by many business travellers, but it wasn't mine. Attached to it was a note:

Lieutenant Baxter:

I've taken the liberty of moving your personal effects to this bag, along with clothes and other items which will confirm your cover identity. There is also a small travel kit in the bag which you should use to place all of your Navy IDs and other items which do not conform to your new identity. You can give them to me in the morning. Just leave all of your uniforms in the room when you leave, and they will be taken care of for you. I look forward to working with you.

Eric Vulman

I looked through the bag. He had done an excellent job. Any item I had owned which had a Navy crest or identification from the Eisenhower had been removed and replaced with an appropriate civilian equivalent. There was also a wallet which identified me as Mike Donovan, a civilian test pilot for McDonald Douglas. I was based out of St Louis. I didn't know the city well, but I had been there, so I could fake it if I had to. I made a mental note to see how the Blues were doing so I could discuss hockey if the subject came up.

I took a shower—my first one since the day before on the Eisenhower. Then, I sacked out for a few hours so I would be alert for the evening. While I was asleep, I had the weirdest dream. I could have sworn I heard Admiral Nepper's voice. "Are you sure this will work?" he was asking. "I do have other operatives we could use."

"And they'll be compromised, too," another voice said. It was a sultry, feminine voice.

"But what if he makes a mistake? He will be under a lot of pressure."

"He can handle it, uncle," the woman's voice said. "Your brother has handled many similar situations."

"I don't know. My brother may be over his head on this affair."

"Perhaps I should get to know our lieutenant better," the woman's voice mused.

I drifted further into sleep and couldn't remember anything else of the dream.

I awoke about three in the afternoon feeling refreshed. This was my one night in the big city, and I had now had enough sleep to be able to enjoy my evening. All I needed was someone of the female persuasion to share it with. There had to be some good singles bars in the area. With the Pentagon practically around the corner, there had to be a lot of singles. Therefore: singles bars.

I checked in at the concierge desk. It was manned—or rather personed if there was such a word in the politically correct climate of our capital city—by an attractive young brunette. "Tell me," I asked with my most charming smile, "where is the best place for a guy like me to meet girls?" I said it half in hopes she would offer herself. The direct approach is usually best, I thought.

"I know of several," a soft, feminine voice said behind me. I turned and found my one true love—at least for the evening. She was about five six with bright red hair practically down to her ass. She wore a short Kelly green mini dress that displayed her considerable assets extremely well. Her face was incredibly beautiful, and her impish grin was enough to tell me that I wouldn't be hitting the nightspots alone. She held out a delicate hand with dark red nails. "Diane Moone, she said, "with an 'e'."

"Diane with an 'e' or Moone with an 'e'?" I asked, taking the hand.

"Both," she replied with a smile.

It had to be love, I thought.

The evening was nothing short of fantastic. Diane was the most incredible woman I had ever known. She had it all—looks, poise, intelligence, and a sex drive that would make a monk blush. We started with dinner at a little place in Georgetown she knew.

"It's a great place," I told her, sipping my wine with dinner. "You must spend a lot of time in Washington. Do you live here?"

"Oh, no," she laughed. "I'm just here visiting my uncle. He's in the Navy."

That gave us plenty to talk about. We discussed the Navy and in particular, Navy flying. She was remarkably well versed on all types of aircraft and their capabilities. The dinner passed quickly. Then, we had planned to cab back to a nightspot not far from the hotel, but at the last minute, that plan changed.

"Look," she said with a smile, "let's cut to the chase. You don't need to take me drinking and dancing to get laid. Let's just go back to your room, order something with bubbles, and not waste time listening to loud music."

It was an offer no red-blooded American boy could turn down. Now, I knew I was in love.

I was too much of a gentleman to discuss my conquests in detail, but with Diane, I wanted to break that rule. I wanted everyone to know that I had sex with one of the most incredible women I had ever known.

Men enjoy sex most when the women they're doing it with are enjoying themselves, too. I don't know when I enjoyed sex more. Diane was a veritable tigress, leaping and pouncing in my bed until I was completely spent. We fell asleep in each other's arms.

The wake-up call came through at seven. After I hung up the phone, I realized Diane was gone. I hadn't heard her leave, but I found myself regretting that she had. She was an absolutely incredible lover and I missed her already. She was a real looker, and that voice... Come to think of it, I realized, her voice was the woman's voice in my dream. I shuddered involuntarily. Just what in hell was going on anyway? Come to think of it, all I knew about her was her name. I hadn't thought to ask where she was from or her phone number. I knew she had an uncle in the Navy, but I hadn't even asked about him. It was as if I was so wrapped up in her spell that I hadn't thought to ask her anything.

Eric Vulman had provided me with a good variety of casual clothing. I selected a dark blue polo shirt, tan slacks and brown loafers. I looked more as if I was going out to play eighteen holes rather than starting on an espionage assignment. It was probably just as well. I never cared much for trench coats and slouch hats.

Eric Vulman was waiting for me in the lobby. He called my name when he saw me. I assumed he must have seen a picture of me, for he seemed to have no trouble picking me out of the busy morning crowd in the lobby.

"Eric Vulman," he said in a friendly voice tinged with an Oklahoma twang as he stuck out a large, beefy hand. I had fairly large hands, but his were larger than mine. We were about the same height, but he carried about thirty pounds more than me. None of it appeared to be fat. Except for a slight limp, he seemed to be in perfect shape. He was dressed much as I was, although his polo shirt was green. To a casual observer, he might have been my father. We looked like men cut from the same cloth. I took an instant liking to him.

"Rich Baxter," I replied.

He shook his head with a smile. "Not anymore. Remember?"

I could have kicked myself. I had a new identity and had forgotten to use it. That could be very bad during the mission, I realized. "Sorry, Mike Donovan."

The smile became wider. "Pleased to meet you, Mike. Have you eaten yet?"

"No, sir."

"Drop the 'sir'," he said with a laugh. "You're a civilian now. Just call me Eric. Everybody else does."

After we had ordered breakfast and each had a cup of coffee in front of us, Eric asked, "Have you ever been to Oklahoma?"

"No, s... uh, I mean no," I replied. "I've flown over it a few times, and I saw Twister twice if that helps."

He laughed, "Well, that's a start anyhow. Most people think it's just a buffer to keep the Texans from moving north. They picture it as a flat, dry prairie with tornadoes every day."

"It isn't like that?" I blurted. To be honest, I thought that was an accurate picture of the state.

He shook his head. "Not really. Oh, there are parts of the state that are like that. Eastern Oklahoma is green with rolling hills, lots of lakes and lots of trees. That's where Ovid is. I think you'll like it."

"What about the tornado part?"

"Ovid's never been hit by one," he told me.

"There's always a first time," I pointed out as our breakfasts arrived.

He just chuckled, as if there was a joke that only he understood.

"So," I pressed between bites, "I understand you're to brief me on the mission."

"That's right," he agreed. "You already have your new identity. Are your old IDs in your travel kit?"

“Yes,” I replied. “I’ll keep them hidden.”

He shook his head. “That won’t work. I’ll take them when we’re in the air. We can’t take the risk of someone going through your luggage, can we?”

“I suppose not,” I agreed. Deep down, though, I didn’t want to let go of those IDs. They described who I was. I didn’t care so much about the credit cards, but my military ID and my wings were in there. I didn’t want anything to happen to them.

“Good,” he said, motioning the waitress that we needed more coffee. When she had filled our cups, he leaned forward and continued, “There are a few things you need to be aware of in Ovid. In many ways, it is your typical small Midwestern town. In other ways, though, it’s very different. If you are to have any chance at success in your mission, it’s important that you stay in character at all times and I do mean all times. If anyone discovers that you are not Mike Donovan, your life could be in danger. Do you understand?”

“You make it sound like East Berlin during the Cold War,” I commented.

“Do you understand?” he repeated grimly.

“Yes, Eric, I understand,” I said seriously. There was something he wasn’t telling me. What did he know about what I would be facing in Ovid? I thought. What made Ovid different from other small towns? I really couldn’t imagine.

We drove to the airport. It was one of those little suburban fields that caters to corporate jets. There, parked in front of an executive hangar, was a beautiful plane. It was thin and sleek, with sweptback wings which angled straight up on the tips. It was white with blue letters reading Vulman Industries. I hadn’t expected anything like it.

“What do you think?” he asked with a smile.

“It’s a Learjet 45, isn’t it?” I asked.

“You know your aircraft,” he replied.

“But they’re brand new,” I said. “That’s a—what? —seven million dollar plane?”

“Configured the way you see it, closer to eight,” he answered. “It cruises at over 400 knots with a ceiling of 51,000 feet. Not bad for a civilian plane, is it?”

Compared to the F-18, it flew slow and low, but he was right. It was an impressive plane. My hands itched to take the stick and try it out. Eric must have been reading my mind, for he asked, “Would you like to fly us to Ovid?”

“Very much,” I replied. “You don’t mind? I’ve never been checked out on one of these.”

“Don’t worry. It’s just you and me and there are dual controls. I can take over if you try to make it fly like an F-18.”

We loaded my gear on board. I felt like a part of me was being stolen away when he took the kit and removed all of my real IDs. I felt better, though, when I sat in the pilot’s seat. The Learjet 45 wasn’t as complex as an F-18. Of course, it had no need of weapons systems and advanced radars. Still, it was an impressive machine. Controls were arranged in a logical and easy-to-use fashion. Every instrument was civilian state of the art.

“Need any help?” Eric asked.

“I don’t think so,” I replied, as I started going through the pre-flight checklist. In a few minutes, I had finished the list and was ready to taxi out. Eric was an able assistant, switching radio frequencies for me and acting as a second set of eyes. Until we were off the ground and at cruising altitude, we would be in what pilots derisively called ‘Indian Country.’ This was because of all the Cherokees and Apaches and other small planes that populated the lower altitudes. There were so many of them that a second set of eyes was needed just to make sure everybody stayed out of each other’s way.

Once cleared, the Learjet accelerated effortlessly down the long concrete runway. We made it off the deck without a bump and smoothly climbed to 8,000 feet as requested by ATC. I knew how planes were required to act in civilian airspace, but I longed for a military field and an area closed off to civilian traffic. There, I could have punched the Learjet and scooted to cruising altitude in no time. Finally, we were cleared to 38,000 feet, so I put the jet into a gentle climb and we were off for Oklahoma.

“What’s the night life like in Ovid?” I asked Eric as I flipped on the autopilot. I wasn’t expecting much, but I had hoped for at least a little action.

“There’s not much to it,” he admitted. “There are a couple of movies in town. Hell, we even still have a drive-in movie, too. There’s the bowling alley and a couple of bars. I hear Randy Andy’s is the spot most of my single folks hang out in.”

Now that place sounded very promising. “Is it a strip joint?” I asked hopefully.

“Well, I haven’t been there,” he admitted. “I’ve been happily married for a long time. I don’t think stripping is allowed there, though. Ovid is fairly liberal for a Bible Belt community, but there are some limits. If it wasn’t for the college, we would probably be a lot more blue nosed.”

“It sounds like a good place to raise a family, though,” I allowed.

“Oh, it is,” Eric agreed. “It is a clean town. There’s really no crime at all. There’s no drug problem. We like it in Ovid.”

“Is that why you have your headquarters there?”

“That’s one of the reasons,” he replied, not bothering to mention what the other reasons were.

We talked about a lot of things on the way to Ovid. Eric was a true man of the world. Whatever the subject, he had had some experience with it. I thought being in the Navy had taken me to many exotic places, but Eric had not only been to all of them, but many more as well. It seemed as if he had been everywhere and done everything. I remember thinking at the time that it seemed as if he would have needed several lifetimes to accomplish so much. Sometimes, the most bizarre possibility is the correct one, as I was soon to learn.

I found myself really liking Eric. He was becoming something of a surrogate father to me in the short time I had known him. My own father and I had gotten along okay, but Dad's feet were firmly planted on the ground. Being an engineer in a high-tech lab for the rest of his life suited him very well. Me? I knew I had to fly, and Eric was the same way. He could talk engineering at levels I could barely understand. He was obviously the genius who had designed the chip for the fuel pump. His grasp of science and engineering was the best I had ever seen. But my father was a good engineer as well. What drew me closer to Eric was his love of flying.

"Eric, excuse me for saying this, but I'm surprised Vulman Industries is big enough to justify a plane like this."

He grinned at me. "Working already? It sounds as if you're ready to put me on the list of suspects."

"No," I rushed to say. "I didn't mean it that way at all. I was just curious about your company."

"Well," he began, "we've been in the auto parts business for a number of years. That's how we can afford a plane like this. We've always had a good relationship with Ford. A number of years ago, someone in my family even helped design the Mercury for them. We've got plants in four states as well as Canada and Mexico. That's how we got started in aviation."

"Excuse me?"

"Think about it, son," he explained. "Rolls Royce, BMW, Saab, Mitsubishi, Nissan, and of course, Ford, have all been involved in aviation as well as automobiles. It's only natural that their suppliers would follow them in whatever lines they take on."

"So is the entire plant in Ovid dedicated to the new fuel pump?" I asked.

He shook his head. "No, not yet. Eventually we will start assembling it in Ovid, but we'll need time to do that. I've just put new loans in place to finance the project. But we have to find out where the leak is first. Otherwise, the proprietary nature of the product might become public knowledge, and we'll have nothing to sell."

That certainly eliminated any suspicions I might have unconsciously had about Eric. I had decided that he would be the one person in Ovid I would be able to trust.

"Time to start our descent," he told me.

"Then I should contact the tower in Ovid," I concluded.

"No tower there, son. It's just a 4,000 foot concrete strip and a couple of executive hangars. There's not much air traffic in and out of Ovid. I'll talk you in."

Ovid's airfield turned out to be at the south end of a long, narrow valley. The surrounding hills were wooded and were already starting to green up in the early spring. Farms spread across the valley, fields already green with winter wheat and other early crops. As we made our approach from the south, I could see in the distance a collection of buildings and a pattern of streets.

"That's Ovid," Eric explained.

"How big is it?"

"About fifteen thousand," he told me, "and growing all the time."

He should be a spokesman for their Chamber of Commerce, I thought. I began to wonder how I was going to find enough to do in a town of fifteen thousand. I wondered if they set up grandstands on the main drag so everyone could go watch the sidewalks roll up at sundown.

It did look pleasant in a pastoral sort of way. It actually reminded me of some of the little valleys I had flown over in the Mediterranean area. Except for the distinctly American street grid laid out in continuous squares, it could have been a little town in Italy or Greece. I could see how it could grow on a person, but not on me. I was strictly a city boy.

The Learjet made a smooth, fluid approach to the field. Landing on a 4,000 foot long airstrip was a walk in the park after landing fighters on carrier decks. It was an easy plane to fly, and I was sorry to see our flight end. I had no idea how long it would be before I was in the air again, but even a day would be too long.

We parked the plane in front of a hangar which had 'Vulman Industries' painted on the side. Eric pressed a button on a device that looked like a garage door opener and the hangar door flew up. Inside was a white Mustang convertible, brand new and polished until it shone.

"That's your transportation," he told me, nodding at the car.

"Not bad," I commented.

"No," he agreed, "not bad at all. There's no Hertz or Avis in Ovid, but as I told you, we get along pretty good with Ford. That one is courtesy of the Ford dealer here in town. When we stow your gear, you can drive on into town and get settled. There's a reservation in your name at the Ovid Inn."

"How do I find the Ovid Inn?"

He pointed at a modest highway that ran parallel to the runway. "Just follow that road north. Ovid's about three miles ahead. The Ovid Inn will be on your right about three stoplights into town. If you have any trouble, just stop and ask someone. I'll give you this evening to get settled in. Then, we'll get started first thing in the morning."

"I'm fine now if you want to get started today," I told him.

"I appreciate that," he replied, "but we're not ready for you yet. Let's just settle on starting in my office tomorrow morning at eight."

"Okay," I agreed, throwing my bags into the back seat of the Mustang.

"Do you need a ride into town? This seems to be the only car."

"Oh, I have my own transportation." I assumed he meant that a car was being sent for him. It was his business, I decided.

"One more thing before you go, son," Eric said as I got ready to fire up the Mustang. "Remember what I told you. Ovid is... different. You've got to maintain your cover at all times. Don't be surprised at anything you see or hear. Just play it cool and we'll talk in the morning."

"Sure," I agreed, not having the foggiest idea what he was talking about. I was soon to learn.

The drive into Ovid was pleasant enough. It was early afternoon, the warmest part of the day, and a clear blue Oklahoma sky unfettered by the pollution of larger cities let a sufficient amount of solar heating in to make the ride comfortable with the top down. I had never driven a Mustang before, and I was pleased to see it was a tight, responsive car. I vowed to consider one the next time I got ready to buy a car.

I accelerated smoothly along the nearly deserted highway, but I kept my speed within the legal limit. I had heard too many stories about small town speed traps. No local cop was going to make his quota from me.

Ovid was a clean, attractive little town. Even the businesses on the edge of town displayed signs of prosperity. Farm implement dealers, car dealers, and gas stations all appeared clean and prosperous, if not busy. Oh well, I thought, it was a workday. Saturdays were probably the big business days for Ovid. That was the time when all the farmers came in to buy whatever they needed.

Then, my pleasant, relaxed drive into Ovid fell apart. Without warning, the Mustang engine, which had been so responsive only moments before, suddenly revved for no apparent reason, causing the car to shoot ahead at fifty, a good fifteen miles over the speed limit. As if it had a mind of its own, it shot through the approaching intersection against the light, swerving to narrowly miss a pickup truck which had started when the light changed. Then, as quickly as it started, the excitement ended. With no help from me, the engine died down to an idle and the car pulled neatly up at the curb.

What had happened? I wondered. Had the gas pedal stuck? Even if it had, why did the car swerve to avoid the truck. I hadn't been able to grab it to miss the truck. It was as if the car had a mind of its own.

I didn't have much time to think about it, though. As I looked in my rear-view mirror, I saw the sight I had hoped to avoid. Red and blue lights silently flashing, a police cruiser had pulled up directly behind me. I watched in resignation as a tall, slender police officer, his eyes hidden behind mirrored sunglasses, stepped out of his car and walked purposely up to mine.

“Step out of the car, please, sir,” he said with the mantra of all traffic cops. I did as he asked. “Was there a problem back there, sir?”

“Yes,” I said, relieved that he at least seemed to be willing to listen to what had happened. “Something went wrong with my car back there. It went out of control for a moment.”

“All by itself?” he asked sardonically.

“Yes,” I replied indignantly. “If you were already behind me, you must know I was driving safely just before I went through that light.”

“So you admit to going through a red light?”

“Of course,” I replied, trying to keep my temper down. “Didn’t you hear what I just said? The car went out of control. It must have been a stuck gas pedal or something.”

“Or something. I need to see your license and registration.”

I was doing my best to control my temper. I didn’t want to make any waves my first hour in Ovid, but the cop was pissing me off. I fumbled for my wallet and pulled out the Missouri driver’s license that identified me as Mike Donovan.

“And the registration?” he asked.

Eric hadn’t said anything about the registration. I assumed it was probably in the glove compartment. I slid back into the seat and opened it. There was nothing there—not even an owner’s manual. The same was true of the compartment between the bucket seats.

“Look,” I said, sliding back out of the seat, “Eric Vulman loaned me this car. I’m working with him on a project out at Vulman Industries.” I hoped that he was an important enough person that the name would carry some weight. The officer’s expression didn’t change, though.

“I’m sure if you give him a call, he can verify that. He said he got the car from the local Ford dealer. If you check with one of them, I'm sure they know where the registration is."

"I'll do that," he said, "but for now, I'll have to impound the car. You'll have to see the Judge this afternoon."

"Now, wait a minute!" I began to protest.

He looked at me through the mirrored glasses and asked quietly, "Do you want to add resisting arrest to the charges?"

Muttering to myself, I got into the Mustang on the passenger side as he slid under the wheel. I found myself wishing someone would steal his police car while he was doing this. To my shock, though, the police cruiser started up, too. I looked back and was surprised to see another officer behind the wheel of the cruiser. He looked like the twin of the officer who was with me.

"I thought you were alone," I said.

"Did you?" was his only reply.

At least, I had the chance to look around Ovid. It was a newer version of a lot of the small towns I remembered back in New England. I grew up in a suburb just outside the Beltway, so I had seen little towns like Ovid before. I wondered how a person managed to live in a burg like Ovid and not die from boredom. Still, I had to admit, it was a pleasant town—the sort of town Beaver Cleaver must have grown up in.

Since we were on the highway business strip, I didn't see many pedestrians, but the ones I did see were well dressed and, for the most part, attractive. The only thing that was odd about them was that some of them looked a little... well, transparent for lack of a better word. I don't mean I could see right through them. It was like looking at a 3-D image. You know it doesn't really leap off the page, but it looks as if it does. That was the way it was with some of the people. You couldn't actually see right through them, but it looked as if you could, if that makes any sense.

Just before we turned off the business strip, I saw a big sign out in front of a bar which called itself Randy Andy's. Maybe after I got finished with this small town kangaroo court, I'd check in at the Ovid Inn and go down to Randy Andy's. It was probably all the action Ovid had to offer.

We proceeded down a main arterial populated by small mom and pop shops and older houses. It gave way to the main business district of Ovid. It looked like your typical small town with lots of concrete, diagonal parking, and no buildings over three stories tall. We were actually about a block off the main business street, but I could see enough to get the general idea. We came up to a block which seemed to consist entirely of civic buildings. We came to a final stop as the Mustang pulled in front of a gray granite building with Doric columns in front. The words 'City Hall' were carved into the granite above the columns. As small town city halls went, it was reasonably impressive. A blue flag, probably the state flag, was flying next to the US flag in the grassy area in front of the building. It could have been the city hall of almost any small town in the country.

Oh well, I thought to myself, at least justice was swift in Ovid. I would meekly take my ticket and be done with it. After all, I was a jet pilot. We all had the reputation of being fast drivers, and most of us were. This wouldn't be my first time in front of a judge. I guessed I could look forward to another sharp increase in my auto insurance.

Just as we were about to open the door to the courtroom, it burst open, and three little balls of energy disguised as little giggling girls came running out.

"There you are!" a woman called to them from down the passageway.

"What were you girls doing?"

"We went to see the Judge!" the oldest of them, maybe ten, said, twirling her skirt.

Another girl, about eight said, "Yeah!" with breathless excitement.

It was the third girl that I was watching, though. She, too, appeared to be about eight, with long blonde hair and a gingham dress. She seemed a little dazed. "This isn't right," she muttered.

Before she could say anything else, the woman—presumably her mother—grabbed her by the arm. Addressing all the girls, she said sternly, “I can’t take my eyes off you for a minute! I come in here to renew my driver’s license and you wander off to bother the Judge. Now come along, all of you.”

They left together, the little blonde girl looking back at us in confusion and... fear? Yes, fear.

I looked at the officer, but he just smiled at me from behind his glasses and said, “Kids,” as if that explained it all. It didn’t.

The courtroom was nicer than I would have expected in a small town. It was nearly deserted as well. The only spectator was an attractive blonde woman about my age who sat primly in the back row of the visitor’s gallery. I glanced at her quickly enough to see that she was wearing a wedding ring. I guessed she wouldn’t be joining me for a drink at Randy Andy’s that evening.

The Judge was already seated. From the look on his face, he had had a long day. That didn’t bode well for me. He was about fifty, I would have guessed, and very distinguished-looking in his black robe. His hair was mostly brown with just a hint of gray. He was wearing gold-rimmed glasses which appeared to be fairly expensive. Being a judge must pay fairly well, I thought, even in a little town like Ovid.

“What have we here, Officer Mercer?” he asked in an authoritative voice.

“Reckless driving and endangerment,” he said formally. “Also no registration in his vehicle.”

“Well, we ought to be able to take care of that pretty quickly. What’s your name, son?”

“Mike Donovan,” I told him as I stood before the bench. I had used the name so often that it was starting to sound natural to me.

“Well, Mr. Donovan, exactly why were you engaging in reckless driving?” there was a touch of amusement in his voice.

“Something went wrong with my car,” I told him. “Eric Vulman loaned it to me while I was in Ovid. Apparently the gas pedal stuck and I went through a red light.”

“I see,” said the Judge. “And do you have any proof of this?”

“Perhaps someone should inspect the car,” I suggested.

“That’s been done, Your Honor,” Officer Mercer said. “There is nothing wrong with the car.”

“What are you talking about?” I exploded. “No one had checked that car! He’s lying, Your Honor!”

The Judge pounded his gavel and boomed, “That will be enough, Mr. Donovan!” Then, he said something else to me, but I couldn’t understand it. It sounded as if it were Latin or something. Before I could ask him to repeat himself, I felt a sudden odd tingling sensation and dizziness. My knees turned to water and I fell to the floor.

“Mr. Donovan, you appear to be in some distress,” the Judge observed. “Under the circumstances, I think you should be allowed to rest. This case is continued until further notice.”

I didn’t have a clue what was wrong. I just realized I couldn’t stand up without becoming dizzy, and the tingling was becoming more intense.

“Officer Mercer,” the Judge ordered, “take Mr. Donovan to someplace where he can rest until he has recovered.”

I felt a strong hand lift me to my feet. With the officer’s help, I was able to stand and even walk. I assumed he would be taking me to an office where I could sit down, but instead, he led me out of the building and back to his car. They had apparently taken the Mustang someplace else, for I saw that where it had been parked, there was now a white Lincoln.

“Where are we going?” I managed to mumble as he positioned me in the back seat and allowed me to lie down.

“Someplace where you’ll be safe,” he told me.

I must have slept in the back seat, for the next thing I remembered was Officer Mercer pulling me out of the seat and onto my feet again.

We were parked in front of a small apartment complex. He helped me walk to the second floor of one of the buildings and managed to support me against the wall while opening the door of one of the apartments. As I was slumped against the building, I noticed the officer seemed much taller than he had before. We were about the same height, but now, he seemed to tower over me. I never thought to ask him why he had taken me so far just to rest. My mind felt like it had just been processed through a blender, and there didn't seem to be one muscle working correctly in my body.

He led me to a bedroom and gently dropped me on the bed. "Thanks," I said barely above a whisper. Even my voice sounded strange. I stopped thinking about it, though, for I quickly drifted off to sleep.

My sleep was anything but restful. The tingling continued, and my muscles seemed to spasm. It felt almost as if my body was twisting and contorting itself into a new shape. I felt parts of my body start to grow while others shrank. Then, as quickly as the sensations began, they stopped. The tingling ebbed away, and I seemed to know instinctively that I had control of my body again.

I lay there with my eyes still closed as I let my mind clear. Almost like going through a pre-flight checklist, I began to take inventory of myself. Something was tickling my ears, and there seemed to be extra weight around my earlobes. That was nothing compared to the extra weight I felt on my chest. My chest felt warm, but my legs felt cooler, as if someone had removed my pants.

Even with my eyes closed, it began to dawn on me what had happened and who—or at least what—I had become, but it seemed too bizarre to accept. Even though my mind had cleared, I denied to myself what had happened. I wanted desperately to keep my eyes closed. I wanted to refute in darkness what my other senses were telling me had occurred. At last, I knew I could wait no longer. I opened my eyes.

I was lying on my back, so I looked down at my chest, fearing the worst. My fears were confirmed. My chest was covered in a knit material, plum in color, and rising from it were two large, round breasts. My first thought upon seeing them was that if they were this large when I was lying on my back, they would be gigantic when I stood up.

Slowly, I pushed myself into a sitting position, grimacing as I felt those large breasts pulling down on my chest. A mane of coal-black hair fell over my shoulders. The strands were long and almost shiny with only a slight curl. I raised my hands to push the hair away and saw that they were now much smaller with long, slim fingers and feminine nails painted a dark red. Even my skin had a reddish cast to it. It was nearly the color of bronze, I realized, and smooth and flawless.

I looked down at myself again. I saw large breasts, a slim waist, flaring hips, and slim legs encased in nylon. There was no mistaking what I was. I was now a woman. But that was impossible, I tried to tell myself.

I had no idea where I was, but it was obviously a woman's room. The carpet was a rose pink. There were floral drapes and off-white walls. A vanity sat against one wall, and there were cosmetics neatly arranged on its surface. I could see into the bathroom where nylons were hanging over the shower door and a bra was draped carelessly over the back of the toilet. Was this the room of the woman I had become? It seemed likely.

I staggered to a full-length mirror on the back of the bedroom door, nearly losing my balance from the changed weight distribution of my body. Staring back at me was a young woman. She looked very exotic with her bronze skin and long black hair. Her face was classically beautiful with high cheekbones which gave her eyes an almost Oriental cast. The eyes themselves were such a dark brown that they appeared nearly black. As I had realized from looking down, she—I—had a very well-proportioned body and legs that were sensational, even without a heel to set off the ankles. In short, I was a knockout. If I had been my old self and seen this girl, I would have given almost anything for a night in bed with her.

I could have been Hispanic, but I realized I was probably at least part Indian. After all, Oklahoma had always had a large Indian population.

At one time, the entire state had been an Indian reservation. It didn't bother me to be an Indian. As a naval officer, I had lived, worked, and played with members of every ethnic group imaginable. The US military is probably the most well-integrated organization in American society.

No, being an Indian was the least of my worries. Instead, I was bothered at being a woman. I had read a story once where a man got changed into a woman and didn't realize it at first. Believe me, I realized it. Everything felt wrong. First, having worn closely cropped hair all my life, I had no idea how heavy the stuff was. And what was pulling on my ears? I pulled back the hair from my right ear and saw a long, dangling tassel composed of turquoise and silver threaded through my earlobe.

My entire torso felt different as well. I had taken the shape of my body for granted, for it had basically remained unchanged from the time I had graduated from Annapolis. But now, it felt entirely different. It protruded in some places and indented in others that it shouldn't have, causing me to walk with a swaying motion. But the worst of all the sensations was what was—or rather wasn't—between my legs. There was something silky covering my crotch, almost like a soft, tight bandage covering a gaping wound. I felt a sudden sensation of loss, as if I were incomplete.

I thought I would pass out from the shock. I felt as if I had entered a high-G turn causing my body to feel strange and my vision to tunnel out. I staggered numbly back to the bed, sitting on it as my knees gave out. Even that sensation was odd as my greatly expanded ass flowed across the mattress.

Then, I did something that only a few hours earlier, I could never have imagined doing: I cried. It was just a few tears at first, like a small leak at the corners of my eyes, but the effortless tears became a trembling stream followed by a sobbing torrent. Strangely, it felt good to cry, as if my problems lessened, washed away by the tears. As a male, I hadn't cried since I was ten, so I felt as if eighteen years of tears were draining out of my body.

I looked across the room at my reflection. Rivulets of black flowed down my cheeks, and I realized for the first time that I was wearing makeup. I licked my lips, tasting the slightly sweet taste of lipstick.

From beyond the bedroom, a door suddenly opened and closed. "Holly, are you okay?" a woman's voice called.

I stood up again. I had a sneaky hunch she was talking to me. "In... in here," I called, hearing for the first time my new soprano voice.

A terrific looking redhead in a green sweater dress looked into the room, staring directly at me. She had sparkling green eyes and a figure almost as fantastic as mine. She appeared to be about my age—my new age—but she was a couple of inches taller than me, whatever height I had become.

"Holy shit," she said, dumbfounded. "You're real!"

It wasn't something I would have expected her to say. "I'm real?" I asked. "What does that mean?"

"Oh!" she gasped. "I'm sorry. I just meant... Look, tell me straight up: do you remember who you were?"

"Who I was? I don't even know who I am now," I crossly told her. I tried to fold my arms for emphasis, but I found it hard to do with the breasts sticking out so far.

She looked at what I was trying to do and giggled, "Well, if you're trying to fold your arms over those melons, you must have been a guy before."

"You make it sound like this has happened before."

She sighed, "More times than you can imagine, honey. The Judge seems to get his laughs out of changing men into women. He even changes a few women into men just for a little balance. He's quite a guy, our Judge."

Confused, I sat back down on the bed. "This is all happening too fast for me."

She sat down next to me and put a sisterly arm around my shoulders.

If she had done that to me a few hours ago while I was sitting on a bed, I would have had her naked in a New York minute and ready to rock and roll. Now, though, I had the same plumbing she did. Lesbian sex didn't seem like much fun, either.

"Okay," she began, "I'll start from the beginning. Your name is Holly Ann Sheridan, and you're the Executive Assistant to Eric Vulman at Vulman Industries. You're twenty-one years old and your mother was a full-blooded Cherokee Indian. Your parents died two years ago in a car crash, but don't worry about that part. They never really existed. Shall I go on?"

"Yes," I replied. "Start by telling me who you are."

She smiled. "I'm Andrea Pyron, your roommate. I work at Vulman, too, as a secretary in the Production Department. We've roomed together for a year."

"Are you..." I began. "I mean, were you a man, too?"

She laughed, "Do I act like it?"

My face reddened, if it could become any redder. "No, I guess not. It's just that you said it happens a lot."

"It does, but not every time," she told me. "I was a lobbyist from Oklahoma City. My Oklahoma accent is for real and I'm one hundred percent girl—always have been and always will be."

"Oh my god!" I cried. "I've got an accent, too." I hadn't realized it until she had mentioned her own twang. I sounded just like her.

"You'll get used to it, honey," she told me. "Everybody does."

"Maybe," I allowed, "but I don't think I'll get used to this body."

"That's where you're wrong. Just about everybody gets used to their new identity after a while. I think it's part of the magic. If I were to go back to my old life, I probably wouldn't even know how to be a lobbyist anymore."

Did that mean that in time, I'd forget how to fly a plane? Did the magic of Ovid mean that I'd be condemned to a life of skirts and high heels, shuffling paper from one office to another instead of soaring above the clouds? It was a prospect I couldn't bring myself to consider. No matter what my anatomy told me, I was Richard Baxter, Lieutenant, United States Navy—a pilot and a man.

"I know what you're thinking," she said.

"You do?" I responded. How could she? How could someone who had always been a woman understand what it meant to lose your manhood? I wondered if she would have felt the same way if she had suddenly awakened with a two-day growth of beard and a penis and testicles crowding between her legs.

"Yes," she went on. "You want to fight it. That's okay—go ahead and fight it. You'll come to some sort of balance eventually. You'll have to, or you'll go crazy."

"You mean I won't be allowed to cut my hair, wear pants at work, and pick up chicks for some great girl-to-girl sex?" I said sarcastically.

She actually took the question seriously. "Well, I suppose you could cut your hair. As for wearing pants, Mr. Vulman probably wouldn't be very pleased unless they were very businesslike. I don't even think you have anything like that in your wardrobe. As far as lesbian sex, though, that's not very likely. Ovid is a small town, so there aren't any good gay bars. I suppose you could find it if you looked hard enough, but it doesn't fit into your character."

"My character?"

She nodded. "That's right. You see, Holly Sheridan has existed for some time now. There are placeholders here—we call them shades. They are like people, but not quite really there, if that makes any sense."

"It does," I replied. "I've seen some of them. I just didn't know what they were. So there is a shade of everybody before something in Ovid changes them?"

"Usually," she clarified, "but not always. Sometimes, the Judge makes an entirely new person out of whole cloth. Then, reality warps to accept that person as if they had always been part of Ovid. It's a little complicated, but since most people don't remember their transformations, it works out. Only about one in four or five people who are changed remember who they were before."

So the Judge was the force behind the transformations. I wasn't really surprised. The words I thought were Latin must have been some sort of spell. The questions were how and why, and what did it have to do, if anything, with the reason I had been sent to Ovid in the first place? I had to have a strategy. What would it be?

I had to know more about what was going on in Ovid. Eric Vulman had brought me here, so that meant that odds were good he knew what was going on in Ovid. He was probably even a part of it. Andrea had said that I was his executive assistant. It sounded like a glorified title for secretary. The best strategy then seemed to be to keep my cover as a transformed civilian pilot and try to fit in until I could talk to him. After all, I was still a Naval officer as far as I was concerned, and I had a mission to perform. I just wasn't sure how I was going to go about it. Until I talked to Eric, I had no choice but to play the part I had been given.

"Okay," I sighed, "I guess you'd better tell me what my character is."

She shrugged. "There's not a great deal to tell. You have always just been a normal young woman. You do your job well, everybody likes you, you attract guys whether you want to or not..."

I shuddered at that part.

"...and you're my best friend."

"Uh, the boy part," I began nervously, "I don't have a boyfriend or anything, do I?"

She shook her head. "No, but it isn't from lack of interest on the boys' part. You've had a casual date here and there, but nothing serious. You're between boyfriends right now. By the way, you apparently dropped out of Oklahoma State after two years because of a failed romance. As the story goes, I knew you in college, but I dropped out to go to work and ended up in Ovid. That's just a story, though. I've only been here about six months, but Andrea was here before I arrived. I told you about a job in Ovid, and here you are."

"Okay," I summarized, "so I'm a college dropout, a hot babe, half Indian and a glorified secretary."

"That about sums it up," she agreed. "Remember, I fit that description, too, except for the Indian part, and I can tell you, life isn't too bad here. I don't think I would want to give up Ovid and go back to the rat race again."

"That's fine for you," I told her, "but you've always been a girl. I haven't, so I don't think I'm going to have much fun being pawed on by every guy in town."

She grinned wickedly. "Don't be so sure. You wouldn't be the first former man to find out it's more fun on this side of the fence."

"Yeah, right."

"Look," she said, standing up, "we're supposed to be friends. Why don't you let me show you the ropes? I can help you play the role and you can decide for yourself what to do from there."

"Okay," I said hesitantly, "but no guys. We can be friends, but don't try to set me up with a guy. I would feel really queer."

She put out a slender hand. "It's a deal."

"Okay," I agreed, holding out a hand no larger than hers. "It's a deal."

Andrea and I spent the evening together, talking about Ovid and about my situation. It was an informative conversation, and as we fixed a quick dinner consisting of chicken and a salad, I began to have a pretty good grasp of what was happening in Ovid. Apparently, the town had been created out of nowhere by the Judge and his cohorts. The entire town was less than two years old, but most of the residents didn't know that. Most of the residents were shades. A shade, it turned out, was some sort of supernatural being that thought of itself as being a person but really wasn't. No one knew for sure what they were.

The rest of the town's population consisted of transformed people. Most had just wandered into town and been arrested by Officer Mercer, who seemed to be the only police officer in the town. Once changed, only about a quarter of the people remembered their old lives. The rest were as clueless as the shades seemed to be. Men were often changed into women and vice versa. Others had been changed into animals and even plants, but that treatment seemed to be reserved for a select few who had committed most heinous crimes.

"So why don't the people who remember start a little revolution or something?" I asked between bites of chicken. I was actually starting to feel human again. I had changed into a sweater and jeans, so I didn't feel quite so out of place.

"It's not that easy," Andrea explained. "I can talk to you about this because we're alone. If someone else walked into the room right now, we couldn't discuss this at all. It's a little hard to start a revolution under those circumstances."

"Then why hasn't someone fled town and told the authorities?"

"Told them what?" she asked. "That there are some strange beings with great magical powers who changed them into someone else in a small town in Oklahoma that doesn't really exist?"

"I see your point," I admitted. Anyone who tried to do that would be locked away for sure.

"Besides," she went on, "you can leave town any time you want."

"You can?" That meant I might be able to get a message back to Admiral Nepper. There was a faint possibility that I could make him believe what had happened in Ovid.

"Sure," she said smiling. "You can do it just as soon as you've accepted your new identity. That's another one of the little rules."

"Oh." So I had to accept being Holly Sheridan to leave town. That didn't sound like much of a deal. There had to be another way. "So, another subject. Who is the Judge anyway?"

"That I can't tell you," she replied as she finished off her chicken. "Are you finished? Here, I'll put everything in the dishwasher."

I handed her my plate. "What do you mean you can't tell me?"

She shrugged. "It's just another rule. If I tried to tell you, my voice would freeze up. If I tried to write it down, the muscles in my hand wouldn't work. You'll figure it out pretty quickly, though. Everybody does. It's just a little game the Judge likes to play."

I helped her with the dishes. It was funny, but Andrea really was starting to really become a good friend. Like many guys, I had never counted any women among my good friends. I don't mean to say that I saw women as nothing but sex objects. I was a bit more nineties than that. It was just that I had never spent much time around them except as co-workers or as dates. I had two brothers, but no sisters. When I got to the Naval Academy, there were some women around, but it was still mostly men. Then, in flight school, there were again a few women, but not very many. As a result, I had not had the chance to know women as contemporaries.

Then, in the Navy, there were women in our squadron, but the Navy has some very strict rules on relationships between the sexes. Often, the best way to stay within the rules is to keep your distance from them socially. I always stayed within the rules.

So as a hotshot jet pilot, the majority of the women I had gotten to know well were potential conquests. It tended to color my opinion of women. Now, I was one, so my friends would be mostly people like Andrea. It was a hard road to walk, but if they were all like Andrea, I thought I could do just fine.

When we had finished with the dishes, I asked, "So what happens tomorrow? I mean, I don't know anyone at work." I had to make sure I didn't slip and recognize Eric Vulman. After all, I wasn't supposed to know him. "And I really don't know what to do or even how to dress."

"Well, most of the stuff will come to you as you need it," she told me, sitting next to me on the couch in the living room. "When you get up in the morning, just relax and let yourself go. If you try to blank out your mind, you'll find that your body automatically does everything it's supposed to do. As far as knowing people, I'll try to identify them for you during the day. The ones who remember who they used to be will cut you some slack. They know what you'll be going through. Just relax and try to have a good time of it."

"Sure," I grumbled. "I don't even know how to pee as a girl." I suddenly realized I needed to do that, but the sensation was coming from inside my body instead of from the penis. Of course. How could it be otherwise? I didn't have one of those things anymore. "Uh... so how do I pee as a girl?"

"How did you pee as a guy?" she asked.

"Well, I just stood, aimed and let go."

She grinned. "It's the same for you now—all except the aiming part, so it might be better if you sat down."

"Thanks a lot," I told her, jumping up to go into the head... er... bathroom.

"And don't forget to wipe!" she called cheerily.

Some old habits die hard, I realized when I returned to the living room. We had decided to watch a little TV before bed. Since we had cable TV, there were plenty of choices to watch, and with as much male as I could still muster, I began flipping through the channels.

"Settle on something," Andrea complained. "I don't care what."

I stopped flipping when I came to a movie I had always enjoyed. It was a movie called Clash of the Titans. It was a simple piece of fluff that starred Sir Laurence Olivier as Zeus and... Wait a minute, I thought. Ovid was a Roman poet. That much I had remembered. Zeus was for all practical purposes the same as the Roman god Jupiter. I looked over at Andrea who was obviously bored with the movie.

"Do you mean that the Judge is really Ju... Ju... Ack!" I choked.

She smiled. "You came up with that pretty fast. I think you've got the right idea. Don't try to say it, though. Don't you remember what I told you? We can't talk about that."

I remembered something else from Roman mythology while my vocal chords returned to normal—or at least to female normal. Vulcan was the son of Jupiter. Vulman was only one letter different from Vulcan. That meant Eric Vulman was one of them, too. And what about Admiral Nepper? He knew Eric Vulman. Nepper—Neptune. Oh my god! Or maybe I should have said 'oh my gods!'

It was all starting to make a perverse sense now.

"So we can't talk about it at all?" I managed to say.

"Well," she drawled, "there's always a way. As long as you don't try to mention their names, you can carry on an oblique discussion."

"So," I began, looking her straight in the eye, "if I were to ask something about why these... beings are doing what they're doing, you could still answer the question?"

"If I knew the answer," she pointed out. "Nobody really knows why they're doing all of this. Maybe they have some cosmic reason for it, or at the other extreme, maybe this is just their idea of an amusement park. That would make Ovid some sort of a metaphysical Disneyland. Or maybe the answer is somewhere in between."

Just think of what they could do if they wanted to, I told myself. They had the power to transmute matter itself, all without any apparent mechanisms. They thought it and it became real. I wondered if they all had the power or just the Judge. I tried to remember my mythology. Stories often talked about the gods turning someone into something else, but a specific god wasn't always mentioned. It seemed like it was usually Jupiter who transformed others and sometimes himself. There was the woman who had changed a man into a stag. What was her name? Dinah? No—Diana. Or maybe it was Diane with an 'e.'

"Well, it's late and we both have to go to work in the morning," Andrea announced, breaking my train of thought. "Your nighties are in the second drawer of your dresser."

"Nighties?"

There was that grin again. “Unless you’d rather sleep in the nude.”

I shook my head, feeling the long hair tickle my neck and ears. “No, but don’t I have any pajamas?”

“Oh, they’re probably in there, too,” she said lightly.

“You’re enjoying this, aren’t you?” I asked with a frown.

Laughing, she gave me a sisterly hug. “You know, I’ve known guys like you were before. They were military pilots instead of civilians like you, but the mindset is the same. You’re all macho and act like you should be Indiana Jones or something. I guess I’m just having fun watching you try something really hard, like being a girl. I’m sorry, though. I shouldn’t get my jollies out of this. It’s just that it’s so cute watching you try to figure all of this out.”

“Unfortunately, with a body like this, everything I do seems to be cute,” I groaned.

There were, indeed, pajamas in the drawer, but that didn’t make me feel much better. They were soft and silky with lacy trim, and their color—light pink—didn’t help. I sighed with resignation and stripped down to get into them.

There, alone and nude in my bathroom, I had the first good look at my entire body. I could be a centerfold, I realized. I was going to have to beat guys off with a stick. My new body was going to look sexy in baggy jeans and a sweatshirt. I supposed I could cut my hair, but it wouldn’t really help. No one would mistake me for a guy no matter what I did. Besides, I still had a job to do.

Or did I? As I crawled into bed, I began to wonder. Had I been lured to Ovid just to be changed into this Indian bombshell? If that was the case, why all the phony identity crap? Why not send Lieutenant Richard Baxter into Ovid and change him instead of the elaborate Mike Donovan story. No, they were serious about my mission. Admiral Nepper and Eric Vulman might be part of the pantheon of Roman gods, but they needed my help. Maybe that could be my ticket back to my old life. With that happy thought, I drifted off to sleep.

“Hey! It’s six o’clock, Sleeping Beauty.”

“Mmph,” I managed to utter. I felt strange. Everything felt different. There was flesh where there shouldn’t be flesh, and there wasn’t flesh where there should be. Then, there was this twisted mass of hair around my face... Then, I woke up enough to remember what had happened to me. I was a girl. Damn.

To make matters worse, I was going to have to convince everyone I met today that I really was Holly Sheridan. It wasn’t going to be easy. Getting out of a dress and nylons hadn’t been that hard, but getting into them? And what about makeup? I would be expected to wear it, but I didn’t have the foggiest notion how to apply it. I was going to really need some help. Thank god (or was it gods?) for Andrea.

“Take a shower and we’ll get you ready,” Andrea told me, reading my mind it seemed.

We each had a private bathroom, so all I had to do was pad in, strip down and shower, stopping first for a trip to the head. It seemed as if this new body wasn’t nearly as forgiving about holding urine. When I had to go, I really had to go. ‘Who designed these crazy female bodies anyway?’ I thought unhappily.

I carefully washed off my new body. Maybe some men put in my situation would have used the occasion to do a little exploring, maybe even a little autoeroticism, but not me. I washed off my body as if it were a house of cards, unwilling to touch too forcefully. This wasn’t my body, I thought. Not really, anyhow. My body was male. I had to think of this body as just part of my cover in my mission. Maybe that was really all it was. Yes, that was it! As soon as I finished my mission, they would change me back. That had to be it. I actually felt a little better. I could do this temporarily.

“Are you going to take all day in there?”

I looked up and saw Andrea staring at me through the glass shower door. I quickly grabbed a towel that I had hung over the door and attempted to cover myself.

“What are you doing?” she laughed. “You haven’t got anything I haven’t got. Forget the modesty.”

Embarrassed, I turned off the water and dropped the towel to a less modest position.

“Hmm...” she said. “On second thought, you may not have anything I haven’t got, but you’ve certainly got a lot more of it.”

“Thanks a bunch,” I grumbled.

“Look, save the long showers for later when you know how to get ready. We need to get you ready to go or we’re both going to be late. Here, take this.”

She held out a pill to me. “What is it?” I asked suspiciously.

“A vitamin,” she said simply. “We girls need our iron.”

I took it and washed it down with a paper cup of water.

She had already picked out an outfit for me and spread it out on the bed. It consisted of a tan bra and panties, panty hose, a beige knit blouse and a very pale green single breasted women’s suit made out of some silky material. I held up the skirt. I was afraid it wouldn’t even cover my crotch. “Couldn’t you find anything shorter?” I asked sarcastically.

“You’ll want to fit in, won’t you?” she asked.

Reluctantly, I nodded.

“Well, this is the type of outfit Holly usually wears. That’s an 18-inch skirt, so you’ll be right in style. Now get dressed. We need to work on your makeup and we haven’t got much time.”

When Andrea had finished with me, I was an absolute knockout. I was going to have to consider myself lucky if I didn’t get attacked by the first man at Vulman Industries who spotted me. My suit was professional in cut, but it did nothing to hide an incredible figure that included a 36C rack on a five foot four inch frame. Legs? Oh, they were unbelievable. They were the kind of legs that Hollywood studios used to insure, and in the two-inch ivory heels that I wore, they couldn't have looked better.

Andrea agreed to go light on the makeup and easy on the jewelry. I wore a dainty gold chain necklace and a thin gold bracelet. My long hair pretty much covered the small gold rings in my ears. Even with light makeup though, my dark brown eyes, thick lashes and prominent cheekbones gave me the face of a Victoria's Secret model.

"Your turn to drive," she told me, flipping me a set of keys as we walked out the door.

"How can I drive like this?" I asked, motioning to myself.

"It doesn't seem to stop other women," she said with a sigh. "You have to learn sometime. There aren't any buses in Ovid and it's a long walk to work in those heels."

My car turned out to be a little red Pontiac Sunbird. That seemed appropriate for someone who was half-Indian. After all, Pontiac had been an Indian chief and a Sunbird sounded vaguely Indian. The car had an automatic transmission, so I didn't need to worry about depressing a clutch pedal in heels. I found it actually was no problem to drive as a woman, but the shoulder harness did rub uncomfortably against my new breasts.

Andrea guided me to Vulman Industries. It turned out to be a fairly large building in the southwest part of town. The front of the building was a two-story brick office area with a larger cast concrete area behind it. The concrete area had to be the manufacturing area where the company made car parts. The entrance way was nicely landscaped with a pair of flagpoles, one displaying the US flag while on the other, the Oklahoma state flag flew. Or so Andrea told me. I wouldn't have known the Oklahoma state flag from the flag of Bangladesh.

As I pulled into the parking lot, I saw there were already perhaps a hundred or so cars parked with more seeking out spaces.

“How many people work here?” I asked Andrea.

“About two hundred,” she replied, “but we’re still hiring.”

The car parts business must be good, I thought. Now, if Vulman could finish development of the new aviation fuel pump and keep the final designs secret, Vulman could expect considerable growth.

I don’t think I was as nervous the first time I landed on a carrier deck as I was when I walked into Vulman Industries for the first time.

Everyone we met was friendly. There were cheerful greetings and waves from the parking lot to the front entrance. It was Thursday, but you would have thought none of these people had seen each other for several weeks the way they greeted each other. I had to say it appeared that morale at Vulman was good. Of course, the majority of the people I saw were shades. Still, they seemed to be genuine in their actions and not just automatons.

Andrea led me through the lobby, past the cheery shade receptionist, and down a hallway. The hall opened up into an administrative area, complete with an attractive desk and a visitor’s couch. Straight ahead, past the desk, were a pair of large oak doors. ‘Eric Vulman—President’ was written in gold on one of the doors. “This is your desk,” she told me. It figured. I was right. Executive Assistant was just another title for secretary.

I put my purse under the desk as I had seen so many other secretaries do and sat down with a sigh.

Andrea smiled. “Just relax. Eric is a nice guy. Remember, he’ll know you are new, so he’ll take it easy on you.”

I returned her smile to be friendly, but I didn’t feel like smiling. As she turned and walked off to her own desk in some other part of the building, I felt very alone. It was one thing to be Holly Sheridan around Andrea. Even though she had always been female, she at least knew what had happened to me. Now, I was to be surrounded by shades and transformed people who had no idea that Ovid was all a sham. They would expect me to act like the Holly Sheridan they had always known. I wasn’t sure I was up to the task.

I was startled as one of the large oak doors opened. There, in an expensive suit that made him look like the corporate executive he was, stood Eric Vulman. He smiled at me. "Holly, good. I'm glad you're here. Come on in. I have some things to go over with you."

I'm sure you do, I thought to myself, my fear subsiding as my temper rose. Here was one of the beings responsible for my condition, and he was speaking to me as if there was nothing out of the ordinary. I hoped that he could tell from my body language that I wasn't pleased, but I suspected it was hard to do swaying as I was in high heels.

He closed the door behind me and motioned me to a small round conference table. As I sat silently, he moved over to his credenza and began to prepare two cups of coffee. I supposed angrily that that would be one of my duties from then on. "Coffee?" he asked pleasantly.

"Please," I replied, trying to make it sound cold.

"I believe you like it black," he observed.

"No," I corrected him. Andrea and I had had a cup of coffee before leaving the apartment, so I knew how this body preferred coffee. "For some reason, since yesterday, I seem to prefer it light."

Refusing to rise to the bait, he poured in a little powdered cream and stirred it for me. He placed the cup in front of me, then sat down opposite me. "I'm sure you want to know what's going on," he said.

"Obviously."

"Okay," he agreed. "I'll tell you what I can. But there is one thing I can't tell you, and that is..."

"Who you are," I interrupted. "You're Vulcan." I was surprised that I was able to say it in front of him. Apparently that taboo didn't apply when you were alone with a god.

His eyebrows shot up sharply. "I can see our confidence in you has not been misplaced. You reasoned that out much sooner than most of our new residents do."

“I had a little help,” I replied, taking a sip of the coffee. It was just right. “The old movie Clash of the Titans was on last night.”

He laughed, “Still, to deduce who we were from watching a bunch of middle-aged actors strolling around in togas in that film was quite a feat. It makes things easier to explain, though.”

“So what is going on?” I asked. We might as well cut to the chase, I thought.

“It’s pretty much as I explained to you yesterday,” he replied. “Your mission is a real one. It’s just that the cover of Mike Donovan wouldn’t have allowed you to learn much. Whoever is leaking the information wouldn’t be very open around you. But now that you’ve joined the ranks of the transformed, you have a reason to not care for us.”

“That’s for sure.”

He looked at me sympathetically. “Please, Holly...”

“Do you have to call me Holly? You know who I really am,” I pointed out.

“I know who you really were,” he corrected me, a little sternly. “Look at yourself in the mirror. There is nothing left of Richard Baxter or Mike Donovan except memories. You are Holly Sheridan, and as far as most people you meet from now on, you always have been. In fact, Richard Baxter never existed.”

“What?”

He rose and went to his desk. Picking up a newspaper, he returned with it and placed it in front of me. It was a USA Today dated the previous morning. The headline read ‘Navy Jet Shot Down Over Iraq!’ There were pictures of Terry and me, and under them, the subhead read ‘2 Pilots Die.’ I looked up at him in confusion.

“This is what happened to you day before yesterday—or would have if we hadn’t recalled you. More than likely, the incident would have started another round of violence in the Middle East. You, of course, wouldn’t have been around to see it.”

“But this didn’t happen,” I protested. “This must be one of those phony papers you get printed up at the novelty shops.”

“But it would have happened,” he clarified, “if we had let events go on without intervening. You were going straight into an ambush. It happened anyway, but your two wingmen managed to avoid damage and knock out the SAM battery that caught you. You were a good pilot. You would have just been in the wrong place at the wrong moment in time.”

It could have happened, I realized. I was a good pilot—a very good pilot—but things happened in the air. They could have nailed me. I looked more carefully at the newspaper, suppressing a shudder. In that moment, I knew Eric was telling me the truth.

“Okay,” I said slowly, “so you saved me from death. So what do you mean when you said I never existed?”

Eric explained, “The way the rules are set up, when you become a citizen of Ovid, your previous existence is eliminated. It’s as if you never existed at all. If you were to call your parents right now, they wouldn’t know who you were. The Judge can override that temporarily, but it’s a strain even for him. In your case, Richard Baxter ceased to exist the moment you were transformed.”

“But I can be changed back, can’t I?” I asked. “I mean, I don’t have to stay like this forever, do I?”

“That would be up to the Judge,” Eric replied. “There have been times where he has performed a second transformation, but it doesn’t happen very often. There’s a significant chance that you’ll remain Holly Sheridan for the rest of your life.”

I felt as if he had just pronounced a death sentence on me. Everything I had ever been—everything I had ever worked for was gone. I enjoyed being a man, a pilot, and a Naval officer. All those things were lost to me now. I had been changed into someone I didn’t know how to be, and to be honest, I didn’t want to know how to be.

“I’m really sorry,” Eric told me, “but this was necessary. We thought that a girl like Holly would be more non-threatening to our spy. As Holly, you'd be able to learn things you would never have learned in your male persona, whether that male was Richard Baxter or Mike Donovan."

"Then why the phony identity?" I wanted to know. "Why not just change me without Mike Donovan even being in the picture?"

"Because as a military officer, you'd be less likely to betray your country. Our spy or spies would be more wary around you. Once an officer, always an officer and all that. As a civilian pilot, though, you might be a little more open to any proposal they might make. They might think you're bitter enough about the transformation that you would be willing to join them."

I might at that, I thought to myself. I was a loyal American, but these people weren't Americans. Oh, they acted as if they were, but they were really gods from another time and place. If I helped them, was I really helping my country? Or was I just helping these ancient gods in whatever purpose they had conceived. I realized, though, that I would have to play along for the time being. What choice did I have? If I helped them, I could try to make sure I was really helping my country in the process. If I didn't help them, I would no longer be needed. I could be transformed again. I had no doubt that the next transformation would be to get me out of the way of the operation entirely. What would they change me into? A baby? An animal? I had no idea what the limits were, but I knew that unless I helped them, I would be in way over my head.

"So what do we do now?" I asked resignedly.

Eric relaxed noticeably. "More coffee?"

I nodded. "Please. Maybe I should get it though. I assume that's part of my duties."

"Yes," he agreed, pushing his cup toward me. "Perhaps you're right. It would look better."

When we both had fresh cups of coffee, he continued, "The team putting together the chip for the fuel pump is actually pretty small. There are only five people there and two of them are shades.”

“Can a shade betray you?” I queried.

“We don’t think so.”

“You don’t think so? I thought you were gods.”

“We are,” he agreed, “but we aren’t omnipotent or omniscient. Read your mythology. People were always tricking the gods, and we were always tricking each other. We aren’t like the Christian god, all seeing and all knowing. Even he got fooled for a time by Adam and Eve. If we were all powerful, we wouldn’t need you to help us. We would just know who our spy was.”

It was actually comforting to know there were limits to their powers. Granted, they still had very impressive powers, but they couldn’t do everything.

“So really what I am is the bait,” I surmised. “You expect them to contact me to help them in their scheme.”

Eric nodded. “That’s right. They thought they had the right plans before, but there were no templates for the chip in their set. That was only because the final design for the chip hadn’t been made. We’re close now though, and they’ll know it. But they’ll want to make sure it does what it’s supposed to do. They’ll need a pilot for that.”

“Now wait a minute,” I protested, raising a feminine hand, “I won’t know if the chip works or not. I’m just a pilot.”

“True,” Eric agreed, “but they won’t know that. For a week now we’ve been telling everyone associated with the project that a pilot who is a computer expert employed by the contractor for the F-18 is going to determine the functionality of the chip. And of course, the Navy will be sending their own man to look at it, too. They won’t approach someone from the Navy, but I’m betting they’ll approach you.”

He got up suddenly and went over to his desk. He keyed an intercom and said, “Tricia, I’m sending Holly down there to get some employee files. Give her whatever she needs, okay?”

“Will do,” a voice came back.

“I want you to read over the files of everyone on the project,” he told me. “You’ll be expected to know all of them. Personnel is at the other end of this hall. Tricia will help you. She’s an attractive black woman, about thirty, with short hair. You and Tricia are good friends.”

“Is she real?” I asked, getting to my feet.

“Yes,” he replied. “She doesn’t remember being anyone else, though. That reminds me. If you look down at the bottom of the Employee Application Form in each file, you’ll see either one, two or three asterisks. One means a shade, two means a transformee who doesn’t remember his or her previous life, and three means that, like you, they remember.”

I gave him a grim smile. “How many asterisks are on your file?”

“None at all,” he said blandly.

Tricia greeted me as an old friend, but I suppose in her mind, that’s just what I was. I found after chatting with her for a couple of minutes that she really was a likeable person. I wondered who she had been before she came to Ovid. Was she a former man like me? Had she been black? Since she didn’t know herself, it was unlikely that I would ever find out. I began to realize that the best way to deal with the residents of Ovid was to see them as they saw themselves and not worry about who they had been before.

Was that how they would deal with me? Andrea and Eric knew who I really was, or at least, who I had been. Come to think of it, Andrea didn’t even know that. She only knew my cover identity. To everyone else, I was Holly Sheridan. To the shades and people like Tricia, I always had been Holly. Other transformees who at least knew they had been transformed would know that Holly was now real and no longer a shade, but it probably wouldn’t matter to them. I supposed Eric was right. In many ways, it was the perfect cover, but why they couldn’t have changed me into a man was beyond me. I could have been just as effective that way, I was sure.

Of course, there was the idea that I would cast my lot with the spies if they thought I was thoroughly disgusted with my change of sex. Maybe I should consider it, I thought. I owed these gods nothing. They had changed me against my will. They had taken away my career, my sex, everything that had made me Richard Baxter. What did I really owe them? My life? Only if I believed their story of my imminent death in the Gulf.

Still, I told myself, they had no reason to lie to me. They could have used another pilot were it not for their desire to use one who had been bound to die. If all they wanted was a pilot, surely they could have found one who could have tolerated becoming a woman. Hell, there was probably a pilot out there somewhere who would have jumped at the chance. I couldn't imagine who he would be, but it took all kinds to make a world.

Resigned at least for the moment to my situation, I returned to my desk with the personnel files I was to study. I had also grabbed my own file so I could learn more about my new self.

The first file I opened was the file of the team leader of the chip development project. His name was Darren Cache. His picture was in the file. He appeared young, no more than twenty-five. I wondered if it was an old picture, so I checked his birth date. No, in fact, he was only twenty-four. I guessed high tech leaders were often young. Gray hair and innovations in computers didn't seem to go hand-in-hand. There were two asterisks at the bottom of his file. That meant he didn't know who he had been before. He had dark hair, fair skin and blue eyes if the color of the picture was right. He was a handsome man. I wondered if he was married. I looked down at the file and was pleased to see that he was single.

Pleased to see that he was single? What in hell was wrong with me? My mind had been drifting in almost a trance. I had been thinking like... like... like a girl, damn it! What was I going to think about next? Shopping for some really cute clothes? Having babies? I had to focus my mind on who I was. I mean, who I really was—not who I appeared to be. Maybe the transformation was more than physical. The physical aspects were scary enough.

I tried to concentrate on the files. No problems with the next file. The guy looked like a weasel. He was thirtyish, balding, and with a bushy moustache. He had dark skin—darker than mine—and dark brown eyes. His name was Randy Aziz. Aziz—wasn't that an Arab name? He was a shade, though. I suspected, as did Eric, that the culprit was not a shade. Surely the gods had better control than that on their artificial creations.

Whoa, Rich, I said to myself. I didn't really know enough about the shades to say that. Maybe they were just another form of intelligent life. Eric had said himself that the gods were not omnipotent. He might think a shade couldn't betray the gods, but what if he was wrong? Maybe shades could act up like the Yul Brynner robot in Westworld. Now there was a scary thought.

The next file belonged to a Meg Hartwell. She was real and apparently remembered who she had been. She looked to be about twenty-five with blonde hair and blue eyes. I would have to call her cute, I thought, trying to recall my male perspective, but nothing to write home about. If she had been male before, she might be angry enough at the gods to betray them.

Damon Greene was a black man and perhaps the oldest member of the team. He was thirty-five but his picture made him look older. He was real with no memory of a past life, but could he feel as if he had been passed over in favor of a younger Team Leader? Jealousy could be a motive for betrayal. He was also the only married member of the team. Money pressures could cause him to be a spy as well.

The final team member was Jeff Todd. He was the same age as I was now and a recent graduate of Capta College, which was apparently a local school. He was blonde with blue eyes and looked like the All-American boy. He was also a shade. Of all the team members, he seemed to be the least likely suspect. He looked too young and too inexperienced to be involved in anything like espionage. Of course, that could make him the perfect spy, too. Who knew how old the shades really were?

Finally, I came to my own folder. There I was, smiling in a picture that I had never posed for. I looked fantastic even in a cheapo employee ID photo. According to the folder, my birthday was in February, so I had just turned twenty-one. My parents were Brad Sheridan and Mary Lone Eagle Hansen, both conveniently dead. I was listed as being one-half Indian. I was apparently born in Tulsa, and I had a sister living in Dallas. I wondered what she was like, assuming she really existed (which I doubted). I had to give the gods credit—they were thorough.

Finished with the folders, I was suddenly bored. If I had still been my old self, I would have ploughed through all the adminstrivia with the help of a yeoman or two and would be looking forward to flight ops. No more soaring through the clouds for me, I realized with sadness. I looked down at the in-basket on my desk. There were other projects for Holly to do, it seemed. With a sigh of resignation, I began to go through them.

Most of the projects were mundane in nature, but at least I was gratified to see that Eric did give Holly meaningful projects. I was apparently responsible for a lot of the day-to-day administration. I wasn't treated like a receptionist, or even a secretary. The only phone calls that came back to me were important ones that had passed the receptionist's screening, so I wasn't deluged with salesmen's calls. I did have to do most of my own typing, though, but I found that if I let myself relax into an almost trance-like state, I was a whiz at the keyboard. Apparently, the spell on me worked a little like an autopilot on an aircraft. As long as the task wasn't too complex, I could do it without thinking.

Going through the in-basket, I saw that there was a meeting right after lunch that I would be expected to attend. I looked forward to it, for it was with the chip development team. It would give me a chance to assess each of them.

Andrea joined me for lunch, leading me to the small cafeteria in the building. We weren't able to talk about my true first day on the job, though. Tricia and a girl from payroll had joined us, so I was exposed to my first dose of girl talk. Each of the girls talked about their husband or boyfriend. Tricia was married, and the payroll clerk, Renee, was a shade and was engaged. Andrea apparently had been seeing a lot of the bartender at that local bar I had spotted, Randy Andy's.

I was astounded at how openly each of the girls talked about sex. It was a good thing my Indian skin was slightly red or I would have had to explain my sudden rash of blushing to the other girls. I just kept my mouth shut and laughed when the other girls laughed. As a former man, I had no idea how openly women discussed their relationships with men. If I had known as a man, I would have probably suffered from performance anxiety a few times.

"All this talk reminds me to take my pill," Renee said suddenly, pulling a pill identical to the one Andrea had made me take that morning. She washed it down with iced tea. "There. No babies for a little while."

I gave Andrea an evil gaze. She had tricked me into taking a birth control pill!

She shrugged and said to Renee (but really to me, I realized), "Right. Better safe than sorry."

Finally, Tricia said, "How about you, Holly? You haven't said a word. Who are you seeing now?"

I gulped. Was I seeing anyone now? I had forgotten if Andrea had told me or not. I hoped I wasn't, but I didn't know. There was no way I was going to be caught dead dating a guy. I was one myself—inside, at least.

Andrea bailed me out, though. "Miss Sheridan is currently between men," she announced with mock formality.

"A lot of guys around here are going to be happy to hear that," Renee laughed. "They were afraid you and that car salesman would actually hit it off."

"Yeah," Tricia said, "we all heard he had a big engine under the hood."

They all laughed, and I even managed to fake a smile. I of course had no idea who they were talking about, but I was secretly relieved that I didn't have a boyfriend to juggle along with all the other aspects of my new life.

"Maybe I can put a flyer in with everybody's check tomorrow," Renee teased. "That way, they'll know you're available, Holly."

"Just in the guys' envelopes," Andrea suggested with mischief in her eyes aimed only at me. "After all, Holly isn't into girls."

They all laughed again. I was relieved, though, that lunch ended without any more comments about my love life.

I got to the chip development team meeting a little late. I hadn't taken into account that going to the head as a woman was a much more significant chore. Instead of sauntering up to the urinal for a quick task, I had to adjust dress and pantyhose and panties. It was practically like having to get undressed and dressed again just to take a piss.

They were meeting in a small conference room when I walked in on them. Eric had told them I would be joining their afternoon meeting instead of him, so they were expecting me. It was the excuse I needed to meet all of them, although they didn't know that.

"Hi, Holly," Darren called out casually when I walked in. He was leaning back in his chair while tapping a pencil against the table. He was wearing what looked to me to be a very expensive suit, and the tie that was loosened at his neck cost at least a hundred. I know, because I had priced that same tie before the ship left on deployment. Everyone else echoed the friendly greeting. I smiled at everyone and took an unobtrusive seat at the foot of the table.

"Okay," Darren began, "everybody's here. We've still got a lot of work to do, so let's make this meeting a short one. Damon, how is the interface?"

"Ready to go," the black man said confidently. "All the computer simulations show we're right on target."

"How about the subroutines?"

Meg and Randy both said together, "Ready."

Then Meg added, "We still need to re-calibrate fuel flow in one of the nozzles, but that can be reset now at the user level instead of reprogramming."

Darren nodded his agreement. "Are there any other issues we need to go over before we produce the final blueprint for the chip?"

"I'd like to take one last look this afternoon at programmable user interfaces in general. There are a couple of areas I'd like to tweak," Randy commented. I noted his accent was pure Oklahoma. His ancestry might be Middle Eastern but he was obviously born and raised in the US. That was one point for him. He would probably have no close ties with a foreign family since he was a shade.

"Okay," Darren said. "Randy, you've got this afternoon to look at the interfaces. Get Jeff to help you. His subroutine is finished. Tomorrow, we start on the final design. We should have the final design by a week from today. That's next Thursday. Any problems with that?"

Nobody disagreed, but the deadline set off a series of technical problems which even with my engineering background were hard to follow. The solutions to the problems took over an hour.

When the last of the discussions ended, Darren smiled. "We've made terrific progress this last week. It calls for a little celebration. Everybody head over to Randy Andy's right after work. I'm buying the first round."

This met with general approval. Randy even chimed in, "And I'll buy the second round."

"You're invited, too, Holly," Darren said with a warm smile in my direction.

"I'll be there," I said. It would be a perfect opportunity to see them in an informal atmosphere, not that they were very formal in the meeting. My first impression of them was that they all got along extremely well. There seemed to be no conflicts or jealousy among the members of the team. I was hard-pressed to see any of them as a spy. Of course, a successful spy doesn't exactly go around with a sign around his or her neck.

Meg hung back to talk to me after the others had left. She was better looking than her employee file picture, but still no raving beauty. Still, she had a nice figure which stood out through her white silk blouse and short navy-blue skirt. If I had met her as my male self, I would have been mildly interested, I had to admit. "Holly," she began hesitantly, "I just wanted to ask if you were feeling... different."

I knew what she was asking since I knew that she remembered who she had been. She was wondering if I remembered, too. "I feel fine," I replied carefully. The person I was supposed to be would have no reason to know about Meg, so I had to play dumb. "I just feel like a new person."

Meg grinned. Contact had been made. "I know how you feel."

"You do?"

"Look, Holly, a few of us remember who we were," she explained. "You're not alone. If you ever need any help getting settled in, let me know."

"Thanks," I replied. "My roommate has been a big help. I don't think I could have gotten through this without her."

"Oh, that's right," Meg said. "You share a place with Andrea, don't you?"

I nodded.

"Well, she's a good friend of mine," Meg explained. "The team has had to work closely with production on this project, and Andrea has been very helpful getting the specifications we needed. If she is half the help to you she's been to the team, you'll do fine. But if you need any help from me, just let me know."

"Uh, one thing," I told her. "I was just wondering. I'm a little new at being... well, at being a girl, to be honest. Andrea has always been one. Is there anybody you know who can help me with..."

“The emotional changes?” Meg asked.

I nodded.

She smiled at me. “Don’t worry. I’ll help you with that. Until last summer, I was a male software engineer working out of the Silicon Valley.”

“How did you end up here?” I asked.

“I was a big country western fan,” she explained. “I was driving to Branson, Missouri, for a week’s vacation and to see some of the country stars. I got stopped going through Ovid.”

“Speeding?”

She shook her head sadly. “No, drug possession. I was a pretty successful software engineer, so I had plenty of money to powder my nose. Don’t worry, that’s all in the past now. There are no drugs in Ovid, thank god.”

Or the gods, I thought, but she couldn’t say that.

“Anyhow,” she continued, “the next thing I knew, I was Meg Hartwell, girl software engineer.”

I was truly fascinated. This was the first opportunity I had had to talk to someone who had undergone the same sex change I had experienced. Let’s see, it was nearly April, so she had been a woman now for—what?—eight or nine months. She didn’t seem to be unhappy about it. Still, she could be hiding it, I thought. If she was unhappy with her new sex, she might be willing to spy on the project, either to get even or to strike a deal with a maverick god who would agree to change her back.

“So,” I began, “how has it been for you? I mean, how have you felt about being female?”

She gave me a knowing smile. “I remember asking someone that same question right after I got here. To be honest, I didn’t think I would ever get used to it. At first, I was so disoriented, I didn’t know what to do. The thought of wearing dresses and makeup was repugnant. It seemed like being a transvestite. Then, after a few days, it started seeming more normal. Besides, I looked better when I dressed right and had the right makeup. When I looked better, I felt better.”

I had to admit I understood her point better than I would have before my transformation. There was a feeling of accomplishment when you put the whole attire and makeup thing together. It was almost like putting a puzzle together to admire the picture.

“Of course, the hormones kick in pretty quickly, too.”

“They do?” That wasn’t something I had thought much about. My body was producing female hormones. How much of an effect would they have on the way I acted and the way I thought? More than I wanted to admit to myself, I was sure.

“They do,” she affirmed. “Don’t be surprised if men start looking good to you.”

I shook my head. “Sorry, but I don’t think so.”

“Oh, it will happen,” she assured me. “It will be subtle at first, but before you know it, you’ll be looking at a man’s ass and build just like you used to look at breasts and legs.”

I silently prayed to god that she was wrong. There was one more question I needed to ask though. “Uh, Meg?”

“Yes?”

“Are you happy?”

She thought for a moment before answering. “Yes, I am. Looking back on it, as a man, I had pretty much made a hash of my life. This was my chance to start over. Once I got my bearings, I actually started to become comfortable with who I had become. Now, I guess I just want what a lot of other women want—a career, a family, and friends. Just go with the flow, Holly. Ovid can be a great place if you do that.”

Go with the flow, I repeated to myself as I went back to my desk. Was that what I was supposed to be doing? Sorry, that wasn’t my style.

What did I want? Meg had talked about a career. I had that, until they took it away from me. A family? That had never been very important to me. I wasn't close to my parents or my brothers, but I had to admit to myself that I would miss them. I wasn't ready to go out and find another family, though. As for friends, I had had them, too. I was developing new ones in Ovid, but I didn't want to get too close to them. I would figure out a way to regain my masculinity and leave Ovid as soon as my mission was complete.

But, I reminded myself, unless I appeared to be going with the flow, I'd stick out like the proverbial sore thumb. I needed to appear to be adapting or my cover wouldn't work. My best strategy would be to do my best to fit in and catch the spy. Then once I wasn't needed in Ovid anymore, I could work on getting out.

The rest of the afternoon dragged by. At least the offices closed at four thirty instead of five. Still, the last hour at my desk was almost painful. I saw nothing further of Eric that day. On his calendar, he was signed out for meetings. I knew, though, that he was out playing golf with the Judge. I envied him.

Just before four thirty, Andrea walked in. "Ready to go?" she asked.

"Sure," I said, collecting my purse. Then I remembered Darren's offer of a drink at Randy Andy's. It would be a great opportunity to talk to the team, so I really had to go. "I forgot, Andrea. I'm having a drink with Darren and his team. I can drop you off at home first, though."

"Don't bother," she laughed. "I got invited, too. I'm kind of an honorary team member."

Andrea and I were the first from Vulman to arrive at Randy Andy's, but the place had plenty of other customers already. Some of them looked like they had been there since the sun came up. The bar itself was cleaner than most small town bars. I knew because as a pilot, I was an expert on bars, small town and otherwise. It was just as dark as most small town bars, though, with dim lights and pinewood walls that absorbed a lot of the light. It was arranged in typical bar fashion with a long bar flanked by several tables of various sizes. A second room contained a few booths and a pool table.

The only atypical feature of the bar was a lack of cigarette smoke. I wondered if cigarettes were as hard to obtain as drugs. It didn't matter to me. As a non-smoker, I would be happy to learn that the gods had kicked Joe Camel's ass out of town. Still, without the smell of stale cigarette smoke, the place didn't seem natural. I had to make do with a stale beer smell and there was plenty of that. It was odd, but since my sex change, even my sense of smell had changed. I found myself attracted to floral scents and turned off by the bar smells I had come to enjoy as a man.

There was another difference, at least for me, when Andrea and I walked into the bar. That was that all the men in the place turned around to look at us. Andrea didn't seem to pay much attention, but I felt as if my clothes were being mentally stripped from my body. I had a sudden urge to tug on my skirt to make it longer and fold my arms over my breasts to make them less obvious. It didn't work, though. The men continued to stare. Had I done that when I was male? Probably.

We staked out a large table and braced ourselves as a few of the braver men, their courage fortified by a couple of hours at the bar, started to slowly sidle our way. The strange mixture of country western music and rock that spewed out of the jukebox made it hard to hear what some of the men were saying, but between songs and a low spots in the music, I kept hearing phrases like "great ass" and "nice tits." Needless to say, I felt very uncomfortable.

Fortunately, the rest of the gang from work showed up before we could even order drinks. Everyone arranged themselves around the table. Darren sat next to me and grinned at me. "Thanks for getting a table. I was afraid there wouldn't be a big one left when we got here."

No chance of that, I thought. Many of the tables were still empty, although the place was filling fast.

"What'll it be, guys?" a raspy voice said with a thick Oklahoma drawl. I looked up and saw a man in black trousers and a white shirt. He was tall and thin, with a receding hairline and a hawkish nose. He wasn't homely, but his features gave him an almost weasel-like appearance.

"Coors for me, Marty," Darren said. "What about the rest of you?"

A chorus of "Beer!" came up from everyone, including me.

"Better make it pitchers, Marty," Darren said. "Let's start with three."

Three pitchers for seven of us, and that was what Darren considered the first round. Apparently, we were going to have a party. That was fine with me. I had downed pitchers of beer in Officer's Clubs and civilian bars on four continents. A little sex change wasn't going to cramp my style.

It was a good party. After we had made short work of Darren's pitchers, Randy paid for the refills. Meg chipped in for some nachos, which I suspected would be as close as any of us came to eating dinner for a while. Randy playfully kissed Meg for ordering food, earning him the temporary nickname of Randy Randy. Damon picked up the next round but had to leave early to make it to his son's soccer game. Jeff was trying to teach Andrea an old college drinking song. In general, it was a good party—one that made it hard to imagine that any of these people could be a spy.

I was almost on familiar turf, sitting in the bar, a beer in hand and plenty more to come. I could almost imagine myself back in my old body, having a few beers back at the club with the other pilots. Of course there were many differences, some subtle and some not so subtle. When I would turn my head to talk to someone else at the table, I could feel the sway of the earrings in my ears and the brush of long hair on my cheeks. When I brought the beer glass to my lips, I could see it clutched in a small hand with painted nails. Then there was the constant problem with my skirt riding up as I shifted in my seat. I had to remember to tug it back in place periodically. The sound of my voice was still disconcerting, too. I would get wrapped up in the conversation and decide to add a point, only to be shocked at the high pitch of my voice.

Then, there were the not so subtle reminders. It seemed like every time a slow song came up on the jukebox, some guy would come up, try to introduce himself, and ask me to dance. I politely declined each offer, more than a little embarrassed at the whole idea of dancing with a man.

Andrea was getting a chuckle out of the whole thing. As attractive as she was, guys were practically pushing her out of the way to talk to me. Of course, part of the time, they didn't have to. Andrea spent a fair amount of time out of her seat next to me talking with the bartender.

"They're an item," Meg explained to me.

The bartender, who went by the nickname of Deuce Meg told me, was a good-looking guy. Even if I hadn't been forced to see him from the female perspective, I would have known that. He was dark featured—black hair and goatee, dark brown eyes, and an olive complexion. He appeared to be about mid twenties, and from the muscles bulging out from the Randy Andy's T-shirt he wore, he obviously kept himself in good shape. The bar didn't need a bouncer when it had a bartender like Deuce. I also noted that he was real.

Finally, too much beer and too much sitting took their toll. I had to go to the head. I dreaded doing so. It had been so easy to drink beer as a man. I could be in and out of the head in less than a minute. Now, though, it was a major project. Still, it could wait no longer. The pressure in my bladder was building fast. I was finding to my chagrin that as a woman, when you had to go, you really had to go.

The heads were not exactly conveniently located. To reach them, I had to walk back through the pool room. There, playing a game of eight ball, were two men who looked as if they had just stepped out of the movie Deliverance. One was as homely as the other, for they were identical twins. They both wore dirty T-shirts and jeans, and there were two denim jackets on the stools next to them. I don't think they dressed so nearly alike on purpose. Rather, they just would never have had the style to dress in any other way. I would have guessed their ages at mid-twenties and their occupations as something which kept them in fairly decent shape in spite of the beer they were guzzling. The only real difference between them was that one of them was real and the other was a shade.

“Hey, pretty lady,” one of them called to me. I didn’t know which one. I had been trying to rush past them.

Before I could reach the head, a pool cue came down in the doorway like a tollgate. I looked around, and up into the eyes of one of the twins—the real one.

“Well now, Pocahontas, it wasn’t too friendly of you not to talk to my brother and me,” he said in mock friendliness.

“Yeah,” his shade brother agreed. “Not friendly at all.”

“Hello Jed, Ted,” a familiar voice said suddenly behind me. A hand reached by me and gently pushed the pool cue aside. I looked around to see Darren, a thin smile on his lips as he looked each of the twins in the eye.

“Hello, Darren,” both twins replied, respectfully but obviously not happy to see him. As I looked at each of them, I could see that they were not willing to challenge him. I wondered why. There were two of them and only one of Darren.

“Well, if you’ll excuse us, I think the lady and I need to do a little resting.”

They both backed away. “Sure thing, Darren,” the real one said.

I was so curious as to why they backed down that I didn’t think twice about using the head. Everything about it just seemed natural. I even remembered to wipe the way Andrea had taught me. I dressed quickly, hoping Darren would still be outside the door to the head. Gentleman that he was, he had waited for me. With a silent smile to me, the two of us walked back to the main room past a very disgruntled set of twins.

“They’re the Borland twins,” Darren explained. “Jed and Ted. Neither one of them is very bright.”

I realized that, but I also realized they didn’t have to be very bright to do what they had in mind.

“They seemed to be a little afraid of you,” I noted.

He nodded. “I have a reputation of being pretty good in a fight,” he said in a tone so conversational that it didn’t sound like bragging.

The party continued, but with a subtle change. I found myself inching toward Darren and talking with him more. It was partially protective coloration. I wanted it to look like I was with him so the other men in the bar would leave me alone. But it was partially something else as well. Darren had been my protector, and I found that I didn’t mind having one. The more I saw him in action, the more I liked him. He was fairly quiet, thoughtful, and seemed to exude an air of self-confidence. He was something like a pilot without the swagger.

We talked mostly party small talk. It was really more of a group discussion than a one-on-one conversation, but I found myself enjoying it. In the short time I had been female, I had seen a lot of men spending more time staring at my breasts than really talking to me. When Darren turned in my direction, though, it was as if I had his full attention as a person. His eyes were locked on mine.

One by one, the party began to break up. My stomach was uncomfortable from too much beer and junk food. Besides, I knew this smaller body of mine would have less tolerance for alcohol, so I resolved to quit before I had had too much. I suspected, though, that I had already come close to reaching that point.

Andrea had decided to stick around for awhile. Meg told me that Deuce was getting off at ten, so I knew why Andrea was staying. I wished everybody who was left a pleasant evening and got unsteadily to my feet.

“Are you going to be okay?” Darren asked me.

“Just fine,” I slurred a little. “I’ll drive slowly.” I wondered what the Judge would do if I was brought into his court for driving while impaired. I resolved to drive really really carefully.

The clear evening air felt good on my face as I walked out to my car. Since it was early spring, the evenings were still crisp. I sucked in a cool breath, enjoying the relative quiet as the noise from the jukebox receded. I fumbled with my keys, trying to get my car door open.

I was new to being a girl. That was my only excuse. Someone raised as a girl would have known to be careful in a dark parking lot. Since I was raised male, I never thought to look around for someone lurking in the shadows. My first indication that I was in trouble happened when I felt two large arms grab me at the waist from behind. Involuntarily, the air left my lungs as I let out a gasp.

“Well, well, Pocahontas, what are you going to do now?” I recognized the voice. It was one of the twins, Jed or Ted. From the arms that held me, I could see it was the real one, whichever one that was. The shade twin came into view as well, an evil grin on his ugly face.

I might have been slow to recognize the danger I faced walking out into the dark parking lot, but I wasn’t slow when it came to understanding what those two semi-retards had in mind for me. I had been a girl for less than two days and I was about to be raped.

Thankful for the self-defense training I had received in the Navy, I dug in my heels and tried to flip my assailant over my shoulder. If I succeeded, I might just have enough time to get in my car. To my shock, it didn’t work and I nearly lost my balance. It was a combination of factors, I realized at once. First, high heels are a poor shoe to be wearing when you’re trying to throw someone. Next, I hadn’t allowed for the fact that I was much smaller and weaker. And finally, I panicked, struggling futilely.

“Well it’s not Pocahontas after all,” the shade twin laughed. “It’s Judo Judy.”

Both men were laughing so hard, they didn’t even see the first kick. I tried to jump back as a leg came flying out of nowhere, knocking the shade twin to the ground. A dark shape hit the ground, rolled and came to his feet. It was Darren. “Let her go, Jed,” he growled from a low crouch.

Jed didn’t have to be asked twice. I felt his arms sag and fall away from me. I nearly fell to the ground as he retreated. I thought Darren was just going to let them run away, but before they could both get their balance, a car, headlights on high with a red light flashing on top blocked their way.

“Stop where you are,” a calm but forceful voice called to them, stepping out of the police cruiser so quickly I never saw the door open or close. I did recognize the voice, though. Silhouetted in the bright lights of the cruiser was Officer Mercer.

The twins saw that he hadn’t bothered to draw his gun, so foolishly, they decided to make a run for it. Officer Mercer moved so quickly, he was a soft blur in the lights. In seconds, both of the twins were on the ground semiconscious.

“Do you need any help with them, officer?” Darren called.

“No. Thank you for asking, sir,” Officer Mercer said respectfully. “If you’d just take care of the young lady, I would appreciate it.”

I shook my head and raised an arm in protest. “No... no, I’m fine. I just need to go home.”

I tried to make it to my car, but my legs nearly collapsed from under me. Darren caught me as I began to fall, my breasts pressing against his chest. What was wrong with me? I wondered as I rested limply against him. I was shaking like the proverbial leaf. I was light headed and weak in the knees. I was a pilot, damn it! I had landed planes on carrier decks, faced the enemy in the skies above the Middle East, and accomplished dangerous feats for years. Yet here I was, unable to control myself. To make it worse, in frustration, I began to cry. Cry, for god’s sake!

Darren misunderstood the cause of my tears. He held me even closer to him and said softly, “Don’t worry, Holly, you’re all right. They won’t bother you anymore.”

For some reason, that made me cry even harder. He was talking to me like I was a weak girl. He was holding me as if I needed to be comforted. None of this was true, was it? Was it? God, what was happening to me? I was a man in a woman’s body, but mentally, I was still a man. I had to be. I couldn't lose myself in this soft vessel, I thought. I had to get control of myself.

At last, I was able to stop the tears.

"Give me your keys and I'll drive you home," Darren offered.

I managed to pull away from him and stand a little steadier. "No, I can drive. I'll be fine."

"Look, I want to drive you home," he insisted. "I only live a couple of blocks from you. I can walk home. Then, you can pick me up in the morning and bring me over here to pick up my car. I'd feel better knowing you made it home okay."

"Well..." I drawled slowly. I had to admit I would feel safer if someone was with me. I had never had the experience of fear of being sexually assaulted before. It gave me a new appreciation for what girls go through. Every dark corner could hold a potential attacker. I suddenly realized that I didn't want to go back to my dark apartment all by myself. I wanted someone else there when I opened the door. "All right."

"You know," he said when we were in the car driving home, "there are better moves you could make."

"I beg your pardon?"

"Oh, I'm sorry," he apologized. "I was talking about the way you tried to bring Jed down."

I had been pretty good at self-defense training in flight school. "What do you mean?" I asked indignantly.

"Well, the move you tried on him would have worked fine if you were my size, but you would have to be a lot stronger to make that work while you were standing in heels," he explained.

"And you know a better way?" I asked coolly. Unfortunately, I knew he was right.

"Well, better for someone your size," he amended. "Hey, tomorrow is casual day. Why don't you wear something you wouldn't mind getting roughed up and I'll show you what I mean over the noon hour."

"Are we going to fight it out in the parking lot?" I asked sarcastically.

"No," he said, smiling, "but you'll see."

He saw me to my door and waited while I turned on the lights.

"Do you want me to look around?" he asked.

I smiled. "No, thanks. I'll be fine."

He took my hand gently. "Then I'll say goodnight. Pick me up about a quarter until eight?"

"Sure," I agreed. Then, before he could turn away, I did something impulsively that I never dreamed I would do. I leaned over from the doorstep and gave him a sisterly kiss on the cheek. "Thanks, Darren."

With a surprised look on his face, he replied, "Sure. Any time."

As I closed the door behind me, I wondered if there was any way I could kick myself. What was I thinking of, giving him that little kiss? Was I turning gay? Well, not gay, I rationalized. After all, no matter what I was in my mind, I was a very pretty girl on the outside. Maybe it was just that autopilot thing kicking in again. That had to be it, I told myself. After all, there was no way I would have voluntarily kissed him, even in the innocent fashion I had done. No way in the world.

Besides, Darren wasn't just a co-worker or a friend. He was a suspect in a case of industrial espionage which was potentially damaging to the country I had sworn an oath to protect. I couldn't get involved with him, even if I wanted to, which I didn't. I was sure I didn't want to get involved. I was very sure. I was positive. I kept telling myself that almost as a mantra as I went to bed.

"Time to get up!" Andrea was just too damned cheery in the morning. I groaned and stretched, feeling the uncomfortable sway of my breasts as I sat up.

"So what time did you come in? I didn't even hear you," I told her, swinging myself out of bed.

“Let’s just say you were dead to the world when I came in,” she laughed. “By the way, it’s casual day today, so dress accordingly.”

“Yes, I know,” I replied. “Darren told me. What should I wear?”

Andrea helped me pick out an outfit. It consisted of jeans and a denim shirt. I had thought it would make me look less feminine, but no such luck. When I looked in the mirror, I could see the outfit was designed to compliment my curves, not hide them. With my long black hair and Indian features, I looked like something out of a Western movie. Oh well, I sighed, I might as well go all the way for that look. I slipped on a black belt with a large turquoise buckle and black boots with a two-inch heel and turquoise earrings.

“You know what you really need to set that off,” Andrea commented as I struggled with my makeup, “is one of your fetish necklaces.”

I turned. “One of my what?”

“Fetish necklaces,” she repeated. “Oh, quit thinking like a man. I don’t mean that kind of fetish. Lots of women wear fetish necklaces. They have little stone carvings of bears and other animals that have magical powers according to Indian legends. Some Indian you are.”

“I’m only half-Indian,” I corrected.

“Then it must be the clueless half,” she joked.

“Hey, it’s hard enough to figure out how to be a girl. I’ll figure out how to be an Indian later.” I sincerely hoped there wouldn’t be a later. Maybe if this mission went well, I could convince the Judge to change me into a man again.

I put on the fetish necklace. She was right. It was perfect for my outfit. I may have wanted to be a man again, but I still managed to take a certain amount of pride in the fact that I made a dynamite-looking woman. I was beautiful and a little exotic.

“Come on,” she urged. “We’ve got to get to work. My turn to drive.”

“Oh!” I interjected. “I almost forgot. We have to pick up Darren.”

“Why?”

“He drove me home last night and left his car at the bar,” I explained.

“Oh?” There was a sly note of curiosity in her voice.

“Don’t get any ideas,” I told her, blushing. “It’s a long story. I’ll tell you on the way to work. Do you know where he lives?”

“His address is in the employee directory. I can find it,” she replied.

It was only three blocks, but I managed to get the basics of the story explained to her. She was duly sympathetic. “Those boys have been headed for a fall for a long time. They’re mean and nasty. I’m not sure why the powers that be put up with them. Maybe this time, they’ll do something about them.”

I could only hope.

Darren was waiting for us in front of his house. His house turned out to be a very nice ranch style home, well landscaped and freshly painted. As we pulled up, I could see the edge of a swimming pool in his large back yard. He seemed to be doing pretty well for himself. By Ovid standards, it was quite a nice house.

“Here, I’ll get in back,” I offered. Andrea drove a little Escort coupe, so there wasn’t much room in the back seat.

“Don’t bother,” he replied, sliding into the back seat and resting his legs across the entire seat. “See? I’ll do fine. Did you sleep okay last night?”

“Like a baby,” I said truthfully.

“Good. Don’t forget to come by my office at lunch.”

“I won’t.” I didn’t really think he would have much to teach me about self-defense, but I did want to get to know him better. I mean, he was a suspect and I owed it to the mission to get to know everything I could about him.

Darren’s car was impressive. He had a white Corvette, brand new. He really was doing well for himself. I had priced the new ones. As I let him out, I started thinking. Darren didn't remember who he was, but that didn't mean he couldn't be the spy. The motive could have easily been money. He obviously liked to live well, and I began to wonder if his salary was sufficient to afford all of his toys. I decided to take another look in his file and see how much he earned.

"Thanks, girls," he said brightly as he got out. Then, before I could stop him, he gave me a quick kiss on the cheek. "See you at lunch."

"Wow!" Andrea said with a wicked grin as we drove away. "For somebody who hasn't been a girl very long, you work fast."

"Oh," I mumbled, blushing, "it's nothing, really. He just helped me out of a jam. That was just a little brotherly peck."

"The kiss may have been brotherly," she commented, "but the look in his eyes wasn't. Come to think of it, you had that same look."

"That's ridiculous!" I protested. "I'm not interested in him at all. I mean, he's a guy."

"And you're a girl. So what's the problem?"

"I'm not all girl," I said, folding my arms in disgust, trying to ignore the swell of my breasts.

"Don't be too sure," she warned. "I've seen other guys become girls and get to like it. Look at Meg. When she first got here, she was just like you. Now, you'd never know she was ever male."

I didn't argue. I knew there was a real risk that my entire psyche was changing. It was only my second morning as a woman, but it had seemed much more natural. I was beginning to think nothing of unconsciously walking in heels and touching up my makeup. Sitting to pee was still a pain, but I was managing to get the job done in less time. I was beginning to recognize that the person I had once been was being pushed back further and further in my mind, filtered by the constant demands of a female body. Someone once said you are what you eat. I didn't know about that, but I was starting to learn that you are who you are.

I was just getting ready to see Tricia and pull Darren's file again when Eric called me into his office. He was dressed casually as well, but he looked every bit as professional in a polo shirt as he did in a suit. He limped over to his credenza and poured us each a cup of coffee.

"I thought that was my job now," I commented.

He grinned. "I suppose it is, but I like to think of myself as a liberal boss. How is your investigation going?"

We seated ourselves at his conference table and I began, "Well, it's going slowly. I haven't found anybody wearing a trench coat and dark glasses. The whole team seems to get along well together. No one seems unhappy or suspicious." I thought about Darren's lifestyle but decided not to mention it until I reviewed his file again.

Eric sighed, "We're having that same problem. Meg would be the most likely candidate from a purely pragmatic standpoint. She's the only real person on the team who remembers who she was before. She might bear us some ill will."

"Particularly since you changed her sex," I couldn't resist adding.

Eric stared at me. "Is it that terrible, being a girl?"

Was it? I should have been able to answer yes, it's terrible. Every time I put my hand between my legs and feel nothing but a slit, it's a nightmare. Every time my breasts sway or my hips swivel, I get angry. Every time I put on makeup, I feel like I'm in drag. I should have been able to say all of those things, but for some reason, those statements didn't seem accurate. All I could say was, "Maybe it isn't terrible, but I think I would rather be male."

I think? I THINK? Where was the firm conviction that I was male through and through? Had that dissipated so quickly? No, not really. It was just that every hour I spent as Holly Sheridan made it seem just that much more natural. Yes, I would rather have been a male, but it was almost like my old male self saying 'yes, I would like to be taller.'

"Well, as soon as this mission is over, I'll talk to the Judge about that and see what he can do," Eric promised.

"I would appreciate that," I mumbled.

“In the meantime, I’m going to be gone for a long weekend,” Eric continued. “Keep working on the case. The Navy will be sending someone here on Monday to evaluate the project. That means the final designs will be ready Monday. We will be at our most vulnerable point then, so anything you can give me when I get back Monday may help us find the culprit.”

“I’ll do my best,” I promised. “But I thought the final design wouldn’t be ready until Thursday.”

Eric smiled. “That’s the official story, but Darren will have everything wrapped up today. Even the rest of the team doesn’t know it. So stay alert.”

“I will.”

And I would. I went immediately to Tricia’s office and pulled the files on the team members again. Back at my desk, I immediately opened Darren’s file. I found myself a little uptight about it. I liked Darren and I hoped there was nothing suspicious in his file. Unfortunately, I was disappointed.

Darren did make pretty decent money. His file indicated that he made in the low thirties. The problem was that low thirties was probably not to support expensive clothing, a nice house with a pool and a Corvette. Of course, it was possible that he had family money. Just because his life had been constructed by the gods didn’t mean he couldn’t have a rich uncle somewhere in the family who paid the bills either directly or posthumously.

Maybe there was something incriminating in one of the other folders that I had missed, I thought. Randy’s and Jeff’s files showed nothing, though. Besides, they were shades. I had come to realize that shades acted just like real people, but I couldn’t see one of them being a spy. Damon was still a possibility. I really didn’t know that much about him, but somehow, he didn’t seem the type. My brief conversation with him and the comments of others led me to believe he was a dedicated family man with a working wife. They lived well but not beyond their means. He just didn’t seem the type.

Meg was still a possibility. She had experienced a sex change after all. Maybe she wasn't as happy being female as she let on. But most spies wouldn't be in a developing relationship if they knew they might have to flee suddenly. The best spies were loners—people with no spouse or significant other who lived alone. People like Darren.

But wait a minute, I thought. There was nothing that said the spy had to be on the team. Technically, the spy could be anyone at Vulman. After all, it wasn't a secure facility. Most of the place built parts for Fords. That didn't rate very high security. Even if you narrowed the search down to people who worked in the office, that meant there were maybe thirty more suspects. The weird way things worked in Ovid, the spy could even have been the shade Holly, if you accepted the premise that a shade could be the culprit. Maybe I was chasing myself and didn't even know it. Between my investigation and too much beer the night before, I was getting a headache.

I felt better by lunchtime as I made my way to Darren's office. I was looking forward to getting to know him better. He was rapidly becoming my number one suspect, but in spite of the circumstantial evidence, I didn't really think in my heart that he was the one.

"Come on in," he called when he saw me at his door. His office was fairly plain. The only pictures on the wall were of new Fords, probably given to him by one of the Ford reps who visited the plant periodically. His desk was relatively neat, and there were two brown paper sacks on it.

"Lunch," he explained, nodding at the sacks. "I thought we could eat here after our workout."

I raised an eyebrow. "Workout?"

"Well, not really a workout," he admitted. Then he pointed to an open area of the floor where he had rolled out a padded mat. "I did think we could practice for a minute or two."

"That's right," I said. "You were going to show me how to defend myself."

“Well,” he admitted sheepishly, “I suspect you already know how to do that. If I indicated that you couldn’t, it was probably just the beer talking.”

“No,” I told him. “I didn’t do very well last night, and you did. Any pointers you can give me would be appreciated.”

He nodded. “Okay. As I told you last night, you’re a little small to be trying to throw a full-sized man. There’s an easier technique. Here, put a bear hug on me like Jake did to you last night.”

“Sure,” I said, coming up behind him. I threw my arms around him, feeling my breasts squeeze against his back. I was not surprised as I wrapped my arms around his waist to find that he was very fit. His stomach was flat and hard.

“Now watch this,” he said, dropping to one knee, grabbing my right leg, and pulling me off my feet. As I landed on my butt, I was happy for the first time that I had picked up a layer of feminine padding there. Otherwise, even the mat wouldn’t have cushioned my fall as well.

“Pretty good,” I admitted as he gave me a hand up.

“It works better for a woman,” he explained. “It’s like the old adage that goes the bigger they are, the harder they fall. It doesn’t take much strength, and you don’t need to worry about how to plant your feet while wearing heels. Now you try it.”

He came up behind me, grabbing me just below my breasts. I dropped as best I could, feeling my breasts pulled upward awkwardly and a little painfully. But he was right. My heeled boots were no obstacle since I already had a knee on the ground. I pulled his right leg as he had pulled mine and was rewarded with a satisfying thump as he hit the mat.

“Pretty good,” he allowed. “Now the same move works from the front, too. Here, let me show you.”

He put his arms around me tightly pulling me to him as if to steal a kiss. His lips moved closer and closer to mine...

“Drop!”

“What?”

“Drop down and grab my leg.” His lips were practically on mine. Then, before I could react, he was kissing me. I thought to drop and grab his leg, but there was something deep inside me that wanted this to happen. I felt my arms involuntarily drape around his neck. I felt our bodies move closer together. There was a new sensation between my legs, almost as if someone had spilled something warm there. I knew what it was, and the feeling was very pleasant.

Suddenly, we looked at each other, each as surprised as the other. We hadn’t meant for it to happen. I certainly hadn’t planned on it, but there it was. What the hell was happening to me anyway? It shouldn’t have felt right, but it did.

“Uh... I guess you get the idea,” he finally said.

“I think so,” I replied with a faint smile. I let my hands drop away and felt him release my waist. Neither of us could think of anything to say.

Nervously, he handed me a brown sack. “I got us both chicken salad sandwiches,” he said, trying to make it sound as if nothing had just happened. “I hope that’s all right.”

“Sure,” I answered, accepting the sack.

We ate together in silence. I was aware of what he was thinking. After all, I had been male myself for almost all of my life. He was thinking that I was between boyfriends, so maybe I might fall for him. He wanted that to happen, I could tell. I wondered if I had been so transparent as a man. Probably, I realized.

What was odd was that I was beginning to feel an attraction to Darren. Now, I had never been attracted to a man in my life. If I were still a man, I could have easily become friends with Darren. He was strong, self-assured, and forthright. He was just the sort of person I had always valued as a friend. But now that I had a full load of female hormones racing through my system, I had been forced to see Darren as potentially more than a friend. Added to his list of positive attributes, the female brain I now had was forced to add the descriptors attractive, protective, and a good dancer.

I supposed I had to think of what might happen if I had to stay as Holly in Ovid. Eventually, I would have to consider sexual relations with a man. The thought was not a happy one, but there it was. It would eventually come down to go to bed with a man, be a lesbian, or buy a dildo. None of the prospects sounded very good to me.

We mumbled lukewarm “see you later” to each other and I went back to my desk.

I really didn’t accomplish much that afternoon. I noticed that very little work got done on Friday afternoons, either in the Navy or at Vulman Industries. At last four thirty rolled around and Andrea showed up at my desk to collect me.

“I’m looking forward to a hot bath,” I told her, explaining the bumps and bruises I had probably gotten from my little self-defense session with Darren.

“Well, it will have to wait,” she told me. “We’re meeting the production staff for a beer at Randy Andy’s.”

I groaned, “Not again. I can still feel the beer from last night.”

“Then consider this a little hair of the dog,” Andrea laughed. “We won’t stay long. Deuce has to work until closing, so I won’t be going over to his place until late. We can go home after a quick one and watch a movie or something.”

“Great.” I was looking forward to relaxing without playing Holly for a while.

Randy Andy’s was already jumping. I recognized a lot of people from Vulman Industries in the crowd. Andrea and I sat with the production staff. I had met some of them, so they weren’t all strangers.

Unfortunately, one of the staffers, a Ralph Cosgrove, sat next to me and made sure he was crowded right up against me. He was real but seemed to know only his current life. He kept trying to strike up a conversation with me, finally draping his arm nonchalantly over the back of my chair. It was too much for me to take.

Then I spotted Darren. He was drinking at a nearby table with his team. It gave me the perfect excuse to escape Ralph. "I'll be right back," I promised Ralph, having no intention of returning.

"Hi," Darren said as I sat down next to him. His team all greeted me as well. "How are you feeling?"

"I'm a little sore," I admitted. "Thanks for the lesson."

He smiled. "My pleasure. I'm sure Dennis will never bother you again, but it never hurts to be sure."

"Who?" I asked blankly.

"Dennis," he repeated. "Dennis Jessup. Remember? He was the guy who accosted you in the parking lot. Fortunately, it was pretty innocent, but I'm glad you agreed to the self-defense lesson just the same."

"No," I protested. "I was attacked by Jed and Ted Borland."

He shook his head. "I think you're a little confused, Holly. The only Borlands I know of are Jean and Tina Borland over there at the bar."

I looked at where he was nodding. Two girls, identical twins, were at the bar, flirting with two men who appeared to be truck drivers. Both girls wore identical tight pink dresses. Neither girl was particularly attractive, but the truckers didn't seem to care. I could imagine why. If I looked very closely at the girls, I could see they bore a faint resemblance to the men who had assaulted me the night before. Of course, I thought. Officer Mercer had hauled them away. The Judge had probably seen them this morning and changed them. Apparently not everyone remembered who they had been before. I suspected that only those of us who still had our original memories would know.

"I guess you're right," I conceded.

He paused for a moment, then said, "Look, Holly, I was wondering—would you have dinner with me tomorrow night?"

That was sudden, I thought. My god, I was being asked out on a date. Well, why not? It would give me a chance to learn more about the man who was rapidly becoming my best suspect. "Sure."

He grinned. "That's terrific. There's a dinner dance out at the country club tomorrow night. I'll pick you up at seven if that's all right."

"Seven's fine," I replied. Wait a minute. Had I just done what I thought I had done? I agreed to go out on a date as a woman. To make it worse, a dinner dance. What in hell was happening to me? Oh, I knew I could justify the whole thing by saying that I just wanted to learn more about a suspect, but deep down, I knew that just didn't wash. After all, I wasn't trying to date any of the other guys or go shopping with Meg. No, I was zeroing in on Darren, and not because I thought he was a spy. Or at least, I hoped he wasn't a spy.

"Holly! Time to go!" Andrea was practically yelling from the bar to get my attention.

"Okay, Darren, I'll see you tomorrow," I said quickly.

"If you need a ride, I can take you home," he offered.

"No, thanks," I told him, squeezing his hand. "I agreed to hang out with Andrea tonight." Part of me wanted to stay with Darren, but I knew I was getting terribly close to doing something in this body I would regret if I ever got a male body again.

I didn't tell Andrea about the date until we got home and we were getting ready to watch a movie.

"A date with Darren? And a dance no less?" she practically squealed. "That's great! He is really a neat-looking guy. If I weren't going with Deuce, I think I'd be after Darren myself."

"Look, it's nothing like that," I protested. "We're just friends. I imagine he just needed somebody at the last minute to go with him and I was available."

"He didn't plan to go at all," Andrea said. "I overheard him tell somebody at the office just a couple of days ago that he hated dinner dances and wasn't going. I think what changed his mind is finding out you were available."

“You’re writing too much into this.”

She jumped on the couch next to me and put her arm around me.

“Hey, Deuce has to go to work about noon tomorrow. Why don’t I take you to get your hair and makeup done?”

“Now wait a minute,” I practically shouted, “I’m not going to... I mean I shouldn’t...”

“Oh, come on,” she insisted. “You’re wearing makeup now, and nail polish, too. I just want to see you really dolled up. You’re such a knockout now, I’ll be you’ll put some of the older guys into cardiac arrest when they see you really done up.”

“I’ll think about it,” I promised, hoping she would forget about it after a night with Deuce.

No such luck, though. I slept in on Saturday, and I was sitting in my pajamas just going through my second cup of coffee when Andrea barged in. “Come on, you need to get dressed,” she said. “I’ve got you an appointment with Janice over at M’lady in half an hour.”

Oh god, I thought, she remembered. “Look, Andrea, I’m not really a girl, you know.”

“Well you could have fooled me,” she laughed. “I don’t think Darren dates anything but girls, so either he’s made a terrible mistake or you’re a girl.”

“You know what I mean.”

“Come on,” she insisted, pulling me out of my chair. “You made the date all by yourself. I’m just here to make sure you do it right.”

I threw on a pair of jeans and a sweatshirt, did something quick with my hair, and presented myself to Andrea who promptly turned up her nose. “Going for the homeless waif look?” she asked me.

“You said to hurry,” I reminded her. “This is the best I could do on short notice.”

“Then it will have to do,” Andrea sighed. “Maybe Janice will want to take before and after pictures.”

M'lady was a small beauty shop just off Main Street. To my knowledge, I had never actually been in a beauty shop in my entire life. I felt as if I was a helpless lamb being led to the slaughter. What was wrong with my appearance? I mean, I needed a little work, but why all this fuss? I was just going out for dinner with a friend. So what if he was a guy and I was a... a... girl?

The first thing I noticed as we walked in was the chemical smell. It was absolutely overpowering. I didn't want anything that smelled like that anywhere near me. I balked at the door.

"Quit being such a baby," Andrea whispered.

An attractive brunette shade came to the front of the shop to greet us. She gave Andrea a hug and took my hands with a smile as her way of greeting. "You're really lucky," she told me. "I had a last minute cancellation or I could never have fitted you in today. What did you have in mind?"

I didn't have the slightest idea, but Andrea bailed me out. "Keep it long and full. Just trim it a bit and give it a little more wave. She has a big date tonight."

"Don't worry," Janice said to both of us. "I know just what to do."

She did, too. I never realized how heavy hair could be until she washed it. Once it was saturated with water, I had no trouble leaning over the sink for a rinse. What I thought I would have trouble doing was ever raising my head again. "Maybe you should just cut this short," I suggested.

"This beautiful hair?" Janice said, shocked. "That would be a crime. Wait until you see what I do with it. Then you tell me if you want me to cut it short."

I found out that hairdressers are a little bit like Marine Gunny Sergeants. They do things for your own good even if it kills you. I was used to going to the Navy barber on the ship and having him spend ten minutes trimming my hair down until scalp showed. No such luck as a woman, though. It took her the better part of an hour to wash, trim, curl and shape the mass of black hair I had been given.

“What do you think?” I looked in the mirror with trepidation. Whatever had taken that long must look pretty far out, I thought. I almost gasped when I saw the result, though. My hair looked like a woman’s hair in one of those TV commercials where the model’s hair looks so lustrous you can actually see the sheen. My hair had only a slight, almost natural curl, with long waves of hair flowing gently down my back.

“Wow!” was all I could say.

Janice smiled. “I’m glad you like it. Now, it’s time to turn you over to Bobby Sue.”

“Who’s Bobby Sue?” I asked both Janice and Andrea.

“I’m the manicurist,” a pleasant alto voice said from across the room. Bobby Sue was an attractive blonde with long hair, large breasts, and fairly heavy but attractive makeup. Unlike Janice, she was real. “I hear you have a big date tonight.”

“That’s what everyone tells me,” I replied.

She laughed, “Then it must be true. Come over to my little corner of the world.”

I followed her into a little cubicle while Janice and Andrea remained behind, engrossed in their own conversation.

“You’re new at this, aren’t you?” Bobby Sue asked me when we were alone.

“Yes,” I sighed. “New at everything, I’m afraid.”

“Don’t worry,” she told me. “It gets easier after a week or so. I’ve been here a month and it seems as if I’ve been Bobby Sue all my life.”

“But you were a girl before,” I pointed out. “I mean, you must have been. How else could you be doing this for a living?”

“Wrong!” she laughed. “I was as male as you must have been.”

I was really shocked. “But how did you learn this job so quickly?”

“It’s what I did before,” she told me. “Don’t look so surprised. There are male manicurists and cosmetologists and hairdressers.”

“Yeah,” I replied as she daubed nail polish remover on my fingernails, “but they’re usually...”

“Gay?”

I blushed. “Well, yes.”

“Not as many of them are gay as you might think,” she admonished me. “I was, though, if that makes you feel any better.”

“So you must have been happy with your change,” I ventured.

She gave me a patronizing smile as she began to use a file to shape my nails. “I said I was gay—not a transsexual. I enjoyed being male. I suppose my sexual orientation made it a little easier to accept making love to a man, but I missed my penis just as much as you probably miss yours.”

Ovid was indeed a strange place, I thought to myself. Yet somehow, it seemed to work. Men were changed into women and, presumably, women were changed into men, yet everyone seemed to be pretty comfortable with the situation. Even I was falling under the spell of the town, yet I didn’t seem to care. I still would have gladly changed back into a man in a heartbeat, but I was no longer completely uncomfortable being a woman. If I was forced to remain Holly Sheridan for the rest of my life, I felt as if I could stand it. The only thing I would miss to the point of distraction was flying.

Bobby Sue did as fine a job as Janice had done. When she was finished, she had given my finger and toenails a coat of deep red enamel that made them look absolutely elegant. Then, she worked on my makeup, and when I looked in the mirror at the results, I saw that Bobby Sue had turned me into an exotic beauty. I looked just a little Oriental, with long luxurious lashes and deeply shadowed eyes. My lips matched my nail polish perfectly. I smiled at the image in the mirror, well aware that only a couple of days before, I would have cringed at this standard of feminine beauty.

“Was I right?” Andrea asked as we drove home.

“You were right,” I sighed. “Is it time for me to say I don’t have a thing to wear now, or have you got that base covered, too?”

“Oh, your closet is full of nice little numbers,” she told me. “I’ll help you pick the right one.”

When seven o’clock rolled around, my only fear was that Darren might jump me the minute he walked in the door. I was wearing a dark red cocktail dress, matching three-inch heels, stockings that slightly darkened my already dark legs, and gold jewelry set with tiny rubies. I couldn’t remember the last time I had seen such a picture of loveliness, and it made me weak in the knees to realize that picture was me.

Darren was dumbstruck when he saw me.

“Well, what do you think?” I asked, a little nervous.

“I think it’s a crime I didn’t ask you out sooner,” he replied. We looked good together. He was wearing a charcoal suit and a red tie very similar in shade to my dress. We looked like a couple who had just stepped out of the pages of a magazine. All that we needed now was to be laughing out the door on our way to a sports car. Come to think of it, we were laughing as we left to get into Darren’s Corvette.

The Ovid Country Club was a typical small town country club. It was situated just a short distance off the highway surrounded by a clump of woods that separated the main building from the golf course. By small town standards, it was nice, reminding me of an Officer’s Club on a small naval base. By big city standards, though, it would hardly have rated as the tennis pavilion. There was no valet parking, so we parked the car and walked to the main building. I lived in mortal fear of tripping in the uneven parking lot. I still wasn’t entirely used to high heels.

Darren had been a complete gentleman. He had opened the car door for me, and when I got out, he gently put his arm around me to help me. His arm was still around me as we walked in. I found for some inexplicable reason that I liked having his arm around me. It made me feel not just safe, but as if I belonged. I was becoming used to this new body—to this new sex—of mine. It had to be part of the magic, though. There was no way a person like me could have accepted all of this without a little magical help, I realized. Surely hormones alone weren't enough to change me this much?

The room was set up with mostly four-person tables, and we found ourselves seated with another couple who were already there. They were the Jagers, Steven and Susan, and I found them to be an interesting couple. He was a college professor and she was an attorney. They were both very attractive people, a little older than we were. We talked over glasses of wine, or at least, Darren and I drank wine. Both Steven and Susan limited themselves to club soda. After we had ordered, Susan asked me to accompany her to the restroom. I was finally going to find out if women really did plot the overthrow of men from the secret confines of the ladies' room.

Susan was squinting in the mirror. "Do my eyes look red?" she asked. I looked at them closely. She had beautiful blue eyes and her makeup was impeccable. "No, they look fine."

"I'm relieved," she said. "I finally got tired of glasses and decided to give contacts a try. They feel a little odd though. I hope I can wear them okay."

"How long have you worn glasses?" I asked as I touched up my lipstick in the mirror.

Susan looked around, making sure there was no one else in the room. "Ever since I came to Ovid," she replied, looking at me carefully.

"Then you were transformed?" I asked, picking up on her cue.

"Yes," she confirmed. "I used to be a lawyer in Dallas. A male one, that is."

"What is it with the Judge turning men into women?" I blurted. "I guess that you knew I used to be a man."

She smiled. "I suspected it. You're doing a great job, but those of us who have gone through it know what you're going through."

“I understand it gets easier with time?” I ventured.

She nodded. “It does. At first, you can’t believe what has happened to you. Then, you figure you’re going to have to learn to live with it, but you don’t have to like it. Then, acceptance sets in. You start to realize that a substantial percentage of the world’s population lives as female and likes it. Then finally, you start to understand why.” She said the last sentence with something resembling a contented sigh. Then she asked, “What do you think of Darren?”

“I like him,” I replied simply.

“Enough to spend the rest of your life with him?”

I hadn’t considered that as a possibility. At first, he was a suspect. Then, he became a friend. Now... I wasn’t sure. “Why do you ask?”

She smiled again. “Answering a question with a question. Maybe you should be a lawyer. You don’t really have to answer the question to me, but answer it to yourself. Ovid seems to weave a spell of its own, and romance seems to happen quickly. I saw the way he looked at you. He’s in love.”

“Love?”

“Yes,” she confirmed, “and I think it may be reciprocated.”

Was it? I wondered as we went back to the table. I had never been in love before, so I wasn’t sure what it felt like, especially with this brand of plumbing. As a man, I had dated many girls and went to bed with a great number of them, but I never loved them. They were just... well, just girls. Some of the girls told me they loved me, but all I could do was try to let them down gently. Now, the high-heeled shoe was on the other shapely foot. I was the girl, and it was a man who was falling in love with me.

We enjoyed a nice meal. I was happy to have Steven and Susan there, for it kept the conversation from becoming intimate. But on the dance floor, Darren held me closely. I could feel his rising manhood and found it stimulating my own body. Sometimes, we talked as we danced, about inconsequential things. But most of the time, he just held me closely, smelling the soft scents of my hair and my perfume.

As we left, I was a little tipsy. I had to remember that this body had far less tolerance for alcohol than my old one did. Darren again held me closely—more closely than was actually necessary. Still, I was glad for his help.

“Would you like a nightcap?” he asked.

“I’d love one,” I replied. I had had quite a bit to drink, but one more would probably give me the courage to do what I planned to do—what we planned to do. Looking back on that evening, I have no illusions about my intent. My body was firmly and completely female, complete with all the right parts and all the right programming. I had gotten to know new women like Meg and Susan, and I realized that as strange as it would have sounded to me a few days earlier, they were happy being female and I could be, too. After all, I was a pilot, and pilots are nothing if not adaptable.

Back to my intent. I fully expected to get laid. No, wait a minute, that’s not quite right. As a man, I would have expected to get laid. Richard Baxter wanted to get laid. Holly Sheridan wanted to make love. Was I nervous? Of course I was. The idea of someone sticking into me what I had once so happily stuck into others practically made me shudder in fear. But there was a feeling buried inside my body that yearned for the sexual touch of a man.

The inside of Darren’s house was as nice as the outside. Very tasteful furniture, not overly masculine, graced the living room, which was highlighted by a large stone fireplace. Darren made a fire and then got us two snifters of brandy. Together on a large leather couch, I took a sip. To my new body, the brandy tasted strong, but I knew it was an excellent—and probably expensive—brandy. A quick thought about Darren’s lifestyle crossed my mind, then quickly flew. Darren couldn’t be the spy. He just couldn’t. I cared too much for him.

We didn’t speak. We didn’t need to. Just a couple of sips of the brandy and we were in each other’s arms. I vacillated between fear and pleasure as he lifted me in his strong arms and carried me into his bedroom, his blue eyes never leaving mine. I felt myself being gently laid on the bed. Languidly, I kicked off my shoes while I loosened his tie. In minutes, we had managed to remove each other's clothing.

For a moment, I remembered that I had once had a body like his, trim and muscular. Now, I was soft and round. It caused my body to give way to his. We kissed long and hard, using our hands to explore each other's bodies. I was amazed to learn that there were so many parts of my new body that shivered at a lover's touch. It was like having dozens of places to be sexually stimulated. I knew there weren't dozens, but the shivers of pleasure I experienced seemed to radiate in all directions.

Penetration was not as bad as I had feared. Rather, it was like satisfying a hungry void. I guess that's really what it is for a woman, I realized with a groan of pleasure. But the best was yet to come. Darren was a slow and a considerate lover. I thought with chagrin that I had never been that way. Darren seemed more interested in my satisfaction than his. The result was an explosive orgasm accentuated by one of his own.

It was then that he said his first words to me since we had begun. "I love you," he said softly.

I didn't answer him. At least, I didn't answer him right away. After our second episode of making love, I told him I loved him, or I think I did. I was still in the middle of another orgasm when I said it.

We were still there, holding each other, at dawn. His rough, hairy skin felt so good against mine that I never wanted to leave. I snuggled closer to him, realizing he had a morning erection. My own sex became moist almost at once. Well, no use in letting it go to waste, I thought, rolling him gently on his back and climbing on board.

We slept for a couple more hours after that. It was nearly ten when I stirred again. Darren was still asleep, snoring softly. I slid out from under his arm and got out of bed. As I slipped into the shower, I was actually pretty proud of myself. I had made the ultimate adaptation to my new form. I might never have the opportunity to be male again, but it didn't matter as much to me now. I had found that I could be comfortable having sex as a woman.

Of course, there were a few other things to get used to. I hadn't had a period yet, and I wasn't looking forward to having one. Of course, I didn't want the alternative either. Pregnancy had no appeal. I was thankful I had taken Andrea's advice and continued taking the birth control pills my shade self had taken.

Then, there was the Indian side of me. I was only half-Indian, but I couldn't deny my ethnic heritage. Come to think of it, I did look a little like the Disney version of Pocahontas. What did Indians do that was different from what other people did? I didn't have a clue. I suspected it wouldn't be much different from being completely white. Indians and part Indians like me made up a substantial part of Oklahoma's population. We were just folks.

As I stepped out of the shower, though, I remembered reluctantly that I still had a mission to perform. I had screwed up there. I had actually slept with a suspect. Not that I really thought of him as a suspect anymore. He was just Darren. A friend. A lover.

Darren was still sleeping when I got out of the shower. That man could sleep through anything, I thought with a smile. I picked up all of my clothes from the night before and got dressed. I looked a bit dishevelled, but Darren would be the only one who would see me. Well, Andrea would unless she had stayed with Deuce for the night, but I didn't care.

Once dressed, I made my way into the kitchen and put some coffee on. I thought about making breakfast, but I had no indication that I had inherited any cooking skills with my new body. I certainly didn't have any as Richard Baxter. Still, it might be fun to try. There were some cookbooks on a shelf. I decided to pull one out and see what I could make.

As I pulled it out, two file folders nestled between two books fell to the floor, their contents scattering over the tile. I began to pick up the papers. The first file was the design for the chip. It was dated the preceding Friday. I made a mental note to tell Darren not to take a secret file home with him. Civilians never understood the need for tight security.

Then, in the second file, I saw something that made my heart stop. It was a picture of me. No, not the me I had become, but the old me. It was a picture of Richard Baxter. With trembling hands, I examined the rest of the file. It was fairly thin, but all the important facts of my life were there. What was Darren doing with that file? He supposedly had no knowledge of what was going on in Ovid, but it was obvious that he did know. So he wasn't one of the transformed who did not remember his previous life.

My stomach turned over violently. Talk about sleeping with the enemy. I cursed myself. I had been so enraptured with Darren that I had forgotten that he was one of my best suspects. Besides, I thought looking around, how else could he afford all of this? There was the house, nicely furnished, the Corvette, the pool, the country club membership, the expensive clothes. Oh my god. Darren was the spy. He had to be. He had been lying to me all along. Then why had he courted me? I guessed it was like the old adage goes: keep your friends close and your enemies closer.

I had to get help. Eric was still out of town. Who could help me? The Judge? Maybe, but I didn't really trust him. How about the police? No, the only police officer I had seen was Officer Mercer, and he was the Judge's man. Who did I really trust? Only one person, I supposed, and that was Andrea. I dropped the folder without thinking and headed for the front door. I realized I shouldn't have left the folder there, but I was a block away before I thought about it and feared going back.

High heels are not made for walking. I discovered that very quickly. Although Darren lived only three blocks from my apartment, I wasn't sure I'd be able to make it all the way in heels. I took them off and walked in my stockings. The pavement was warm but rough on my new feet. Some Indian I was, I thought. I wouldn't do well in moccasins.

I kept looking back over my shoulder, expecting at any minute to see Darren's Corvette approaching, but my luck held. Thank god he was a sound sleeper. I had a giddy moment of him explaining to his foreign masters how he couldn't prevent exposure because he had overslept. And to think I had spent the entire night making love to him! The bastard! I hated him. Then why were there tears in my eyes?

Andrea let me in, since I suddenly realized that in haste, I had forgotten my purse. I just wasn't used to carrying the thing. "What happened to you?" she asked with concern, putting her arm around me to keep me from collapsing.

"Oh, Andrea," I bawled, "I've been an idiot!"

"Here, sit down and tell me about it," she urged, pulling me over to the couch.

Before I could begin, Deuce walked out of Andrea's bedroom. "Holly, have you met Deuce?"

"Not officially," I managed to say. So Deuce and Andrea had spent the night together. She was obviously happier about her choice than I had been about mine.

"So what happened?" Andrea asked.

"I spent the night with Darren," I told her.

"Then why are you crying?" she wanted to know. "Was he a brute?"

"Oh no!" I said gulping. "That part was... was fine, but I found out that he—awk!"

Suddenly, I couldn't speak. It was as if the words had all rushed into my mouth but couldn't get out. I was gagging.

Andrea realized at once what was wrong. "Deuce, go outside for a few minutes." He nodded silently and was gone. Then, Andrea told me, "Do you remember what I said about the rules in Ovid? You were trying to talk about Darren's transformation. Only two of us can talk about that at a time."

"But Darren wasn't transformed," I blurted.

Andrea frowned. "What do you mean? Of course he was transformed. All of us who are real in Ovid have been transformed except for..." Her eyes suddenly became wider. "Holly, this means Darren is one of them."

"Them?"

"Yes, them, like the Judge," she explained, "or maybe not quite like the Judge, but close like... like... Cache! Of course, I should have known."

"What are you talking about?" I asked, my bawling reduced to a snuffle.

She put her arm around my shoulder. "Now Holly, this is very important. How did you find out about Darren?"

Andrea was my roommate and my friend. In the few days that I had known her, I had come to trust her more than anyone else I had met in Ovid. I spilled my guts. I told her the whole story from beginning to end. I left out nothing. She listened in silence until I was finished. "You wait right here," she ordered. "I need to talk to Deuce. And don't answer the phone! It might be him."

As if on cue, the phone began to ring. I let it ring until I heard Darren's voice on the recorder. "Holly, this is Darren. Look, I saw the cookbooks, so I know you saw the file. There's a good explanation for it, though. I've got to talk to you about it. If you're there, pick up the phone. If not, it's nearly noon and I'll be over in half an hour."

That didn't give me much time. I did as Andrea told me, using the opportunity to change out of my dress and into a pair of jeans and a sweater. I had never been so rattled in my life, even the day I had nearly slammed into the fantail of a carrier. Of course, I hadn't been loaded to the brim with female hormones when that happened. Maybe there was something to the belief that women were, on the whole, more emotional than men. If so, then there was no doubt about it—I was all woman now.

Andrea burst into the room. "Deuce thinks he may come looking for you.”

“He’s already called,” I said, slipping on a pair of loafers.

Andrea turned ash-white. “You talked to him?”

I shook my head. “No, but he left a message. He said he’d be here in half an hour. That was ten minutes ago.”

“Then we don’t have any time to waste,” she decided. “Let me check something with Deuce. You go on out to my car and wait.”

“All right,” I agreed, but as I hurried to her car, I began to wonder what was going on. Andrea and Deuce seemed as upset as I was. Why? Was there something else going on in Ovid that I knew nothing about?

Suddenly, I saw a Jeep Wagoneer fire up and go screaming out of the parking lot. Deuce was behind the wheel. Andrea came running into the parking lot. “Come on!” she yelled, opening the car door. “We’ve got to get out of here now!”

I jumped in the car, but I was beginning to feel very uncomfortable with what I had done. Eric had told me to tell no one, yet I had just done so. Had I made a mistake? Something was telling me that I had. “Where are we going?” I asked.

“Someplace safe,” she said cryptically, screaming out of the parking lot almost as fast as Deuce.

Someplace safe turned out to be Randy Andy’s. “But they’re closed on Sunday,” I said, noting the empty parking lot.

“I have a key,” she explained, pulling up behind the building so her car would be hidden from the road. “It belongs to Deuce. Marty has him lock up some nights.”

“Something’s not right about this,” I muttered. “Andrea, what’s going on? I’m not getting out of the car until you explain yourself.”

“Yes you are,” she said softly. I turned and looked at her. She was holding a gun and it was pointed at me.

“Andrea?”

“Holly, look, I’m sorry about this,” she sighed. “You never asked to get involved in this, and if I can, I’ll make sure you get out of this unharmed. But if you don’t get out of the car right now, I will shoot you.”

There was enough resolve in her voice that I knew she would do it. Well, this made me an idiot twice in one day, I thought to myself. I had trusted Darren and been betrayed. Now, I had trusted Andrea and been betrayed. Ovid seemed like East Berlin during the Cold War with a little magic thrown in.

Andrea led me into a small office. “Sit in Marty’s chair,” she ordered, motioning to a ratty office chair behind an equally ratty desk. It seemed as if Marty was not much of a housekeeper.

It had all come together for me in the last couple of minutes. I had concentrated too hard on the team members, but the reason I couldn’t uncover a spy there is that the spy wasn’t on the team. There were no secretaries on the team, so clerical help would have been delivered from outside the team. I had even been told that Andrea was that help, but I had ignored it. Andrea was my spy. With Deuce’s help, she had managed to steal the chip design.

So where was Deuce? Of course. He was waiting for Darren to go to my apartment. Then he would go through Darren’s house. With any luck—all bad—he would find the latest design for the chip in Darren’s house. Damn them all! They didn’t know the first thing about security. What was I saying? I was the one who had tipped off the real spies. If I had kept my head and not gotten involved with Darren, none of this would have happened, I realized.

Andrea sat across the desk from me, her gun pointed in my general direction. There was nothing I could do except wait. She actually looked at me with sympathy on her face. “Holly, I’m sorry this had to happen. I know you think Deuce and I are bad people, but we’re really not. If you knew the whole story, you might even agree with what we’re doing. I wish I could tell it to you.”

“Why don’t you try?” I urged.

She thought about that for a moment, then said, “Well, there are a lot of parts which will have to be left out, but I’ll do my best.” She smiled wistfully. “Come to think of it, I can’t even tell you who I really am. The... Judge’s edicts prevent even me from saying. But since you know who he is, maybe I can explain. Let’s just say the Judge and I are related. When the Judge and his cronies founded Ovid, not everyone agreed with his motives.”

“Motives?” I asked. “You mean why Ovid was founded?”

She nodded. “Exactly. Discussion of that is the biggest taboo of all. Only the... inner circle know all the reasons, and I’m not one of them. You might say I’m on the other side. The Judge has made a lot of enemies in his life.”

I wasn’t surprised. Any being with godlike power who had lived for thousands of years had to have made a few enemies. I had read enough mythology to know that at one time or another, virtually every god and goddess had had his or her differences with the king of the gods. “I’m sure,” was all I said.

“This much I can tell you,” she went on. “Even though Ovid is a magical construct, it’s much easier to sustain it if it has a viable economy in the real world. Hence, Vulman Industries and a few other enterprises. This new chip and the related software would guarantee Vulman big profits which will help the entire Ovid Project. We couldn’t let that happen. We plan to share the research with other companies who have the resources to improve upon this. Vulman’s chip will be obsolete in a month.”

“And every enemy of the United States will have it, too,” I countered. “Not much of a trade-off if you ask me.”

“We’re doing this for the sake of humanity,” Andrea said with passion. “You could help us. You don’t owe these... beings anything. You could help us decipher the software since you’re a pilot and know about these things. Help us. You could hurt them badly by helping us.”

Yes, I could, I realized, if I really knew the software the way they had been led to believe I did. I still wasn't sure what Ovid was all about, but I trusted Eric and Darren more than I trusted Andrea and Deuce. The spies had been exposed, and they were preparing to leave town. There was no reason for me to pretend to be on their side.

"I'm sorry, Andrea, but I can't help you."

She closed her eyes. "I was afraid you'd feel that way."

There was a screech of tires, and moments later, Deuce rushed into the room. "I got it!" he said triumphantly.

"Any problems?" Andrea asked.

He shook his head. "It went just like we discussed. Darren took off like a bat out of hell for your place, and I just strolled in. The file was still on the kitchen floor where she dropped it."

Great, I thought. I had made it easy for them. Not only did I not stop them, but instead, I had actually helped them make off with the plans for the chip. I had unwittingly helped the enemies of my country and probably doomed myself to being Holly Sheridan or something worse forever. I wondered if the Judge had the power to turn me into a jackass. It was what I probably deserved.

"Then let's get out of here," Andrea said. "We don't have much time."

Deuce nodded at me. "What about her?"

Andrea handed him the gun. For a moment, I thought I was about to be killed, but Andrea told him, "Keep the gun on her for a minute while I get ready." She rummaged through her purse, finally extracting a hypodermic needle and a small bottle. She filled the hypo and turned to me. "Holly, this will just knock you out for a few hours. Since you won't be awake to identify us, it may give us a little more time to get away."

She plunged the hypo into my arm. At once I felt a numbness spreading up my arm. I was becoming light headed.

"I'm really sorry," Andrea said sadly. "I really do like you, Holly. I hope someday you will understand. Good luck.”

She turned to go. I saw her reach the doorway when I finally passed out...

“... coming around,” a woman’s voice echoed through my head.

I opened my eyes. I was in an unfamiliar room. The lights were dim, so I couldn’t make out any details. I saw an attractive black woman in medical greens standing over me. She was holding my wrist.

“Can we talk to her?” a male voice echoed behind her. It sounded like... Darren?

She shook her head. “Not yet.”

Then I passed out again.

There was suddenly bright light in my face. My eyes opened as if an alarm had gone off. I looked around and saw that I was in a hospital room. It appeared to be morning. For a moment, my mind was so clouded that I forgot everything that had happened to me in Ovid. I looked in shock at my breasts and felt a momentary pang of loss for what was not between my legs. Then, as I shook my head feeling the waves of long black hair against my neck, I remembered.

A woman in medical greens rushed in. She wasn’t the same woman I had seen earlier. Instead, she was Indian... like me. “Doctor!” she called out the door of my room. “She’s awake!”

Another woman, this time a shade hurried into the room. She was tall and slim, about thirty-five with a nametag that identified her as Dr. Anderson. She checked my pulse and looked at the monitors beside my bed. “Well, Ms. Sheridan, I’d say you’ve made a complete recovery.”

“What... what happened?” I asked, my voice a little strained.

“You were given a very strong sedative,” she replied. “It was nothing dangerous, but it managed to keep you out cold for quite a while. Now, it's Monday morning and you're fit enough to face the world. I'll get you released while Nurse Williams here helps you dress and tells your driver you'll be down shortly."

"My driver?"

She smiled. "Yes, Officer Mercer is waiting for you. By the way, he's the one who brought you in yesterday. You must be a very important patient. We were told to monitor you around the clock."

I was important all right. I was probably going to be dragged back into the courtroom and pay the price for my failure. It was a shame, I thought as I pulled myself out of bed. I was actually getting to like this body. It was light and healthy, and I found I was even starting to enjoy the stares I got from men... one man in particular. Could he ever forgive me for thinking he was the spy?

Then, I remembered the file on Richard Baxter. Could I ever forgive him for lying to me? He knew who I really was all the time. Yet he had treated me like... like a woman.

Nurse Williams pulled a tan business suit, tan pumps and a beige silk blouse out of the closet. The requisite underwear and accessories were there as well. I didn't ask where they came from, but I recognized them as being mine even though I had never worn the outfit before. I was a little unsteady, but with the nurse's help, I was able to get dressed.

As the nurse gave me my purse, I was able to give myself one last look in the mirror. I had applied makeup exactly as Andrea had taught me. Andrea. I would miss her, even if it turned out that she had completely wrecked my new life. I guessed that was the difference between fiction and real life. In fiction, the baddies can be absolutely bad, complete with evil sneers and nefarious manners. In real life, though, the baddies are seldom all bad, and conversely, the good guys aren't all good. Maybe that was my problem. I hadn't realized that fact until it was too late.

Officer Mercer was waiting for me in front of the hospital. He gave a thin smile and said tonelessly, "Good morning, Miss Sheridan." He opened the car door for me more like a chauffeur than a policeman. At least I would be riding to my fate in style, I thought grimly.

He drove without any further conversation, but to my surprise, he drove right past City Hall and turned out onto the highway. At last I realized we were on our way to Vulman Industries. There, I realized I would be facing Eric Vulman and have to tell him of my failure. Darren would be at Vulman, too. I made a note to try to avoid him. I was too embarrassed to see him.

One of the benefits of Ovid being a small town is that I didn't have long to think about what came next. In a few minutes, we were at Vulman Industries. As the car stopped, I tried to open the door, only to find that the back doors of police cars don't open that easily. Officer Mercer came around and again did the honors. "They're expecting you in Mr. Vulman's office," he said.

Good old Mercury, messenger of the gods. Today, I was apparently the message. With a sigh, I accepted his help getting out of the car and walked in the front entrance. Was it really less than a week ago that I had begun my work as Holly Sheridan here at Vulman? I asked myself. It seemed longer somehow. I had actually met some people that I would always think warmly of. There was the chip team, particularly Meg who was so happy with her new life, and Tricia who may have been anyone before but was now my friend. Then there was Eric, who had treated me like a son—well, a daughter—and whose confidence I hadn't lived up to. Of course, there was Andrea—gone now, but in spite of it all, still a friend. And finally, there was Darren. What was Darren? A friend? A lover? Both, perhaps.

I knocked softly on Eric's door, and hear his clear baritone call, "Come in, Holly."

How had he known it was me? Oh, of course, he was a god.

I opened the heavy door, not knowing what to expect. There, standing around the table enjoying coffee were Eric, the Judge, Admiral Nepper, and Darren. Their faces brightened when they saw me, and Eric set his cup down, came over to me and gave me a fatherly hug. "Thank god you're all right," he said happily.

Thank god? Why not thank the gods? Could it be that the powerful gods of Greek and Roman Mythology recognized a power above themselves? I smiled and muttered a weak, "Thank you."

"I think you know everyone here," he said brightly.

"Yes," I agreed, feeling somehow naked in the presence of three gods. What was Darren doing with them? Surely he wasn't... Or maybe he was.

"I seem to remember you drink this with cream now," Eric said, handing me a welcome cup of coffee. "Now that we're all here, let's get on with the meeting."

Confused, I took a seat at the foot of the conference table. Darren sat closest to me. He quickly patted my hand and gave me an encouraging look. I decided to remain silent until I heard what each of the others had to say. Eric began the meeting.

"Needless to say, we've had some real excitement here over the weekend."

The others chuckled softly. Now, I was really confused. I would have thought everyone would have been very grim. After all, secrets relating to the security of the United States had fallen into hostile hands.

"Now, for Holly's benefit, I would appreciate it, Admiral, if you explained what you're doing here today."

"Of course," the Admiral said. "Holly, I'm here to take the specifications for the chip and the related software back to Washington where a prototype fuel pump will be built and tested. My trip was scheduled a week ago before your mission began."

"But, sir," I interrupted, silently cursing myself for interrupting an admiral, "the development on the chip wasn't completed until Friday."

He smiled indulgently at me. "That chip won't work. Darren threw an intentional bug into it that caused all the work that was done on it last week. Even his team didn't know about it, except for Randy, and now we've changed Randy's memories so he doesn't know about the switch either."

"Then my mission was never real," I concluded with disappointment. "You already knew who the spies were. Of course, you're g..."

"You can say it, Holly," the Judge said quickly. "While you are with us in this room, you have dispensation to refer to us as gods."

"And in rebuttal to your last comment, no, we did not know who the spies were," Eric told me. "As I told you before, we aren't omnipotent or omniscient. There are other powerful forces in the world who can use some of the same powers we use."

"We needed you to ferret out the spies and lead them in the wrong direction if possible. We never imagined it would turn out the way it did," Admiral Nepper explained.

"It's my fault, really," Darren explained. "I was to have the folder for the faulty chip in my home and hope that the word would get around that I was taking work home. I never intended for you to be placed in danger. We were hoping you would be able to identify the spies and I would do the rest."

"Then why did you have a folder on my real identity with it?" I asked.

He looked a little sheepish and said, "I'd rather explain that one to you privately."

"Holly," the Judge broke in, "have you ever heard of Prometheus?"

"I think so," I said slowly. "Wasn't he the god who gave fire to humans?"

"Yes," the Judge said a bit peevishly, "thus making himself a hero to humans while I am the villain of that story."

"But you did bind him to a rock and order one of your eagles to eat his liver, brother," Admiral Nepper pointed out.

"Yes," the Judge agreed defensively, "but I allowed his liver to be constantly renewed, so no real harm was done, was it?"

"In any case," Eric broke in, "Prometheus had a son—Deucalion—and this son has reason to have a grudge against the Olympians, as we refer to ourselves. Along with his wife, Pyrrha, they managed to come to Ovid and disguise their true identities."

"Yes," the Judge added. "I never changed them, but the records indicated that I had done so."

"Deuce and Andrea Pyron," I concluded.

"That's right," Eric agreed, taking another sip of coffee. "By the way, Holly, you make much better coffee than I do. To continue, it appears that our two spies are working for enemies of the Olympians. Like father like son, Deuce appears to be trying to spread a new kind of fire to all mankind while we would keep this a military secret of the United States."

"And after all I did for them," the Judge muttered.

"My esteemed brother saved their lives during the Great Flood," Admiral Nepper explained.

'There really was a Great Flood?' I asked myself.

"So now, our two spies are off to their masters, whoever they may be, with plans for a device which will not work, completely unaware that we have one that does," Eric summed up.

"But who are they working for?" I wanted to know.

"A question we may never know the answer to, my dear," the Judge said. "Deuce's grandfather is Iapetus, one of the Titans who we overthrew centuries ago. It is possible there are still representatives of that ancient race who would restore themselves to power. Let us hope that it never happens, for in spite of what our two idealistic spies believe, the return of the Titans would not be beneficial to mankind."

Everyone except me nodded in solemn agreement.

"So now," the Judge continued, "there remains only what to do with you, Holly."

“With me?” ‘Oh-oh,’ I thought, here it comes.

“Yes. As you will recall, I continued the case against you,” the Judge explained. “That allows me to modify your sentence considerably.”

“We have the power to create a new existence for you—a male existence if you prefer,” Admiral Nepper added. “You’re a fine officer, and I would like to offer you a position on my staff.”

“So if there’s no further business here,” the judge began, “we can go back to the courtroom and...”

“Excuse me, sir,” Darren broke in, “could I have just a few minutes alone with Holly?”

The Judge looked at Darren, then at me. I was too startled to say anything. What did Darren want to discuss with me? “Of course.”

“May the dispensation continue?” Darren asked.

“Yes,” the Judge replied. “You know how to get to court when you’re ready.”

“I do.”

Without another word, Eric, Admiral Nepper, and the Judge winked out of existence. Darren and I were alone in the room.

“I wanted a few minutes to talk to you before you make your decision,” Darren said.

Yes, I had a decision to make. I had grown comfortable as Holly for the last few days, but in my heart, I was still a pilot and an officer. I knew what my answer would be.

“Holly,” he began, “the other night when I said I loved you...”

I put my hand on his. “You don’t have to explain. I understand, you were just saying it as part of the mission.”

He shook his head. “No, that’s not it at all. I really meant it.”

“You did?”

“Yes,” he said. “That’s why I had your folder. I wanted to learn everything I could about you. Look, you need to know more about me—who I am and what my part in this is. I'm Eric's son. My real name isn't Cache—it's Cacus. According to Roman myth, I have three heads and breathe fire."

"Do you?" I asked, horrified.

He smiled and shook his head. "No, the Romans have a gift for exaggeration. Except for the Olympians like my father, our powers are pretty limited. That's why I had to ask for dispensation. I couldn't even explain this to you if the Judge didn't allow it."

That was also why I couldn't mention the names of the gods around Andrea, I suddenly realized. "But you live forever?"

"Yes and no," he replied enigmatically. "The Darren Cache you know will grow old normally and die, but there will be a new one with all of my memories when I'm gone. So for the me you see right now, this is it. This is the life I get, and I'd like to spend it with you."

My mouth dropped open in stunned silence. "What?"

"I love you, Holly," he explained. "I've always been fascinated with Holly Sheridan, but as a shade, she lacked true strength. You gave her depth and purpose."

"But I'm a man," I protested. "Or at least, I was a man." And can be again, I realized.

He took my hands in his and stared into my eyes. "Look, Holly, I know who you were. That's why I had your file. I wanted to know everything about you—the old you. There's more magic in Ovid than the obvious magic that changed your physical shape. The magic takes the best of the old you and merges it into a new package. I love you for what you were, what you are, and what I know you can be."

And what could I be? A girl? A wife? A mother? Yes, I realized, I could be those things, and I could probably be happy being them. But what was I giving up? The chance to be a pilot and an officer on an admiral's staff—that's what. But I wouldn't be Richard Baxter. He no longer existed. Who would I be?

More importantly, did I love Darren? The thought of loving a man still seemed odd to me, but when I remembered our lovemaking only a day ago, my body began to tingle. I had never known such pleasure in lovemaking as a man, and come to think of it, I had never felt as close to anyone as I had felt to Darren that night.

“Holly?”

“Huh? Yes?”

“Look, we can’t keep the Judge waiting very long,” he said apologetically. “He’s mellowed a lot through the centuries, but he is still the King of the Gods.”

But I hadn’t made up my mind! I would have to depend on my instincts.

“Let’s go,” I said.

To his credit, Darren did not ask me what I was going to do. He uttered a short phrase that sounded like Latin and Eric’s office disappeared, to be replaced suddenly by the courtroom where my journey as Holly Sheridan had begun.

“Court is now in session,” Officer Mercer’s voice intoned.

I looked around. I was standing before the bench by myself, but in addition to the blonde woman who had been in the courtroom for my first appearance, Eric and Darren sat side by side. Admiral Nepper was nowhere to be seen. Presumably he had returned to Washington.

“The case of the City of Ovid versus Richard Baxter is now back in session,” the Judge said. “Have you made your decision?”

Had I? I had joined the Navy for adventure. What greater adventure could there be than flying a jet fighter? I wondered. Then, I had another thought. If adventure was what I sought, what greater adventure could there be than being part of a scheme of the gods? And besides, wasn’t true love an adventure all to itself?

“I’m waiting for your decision,” the Judge prodded.

“Your Honor,” I began formally, “I would like to remain as I am now—as Holly Sheridan.”

“You understand that there will be no going back on this decision,” he reminded me. “Once the court is adjourned, you will be Holly Sheridan for the rest of your life.”

I had an entire life to explore the unknown—how to be a wife and perhaps a mother. Then, there was my Indian heritage. I would have to explore that as well. But I would miss the flying...

“I understand, Your Honor.”

Did I see a small smile on the Judge’s face? “Then court is adjourned!” he said with a rap of his gavel.

Suddenly Darren was there, his arms around me. Before I could speak, his lips were on mine. My body seemed to melt in his arms, and I never wanted the kiss to end. I knew for certain in that moment that I had made the right decision.

“If you two could hold off just a little while, it is still a working day and we need to get back to the office,” Eric said lightly.

“Are we going back the same way we came?” I asked.

“No,” he laughed, “that is saved for official business. There’s only so much magic in the world, you know. Officer Mercer will be taking us back.”

Eric sat up front with Officer Mercer, while Darren and I held on to each other in the back seat. We had come so close to losing each other that it was as if we still feared it would happen if either of us let go.

“We have to attend a quick meeting on the Production Room floor,” Eric explained. “I called ahead, so everyone should be there.”

Everyone was waiting for us when we walked in. Eric hushed the crowd and announced, “As you know, Vulman Industries is expanding operations around the nation. This means a lot of new opportunities for our employees. Effective today, Darren Cache is no longer Director of Research and Development. He has been promoted to Executive Vice President reporting directly to me. Darren will be shortly choosing his own Director of R&D.”

There was enthusiastic applause from everyone, but especially from me.

“Another announcement involves my Executive Assistant, Holly Sheridan.”

I looked at him in surprise.

“As some of you may know, Holly has worked hard over the last couple of years to get her pilot’s license. Given the far-flung nature of our operations, I have decided that we need a Corporate Pilot. Holly will be adding those duties to her job as my Executive Assistant.”

There was more applause as I flushed with pleasure. I was still going to be able to fly!

“And Holly,” Eric said with a twinkle in his eye, “when some of our new products come to the marketplace, you may have to fly something a little hotter than a Learjet for us.”

A few of the people who knew of the chip project laughed. I was grinning from ear to ear. My days of flying fighters weren’t quite over!

“Now, one last announcement if you two agree,” he went on, looking at Darren and me.

Darren looked expectantly at me. I smiled and nodded my head. We came together, arm in arm and nodded to Eric.

“Then I would like to announce an engagement...”

“Well, at least I learned a little more about you,” I told Diane when I had come out of my trance.

She shrugged. “It won’t be long before you have it all figured out.”

“But only the Olympians have all the story,” I surmised.

“Yes,” Diane agreed, “and we’re a secretive lot, aren’t we?”

“Would the Judge have really let Holly go back to being a male?”

Diane thought about that for a moment. “Yes, I think he would. She had earned it. Her life was in danger. She wouldn’t have been the first human caught in the crossfire in a war among the gods. That’s what’s really happening you know.”

I shivered, but not from being cold, and wrapped my arms around myself. “Are we in any danger here in Ovid?”

“I doubt it,” she replied, drinking the last of her lemonade. “If anything, you’re probably safer. The Judge will be more careful in the future. Now, I must pop off.”

She meant it, too, as she prepared to pop out of the room. “I thought that was for official purposes only,” I pointed out.

“Well,” she said with a wicked grin, “there’s official and official. Right now, there’s an official hunk waiting for me for a hot night on the Riviera, and it’s just about sundown there.”

Like the Cheshire cat, I could swear her grin lasted for a moment longer as she disappeared from my kitchen.

Ovid VI: The Developer

©1998 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

It was a perfect Saturday morning in Ovid. The sun was shining with the promise of a warm—but not hot—spring day. The humidity was relatively low for late May, and there was a light breeze from the north which meant I could open up the house and smell the aromas of spring.

Jerry was at the store, but he promised me he'd be home by three. My parents were due in by five to take the kids out to the farm for the rest of the weekend. That left Jerry and me free to go out to Winston's for a nice meal and then home to try out the goodies I had bought in the lingerie department at March's the day before. I felt a pleasant tingle between my legs that brought a smile to my face. How could I ever imagined this time a year ago that I, Matt O'Hara—All-American Boy, would become Cindy Patton, the mother of two darling children and a loving wife who couldn't wait to drag her handsome husband into bed for a marathon night of sex.

I sighed happily, leaning back in a kitchen chair to take another sip of my favorite coffee.

"Mommmmm!"

I sighed again, this time not so happily. "What is it, Michelle?" I called.

Suddenly, my six-year-old daughter came rushing into the kitchen, followed by Belinda Daniels, one of her little friends from school. "Mike just said a naughty word!" Michelle announced.

I smiled in spite of myself. When Mike and Michelle had been two of my fraternity brothers along with Jerry, we had all used a number of naughty words. Well, Jerry and I still used a few, but not in front of the children. Of course, of my entire family, I was the only one who realized we had all been changed into the idyllic Patton family.

"Mike," I said sternly, not bothering to rise from the kitchen chair.

A small boy, the twin of my daughter, reluctantly appeared in the doorway. He looked so cute it was all I could do to keep from getting up and hugging him.

"Now, what did you say to your sister and her friend?"

He mumbled, "I called them dorks."

I frowned slightly. "Well, I wouldn't call that a particularly naughty word, but it still isn't very nice."

"But they're dorky girls," he replied, a little relieved that 'dork' was apparently a milder term than he had imagined.

"Girls, yes," I agreed, "but not dorks. Someday, my little lad, you'll be doing everything in your power to impress girls—not annoy them. They won't want to date you if you call them names."

"Date!" he repeated. "Yuck!"

I had to laugh. "Go on, you guys, time to play."

Mike and Michelle bolted for the den, each trying to be the first to take control of the TV, but Belinda stayed behind. "Can I have a drink of water?" she asked politely. Of all Michelle's friends, she always seemed to be the most polite and the most mature. She had been a shade until recently, and as childish as anyone else her age. Now, though, she was real and had had several weeks to get used to her new identity.

"Of course, dear," I replied, rising to get her a glass of water. When I handed it to her, she thanked me and took a sip. She looked as if she wanted to say something, so I asked, "Is there something you want to talk about, Belinda?"

She nodded. "Yes, ma'am. Uh, Mrs. Patton, do you remember who you... I mean, were you ever..."

I had heard others stumble over the question as Belinda was now.

"Are you trying to ask me if I remember who I used to be?"

Her face brightened in relief. "Yes! Oh, yes! You do remember. I thought you did." I thought for a moment, she would actually break into tears, but she managed to hold them back.

I reached over and gave her a motherly hug. "So, of course, you remember who you were, too, don't you?"

She nodded her pretty head. "Uh-huh."

"Let me guess," I said softly. "You weren't a little girl before."

"No," she agreed slowly. "I don't like being a little girl either." At that, she did burst into tears.

"Belinda!" Michelle yelled from the den.

"She'll be out there in a minute, honey," I called to her, grabbing a napkin to wipe her liquid blue eyes.

"Th... thank you," she sniffed, practically cradled in my arm.

"Now," I said, sitting her down next to me when she had stopped, "why don't you tell me all about it?"

Of course, I knew all about it. I had been in the courtroom, doing my job as assistant to the Judge, who was, of course, the god Jupiter. I had watched as Belinda and her two friends, all male at the time, had swaggered into the courtroom, their black leather jackets emblazoned with the patch of the Screaming Eagles, a biker gang out of Houston. Within a few minutes, each of the tough, bewhiskered bikers had been changed into a little girl, the oldest of whom was only ten. The other two girls didn't remember who they had been, which was the more common situation in Ovid. Belinda remembered, though.

I knew it was hard for her—probably harder than for most. When I was changed, I had been a college student. Although I had been masculine enough, I wasn't a rough and tumble sort of guy. I had adapted quite well to being female—better than most, I was sure. The same was true for some of my friends, like Susan Jager, a promising young attorney in Ovid.

For transformees like Belinda, though, things were particularly tough. She had been Screech McCracken, a tough biker who had been notorious for his antics in small towns all over the southwest. The Judge had taken special pleasure in changing Screech into a very pretty and very feminine little girl. Like everyone in Ovid, Belinda began to adapt slowly to her new role, but it had been very hard for her. A prison sentence would have probably been a milder punishment.

"I don't want to talk about it," she replied softly. "I just can't. I... Mrs. Patton, I need to know. Were you a boy before?"

"Well, that's a very personal question, sweetheart," I answered. I intentionally used the word 'sweetheart' to reaffirm her sex and status. I had no intention of making things too easy for her. Screech McCracken had been a nasty customer and was now getting what he so richly deserved. Still, I had found myself liking the little girl he had become. I would have to tread softly. I wanted to help her, but making things easy for her might not be the best help. I was starting to understand the difficult task the gods had given themselves. They strove to make our lives whole, but not necessarily easy.

"Okay," she said, accepting that I was not going to tell her about myself. "I understand, I think. It's hard to think straight anymore."

Yes, it was. One of the great difficulties in changing adults into small children was that they had lost the innocence of childhood. If they were to succeed in becoming whole, it was something they had to regain on their own. Belinda was slowly but surely returning to childhood. I knew that she had reluctantly agreed to play with Michelle that morning, but it was an important step for her in realizing who she had to become.

"You'll do fine," I assured her. "The hard part is really already over."

"The hard part?"

I smiled. "You learned how to cry."

She gave me a tiny hint of a smile. "Thank you, Mrs. Patton."

"Any time, Belinda," I said, returning her smile. "Now, go play with Michelle."

"Yes, ma'am."

It was almost a little girl who went scurrying off to the den.

I returned to my coffee, another crisis solved—partially at least. I had taken just one more sip of the now lukewarm brew when there was a “pop” in the den, followed by the screaming of three small children. In horror, I jumped to my feet. Then, the screams turned to laughter. “Xena!” I heard Michelle squeal.

An Amazon marched into my room, followed by three adoring children. She did, in fact, look something like Xena. She was tall—at least six feet—and had raven tresses flowing down her well-tanned back. She wore a leather tunic and high leather boots, both studded with gleaming silver. Of course, I knew at once who it was.

“A little early for Halloween, isn’t it, Diana?” I drawled.

“Are you Xena?” Mike asked with awe in his little voice.

Diana, as in the goddess Diana, smiled at him. “No, little guy, but I’m sort of like her. I am Di-an, Warrior Princess. Now, go play and let me talk to your mom.” She made a slight motion with her hand, and all three children wandered out of the room. I was sure she had made them already forget what they had just seen.

Facing me, she made another gesture, and suddenly, she was wearing shorts, a T-shirt, and sandals just like me. Well, better than me, actually. I was attractive, but Diana in any of her avatars was absolutely breathtaking. She poured herself a cup of coffee and sat down at the kitchen table with me. “Boy, it’s good to get out of my working clothes,” she said with a sigh.

“Have I just seen the real Diana?” I asked.

She frowned. “Oh, that stuff? No, those are just my working clothes. My brother, Apollo, is co-producing a movie. It’s some sword and sorcery epic being filmed in Mexico. Lots of T and A in it. It’s a little on the cheap and sexy side, so they’ll probably release it directly to cable. I took a role in it just to make him happy. I’m getting too old for this sort of work, though.”

This from a woman who never looked over thirty.

“Then why did you do it?” I asked, taking another sip of coffee.

“Well,” she explained, “it’s been a little dull around here lately. Since we had the spies at Vulman a few weeks ago, the Judge seems to be slowing down his case load.”

Actually, that was true. Spies had slipped in, and until the other gods figured out how it had happened, the recruiting of new Ovid residents had been slowed to a crawl. Most of the recent additions to the population had been new shades, working at Vulman Industries on the new military contract.

“I understand he did nail a big fish this month, though,” she said with a sly grin.

“That he did,” I agreed. “I suppose you want to see the whole thing.” That was part of my job, of course. Recorded deep in my memory were the details of every Ovid case. When a god or goddess wanted to review them, I had to make myself available. Most of the gods chose to forgo the presentation, but Diana was always looking for a good story.

“Whenever you’re ready,” she said with a smile.

I took one more sip of coffee and began to fall into a trance.

I was staring directly into the blue eyes of Martin R. Brubaker. The eyes were usually cold and empty, animated only when excited by the rush of success. Then, they took on a cruel gleam which meant the person he had been looking at had been beaten. They were eyes that had shown no emotion when his wife had killed herself, presumably because she had been beaten down by him over the years. Not physically beaten, of course. That would be too crude for the ‘God of Real Estate,’ as the Wall Street Journal had dubbed him. No, he had beaten her down mentally, his cold eyes mirroring the contempt he felt for her.

Now, though, those eyes showed something else. I had a difficult time identifying what those eyes were conveying that night, but at last I knew. Martin R. Brubaker, the God of Real Estate, was frightened.

He had good reason to be frightened, I realized. He was a passenger in a private jet which was threatening to shake apart somewhere over Oklahoma as storm clouds swirled just outside with strong winds buffeting the plane violently. We were all frightened. We had good reason to be. There was a definite possibility that we would not survive our flight. As much as I wanted to live, though, I had to admit to myself that even dying might be worth it just to see the God of Real Estate crap in his pants.

It couldn't happen to a nicer guy, I thought sarcastically. I had worked for him for ten years, and in that ten years, I had learned to hate him more than I had ever thought possible. I had watched him treat everyone who had helped him to the top as if they were dirt under his feet. He had belittled and degraded enemies and allies alike, and he had treated me no differently. After all, I was only Martin R. Brubaker, Junior.

I looked around at Miss Simon. She was the only other passenger in the plane, and she was as frightened as the rest of us—I could see it in her deep blue eyes. She was my father's secretary. She was an attractive blonde, a few years younger than my twenty-eight years. She looked both professional and sexy in her tailored navy-blue suit with a short slit skirt. I had entertained a number of fantasies about her since my father had hired her only a few months before, but those fantasies were never to be realized. My father had strict rules about relations with the hired help, and Miss Simon was beneath me in status. Besides, my father had already picked out a wife for me.

Lucinda Watson was the only daughter of Malcolm Watson the Third, president and principal stockholder of one of the largest insurance companies in the country. His company had a real estate portfolio that was second to none. A merger of our two families through my marriage would mean my father would have an investment partner who would be able to finance many of his new projects. I sighed. At least marrying Lucinda would give me some useful function in the company. In spite of a Harvard MBA, I was reduced to a role not much greater than Miss Simon. What was I saying? She could at least type a letter. That was probably beyond my authority.

I was the laughing stock of the company. I knew it, of course. Sure, I had the title of Vice President, but I wasn't vice president of anything. What I was, was an errand boy for my father. Ever see 'Fierce Creatures?' I was like Kevin Kline in that movie. I hoped I didn't act as stupid as he did, but I certainly was like him when it came to job authority.

"Miss Simon!" he barked over the roar of the jet engines. "I want you to go forward right now and find out what that lunatic in the cockpit thinks he's doing with my airplane."

Miss Simon looked frightened, and I couldn't blame her. The plane was being buffeted by heavy winds which made it rise and fall wildly without warning. Flashes of lightning were adding noticeably to the brightly lit cabin of the plane. Standing went beyond stupid. It was downright dangerous.

"Father, I'll do it," I offered, starting to unbuckle my seat belt. Damn that streak of chivalry, I thought. It had made me stupid, and as Forrest Gump would say, 'stupid is as stupid does.'

"If I wanted you to do it, I would have told you to do it!" he snapped. "Stay exactly where you are. Miss Simon can handle it."

In a perfect world, I would have looked directly into Miss Simon's deep blue eyes. I would have gained the strength from them I required to defy my father. To his shock and amazement, I would demand to be the one to go to the cockpit. Miss Simon would fall instantly in love with me, and my father would develop a sudden deep respect for me. But it wasn't a perfect world. Sinking back down in my seat, I did as I had been told. I couldn't bring myself to look into Miss Simon's eyes.

Dutifully, she unbuckled her belt, grabbing on to the side of her seat to avoid being smashed into the bulkhead. She made her way carefully to the cockpit, her lovely body twisting unnaturally as she clung from seat to seat. I felt her arm brush against my shoulder as she grasped my seat, and I felt deeply ashamed.

“That’s your biggest problem,” my father began to lecture me, ignoring Miss Simon’s travails. “You can never be an effective executive until you learn that menial tasks are to be performed by menial employees. Is that what you want to be—a menial?”

“No, sir,” I muttered just loud enough to be heard over the straining engines. There was no sense in arguing with him. Storm or no storm, he was back in his true form. He seemed to actually gain strength from browbeating me. It had taken his mind off our peril.

It was his fault, though. It was my father who had given the order to the pilot to fly in spite of the gathering storm. We had been in Branson, Missouri, trying to determine what was required to turn a sleepy little town into a country music center second only to Nashville. If we could determine how to duplicate Branson’s success in some underdeveloped community, Martin Brubaker would once again perform another godlike miracle like the ones he had already performed in seven different states on projects too numerous to mention.

We were going to check out several potential communities in Oklahoma. My father had already met with the governor and gotten the political backing he needed. Healthy donations to the campaigns of several key legislators had ensured that whatever community we chose to be the next Branson would have millions of dollars poured into it for new roads and community services. The state would bear the expense and my father would garner the profits. That was why he was the God of Real Estate.

We had appointments set in several small towns on the edges of the Ozarks, and our schedule was tight. Although our pilot had recommended that we delay our flight, my father wouldn’t hear of it. “If you can’t fly us there, I’ll find myself another pilot—one with the balls to fly me where I need to go,” he told the pilot.

Our pilot, Rusty Stoker, had flown fighters in the Gulf War. He had balls the size of watermelons, and he wasn’t used to be talked to like that. His face red with anger, he had replied coldly, “It’s your party.”

“Yes it is,” my father had responded impassively, “and don’t you forget it.”

So here we were, flying into the heart of a Midwestern thunderstorm. Storms over states like Oklahoma produced some of the most intense weather imaginable, from hail and straight-line winds to torrential rain to tornadoes with winds so intense they could drive a stalk of wheat right through a wooden telephone pole. I had never been so afraid in my life.

Miss Simon disappeared into the cockpit just as the plane shuddered. Through the cabin window, I could see a bright flash followed only a couple of seconds later by the crash of thunder roaring over the sounds of our jet engines. There was again a moment of fright in my father’s eyes. As terrified as I was, I took some pleasure in seeing that the great man was actually concerned about his own mortality. That the man who had been instrumental in wrecking so many other lives could be concerned for his own was gratifying.

He recovered quickly, though. After all, he still had me to kick around. “Do you have those files on the towns we have to visit?” he asked gruffly.

“Yes, sir,” I replied, pulling five folders from the pocket in the side of my seat. With my father, I was expected to call him ‘sir’ at all times. I don’t remember ever calling him ‘dad.’

“Let me see them,” he snapped, grabbing them from my hands as the plane shuddered again.

What was it like outside, I wondered, staring into the dark night. The clouds were boiling masses of gray and near-black. Rain was swirling through them, I knew. The winds were whipping it back and forth on its long trip to the ground. Only the power of our two jet engines kept us from being tossed on those winds, mixed with the rain through the dark Oklahoma skies. How much longer would we be in the storm? It couldn’t go on forever.

“This town has promise,” he said, holding up a folder. I couldn’t see the name on the folder, but it didn’t really matter. He wasn’t really talking to me anyway. Besides, whichever town he picked would be altered beyond all recognition in a few years anyway. He would go in, making everyone in some little town think they were going to be rich. Greed would get him whatever he wanted out of local city councils, banks, even schools. Everyone would be following him around as if he were Professor Harold Hill in the Music Man. Then eventually, they would all find out that the only person who was going to get rich from the new venture would be Martin R. Brubaker.

The cockpit door opened again. Miss Simon's husky alto called out, "Rusty says we'll..."

Whatever she was about to say would be lost forever. There was a bright flash just outside the plane, filling the cabin with white light. There was a loud rumble outside the plane which translated into a violent shaking of the entire aircraft. Suddenly, I felt my stomach twist and turn as the plane dropped precipitously, my seat belt practically cutting through my abdomen.

I watched in horror as Miss Simon seemed to fly through the cabin, striking her head on the overhead with a sickening thud. Rusty apparently got control back, for I felt the plane level off and continue normal flight, if it could be said that turbulent shudders constituted normal flight.

I unstrapped my seat belt and rushed to Miss Simon's side. She was unconscious but seemed to be breathing normally.

"Get back in your seat, you goddamned idiot!" my father commanded.

"She's hurt!" I protested. I wanted to help, but I didn't know what to do.

"You will be, too, if you don't belt in!" my father warned. "Leave her where she is until we land."

It was actually good advice. Somewhere in the back of my mind, I knew I was in danger. Just because we had survived so far didn't mean we were out of the woods. Still, I couldn't leave her there, sprawled on the cabin floor. Another bout of turbulence like the last one and she might be hurt more—even killed.

As I held her gently in my arms, I realized it was the first time I had ever touched her. Her skin was soft and warm as I had imagined it would be, and I found myself wishing that I had never heard of Lucinda Watson.

The plane shook once again. I looked out of a cabin window in time to see another flash of lightning. For a moment, I was actually able to see the clouds. They looked like a human face. I could almost see the face of a man, perhaps middle aged, in glasses. Maybe it was the face of God, I thought. Did that mean God was nearsighted? I had to stifle a hysterical giggle at the thought.

“If you’re going to play the hero, get her up in her seat and strap back in!” my father demanded. I had no illusions about him really caring what might happen to me. No, if I were injured along with Miss Simon, my father would have no one to fetch things for him. He would have to perform menial tasks for himself.

Still, it was good advice. Clumsily, I managed to lift her limp body back into her chair and belt her in. Her head slumped to one side, and for a terrible moment, I wondered if her neck was broken.

I made a quick decision and ran for the cockpit over my father’s protests. We needed to get help for Miss Simon at once.

Rusty was fighting the controls. I was shocked to see his face was as pale as I suspected my own face was. His hands gripped the wheel so tightly that the knuckles appeared twice their normal size. He turned for a second and yelled, “Get back in your seat, you idiot!”

Rusty and I got along great, but he had no more respect for me than any of my father’s other employees did. I jumped into the co-pilot’s seat and buckled in. Looking out of the windshield, I could see nothing but a river of rain, sparkling like a Christmas tree in the dim cockpit lights.

“We need to land!” I yelled over the noise of the storm.

“You’re telling me?” he yelled back.

“Is there anything I can do?” I asked.

“Not unless you can conjure up a landing field,” he told me. “This plane was never meant to take this kind of stress. If we don’t find someplace to land quickly, we’re all toast.”

“Can I put out a Mayday?” I asked, reaching for the microphone. “Maybe I can get somebody to light up a field.” There are a large number of small airports all over the country which have lights, but only turn them on as needed.

Rusty shook his head. “Forget it. That last bolt of lightning fried the radio.”

“I thought that wasn’t supposed to happen.”

“So sue the manufacturer!” he snapped.

I looked out the windshield again. “What’s that over there?” I asked.

“Where? Oh, wait. It looks like an airport.”

It did, indeed, look like an airport. Through the sheets of rain, we could both see two strips of parallel lights below us in the distance. There were even lines of approach lights.

“Damned if it doesn’t look like a big airport,” Rusty muttered over a now abating storm.

“Could we be off course?” I asked. “It might be Tulsa.”

“You don’t get off course with GPS,” Rusty explained. “No, we’re out in the middle of Nowhere, Oklahoma. Even Muskogee doesn’t have a strip that modern, and we’re at least fifty miles from there. That airport’s five miles at the most.”

“I don’t care if it’s Twilight Zone International,” I laughed. “Let’s just get this plane on the ground.” I probably wouldn’t have been so anxious if I had known how close to the truth my little joke was.

Rusty’s landing was flawless. Of course, he was helped by the fact that by the time we landed, the wind and the rain had all but stopped. It was as if the area around the airport had some sort of shield which kept the worst of the storm away. I looked around as we came in, trying to find some landmark that might tell me where we were. There seemed to be the lights of a small town a couple of miles away, but there was no development around the airport. Apparently it wasn't as big as we had thought. I couldn't even see a terminal—just a couple of small, dimly lit metal hangars. There seemed to be a collection of vehicles around one of them, so Rusty taxied over to them.

I rushed back into the cabin without waiting for the plane to stop taxiing. Miss Simon was still unconscious. I rushed to her side.

“Where are we?” my father demanded to know. “Why have we landed? The storm's over.”

“We have to get her to a hospital!” I snapped at him with uncharacteristic courage.

He snorted, “She'll be alright. It's probably just a bump on the head. We have a schedule to keep.”

I bit my tongue rather than tell him what I thought he could do with his precious schedule. Instead, I brushed the hair out of Miss Simon's face, regretting that I had never gotten to know her better. She was the kind of woman I really wanted to know.

I didn't even hear the hatch open. Before I knew, it, two white men and a black woman in medical greens were pushing me away from Miss Simon as they began to check her out.

“It's a concussion,” one of the men proclaimed. I looked at him through tired eyes. What was wrong with him? It was almost as if I could see through him. Not really, but almost. I chalked it up to exhaustion.

“Will she be alright?” I managed to ask.

The black woman answered, “She'll be fine. We'll get her to the hospital right away.”

I looked at the woman. She appeared to be somewhat transparent as well. I knew it had to be exhaustion. What other explanation was there?

The woman led us from the plane. Rusty and I were pretty shaky as we made our way down the ladder, but my father had, unfortunately, regained his composure. He was his usual overbearing self. He pushed away a man at the bottom of the ladder who tried to help him down and blustered, "Get this plane back into the air! We're not supposed to be here. For that matter, just what is this place anyway?"

"You're in Ovid, sir," came a voice from out of the darkness. Then, as he stepped into the light, I could see that the speaker was a police officer. He was tall and slender, with a handsome face and impeccable uniform. He moved with incredible grace as he faced my father. "Ovid, Oklahoma."

"Well, I'm not supposed to be in Ovid, Oklahoma," my father growled. "I don't even know where Ovid, Oklahoma is!"

"It's right here," the officer said, not intimidated in the slightest. Did I detect a thin smile at the corner of his mouth?

"Obviously it's right here," my father conceded, "but I'm not supposed to be. We need to leave at once."

"I'm afraid that won't be possible, sir," the officer said, pointing to the tail of our plane. There was a large black scar on the tail, and if I looked closely enough, I could see that at the center of the scar, there was a small hole, maybe six inches in diameter.

"You were struck by lightning," the officer continued. "You were very lucky just to get the plane down. It won't be flying again for some time."

"But I have a schedule to keep!" my father insisted.

"Sir," the officer said politely, "if you'll provide me with a list of your scheduled appointments, we'll make certain that you aren't missed."

My father thought about it for a moment. I could see the wheels in his head turning. There was nothing to be done now except cooperate with the Ovid police officer. "All right," he said at last. "My son can give you the names of the people you need to contact. We need to arrange transportation to get to our next destination. Where can I rent a car?"

The officer shook his head. "The car dealers all rent cars, but there's nothing open this late."

"Then call Tulsa," my father ordered. "They'll send a car from Hertz. My son can give you our authorization number."

I was still fumbling through my attaché case for our agenda. Now I had to try to find our Hertz number as well? The officer saved me the trouble, though.

"It wouldn't do any good," he explained. "There are flash floods between here and Tulsa. You'll just have to wait until morning."

My father sighed. He didn't get to be the God of Real Estate by running into brick walls. Like it or not, we were stuck in Ovid for the night. Tomorrow, we could get a car and be on our way, but not tonight. I handed the officer a copy of our agenda.

The officer smiled. "Now that that's settled, you'll need a place to stay. I'll take you both to the Ovid Inn. They have rooms for you."

"Wait," I said looking around for Rusty. "Our pilot will need a room, too."

"He's been taken to the hospital for observation," the officer told me.

Observation? There had been nothing wrong with him when we landed. Rusty was an ex-fighter pilot. He wasn't hurt during the landing, and he was too much of a John Wayne type to complain about nervous exhaustion or the like.

"Maybe I'd better go see how they're doing at the hospital," I ventured.

The officer shook his head. "The nurse said they would be fine. As soon as you get in your rooms, you can call and find out what their condition is. Now, if you'll come with me, I do need to get you to your rooms."

We followed him to his police car without further protest. My father was uncharacteristically quiet as we drove into town. Then I realized I had seen the mood before. He was sizing up Ovid. Perhaps this would be the town he was looking for.

As we drove into town, the two-lane road became four lanes, and we were treated to the usual display of gas stations and fast food restaurants that graces the main highway strip of every small town in America. I noticed no national franchises—no McDonald's or Burger Kings. The most prominent fast food joint on the strip was called Rusty's Burger Barn. In fact, it was the only place still open. I checked my watch. It was only ten thirty. Apparently, the sidewalks rolled up early in Ovid.

The Ovid Inn looked like a small town version of Best Western. It was neat and clean, the white stucco front recently repainted. It was an L-shaped building two stories high with all rooms opening to the outside. In front, across the parking lot was the typical motel swimming pool. It was about the size of the hot tub at my father's home. Scattered around the pool was the usual collection of cheap plastic lawn chairs. I doubted if the Ovid Inn had a place in the Mobil Travel Guide.

"Here are your keys," the officer said after we had parked. "Your luggage is already in the rooms. Good night."

Tired, we both muttered good night and got out of the car. After we had shambled halfway to our rooms, I stopped as a thought struck me.

"What's wrong?" my father asked.

"How did that officer make all these arrangements? I didn't see anyone get our luggage out of the plane. And how did he get these room keys? We were with him all the time."

My father shrugged. "I don't know and I'm too tired to find out. I'm sure there's a good explanation for it. Just let it go. We have a long day ahead of us tomorrow."

He was right about that, I realized, so I went to my room. It was a pleasant room—nothing fancy—with cable TV and a comfortable bed. As promised, my bag was already in the room. I got ready for bed, relieved to be still alive after our harrowing flight. I could have used a drink, but I was too tired to get dressed again and find a bar. I settled for channel flipping.

As I half-watched TV, my suspicions rose again. It wasn't just the police officer's actions that had me wondering. I also began to wonder how during an emergency landing at a seemingly closed airport, there was already an ambulance and a police car waiting to meet us. And why had they taken Rusty away? He had seemed fine to me.

For that matter, where was Ovid, Oklahoma? I pulled a map out of my case. I had been charged with setting up our travel arrangements, and I had never heard of an Ovid, Oklahoma. It appeared to be a large enough town to have captured our interest, but I didn't remember discussing it or ever seeing it on the map. I checked the map index. No Ovid, Oklahoma was even mentioned. I scoured the map, just in case there was a mistake in the index. Maybe that was why we hadn't considered it. But no—I looked from Muskogee to Tulsa west to Oklahoma City and east to the Arkansas line and found no town called Ovid.

But the town obviously existed. We were in it. Towns didn't just crop up over night, I thought as I lay back on the bed. Did they?

I must have been more tired than I realized. I had fallen asleep wondering about Ovid, and suddenly, it was morning. Someone was pounding on my door. "Open up, Junior!" my father's voice was yelling.

Damn, I hated being called 'Junior' I thought as I ambled to the door. My father was framed in the bright morning light. There was a look of utter excitement on his face.

"Look at this," he said, thrusting a phone book in my hand. "And why aren't you dressed? We have a busy day today. Get some clothes on."

I could have used a shower, but I knew from his voice that he meant I was to get dressed that very minute. I set the phone book down on the nightstand and staggered to my suitcase for some clean underwear.

"You didn't even look at the phone book," he noted, sitting in the only comfortable chair in the room.

“So what’s in the phone book?” I asked, my voice still clogged with sleep.

“Just the background sketch of Ovid,” he said. “This town is perfect. It has a population of about fifteen thousand, so there’s already an infrastructure here. It looks like just a farming town with a little light industry, so it’s clean and folksy. There are lakes and hills all over the area. It’s perfect for our new Branson.”

“It would be,” I agreed, “except for one small detail.”

He frowned. “What’s that?”

“It doesn’t seem to exist.”

“What in hell are you talking about?”

“This town—Ovid.” I threw him the map. “It’s not on the map.”

He threw the map back at me. “So? Some dipshit cartographer screwed up. Maybe they should get together here in Ovid and sue Rand fucking McNally.”

I silently cursed myself. My father’s usual foul mood had been replaced by childish glee and I had ruined it. I had to open my big mouth and tell him that there wasn’t any Santa Claus. Now he would revert to form and be an overbearing bastard all day.

“Okay,” I agreed, trying to recover. “You have to be right. It has to be an oversight on the part of the mapmakers. Obviously, the town is here.”

“Of course it is,” he agreed, somewhat mollified.

“Just let me call the hospital,” I said, as I picked up the receiver and opened the phone book to look up a number. “Then we can discuss the situation at breakfast.”

“Why are you calling the hospital?”

“To check on Rusty and Miss Simon,” I told him. It would never have occurred to the self-centered bastard to call himself.

“Well, make it quick,” he ordered. “We have a lot to talk over.”

A receptionist answered almost at once. “Ovid Memorial Hospital.”

“Yes,” I said. “I’d like to check on the condition of a Rusty Stoker.”

“One moment, please.” I was treated to thirty seconds of elevator music when she came back on the line. “I’m sorry, sir but I don’t show a Rusty Stoker here.”

Maybe they had treated and released him. He might even be here at the Ovid Inn. “Then how about a Miss Simon?” I asked.

“Do you have a first name?”

I was suddenly surprised to realize I had no idea what her first name was. Dad required his staff to be Mr. This and Mrs. That. Since he made sure I never got too familiar with her, I had never asked her for her first name. “No, I’m sorry but I don’t.” No way was I going to ask my father and receive another caustic reply.

“Just a moment, please.”

The elevator music in the background came on again. This time, it sounded like a lethargic version of the old Helen Reddy song, ‘I Am Woman.’

“Hurry up!” my father prodded.

“Just a minute,” I told him.

“Sir?”

“Yes?”

“There is no Miss Simon listed here at the hospital.”

That just wasn’t possible. She had been out cold when they took her off the plane. No doctor in his right mind would have released her in that condition. “Then is there another hospital in Ovid?”

“No, sir. We’re the only one.”

“But...”

“Have a nice day, sir.” The line was dead.

“They’re not there,” I told my father as I hung up the phone.

“Not where?” he asked.

“At the hospital,” I said. “They acted as if they had never heard of them. Yet that’s the only hospital in town. What’s going on around here?”

“Never mind,” my father said, grabbing my arm and pulling me toward the door. “We have a lot of work to do today. We need to talk to the mayor—get him in on the action for a small percentage—then we need to check into land prices. We can probably even get the local bank to help us and...”

“You don’t care, do you?” I asked, stopping at the door. “You don’t care what happens to Rusty or Miss Simon as long as you have your land deal.”

My father’s enthusiasm took a back seat to his anger. “Listen, you ingrate, they are employees. No matter what happens to them, I can always get a new pilot and a new secretary. I’m trying to tell you that this town is a potential gold mine. We can buy up half the town before they even know what happened, and you’re worried about two employees whose combined annual earnings probably couldn’t pay to have my suits cleaned.”

“I’m talking about two human beings,” I told him, my voice rising.

His eyes narrowed. “Fine, you worry about them and I’ll worry about business. I gave you a good education. I thought it would teach you what you need to do to succeed. Apparently it was all too theoretical. You haven’t got an entrepreneurial bone in your body. When we get back to New York, you’re fired. You can go see what your fancy degrees will get you out in the real world.”

“That’s fine with me!” I snapped.

I don’t know what we would have said to each other next. I had never stood up to my father so vehemently before. I have to admit, though, that I would have probably backed down and ended up begging for his forgiveness. Such was his power over me. We were both glowering at each other, fists clenched, when there was a knock on the door. “Mr. Brubaker?” a familiar voice said pleasantly.

I opened the door. The same police officer who had taken us to our rooms the night before was standing there in the morning light.

“Good morning, officer,” I said pleasantly, wondering if he had come by to bring us news of our pilot and secretary.

My father made a different assumption, more in keeping with his character. “Good. I’m glad you’re here. I want to see your mayor as soon as possible. I have a proposition for him that I know he will appreciate. Let’s go.”

The officer continued to stand in the doorway. “I’m sorry, sir. I’m not here to escort you to the mayor. The Judge has issued a warrant for your arrest. Now, if you will come with me...”

My father’s face reddened at once. “What are you blabbering about? My proposition is more important than some trumped up charge from some tank town Judge. You’d better give me the name of that Judge so I can have him reprimanded.”

“What is the charge, officer?” I asked as politely as I could. I had heard stories about how small town justice worked. Often, it was a matter of quietly paying a small fine and moving on. I knew my father’s attitude was bound to raise the ante.

“Unsafe operation of an aircraft,” he replied seriously.

My father exploded, “What the hell are you talking about? We weren’t operating the aircraft. Our pilot was. Haul him in on your dip shit charges and let us go about our business.”

I think he would have been furious under any conditions, but our argument had meant that he was starting from a higher level of irritation. We would be lucky if the officer didn’t pull his gun and shoot us for resisting arrest the way my father was carrying on. I finally laid my hand on his arm and said softly, “Come on, sir. We can get this taken care of quickly. I’m sure Officer...”

“Mercer, sir.”

“Yes. Officer Mercer will be happy to take us to see the mayor after we’ve taken care of this in court, won’t you, Officer?”

Without changing his expression, Officer Mercer replied, “If you still want to see the mayor after the Judge has dealt with you, I will be happy to escort you to see the mayor.”

“There, you see, sir?” I said calmly. “We don’t have to be concerned.”

“Very well,” he huffed at last. “But this had better not take long or my lawyers will be all over your little kangaroo court. Is that clear, Officer?”

“Very clear, sir.”

As we rode to see the Judge, I began to see what my father had meant about Ovid. It was a typical Midwestern community in many ways, but there was a difference, too. Everything looked clean. Not new, necessarily, but clean. There was no trash lying in the gutters, no graffiti on the buildings, and all the lawns were neatly trimmed and sidewalks clean. It was almost a Hollywood version of small town America, showing all of its virtues and none of its faults.

Then, I saw the first thing which disturbed me. As we stopped at a stoplight, I saw what appeared to be a day-care attendant ushering her charges into a nearby playground. As we drove past, I got a good look at the ten or so children she was supervising. All but two of them had that same strange transparent look I had noticed at the airport. There, I had chalked it up to fatigue, but I was now operating on a full night’s sleep. Even the attendant looked a little transparent. Strangely enough, the two normal children didn’t seem to notice anything out of the ordinary. The light changed and we were on our way before I could comment on my observation.

When I was a boy, I used to watch old reruns of the Twilight Zone. Ovid was starting to remind me of that show. Why? Because it was too normal. It was like those Heaven on Earth fantasies where someone from the big city finds relief from his troubles in the small, nearly perfect town of his youth. Well, sorry, Ovid, I thought. I was born and raised in the city, and while I might not have enjoyed growing up under my father's thumb, I certainly didn't want to settle down in Ovid. In fact, I wasn't too sure I even wanted my father investing in Ovid. Something wasn't right in this perfect little town, I realized.

Officer Mercer pulled into the parking lot of a building that I assumed was what passed for a municipal building in Ovid. It wasn't an unattractive building, but why the city fathers had decided to place Doric columns in front of a fairly modern building was beyond me.

There was none of the activity of large city courts in Ovid. I had attended many court hearings, and I had observed dozens of lawyers rushing from room to room, conferencing with clients, and on the phone. There was none of this in Ovid. The halls were deserted.

Officer Mercer led us into a fairly impressive courtroom. There was only one person in the spectator's gallery—an attractive blonde who seemed to be watching our ordeal with mild amusement. Another woman, a fairly attractive brunette, was seated at one of the attorney's tables. She appeared to be fresh out of law school. She was stylishly dressed in a beige business suit and was intently reading a document she held over her open brief case. She seemed to be having a little trouble reading it.

"Damn contacts," she muttered as we approached. Looking at Officer Mercer, she said, "Tell the Judge that right after this case, I need to go get my glasses. These contacts aren't quite right."

"He said that's fine," Officer Mercer said. It sounded like an odd thing to say. How could he say it was fine when he hadn't heard her problem or been in the room to reply to her? The bad feeling I was getting about Ovid was getting worse.

Turning to us, the woman said, "I'm Susan Jager. I'm your attorney for today's trial."

"No you're not," my father said belligerently. "I'm not about to be represented by some little cheerleader fresh out of some podunk law school. I'd rather represent myself."

She nodded at me. "Does that go for you, too?"

“It goes for him, too,” my father replied.

She looked at us with what almost looked like pity. Then, with a sigh, she closed her briefcase and said, “Suit yourselves.”

“All rise,” Officer Mercer suddenly intoned. “The city court for the City of Ovid is now in session, the Honorable Judge presiding.”

A rather distinguished looking man of middle age stepped out of chambers and assumed his post at the bench. I couldn’t help but think he looked a little like that face I had seen in the clouds. He looked down at us over the top of gold-rimmed glasses and said with a soft accent, “You may be seated. Next case?”

“The case of Martin R. Brubaker and Martin R. Brubaker, Junior,” the officer said formally.

“You are charged with unsafe operation of an aircraft. Counsel, how do your clients plead?”

The young woman rose to her feet. “Your honor, the defendants have refused to accept me as counsel.”

The Judge looked at my father and me with utter disdain. “Let it be noted that the defendants have declined counsel.”

“Your Honor!” my father said leaping to his feet. “This is a travesty of justice. My son and...”

“Are you an attorney, sir?” the Judge asked in a cultured Southern voice.

“No, but...”

“Then I will thank you to be silent in my courtroom until you are addressed. Is that clear?”

In my entire life, I had never seen my father back down from anyone, but he backed down from this strange magistrate. The Judge’s frown was almost a personification of the expression ‘if looks could kill.’ The Judge’s look at us seemed almost lethal. My father self-consciously sat back down.

“Now that we have that matter settled,” the Judge said, “let’s continue with the trial. How do the two of you plead?”

My father rose with as much dignity as he could still muster. “Your Honor, my son and I plead not guilty.”

The Judge shifted in his seat. “Very well. Officer Mercer?”

“Yes, Your Honor?”

“Did you see these two men disembark from an airplane which had just been observed operating unsafely over the city of Ovid?”

“I did, Your Honor,” the officer replied formally.

Turning to us, the Judge asked, “Did you disembark from the plane in question?”

If it hadn’t been such a serious situation, I would have laughed. It was if the Judge was intentionally making a travesty of the trial. Surely he must have realized that the results of the trial would be overturned as soon as my father got to his attorneys.

“Of course we did!” my father snapped.

“And who owns the aircraft in question?”

“I do, Your Honor,” my father admitted.

“Then it seems obvious to me that you are responsible for the unsafe operation of the aircraft,” the Judge said.

My father was practically sputtering. “But I wasn’t flying the airplane. That was my pilot’s job. If you want to accuse someone of unsafe flying, charge him!”

“I’ve already dispensed judgement on your pilot,” the Judge replied to our surprise. “I must say he accepted his fate much more civilly than you are. I must also point out that while he flew the plane, you were the one in charge of it, Mr. Brubaker. No pilot would have made the decision to fly into that storm. Only a fool like you would have put so many lives at risk.”

“You can’t talk to me that way!” my father shouted. Then, to my astonishment, the Judge made a sudden motion with his hand and my father stopped speaking. He didn't close his mouth. In fact, his mouth was still open, and he was trying to yell at the Judge, but nothing was coming out. In shock, he reached for his throat, trying to determine what had gone wrong.

The Judge smiled. "That's more like it, Mr. Brubaker. Don't worry. Your condition isn't permanent. You'll be able to speak in a few minutes, but not in the voice you are expecting to hear. I must say, Mr. Brubaker, I don't like you. Many men have faced my Judgement, and I have dealt with them fairly to the best of my ability. I shall do so with you as well—with pleasure. I don't need to hear what you were about to say. I know it from your mind. You were about to threaten me by telling me that you know the governor."

One look at my father's widening eyes told me that that was exactly what he had been about to tell the Judge.

"Well, I know him, too," the Judge went on. "In fact, I play golf with him this afternoon. I would give him your regards, but by tee time, he won't have the slightest idea who you are. I also know about your little scheme to turn Ovid into the next Branson. Well, let me tell you something, Mr. Brubaker, Ovid is far too valuable to be turned into the tourist trap you propose. You will not have the opportunity to disrupt the lives of the people in our community, or any other community for that matter. Now, as to the matter of judgement."

My father lurched around and walked awkwardly to face the Judge at the foot of his bench. Then, I felt invisible hands grab me and pull me to his side. It was as if I had lost complete control of every part of my body. In moments, both of us were facing the Judge.

"Mr. Martin Brubaker, Senior," the Judge intoned, much as I suspected God would do when my father was called to his last judgement, "you have controlled and manipulated people all of your adult life. I think it is time you learned how the other half lives."

Then, he began to speak in a language I had never heard before—at least not the way he spoke it. It sounded vaguely like Latin, but not the Latin you hear in high schools or from the lips of priests. This Latin was a living language, fluid and robust, and the words seemed to have a power I could feel. I watched my father actually cringe under the force of the words. I don't know what I had been expecting, but it wasn't this. My father had changed from indignant to frightened, and I was beginning to become frightened myself.

Then, the Judge was silent. In fact, the entire courtroom was silent. My father just stood there with a tired, defeated look on his face.

"And now for you, Mr. Martin Brubaker, Junior," I felt my blood suddenly run cold. "You have not had a chance to follow your father's path to selfishness and vanity. There may, in fact, be hope for you. My sentence of you carries with it a chance for happiness and contentment, if you are intelligent enough to find it. Goodbye to you, Mr. Brubaker."

With that, the Latin chanting began again, but the words were different. I never took Latin, so I had no idea what he was saying, but I began to feel the power of the words much as my father must have felt them. I felt an odd tingling sensation which seemed to come simultaneously from every part of my body. Then, as suddenly as it began, the sensation stopped. The sudden silence was finally broken by the sound of a gavel.

"Case dismissed. Next case," the Judge said, a note of satisfaction in his voice.

Case dismissed? Why was he letting my father and I go with just an odd speech in Latin? That didn't seem likely at all.

"Come on, let's go," my father said. Or at least the words came from my father's mouth. There was something odd about the way he said it. His voice had developed a slight twang, not unlike a milder version of the twang that seemed to be endemic to everyone who lived in Oklahoma.

My father began to stride from the courtroom, and there was nothing, I realized, that I could do except to follow at his heels like the obedient puppy I had been most of my life.

We were silent as we walked from the courtroom, but there was something odd about my father. In addition to the twang in his voice, he seemed a little shorter. His suit didn't fit him quite right. I was so busy trying to figure out what the problem was that I nearly tripped on my own pants leg. I looked down. My pants seemed too long suddenly, and they felt as if they didn't fit properly.

"I swear, it gets harder and harder to get your driver's license renewed every time," my father muttered.

"What did you say?" I asked. I had a sudden feeling of panic. What my father had said made no sense whatsoever. I was beginning to wonder if the anger he had exhibited in the courtroom had brought on a mild stroke. I had heard of such things happening.

"Weren't you listening?" he said. "I was talking about driver's licenses. Why, when I was your age, it didn't take no time at all to get a new one. Now, you got to wait in a line that looks like the line in front of St Peter on Judgement Day."

My father used a double negative, I realized. I had never heard him do that in my entire life. He was a Harvard graduate in his own right. I didn't think he knew how to be grammatically incorrect. And what was this muttering about a driver's license?

As I pondered these issues, I felt a sudden tingle run through my body. It was as if I had suddenly been moved almost imperceptibly from one point in the universe to another. Something was rubbing on my chest. Something else was tickling my neck. It felt almost as if my entire body were suddenly encased in thin spider silk, shifting in the breeze as I walked.

My father made his way to an aging Ford F-150 pickup truck, white except for the innumerable rust spots. He opened the door with a key that seemed to appear suddenly in his hand. Unlocking the other door from inside, he called, "Well, what are you waiting for? Your daddy will be expecting us home for dinner. You know how he gets when it ain't on the table on time. Now get in."

What was he talking about? Shaken, I did get in—not because I felt I had to, but because I was just too stunned to do anything else. I felt almost as if I was an observer in my own body. My actions seemed to be independent of my thought.

My father methodically put the truck in gear without difficulty. I had never seen him drive a manual transmission in my life, yet he handled it effortlessly. I looked at him closely. There was something different about him, but I couldn't quite determine what it was. Then, I realized what had happened. He was no longer wearing his suit coat, yet it wasn't on the seat beside him. He had been wearing it when he got in the truck, yet now it was gone. That suit cost more than most people made in a month, yet he didn't seem upset that the jacket was missing.

I continued to stare at him, only to realize that whatever was happening was ongoing. His body seemed to lose focus, almost like an image on an aging TV. It blurred around the edges and seemed to be changing as I watched. My father had been balding, but now, he sported a full head of hair, long and pulled back in a bun. It was mostly a dull brown, but here and there were streaks of gray. His sallow, unhealthy pallor had become much pinker, almost rosy, and the wrinkles in his skin seemed to be disappearing. If I hadn't known his actual age, I would have mistaken him for someone in their late thirties—early forties at the most instead of the fifty-five I knew him to be.

As we drove along the Ovid streets, even his clothing was beginning to change. His white dress shirt had already turned to a faded denim blue and seemed to be cascading over his body like a waterfall until it had formed a long, shapeless garment which I realized in shock to be a dress. The sleeves had shortened, revealing slender, nearly hairless arms. I caught my breath as I watched two shapes begin to rise from his chest.

My father—if the person seated next to me could even be called my father—stared at me as we came to a stop at a traffic light. “What’s wrong, honey?” The voice was a full octave higher than my father’s voice. Equally as odd was that there was genuine concern in his—her?—voice.

“Nothing...” I managed to say, uncertain as to what I should say. Was I supposed to tell my father that he was swiftly becoming what appeared to be a woman? What would he think of that? Or worse yet, would he think anything of it at all?

Then, I realized I had been so mesmerized watching my father’s transformation that I had paid no attention to what was happening to my own form. My voice, I suddenly realized, had also changed pitch, becoming higher like my father’s. Also, there was a little of the twang I had noticed in the voices of Oklahoma natives.

I looked down, not entirely surprised to see that I no longer wore a suit. The top button of my now plaid short sleeved shirt popped open of its own accord, and I was greeted with the sight of two substantial mounds of my own. My arms were smooth and hairless, my hands small and delicate. I was wearing jeans as well, but they fit oddly, contracting at the waist while pooling around my hips. I felt a sudden length of hair down the back of my neck and seemed to know instinctively that it had arranged itself into a long ponytail.

There was no question as to what I was becoming. The only question was how. Even in my stupor, I realized that this was the sentence the Judge had spoken of. I was to be a girl, as was my father. But what possible force of law or nature could do what had been done to us? I wasn’t a religious individual, but to my knowledge, even God Himself had never doled out justice of this sort.

“You look a little faint, Donna Mae,” she—for I knew it was now she—said to me.

“Just a little hot,” I managed to respond, trying to be as nonchalant about the changes as possible. It was apparent to me that whatever had happened to my father had affected his mind as well as his body. She seemed to notice nothing out of the ordinary, as if she had been whoever she now was all of her life. Would that also happen to me? My transformation seemed to be a few minutes behind my father’s. Perhaps I would slowly lose the knowledge of who I had been, suddenly believing myself to have always been this Donna Mae she thought I was. I shuddered at the thought. I wanted to be me. I wanted to remember who I had been and become that person again. To be changed in body was bad enough. To be changed in body and mind was like a death sentence.

She laughed, "Honey, it ain't hot yet. It ain't even June yet. This is as nice a day as you'll ever see."

Actually, I was hot. The truck lacked air conditioning, and the air blowing in from the partially opened windows was warm and humid, a harbinger of an Oklahoma summer yet to come. I suspected, though, that my profuse perspiring was due more to the shock of what was happening to me than to the heat.

"Soon as we get home," she continued, "I want you to go out and get me a dozen fresh eggs. I'm gonna devil 'em for your daddy. You know how he likes 'em. Make sure you just have a couple and leave most of 'em for him."

"There's a supermarket," I said spying a place called 'Duggan's IGA.'

"What do we want with a supermarket?" she asked, puzzled.

"Eggs," I reminded her.

"Since when do we need a supermarket for eggs?" she asked.

"Something wrong with the chickens?"

What chickens?

We drove right on past the market, off past the edge of town. There was nothing but cropland ahead, as far as the eye could see. She seemed to know where she was going. I let her drive and tried to concentrate on what had happened to me. Looking into the side mirror, I saw the face of a young woman, perhaps sixteen or so. She had nondescript brown hair and eyes to match. Her skin was lightly tanned with a few freckles on her cheeks and nose. She was not unattractive, but the apparent absence of any makeup gave her a girlish rather than a womanly look. I looked down at my hands. I was relieved to find that my nails were cut short and mannish.

After about two miles or so, we pulled into a gravelled driveway. There was a mailbox attached to a post, and she drove as close to it as she could.

“Well, aren’t you going to get the mail?”

“Huh?” I responded.

She sighed, “I swear, girl, you are addled. Now get that mail or you’ll have to run back out here on foot to get it.”

I climbed out of the truck, feeling for the first time the odd shift of weight in my body. I seemed to be projecting outward both in the front and the rear, and the ponytail running down my back flopped up gently from side to side. I was shorter, too, I realized than I had been when I got in the truck.

The mailbox had the name Potter printed in neat white letters on the side. I reached in the box and pulled out several letters and advertising circulars, dutifully taking them back to the truck. On top of the stack, now resting in my lap, was an advertisement inviting Donna Mae Potter to check out careers in today’s Army. So that’s who I was. I had become a Donna Mae Potter. Sitting next to me, presumably, was a Mrs. Potter—my mother. What was going on?

“So the Army wants you,” she commented, slipping the truck back into gear. “I don’t know what they’d want with girls. It just don’t seem right.”

It didn’t seem right—that was for certain, and I didn’t mean the fact that the Army wanted girls.

“A girl like you needs to settle down and have a family now that your school is over.”

School was over? That made me more like eighteen. It had to be the absence of makeup that made me look so much younger. That was fine with me, though. I had no interest in wearing makeup. I didn’t care if I looked like I was ten years old. No way would I wear makeup. Not now—not ever.

As for the settling down and having a family life, it sounded very ominous. I didn't know what I was going to do, but I certainly didn't plan on having a family. I planned on finding out why I had been changed into a girl and what I could do about changing back. In the meantime, a little voice told me I should act the part I had been given until I could determine what could be done to return me and my father to our normal states. I hoped I could pull it off. I didn't have the slightest notion how to be a teenage girl.

Not far from the road was an aging farmhouse. It was neat and had a fresh coat of white paint on its clapboard siding, but it was old, showing obvious signs of wear. It was nestled in a grove of trees which had obviously been planted many years ago to shield the house from the hot Oklahoma sun. Not far away was a barn with a tractor and several items of farm equipment whose functions I could only guess at parked haphazardly.

As we approached the house, I could see a man in overalls stand up next to the tractor. He had apparently been working on the machine, for he was wiping his oily hands on a white towel which was becoming blacker by the minute. He was tall, perhaps six-three, although with my reduced height, I might have overestimated that. He was lean with a dark skin tanned from continual exposure to the sun. A shock of dark hair, thinning at the front, blew in the light spring breeze. But his most striking feature was that he was transparent. Again, by transparent, I mean that if I tried very hard, I could almost see through him, just like the children on the playground and the people at the airport.

"'Bout time you got back," he said calmly in the ever-present Oklahoma drawl. "Thought you must'a done some shoppin' while you were in town."

"Haven't got nothin' worth shoppin for," she said, getting out of the truck. "I know how you hate for me to spend money on frills."

"Ain't enough money in farming for frills," he drawled. "I ain't had no dinner, though. You'd better get me somethin' real quick."

I didn't like the way he said that to her. I supposed she was my mother now and he was supposed to be my father, whatever he really was. He was overbearing, though, acting as if she were the hired help instead of his wife. Could I have guessed wrong about their relationship? I didn't think so.

After she had descended from the truck, I got my first good look at the woman my father had become. She was short—even shorter than I. I guessed her to be no more than five-two or three. She may have had a pleasant figure at one time, but now she was a little on the pudgy side, walking with a bit more of a waddle than a sway.

"I'll have dinner ready in a jiffy," she told him, unperturbed at the way he had talked to her. She turned to me. "Donna Mae, you go get them eggs like I told you."

I looked around. Where were the chickens? I knew nothing about farms. I had never been on one in my life. I was strictly a city kid.

"What are you waitin' for?" the man growled. "I gotta show you where the hen house is or something?"

Actually, that would have been helpful. I was saved asking that question when I heard the sudden squawk of a chicken from somewhere behind the house. I rushed to the back of the house in search of eggs.

Of course, I had never been in a hen house before. The smell that assaulted my new nose was a strong one of chicken feed, feathers, and waste. Several chickens were nesting—or whatever chickens do—in the poorly lit and ventilated space. There was a basket on a small shelf next to the chickens. I picked it up, trying to determine how I would find the eggs. Did I have to lift the chickens? No, I realized. The eggs rolled down a little chute, collecting in front of the chickens. Apparently my first chore was going to be an easy one. Quickly, I filled the basket with eggs and made my way back to the house.

I assumed correctly that the kitchen was toward the back of the house. My new mother was already preparing food with a couple of mixing bowls on the counter while three steaks popped and sizzled in an open skillet. Pan-fried steak, I realized. She was making a meal that would harden the arteries of the heartiest individual. I had always tried to be careful of what I ate, and this food was deadly. I knew, though, that I would have no choice but to eat it. The thought of eating so much unhealthy food was almost as unsettling as becoming a girl—almost, but not quite.

“Well, girl, set the table and make the drinks,” she ordered. “I still got to make these devilled eggs for supper.”

Set the table with what? Make what drinks? My shoulders slumped in resignation. There was no way in the world I could pull off this impersonation. I didn’t even know where the glasses were. Then a strange thing began to happen. On a whim, I simply cleared my mind. I was, after all, suffering from a mental overload, probably not too dissimilar from what people experience during a nervous breakdown. My body just seemed to respond to knowledge I lacked on a conscious level. As I walked forward toward the kitchen cabinets, my hands reached instinctively upward into one of them, opening it to expose a collection of tumblers. I removed three of them without thinking.

Now, what to put in them? Again, my body froze. I had no conscious idea what drinks to make. I willed myself back into the near-alpha state again, and my body walked to the refrigerator, filled the glasses with ice, and withdrew a large cold pitcher of lemonade from one of the shelves. I set the glasses on the table and allowed my body to find knives and forks. When I took full control again, lunch was ready.

As relieved that I was that I had been able to perform a few simple functions without giving away the fact that I was an impostor, I was also unsettled at the thought that I could so easily surrender control of myself to some unknown force which required me to act like Donna Mae Potter. How pervasive was this force? If I surrendered to it entirely, would I become like my father had become? Perhaps that was what he had done. Perhaps the shock of his transformation had caused him to slip into a mental fugue, now held prisoner in his own transformed body while another personality ruled his very existence. It was not a pleasant thought. I would have to be careful how I used the autonomic state.

“George,” my new mother called out, “dinner’s ready.”

Dinner? Then I remembered. In many rural areas, lunch was called dinner. Supper was the evening meal.

My ‘father’ ambled into the room, carrying a thin newspaper which declared itself to be the Ovid Clarion. He plopped down wordlessly at the head of the table, buried his face in the newspaper, and waited to be served. The effrontery of this clod, I thought! He began to shovel food into his mouth boorishly, offering no acknowledgement as to if it was good, bad, or indifferent. It was as if we weren’t even there. I had seen this type of behavior before when I was younger. My father—that is to say, my real father—often treated my mother in a similar fashion. As much as I was disgusted by my new father’s behavior, it was poetic justice to watch my father—now apparently my mother—suffer the fate he had dealt out before.

As for my new mother, she watched him take the first few bites with a nervous expression. Then, once he had chewed and swallowed without criticism, she relaxed and began to dish up food for herself and for me.

The food was actually quite tasty, but there was far too much of it. I noticed my ‘mother’ was just a little pudgy, and the diet was obviously part of the reason. My ‘father’ was slimmer, and I assumed it was the hard work of farming that kept him that way. As for my new body, it was slim, but hardly model slim. I realized if I became stuck in Ovid for the rest of my life, I would have to learn to eat sparingly or I would begin to resemble my mother.

Another point about the food—it was all bad for us. There was obviously too much fat in the diet, and the fried steak, accompanied with fried potatoes, was probably hardening even my young arteries rapidly. There was at least a helping of corn on my plate. I resolved to eat it and leave as much of the potatoes and steak as I could.

“Honey, you’re hardly eating,” she commented. “Do you feel okay? It isn’t that time of the month for you, is it?”

Time of the month? Holy shit! I had that to look forward to also. What else could go wrong? “No—mom—I’m just not hungry.”

She smiled a motherly smile. Was my father still in there at all? “You’re probably just excited about graduating and all. Is Charlene still coming by to pick you up to get your gown?”

I hoped she meant a graduation gown. I was now eligible to wear the other kind as well. “Yes,” I replied, although I didn’t have the slightest idea who Charlene was or if she was coming by for me.

She nodded. “Then you’d better go get ready. She’ll probably be here any minute.”

As if on cue, there was the sound of a car coming to a halt on the gravel driveway. A horn honked twice. Apparently, my ride had arrived. I started to run out the door. Anything to get away from this madhouse.

“Don’t forget your purse!” ‘mother’ called out to me. Where was it? As if reading my mind, she said, “I saw it on the couch in the living room this morning.”

I grabbed the worn brown purse that was lying on the couch and slung it over my shoulder in what I hoped was a normal fashion.

“Now be careful,” my new mother said, scurrying to fill my ‘father’s’ now-empty plate again. With any luck, maybe the son of a bitch would have a coronary before I got back. I had a feeling I was in for treatment no better than my mother. He was a misogynist if ever I had seen one. Just because I was his daughter, I could not expect decent treatment from him. After all, I was only a girl. I flushed in anger at the thought. I hadn’t asked to be a girl. Of course, when I thought about it, girls that are born that way didn’t ask to be girls either.

Charlene proved to be a girl about my size and build, although there the resemblance ended. She had long red hair, flowing freely down her back and wore flattering makeup on her pretty face. As I got into her car, I saw she was wearing a tank top and shorts. She was a real person, too—not one of those oddly transparent people. She gave me a broad smile.

“So what do you think?” she asked.

“About what?” I returned.

“The car, silly,” she said as if I was the fool of the day. “My mother’s car—she let me take it today. Isn’t that great?”

“Yeah,” I responded, not having the slightest idea what she was talking about. “That’s terrific.”

I was living in hell, I thought as we retraced the route into Ovid that my ‘mother’ and I had taken earlier that day. This morning, I was a young man with a bright future. I was heir to one of the largest real estate fortunes in the country, in my twenties, due to marry a girl with all the right connections, and an MBA from a prestige school. Now, I was fresh off the farm waiting to pick up my high school diploma which would probably qualify me to waitress in that burger joint I saw last night. And of course, I was a girl. I didn’t have the foggiest notion how to be a girl, and I didn’t want to learn.

Here I was, in a car with a girl I presumed was supposed to be my best friend. I had no idea who she was, other than her first name. I supposed it could have been worse. The person who picked me up for a ride into Ovid could have been a large hulking lineman from the high school football team with an IQ slightly lower than the car he drove, and he could have called me ‘Babe’ all the way into town, his meaty arm draped over my tiny shoulders. I shuddered again. Shuddering was starting to be what I did best in this body.

“After we get our gowns, let’s go to Personnel at March’s,” Charlene said brightly.

“March’s?” I had no idea what she was talking about.

“Yeah,” she said. “I want to put in an application there. I hear they pay sales associates pretty well—for Ovid, at least.”

“Oh.” Whatever March’s was.

“You know, you should apply, too,” she said. “That nonsense your dad is always spouting about how girls should be raising families instead of working is really a pile of crap. I mean, jeez, it's almost the twenty-first century. That barefoot and pregnant horse shit went out with high button shoes and celluloid collars."

Not on the Potter farm, I realized. What had I gotten myself into? Whatever it was, it didn't look good.

I had been on the fringes of Ovid's business district when I had been driven to my trial, but this was my first opportunity to see it close up and personal. It was really Small Town America, but most certainly a prosperous version of it. My father and I had travelled all over the region in search of the next Branson and had been greeted with decaying business districts and declining populations wherever we went. Small towns were dying, unless they were close to cities, and there they grew as bedroom communities, slowly losing their identities until they were connected to the cities they served by a never-ending string of fast food restaurants and discount stores. Ovid, though, showed no signs of decay, and it certainly wasn't close to any large city, I imagined. In fact, I wasn't even sure Ovid was on the planet Earth. It was as if it existed... somewhere else.

There wasn't a boarded up store or vacant lot to be seen in the downtown area. Even the offices over the retail shops appeared occupied by a variety of professionals. Storefronts were clean with up-to-date window displays and inviting entrances. The residents of Ovid were dressed casually but prosperously, and everyone seemed to be happy. I felt like I had been suddenly thrust into the movie Truman, complete with smiling, happy citizens and clean streets. Of course, there was one important difference. Many of the residents of Ovid were semi-transparent.

We parked on the street about half a block from a three story building which had the name March's prominently displayed on the front and side in large red letters. It wasn't exactly Bloomingdale's, but it would have to do. For a small town, it actually looked like a fairly impressive store.

Fortunately, Charlene knew just where to go. I followed her up to the third floor where the Special Services department had our graduation gowns and mortarboards. We were each issued one by a smiling clerk. The gowns were gold with black trim while the mortarboards were black with a gold tassel. Charlene was excited when she tried hers on. Graduation from high school was the biggest event in her life. I wonder what she would have thought if she had known that the last time I wore an outfit like the one I now had on was to receive my MBA at Harvard.

Our gowns on hangars wrapped in plastic, Charlene said, "Personnel is on this floor. Let's go fill out job applications."

"Charlene," I began, "I don't think I want to... well, I mean..." Suddenly, I realized I didn't have a single good reason not to fill one out. What was I going to do with myself after I got my high school diploma? There was no wealthy father waiting in the wings to send me off to the best schools. Living and working on the farm would be a true version of hell. It would only be a matter of time until my new father decided it was time to marry me off to some other farmer. Of course, I didn't want to stay in this form in the first place, but something told me that I was probably doomed to be Donna Mae Potter for the rest of my life.

"Okay," I said at last. "Let's fill out those applications."

Charlene squealed with excitement and practically ran to Personnel.

We sat together at a table in the break room with our applications. Charlene was working diligently on hers, but I had paused on mine. I suddenly realized I didn't know most of the information required on the form. I dug into my purse, pulling out a worn wallet and sorted through the cards that were there. No credit cards, I noticed, but there was a Social Security card, a driver's license, and a high school ID there. I managed to get most of the information filled in from them. Of course, I had no idea how to answer the work history questions, but I suspected Donna Mae had always had to work on the farm after school. I wrote that down on the application.

As I finished the application, I happened to think that working at March's might be a good thing after all. It would get me off the farm and provide me with a reasonable income. I wasn't sure I wanted to spend the rest of my new life clerking in a department store, but it was a start. Anything would be better than living on the farm.

A clerk took our finished forms and with a smile said, "If we have any openings, we'll be giving you a call in the next few days."

We thanked her and turned to leave. Maybe it was because I was still sleepwalking into my new life, or maybe it was because I wasn't used to the balance of my new body, but when I swung around to leave, I swung too wide, colliding with someone in the process.

"I'm so sorry!" I apologized to the woman I had run into. Then I took a good look at her. She was without a doubt the most beautiful woman I had ever seen in my entire life. She had hair the color of spun gold, literally gleaming in the overhead lights, and every strand of it was long, full, and absolutely in place. Her body was incredibly beautiful and in absolutely perfect proportion. Her face was flawless and almost angelic, but with a hint of mischief which made her look both complex and intelligent. She was dressed in a gray suit with a lavender silk blouse underneath. It made her look both professional and feminine at the same time. As much as I wanted my masculine form back, I found myself experiencing feelings of awe and envy—awe because of her great beauty and envy because as a new woman, I had none of it.

She smiled, and it was as if soft music played when she spoke.

"That's quite all right. You're new here, aren't you?"

"New?" I asked.

"To Ovid, I mean."

I looked around. Charlene was out of earshot, talking with someone who looked to be about our age. I realized she must have met one of our school chums. "Yes... yes I am," I admitted. "I didn't know anyone else knew about me."

She laughed gently. "Most people will not know. Well, if you will excuse me, it was nice running into you, Donna Mae." With that, she was gone, her body swaying gracefully.

“Wow!” Charlene said, moving to my side. “That should help you get a job here.”

“Why?” I asked, puzzled.

“Are you kidding?” she laughed. “That was Vera March.”

“As in March’s Department Store?” I asked with a gasp.

“None other.”

My spirits fell. For the few minutes I had spent filling out the application, I had visions of a life independent of an overbearing father and passive mother. No more farm life for me. I would move into town and work at someplace like March’s. At least I would have my own life—not just the one the Judge had assigned me to. Now, I realized that I didn’t have a chance. Vera March would want women working in her store who had at least some style and grace. I was fresh off the farm in my new body. Had I actually been a girl, I might have had a chance. At least I would know the fundamentals of clothing and makeup. But I knew none of that. Maybe I could get a job in the local feed and seed store.

Then on the way out of the store, a thought struck me. Vera March had asked if I was new, and yet she called me by name. How strange...

Charlene dropped me off at the farm. It was about four, but already the smells of cooking food were wafting through the house. My new mother came bustling out of the kitchen when she heard me come in.

“Thank god you got home early!” she gushed. “You’ve got to go get all dressed up. Your daddy invited over that nice Mr. Spencer from down the road.”

I was missing something here. Why did this mean I had to get ‘all dressed up?’

“Mr. Spencer?” I repeated. I seemed to be doing a lot of that lately.

“You know, the young man who inherited his family’s farm last year.

He's a nice looking fella, and he's single, Donna Mae."

Oh my god. The significance finally got through to me. My new mother and father's little comments about the role I would be expected to play in life were making sense now. They intended to introduce me to an eligible bachelor and get me married off as soon as possible. But they couldn't do that, could they? I mean, this was the United States.

Things like arranged marriages just didn't happen here, did they? Apparently they did, and if I didn't think fast, I would be part of one.

For now, though, there was nothing to do but go along. If I refused, I might be thrown out of the house on my ear. My new father seemed perfectly capable of doing that if I defied his will. I would have to cooperate until I had an alternative.

"What do you want me to wear?" I asked with a sigh.

Was it my imagination, or did 'mom' suddenly look relieved? I wondered if she thought I would balk at her request.

"Wear that nice little blue dress you got for your birthday," she suggested.

"Could you help me, mom?" I asked. I had no idea what dress she was talking about. "Maybe you could show me what to wear with it."

She was silent for a moment, as if debating whether to desert her kitchen to help me or not. At last, she decided it was such a rare treat to have a teenage daughter ask about apparel and accessories that she couldn't resist. I think I really realized at that moment that either my real father was completely gone or embedded so far in the person he had become that he might as well be gone. Then a thought struck me as we made our way upstairs. What if my father was still in her somewhere, observing everything, yet unable to act, or at least unable to act out of character? If that were so, it was the most diabolical prison ever created. I found myself hoping for my father's sake that it wasn't so.

So for the first time in my life and embarrassed practically to tears, I slipped on a dress. The dress she had suggested for me looked like something out of a bad movie. I didn't know much about women's fashions, but I knew a rather turquoise blue dress with plain short sleeves, a skirt that came down to my knees, and buttons up the front was anything but the height of fashion. Add to them a pair of white flats with no stockings and all I was lacking was a straw hat with the price tag still on it.

"Here, let's let your hair free," mom said, pulling off the scrunchie that had kept my hair in a ponytail. I had to admit, it looked better loose. I was still rather plain, but I could imagine something could be done with that hair... What was I thinking? The only thing I really wanted was to cut all that hair off—to try to look male again. Not much chance of that, though, I realized, looking at my breasts sticking out from the cheap, unstylish dress.

"There, now you're all ready," she told me with a motherly smile. I kept thinking, if my father was still conscious inside this parody of a farm mother, he would be silently screaming by now. At least she hadn't made me wear any makeup.

Ready at last, it now became my job to set the table and start making drinks. Right at six, our guest arrived. I supposed farm families ate dinner—excuse me, supper—early so they could get to bed early and get out and tend the fields and milk the cows early the next day. My mother shooed me into the hallway to greet our guest.

"And you remember Donna Mae here," my new father said, feigning pride in me as I walked into the hall.

Mr. Spencer was nearly my father's age, I realized. He was a pleasant enough looking man, but hardly handsome. His sandy hair was thinning, almost lost against his farm-tanned skin. His eyes were his best feature, sparkling blue in color. He had a slender build, but solid muscles from heavy farm work. He didn't appear to be one of the transparent people. He held a large-boned hand out to me shyly. "Yes, I do remember Donna Mae," he said in a tone of voice that made me want to run for cover.

I bit the bullet and stuck out my own tiny hand, which was immediately covered by his. "Mr. Spencer," I managed to say, trying not to show the pain of his unintentionally powerful grip.

"Just call me Jess," he said with a pleasant smile.

Dinner was hell. It was obvious my new parents had made it their mission in life to marry me off to Jess Spencer. They kept steering the conversation to my domestic prowess. Maybe the Donna Mae who had existed before I was thrust in that role had such abilities, but I had none. I scarcely knew how to boil water, yet my new father busied himself making remarks like, "If you think this chicken is good, you should see what my little Donna Mae can do with a bird."

Yes, I would have liked to have flipped one at my 'father,' but I wasn't sure what would happen if I incurred his wrath. Something told me the results would not be pleasant.

"Well," Jess drawled, "if she can fry up a chicken better than this, she sure would be a fine cook, 'cause Mrs. Potter, this here chicken is about the finest I ever tasted."

My 'mother' smiled with pride. "I'm glad you like it, Mr. Spencer." She had limited her conversation, deferring to my 'father' most of the time. It was a woman's place. I'm sure that's what she thought, anyway.

The kitchen table was small to begin with, but they had arranged it so I was sitting uncomfortably close to Mr. Spencer. He had made no attempt to disguise his gazes at me, taking me in as if I were the reigning Miss America. It took all my willpower to keep from running from the table as fast as my new legs could carry me.

At last, dessert was finished and coffee drunk. The evening was coming to an end, I thought. I could hardly wait to bid Mr. Spencer good night. It wasn't to happen so quickly, though, I realized with a sinking feeling in my stomach, for my father said, "Lucille, why don't you and I clean up and let these young folks get to know each other a little better."

It was done with such a heavy hand that had I been a casual observer, I might have laughed. But for me, in the sudden role of Donna Mae Potter, it was no laughing matter. Mr. Spencer was being given an opportunity to examine the merchandise. What would I do if he... if he... I didn't even want to finish that thought.

He ushered me out onto the front porch, where the setting sun had left the sky a brilliant orange. He guided me to a waiting porch swing and sat down beside me.

"Your folks are fine people," he said by way of an opening gambit. That's right. That's how to get to a girl's heart, I thought. Tell her how wonderful her family was. Well, this girl had been a girl for less than a day, and as to her family, they could roast in hell for all I cared.

Of course, I voiced none of this. I merely smiled and mumbled a demure "Thank you."

"Y'know, I lost my folks early," he went on. "Dad, he died when I was just sixteen. Never sick a day in his life, but a tractor turned over on him one day. Mom and me ran the farm after that, but it wore her out. She got sickly and had to be taken care of for the last six years."

Where was he going with all of this?

"After she died last year, running the farm just got to be a full time job. I never had much time to do any courting."

Courting? Is that what this was? But I didn't want to be courted!

"So I was wondering," he began shyly. "Do you suppose we could see each other again? I mean just the two of us. I'd like to get to know you better, Donna Mae."

Only a day before, how would I have answered a question like that? Well, it would have been a question about a business proposal and not a relationship, so I would have said something to the effect of "I'll be happy to consider your proposal." I didn't think that answer would fit here. Should I tell him no? I wanted to, but I wasn't sure what the ramifications of that response would be. I certainly didn't want to lead him on. An affirmative response might have found me crushed in his arms while he babbled about setting a date for the wedding.

"I'll think about it, Mr. Spencer," I said with a bland smile.

“Call me Jess,” he said softly.

“Jess, then.”

He stood up. “Then I’ll take that as reason to call again,” he said formally. “You tell your folks again thanks for dinner. I’ll be calling you real soon.”

That was it. There was no good night kiss, no pawing me on the porch swing. He ambled down the porch steps, got into a new Dodge pickup, and drove away, leaving one relieved new girl in his wake.

My parents were still doing the dishes when I went into the kitchen.

“So is he gonna call again?” my father said hopefully.

“He said he would,” I replied.

He grunted and put down the dishtowel he had been half-heartedly using. “Then I’ll leave this to you two.” With that, he strode off to the living room where I heard the rustle of a newspaper.

With a sigh, I picked up the dishtowel and began to wipe the dishes as my mother washed them. I was able by now to figure out which shelves to place them on.

Mom smiled at me. “He really just wants what’s best for you,” she said, noting how distracted I was.

“By setting me up with someone his own age?”

“Nonsense!” she scoffed. It was odd how I was accepting this person who had once been my father as my new mother. “Your daddy is forty-one. Mr. Spencer is a good ten years younger.”

“That still makes him—what?—thirteen years older than me,” I pointed out.

“You don’t want some young pup,” she argued. “What’s a young pup good for except in bed?”

My face flushed. I didn’t want any pup, young or old. Underneath this farm girl exterior beat the heart of a red-blooded man, and to have my new mother think all I was interested in was somebody my age for better sex was almost enough to make me run screaming from the room.

“It isn’t that,” I replied honestly as I nearly dropped a dish.

“Of course it is,” she insisted. “I’m not that old, you know. I still remember what it was like to be a young girl like you.”

You only think you do, I thought to myself. When you think you were a young girl, you were already grinding competitors into the dirt while you became one of the wealthiest developers in America. Deep down, do you remember any of that?

“Why, when I was in high school, I had the boys just flocking around me.”

It was so hard to believe that even if she had existed in some form that long ago, the boys would be flocking around her. She looked like Ma Kent for god’s sake.

“Anyhow, Jess Spencer would make you a fine husband. He could provide for you and make you happy if you let him. I saw the way he looked at you at dinner. He’s definitely interested in you. I wouldn’t be surprised to see him pop the question to you on your first date.”

My god! What a terrible thought!

“But what if I don’t... want him?” I managed to ask. “What if I don’t want to get married?”

“All girls want to get married,” she replied, adding, “At least all normal girls.”

Well, I wasn’t exactly a normal girl.

‘Dad’ had gone to bed early, as was apparently his habit. I suppose that was fairly normal on a farm. After all, where else could the expression ‘up with the chickens’ have come from. This gave me some time to spend with ‘mom,’ just talking about inconsequential things—girl talk, if you will. She told me about her own girlhood, growing up the daughter of a tenant farmer in Oklahoma (that is, one where the farmer didn’t actually own the farm, but rather rented it for a share of the crop). I could detect nothing about her that would indicate that she had any memory of her previous life. Here she was, formerly one of the most powerful real estate barons in the country, reduced to a few hundred acres of Oklahoma farmland, and I would have bet her name wasn't even on the deed.

It was, I supposed, a fitting punishment, although the woman she had become would not have considered it a punishment, I was sure. She was limited to her high school education, had gotten pregnant unexpectedly and subsequently married in her senior year. In fact, she hadn't even graduated. In those days, she had told me, pregnant girls weren't welcome in school. My 'father' had been the only man she had ever known—sexually, that is.

It explained a bit about him, too. As the only son of a farmer, he had hoped to marry well, possibly the daughter of another farmer. Then, two small farms could be merged into one large one. It hadn't happened that way, though, and now he was a bitter man who worked hard but never seemed to really get ahead.

That apparently was where I came in. As his 'daughter,' I was expected to improve the family fortunes by marrying well. Jess Spencer's land bordered on ours, and together, we could have a large farm—run, of course, under the benevolent hand of my father.

I was forced to appreciate the cosmic justice the Judge was capable of dispensing. I had a pretty good idea who he was. In college, I had been forced to read Ovid, so I knew his writings of the gods. The Judge either was a god in the old Roman sense, or he had enough powers from wherever to think of himself as one. I suspected he really was one. Which one? Well, Judge and Jupiter both started with the same two letters. He certainly seemed to have Jovian powers. I wondered if Ovid was an existing town he had co-opted or if he had created it out of whole cloth. Whichever was true, he was probably one of the most powerful beings ever to walk the planet.

And he had a sense of humor, too. That much was clear. After all, he had 'punished' both my father and me in most creative ways. My father had browbeaten every woman he had ever known. I don't know exactly why. Maybe he had a domineering mother and he was just getting even. I hadn't known my grandmother, so I couldn't say for sure. Or maybe he was just a misogynistic son of a bitch. Whatever the correct answer, he was paying now, I realized as I headed off to bed. He would spend—presumably—the rest of his new life taking guff from a man who would have been a poor man's version of his soul brother in his original life. He would be one of the people he hated most—a woman.

And what of me? Was justice done in my case? I had never hated women, so was it justice for me to become one? Perhaps, I thought, as I pulled a cotton nightie out of a drawer after a futile search for something less feminine, being female was somewhat incidental to my case. What was it that the Judge had said to me? He said that my sentence carried with it a chance for happiness and contentment, if I was smart enough to find it.

Happiness? Contentment? How was I supposed to be happy as some eighteen-year-old freckle-faced farm girl with an Oklahoma twang in her voice and all the fashion sense of a rock? Was that what Jess Spencer was all about? Was he supposed to make me happy? Yeah, right.

I stripped off my dress, really taking the time to look at my new body for the first time. Well, I was a freckle-faced farm girl all right, but not a bad-looking one. My face was smooth and soft, in spite of some obvious time working on the farm in the hot Oklahoma sun. The rest of my skin was more pink, and I had practically no hair on my body, except on my head and a tiny thin patch at my crotch. My breasts were full, although not overly large. I checked my bra. I was a C cup, but not a particularly large one. The breasts did look a little larger, though, on my slender frame. Waist and hips were undeniably feminine, and my legs were about as nice as a girl's pair of legs could be.

Now what was I supposed to do with this body to gain that happiness and contentment the Judge spoke of? Did I have to marry Jess and be a dutiful farm wife, milking cows and raising children? Maybe that was the Judge's idea of happiness and contentment, but it didn't sound right to me.

But what other choices were available to me? I wondered as I slipped on the nightie and crawled into bed. College was out. I lacked the money, and I was sure that my new father would see no value in that for me. As for work, that was fine, but with no special skills in a small town, there didn't seem much opportunity there. Perhaps the morning would bring answers instead of questions, I thought, as I slowly drifted off to sleep.

"Come on, you lazy girl!" a deep voice barked in the half-light. "There's no call to be sleepin' in. The chickens gotta be fed."

Girl? Chickens? I groaned, surprised to hear the high pitch of my voice. What was going on? I began to awaken slowly, realizing in tiny fragments where I was, and more importantly, who I was. As I lay on my back only semiconscious, I became aware of the weight of my new breasts, the tickle of my long hair, and most insistently, an urgent need to pee. That was the strangest feeling of all. Rather than manifesting itself in a semi-erection of my now absent penis, the feeling seemed to be coming from inside my body. Of course, I realized, where else would it come from? There was nothing sticking out any more.

With a sigh, I got out of bed, feeling the soft nightie swirl about my legs and trundled off to the bathroom. I had had nearly a day to get used to voiding in this fashion, I thought as I squatted on the toilet. Leaning slightly forward to allow for what little aim I could manage. Still, I couldn't get used to the feeling. Somehow, taking a leak wasn't as satisfying any more. With resignation, I wiped myself and began to prepare for a new day as a girl.

I suddenly realized I didn't have the foggiest notion what to do next. I supposed a shower should be the first order of the day. Girls were supposed to smell nice, and I was smelling a little pungent. With a tired sigh, I turned on the water in the shower and let it turn warm while I stripped out of my nightie. I stepped into the shower, relaxing as the warm water cascaded over my newly softened skin.

Most women I knew preferred the luxury of a bath over the utility of a shower. I might be female now, but I realized in that moment that I was always going to be a shower person. The only problem, I noted was keeping my newly long hair from getting wet and not allowing the water to strike directly on my sensitive nipples.

It felt odd to wash this new body, though. My male body had been hard and angular. This new flesh of mine was soft and gave way when I sponged it off. Also, the curves made it a series of different motions. Reluctantly, I realized this new flesh was much more sensitive than my male flesh. Washing it could almost become a sensual act. Its smooth, delicate feel was akin to lying on silk sheets, smooth and cool to the touch. I found myself closing my eyes and sponging my soft breasts, then reaching for...

A loud bang on the door almost caused me to wet myself. "Girl, are you gonna be in there all day?" My father's growl interrupted my reverie. In shock, I looked down at where my hand had been about to go of its own accord. Embarrassed, I rinsed quickly and got dressed in my farm girl outfit of jeans and plaid shirt. I wasn't sure what else to do to get ready. Thankfully, I had been wearing no makeup when I was changed, so I assumed I needed none now. I again gathered my long hair into a rough ponytail and applied the scrunchie I had used the day before. A look in the mirror told me that I looked about right.

Feeding the chickens was a simple enough chore. There weren't many of them to feed for one thing. This wasn't a chicken farm, so the only birds we had were apparently for our own use, the way suburbanites plant small gardens to satisfy their own needs. I had no idea what the primary crop was. It was probably wheat or corn, but I wasn't sure and didn't want to know. The chicken feed was in a bag on a shelf in the hen house. I took the large tin cup resting at the top of the bag and poured it into the wooden trough in front of the chicken's roost. Then, I threw some more in the small exercise yard in front of the hen house. Several birds rushed over and began pecking at once. The chore done, I walked back to the house.

“Well, where are the eggs?” my mother asked, looking over her shoulder from the frying pan filled with sizzling bacon.

“Eggs?”

She sighed, “Honestly, Donna Mae, you can’t seem to keep your mind on anything these days. You’re not going to make much of a farm wife if you can’t keep your head on straight.”

“Sorry,” I mumbled, backing out of the house and heading back to the hen house.

I took a basket off the shelf and filled it with eggs. At least I had performed that chore before, so I knew what I was supposed to be doing. I hurried them back to my mother and began the task of setting the table and making drinks without being asked.

Breakfast was eaten in relative silence. My new father wolfed down a full plate of bacon and eggs, washed down with cold milk and coffee. From the look of him, he had already been working for some time and was getting ready to work again. I was beginning to realize that life on a farm was not as idyllic as I had once imagined. Like most city boys, I had imagined farming to be more technologically oriented as we neared the twenty-first century. No such luck—at least on the Potter farm. Farming here was hard work. I could almost understand why he seemed to resent me. If I had been a son instead of a daughter, I would have been more helpful to him in running the farm. As it was, I was a weak girl, fit only for cooking and light farm duties, and of course, for being married off to a farmer.

I certainly wished I was his son instead of his daughter. I had no interest in being a girl. Maybe I could see the Judge and ask him to change me again. Being the son of... gee, I suddenly realized I didn’t even know his first name... But being Farmer Potter’s son instead of his daughter would be better for everyone. My ‘father’ would have someone to help him on the farm, and I would have my male identity back again. It wouldn’t be the same as being scion of the God of Real Estate, but it would be better than wearing dresses and having periods—or worse yet—missing periods.

My father looked at his watch. “Eight o’clock,” he pronounced. “Time to go to work.”

“Get the dishes, dear,” my mother told me sweetly.

As I rose to do my next chore, the phone rang. My mother answered, listening for a moment before handing the phone to me. “It sounds like Charlene,” she told me.

Charlene was gushing pure excitement. “She called me!”

“Who called you?” I asked.

“Vera March.” When I said nothing, she explained. “You know, from March’s Department Store. They want to interview me for a sales job.”

“That’s great,” I replied, trying to sound cheery. When we had filled out the applications, I had been ambivalent about the idea of being a sales clerk in a small town department store. Sure, it sounded better than being a farm girl, but it was still a long fall from the life I was accustomed to. Now, though, I found myself more than a little envious. Charlene would be off the farm, building a modest career. Me? I would be stuck on the farm, trying desperately to avoid the clumsy advances of Jess Spencer.

“Listen, have you heard from them?” she asked.

“Not a word,” I admitted, chagrined. I guess freckle-faced farm girls weren’t in high demand, even at small town department stores.

“Well, I’m going in at ten for an interview. I’ll let you know how it goes.”

I found myself actually depressed as I hung up the phone. Here I was, mentally an MBA from the Harvard Business School, and yet I couldn’t get a job clerking in a store. Try as I might to stop them, there were actually a few of my tears mixed into the soapy dishwater that morning.

Then, at eight thirty, my life changed.

The phone rang again. "It's for you again," my mother said, exasperated at becoming my answering service.

It was probably Charlene again, I thought, grabbing the phone. I really didn't want to talk to her again, so I was probably a little gruff when I mumbled, "Yes?"

"Donna Mae?" I recognized the voice. There was only one like it in the world, I was sure. It was Vera March.

"Uh... yes," I replied, chagrined.

"I've been reviewing your application," she said smoothly. "I think you have some potential. I'd like to discuss your goals with you. Is there a time we could meet this morning?"

"Uh..." I stammered, trying to think of a reply. I had no car, and I was pretty sure I wouldn't be given the use of the family truck when there were plenty of chores to be done. I would have to catch a ride with Charlene. What time was her interview? Ten? "Would ten thirty do?"

"That would be fine, dear," she said cheerfully. "I'll see you then."

As she hung up, I realized how important the interview might be to my future.

"Oh god!" I cried out.

My 'mother' put her arm around me. "What's wrong, dear?"

"I have a job interview," I told her, so flustered, I didn't know which way to turn. "I need to call Charlene to get a ride. I need to get changed."

'Mother' frowned. "A job interview?"

"Yes," I confirmed. "Charlene and I applied at March's. Vera March wants to see me at ten thirty."

"I'm not too sure I like that woman," my mother said in measured tones. "Besides, we need you here on the farm."

"But I can't stay here on the farm forever," I told her as I dialled Charlene. There it was again—that ability to act as Donna Mae when I let my subconscious take over. I had dialled her number without having the slightest notion what it was. "Charlene... I got an interview, too! Can you pick me up? Nine thirty? Great!"

"I know you can't stay here forever, dear," mother agreed, "but if you and that nice Mr. Spencer were to get married, we could run the farms together."

The cat was out of the bag. The 'M' word had been used for the first time. Apparently my new parents had it all figured out. I was to marry Jess Spencer whether I wanted to or not. What a nice, simple arrangement! The two farms were right next to each other. We could run them as one. I wondered if 'that nice Mr. Spencer' had any idea that the farms would have to be run according to my father's wishes and not his own. I was to be used like some medieval princess, married off to the neighboring baron for an alliance.

Or like Martin R. Brubaker Junior being forced to marry Lucinda Watson, I thought grimly. Yes, I had been willing to do that. I felt I had no choice. My father had decreed it for the good of the company, and I had agreed to it. Did I love Lucinda Watson? Of course I didn't. She was slightly overweight, had a strident voice, and looked down her nose at everyone who hadn't appeared in the society pages in the last three months. Yet I had been willing to marry her.

Was it any worse to be asked to marry Jess Spencer? Jess was a nice guy, pleasant looking if not handsome. He would make a good husband and a good father. Yet I just wasn't attracted to him any more than I had been attracted to Lucinda Watson. Why should that make such a difference to me now? Oh, sure, I was now a girl, and I had to admit that the thought of sex as a girl wasn't the most pleasant thought I had ever experienced. As Martin, I could have forced myself to go to a loveless bed with Lucinda, have sex with her, and then go on with my life, maybe with a mistress on the side. But as Donna Mae, could I slide beneath the covers with a man I didn't love? Was it that different as a woman?

"I just don't want you to go," my mother said suddenly, breaking my train of thought.

“But I’ve already said I would,” I argued.

She folded her arms. “Then I forbid it.”

“Mother, I’m eighteen,” I said, bluffing. I wasn’t sure if I was eighteen or not. “I’m an adult. I’m going in for that interview.”

She was obviously shocked at my resistance. “Then wait until your father finds out about this,” she called to me as I hurried to my room.

I suddenly realized there was sometimes truth to the old woman’s lament of “I haven’t got a thing to wear.” There was nothing in my somewhat Spartan closet which would look right for the interview with Vera March. I finally decided upon a drab brown suit and plain white blouse, as well as a pair of brown flats. I realized it wasn’t a very stylish outfit, but the Potters weren’t a very stylish family. Besides, even if I had found nylons and heels, I wasn’t sure I could handle them. I would just have to let my charming personality do the work for me. I wished I could ditch the Oklahoma twang in my voice, but realized everyone else had it, too, so it wasn’t out of place.

There were no goodbyes from my mother as I hurried out to join Charlene. Mother sat in the living room, pretending to be engrossed in the morning paper as I hurried out the door.

Charlene put me to shame. She wore a linen suit, peach colored, with a silky white blouse. She had stylish gold jewelry and attractive makeup. Her two-inch heels and nylons gave her legs a very sophisticated look. It was all enough to make me cringe. I looked like something that had just wandered in out of the depths of the Ozarks. Charlene noticed my alarm. “Oh, don’t worry, Donna Mae. You look just fine.”

Sure I did. I looked like a man pretending to be a woman. I had no makeup, no heels, no nylons, and a suit the color of cow shit. I had about as much chance of impressing Vera March as I did of winning a Miss America pageant.

We got to March’s with a few minutes to spare. Charlene led the way confidently while I lagged behind, looking over the store to see if there was any role I could take on there. I saw a rather dumpy woman—not one of the transparent people—with a mop cleaning up a mess made by a spilled coffee. Maybe I could do that, I thought. Maybe I was qualified to be a custodian.

The next sensation I felt was running into an immovable object. Tottering and nearly falling, I felt a strong arm pull me back to my feet. I was suddenly looking into the most gorgeous pair of blue eyes I had ever seen. Then, shocked, I realized they were the eyes of a young man.

“Are you all right?” he asked releasing me.

Dumbly, I nodded. I had been a man only a day before, yet I found myself practically awestruck gazing into the eyes of this man. He was not terribly tall—only about six feet, although that towered over my new five-five height. He had brown hair and the aforementioned blue eyes, and strong, handsome features.

“Okay,” he said softly, turning back to the counter of sport shirts he had been looking at when I had bumped into him.

That was it. There had been nothing about me to cause him to give me a second look. I was just some clumsy farm girl who had run into him. I was on my own again.

“Hurry up, Donna Mae,” Charlene called to me. As if in a trance, I followed her to the office.

I waited nervously outside Vera March’s office as Charlene went in for her interview. Here was my best chance to get away from the farm and I had blown it. I almost envied my ‘mother.’ She didn’t realize how far she had fallen—from real estate baron to farm wife. I knew, though. Oh, did I know.

At last, the door opened. Charlene and Vera March were both smiling happily.

“Then you’ll start at nine o’clock tomorrow at the cosmetics counter,” Vera was saying. “I think you’ll do a marvellous job for us. I’m so happy to have you on board.”

I was happy for Charlene, but in the center of my being, I was also hopelessly jealous. She had done it! She was going to move into town and be somebody, even if it was as a clerk at the cosmetics counter. I wouldn't even be able to do that.

"Well, it looks as if you're next," she said to me. Today, she wore a double-breasted silk suit in a tasteful plum color with dark hose and matching shoes. Of course, she could have been wearing a gunny sack and would have still looked incredible. I felt so terribly inadequate that it was all I could do to keep from running for the exit.

When I was seated in her office, she looked over the application I had filled out the day before. Then, she asked me a most unexpected question. "Well, are you settling into being Donna Mae? I'm sure it's quite a change for you."

I nearly fell out of the chair. "You... you know who I was?"

"Oh, yes," she laughed.

"Are you... one of them?" I asked.

"One of what?" she asked patiently.

"A... god?"

Just for a moment, she lost her composure. "You know who we are?"

"I think I do," I answered carefully. "I read a lot of Ovid in college. Since he was Roman, I'm assuming this has something to do with Roman gods."

"That's something of a leap of logic," she commented with a smile.

I shrugged. "Maybe. But it makes sense. To do what the Judge did to me and my father would take magical powers. If you had asked me a couple of days ago if magic existed, I would have said no, but now, it's obvious it does. I didn't become a girl by any non-magical power."

She looked at me carefully. "Perhaps the Judge was right about you. There's more to you than I would have first imagined. Let's see how much there really is to you. Who is the Judge?"

“Jupiter,” I said quickly. I wasn’t entirely sure of my answer, but it seemed to make sense.

“And who am I?”

If Judge and Jupiter had the same first two letters, what would match Vera or March? Mars? Mars was male—it couldn’t be that. V... e...

“Venus!” I said confidently.

She shook her head. “I don’t think anyone else has ever put that together as quickly as you. The disorientation of a new identity keeps most people off balance for some time.” She looked at me quietly for moment. “Do you know what I had planned to do with you this morning?”

“No,” I said honestly.

“I had planned to interview you and turn you down,” she explained.

“When I first heard about you and your father, I decided it would be a fitting life for you two to be stuck out there as simple farm wives for the rest of your lives. Now, I’m not so sure. There is more to you than I would have imagined. You might make an interesting project after all.”

“Project?”

“There is more to Ovid than you could ever imagine,” she told me. “It is populated by gods such as the Judge and me, people like you who remember who they were, and people like your father who don’t remember. Of course, most of the population we call ‘shades.’ They are not entirely real, but are needed for our little town to work. People like you are our true projects. More, I cannot say, but I am offering you a job.”

My heart skipped. “Thank you!”

“Don’t thank me yet,” she said. “I see very difficult times ahead for you. First, I don’t hire uncultured farm girls for my lingerie department.”

Lingerie?

“You will have to learn to fit in as a woman,” she told me. “You start tomorrow at nine.”

“What should I wear?” I asked, realizing I should probably be asking salary questions, but somehow, this seemed more important.

“It doesn’t really matter,” she said. “We’ll be changing your outfit here. I think you’re in for an interesting day tomorrow, Donna.”

I couldn’t believe my good fortune as I left Vera’s office.

Charlene read the look on my face. “You, too?” she practically yelled. With only a grin and a nod, I answered her question. She hugged me so tightly I thought my new breasts would be squashed flat against hers. “That’s terrific!”

We talked together on the drive back like two schoolgirls. Then, I realized with a little private smile that that was exactly what we were. I wondered who Charlene had been before she was transformed. It was difficult to imagine that she had ever been anyone other than this cheery redhead. Had she been male like me? It was certainly possible, but she seemed to have no memories of anything but her life in Ovid. I was actually happy with that. It forced me to conform to my new life, and the sooner I conformed, the more I would be able to control who I had become.

“See you at graduation tonight!” Charlene called out to me as she spun out of our driveway, spraying gravel. I had forgotten all about graduation. It was a little hard for me to see it as a significant event in my life when I had never even attended the school. I wasn’t even sure what time the ceremony would be.

My new mother knew, though. “It’s about time you got home,” she grumped. It was only eleven thirty. I didn’t know what she was so upset about. “Help me with these mashed potatoes and I’ll get the rest. It’s going to be a busy afternoon if we’re going to get you in for graduation at five.”

“Mom,” I said happily as I did my best to mash the potatoes, “I got the job.”

She shook her head. “Your father isn’t going to like that.”

“But I’m an adult... now,” I argued. “I need to make my own way.” Translate that as I need to get off this hellish farm as quickly as my newly-shaved legs can carry me.

“We’ve gone all over that,” she said. “I just hope you’re ready to take the consequences.”

Consequences? What consequences?

Before I could ask, my new father opened the door. “I don’t have much time to eat,” he announced. “There’s a problem down in the south field. Looks like it could be blight.”

That didn’t sound good, and it had put him in a foul mood. I resolved to not mention the new job to him just yet. I hoped my mother had the good sense to remain silent as well. He sat down without ceremony and gulped down a glass of iced tea while wiping the sweat off his forehead with the back of his hand. Silently, my mother placed a pair of pork chops and a mountain of mashed potatoes in front of him. We all ate in silence.

“What time’s graduation?” he finally asked, wolfing down the last of his food.

“We need to get Donna Mae in for rehearsal at five,” mother told him. “You and me should be there at six thirty.”

He shook his head. “Can’t make it by then. Too much to do. You take her.”

Although I hadn’t actually attended the high school in Ovid, I found myself flushing in anger. Here was a man who was supposed to be my own father, and yet he couldn’t be bothered to attend my graduation. Of course, when I thought about it, my real father hadn’t attended mine. He had been closing a multi-million dollar land deal in New Zealand at the time. I suspected, though, that my new father chose not to go because it simply wasn’t an important event. Education obviously wasn’t very important to him, and the education of a girl ranked particularly low on his scale.

Mother actually frowned. “But it’s her graduation.”

Good for you, mom! You couldn't be bothered when you were my dad, but now that you had a sudden helping of maternal instinct, you were right there to help your little... girl.

My father frowned back. "Damn it, woman, I told you I was too busy. Now don't make me tell you again!"

He made no motion to physically strike her, but she flinched nonetheless. It was like a trip back in time when my real father had similarly treated my real mother to verbal abuse. The Judge's justice could be quite poetic, I was beginning to realize.

"All right," she sighed, giving way to his unquestioned authority.

"Donna Mae, you go start the wash. I'll clean up down here."

"Yes, ma'am," I replied, anxious to be out of the room as quickly as possible.

He wasn't a violent man, I realized as I gathered the washing as best I could. Rather, he was a cruel man. Yet I was certain if someone had confronted him with that fact, he would have denied it. He would contend that he was just being sensible. I could only imagine what his 'sensible' reaction to my new job would be. He wouldn't strike me—I was pretty sure of that. But he would forbid me to work at March's—I was equally sure of that. I had to keep my new job a secret until I had actually begun work. Otherwise, he would forbid me, and my mother would not be able to help. I only hoped she didn't say anything to him.

She didn't. She told me so as we made our way into town for graduation. "No telling what the man would have done if I'd told him," she muttered to me as we drove past the first buildings of Ovid. "He's riled enough at you as it is."

"At me?" I asked innocently, trying not to feel like a fool in my gold and black graduation gown.

She nodded, looking solemn in her dark blue suit which I suspected was normally reserved for church. I didn't know much about women's fashions, but it looked somewhat unstylish. "I want you to go into that, that Mrs. March tomorrow and tell her you don't want the job. Better yet, you can call her.”

“I’m not going to do that,” I replied stubbornly. If I was to make my own way, I had to have that job—no matter what.

“Then it’ll be on your head,” she said.

She dropped me off in front of the high school stadium. I gathered my robe and mortarboard, thankful as I got out of the truck that I had opted for a comfortable cotton blouse, shorts, and sandals to wear under the robe. It was going to be a warm evening. The sight that awaited me was the strangest I had seen yet in Ovid. It was strange for its normalcy, for students—some real but most transparent—gathered in little groups laughing and talking as if nothing was wrong. I counted—what?—twenty or so ‘real’ people, including Charlene and myself. No one seemed to notice the strangeness of the scene, or if they did, they kept it to themselves.

“Well, here we are!” Charlene said happily as she gave me a hug.

“Come on, let’s talk to Alice.”

Alice was a young girl, dark skin and black hair hinting of Indian heritage, who was talking to a young boy of similar blood near the edge of the crowd. Both she and the boy were—what was the expression Vera had used?—shades. Yet as we approached, I realized they appeared perfectly normal in their actions. Alice happily hugged Charlene, then me, and I was surprised to realize that shades were completely solid.

“This is so cool!” Alice laughed. “Charlene told me you guys would be working at March’s. Then we’ll still get to see each other while Charlie and I are at Capta.”

I had no idea what Capta was, but I wasn’t about to ask. The four of us walked in to the rehearsal together.

“Say, Donna Mae,” the boy, Charlie asked as we waited to be arranged for the ceremony. “Are you going with anyone right now?”

Only Mr. Spencer, I thought to myself grimly. I hesitantly answered, “No... not right now.”

“Well, I was talking to Danny Grady yesterday. He said you were pretty cute for a farm girl.”

Charlene and Alice snickered.

“So he doesn’t think Alice and I are cute—for farm girls?” Charlene asked sweetly.

“Nope,” he responded. “I almost decked him for you. What an ass!”

Pretty cute for a farm girl, eh? I thought as we were sorted into our proper chairs. I had gone to an expensive private high school. There weren’t any farm kids there. If they had been, they would have had very rich parents, just like the rest of my fellow students. I had never realized before that in small towns, there were farm kids and town kids. They were reasonably civil to each other, but they moved in different circles. I had been turned into a farm kid. That apparently made me some sort of yokel in the eyes of many of the townies. Well, so be it.

It did make one thing harder, though. I had been thinking that I would move to town as quickly as I could, assuming that I had a high school ‘friend’ I could room with. If my close ‘friends’ were all farm kids, my options for moving to town might be more limited.

The ceremony went off without any problems. I tried to act just like all the other kids as I marched up to receive my diploma from a line of people I assumed were school dignitaries and administrators. They each smiled, called me by name, and warmly shook my hand as they congratulated me. I realized they all knew me and meant their congratulations. I simply mumbled my thanks and moved on back to my seat.

“Time to party now,” Charlene announced as the ceremony ended. Alice, Charlie, and several others agreed. “Come on, Donna Mae.”

“Thanks, but I can’t,” I replied, seeing my mother waiting patiently for me.

Charlene groaned, “Oh, come on! We only graduate once. We’re all going down to the lake for a party.”

“We’ve got to go to work tomorrow,” I explained. “I need you to pick me up. We have to be there by nine.”

“No problem,” she laughed, giving me a hug. “I’ll pick you up. Now let’s party.”

I hugged her back. “I can’t. I’m sorry.”

She smiled. “Party pooper.”

I smiled back. “See you tomorrow.”

When we got home, my father was already in bed, for which I was thankful. That meant I didn’t have to tell him about my new job, and mother couldn’t either.

In bed at last, I had a few quiet moments to reflect on my first full day as a girl. I thought it had gone fairly well. I had a job, had graduated from high school, and made a couple of new friends. It had been a real eye-opener to find that there was a rift between town kids and farm kids. All evening, I had seen evidence that the girls from town considered themselves to be much more sophisticated than their country cousins. I smiled, thinking what girls their age I knew back in New York would think of their ‘sophistication.’ For that matter, I wondered what they would think if they knew that through my father, I had met a number of their TV and movie idols. What would they think of their ‘farm girl’ if they knew I had met Matt Dillon, for example?

Come to think of it, I still had Matt’s private phone number twirling around in my head someplace. He and I had met at a party in LA that had ended up as a private party back at his place with a few friends—mostly female. Maybe I’d give him a call, I thought smiling at what that would be like. I mean, it would be interesting to meet him this way, wouldn’t it? What would we do? I could imagine having a drink with him now, his arm slipping around m... wait a minute!

I shot bolt upright in bed. With a shock, I could feel a strange tingling in places I had been trying to ignore. I hadn’t planned on thinking of Matt that way. I had just been thinking about what every girl in Ovid would say if they knew that I knew him. Why had I suddenly started thinking of him... that way? There was more at work with my transformation than I had realized before. Maybe my mind wasn't so unaffected after all. I would have to be careful, I realized, as I drifted off to sleep.

I awoke the next morning with no prodding. My father was still in the shower, and I could already smell bacon frying in the kitchen. I hurried into the kitchen in a white cotton robe. I was afraid my mother had actually said something about the job to my father. Mother was setting the table when I entered the kitchen.

"Have you told him?" I asked, nervous with anticipation.

She shook her head. "No. He woke up in a bad mood. I told him you were going to be helping Charlene today, so he doesn't know."

I breathed a sigh of relief. If his schedule held true, he would be out in the field most of the day. He wouldn't notice when I left or when I returned. It wasn't going to be a satisfactory long term solution, but once I had actually started the job and learned my way around Ovid, it would be harder for him to stop me.

Thankfully, I had no fear of physical abuse. He wasn't a hitter for all his other faults. He was just a man with no respect for the worth of women. He probably never thought to hit a woman—not because he felt it was wrong—because women weren't worth the trouble. Of course, that didn't mean he would never hit a woman. It just meant he hadn't yet.

I dressed quickly if not well. Vera had said it didn't matter what I wore since she would take care of that when I got to work. I assumed there was some sort of uniform I was to wear, although I had noticed no uniforms in the store before. Taking her at her word, I dressed in a pair of tan slacks and a white polo shirt and flat sandals. With my hair still tied in the ever-present ponytail, I didn't think I looked too bad. I certainly didn't look like a boy, for my curves were obviously feminine, but I looked boyish. I smiled at myself. It was the look I had hoped for. I ate quickly and rushed out to meet Charlene as soon as she pulled up.

Charlene looked as if she were dressed for a party. Her hair was stylishly curled and her makeup gave her a somewhat sophisticated appearance. She wore a Kelly green dress that made her red hair look like living flames as it curled over her shoulders. Matching two-inch heels and tan hose displayed long, lovely legs, and gold earrings and jewelry gave an almost regal air to her appearance. She looked like an Irish princess. If I had still been male, I would have been instantly in love.

“Wow!” I said, almost without meaning to as I got in the car. “Look at you.”

She smiled. “I’m glad you like it. I’m starting out in dresses today. You’re awfully casual, though. Where has she got you starting?”

“Lingerie,” I replied with an involuntary blush.

She looked at me quizzically as we pulled away from the house.

“Lingerie? Dressed like that?”

“What’s wrong with this?” I asked, embarrassed in spite of myself.

“Well,” she explained, “it might be a suitable look for sportswear or something, but it’s a little casual for lingerie.”

“Vera said it didn’t matter,” I told her. “She said something about my changing when I got there.”

“Oh.”

We didn’t speak of it again while driving in, but I did start to feel a little uncomfortable. Here was Charlene, all dressed up, and here I was, still the country bumpkin. Had I misunderstood Vera’s instructions to me? Maybe she would take one look at me and decide she had made a mistake in hiring me. My stomach churned. If that happened, I would be back to square one.

March’s opened at nine thirty during the week and it was—what?—Wednesday. It was odd, but without my Daytimer, I had lost all sense of time. Had it only been two days since I had been transformed? It seemed as if it were a lifetime ago. We reported in at Vera’s office at five until nine.

Vera was dressed in a pastel green suit with a soft silk blouse. She had a cheerful smile on her face as she inspected Charlene. “Just right,” she said. “Go ahead and report to Cosmetics on the second floor. Ms. Jensen will get you started.”

As Charlene walked out of the office with a happy smile, Vera’s attention was turned to me. She didn’t exactly frown, but there was a look of concern bordering on pity when she inspected me.

“Well, Donna Mae, I think we’ll have our work cut out for us, don’t you?”

I didn’t answer, unsure of what to say.

She motioned to a chair. “Sit down for a moment.”

Silently, I sat.

She folded her hands and leaned forward with catlike grace. “Donna, if we are going to succeed in making a silk purse out of a sow’s ear...”

Is that what I was? A sow’s ear?

“...then we will have to work hard at it. Tell me, what do you think about being a woman?”

A woman? Is that what I was? Believe it or not, I hadn’t really thought of myself as one. I mean, I knew I was female. That was obvious every time I had to pee, or every time I felt the sway of my new breasts or heard the soft soprano voice I now owned. But what did it mean to be a woman?

“I’m not sure,” I replied honestly, realizing it for the first time.

“Then let me explain it to you,” she said kindly. “Being a woman is more difficult than being a man. Men can do whatever they want without fear of becoming an object. Do you understand that?”

“I... No, I guess I don’t.”

“When you were a man, you could be dressed in a thousand-dollar suit and it might define what sort of a man you were—wealthy, professional, cultured—but it wouldn’t define you as an object. You were still a man. You were important because you were a man, whether you wore the thousand-dollar suit or the work shirt and jeans your new father wears. But when you are a woman, you must constantly assert that importance. It's not automatically granted to you. In fact, how you dress and conduct yourself may detract from your importance. Dress correctly or incorrectly and a man is still a man. When a woman dresses, she may become a twat or a cunt if she's not careful. Do you see what I mean?"

"But a man can be a dick," I argued.

She nodded. "Yes, but it doesn't mean the same thing. When you call a man a dick, it's as if you were calling him a moron. You aren't reducing him to an object—a sexual one in particular. But when a woman is reduced to a cunt, she becomes an object."

"Then why was this done to me?" I asked. "Why was I changed into a woman?"

"You would have to ask the Judge for a specific answer," she told me, "and I doubt if he would give it to you. I can speculate, though. My guess is that he saw in you qualities which would be strengthened if you were to be given the opportunity—and that is what it is—to be a woman."

"What qualities? I'm not attracted to men—or at least I wasn't before. I've never been anxious to dress in women's clothing. I was happy being who I was."

"Were you?"

"Of course," I replied, although I had to admit, without much conviction. Had I been happy being Martin Brubaker Junior? Sure, I was wealthy, or at least, my father was, but I had no authority over anything, including my own life.

"You see it, don't you, Donna?" she said softly. "Your life was empty. You had no true identity. You were forced to go through your life being what your father expected you to be—him. Like him, you would have followed your father down a path that would lead to a career whose only satisfaction was to participate in the destruction of others. That's what your father was all about, wasn't he?"

It was, of course. He had followed his own father into the real estate business. I didn't remember much about my grandfather—he had died when I was ten. But I never remembered him hugging me or smiling at me. I remember him being formal, gruff, and distant, like my own father. He was like the robber barons, playing the game of real estate to win, and he had taught my father well.

"It was too late for your father," she went on. "Too many years of bitterness and a loveless marriage left him without enough potential to be offered another chance. You would have been just like him before you knew it."

"I would never have been like him!" I protested, surprised at my own vehemence.

She shook her head sadly. "Yes, you would. Already, your life was more empty than that of our own shades. They at least have in many cases the appearance of a happy life, but they are empty. They live lives that are dictated for them, as did you. Now, though, all of that must change."

Her voice was becoming calm and soothing. I felt myself almost drifting into a quiet reverie. Thoughts of my former life seemed to drift away with a mental tide, replaced by a yearning I couldn't begin to understand. Oh, I still remembered my former life. It was just it seemed so insignificant. What was the old quote in the Bible about gaining the world while losing your immortal soul? For me, just the opposite seemed to be happening.

While I was still in this reverie, listening not hearing the words that Vera spoke to me, but still absorbing their meaning, I suddenly rose to my feet. Vera smiled at me and led me into another world.

"Well, what do you think?"

It had taken nearly three hours, but a new person stood in Vera's office, gazing unbelievably into a full-length mirror. I wasn't sure what to think. The person who looked back at me from the mirror was almost more of a stranger than the person who looked back at me right after my transformation.

First, Vera had taken me to the beauty shop in the store. There, as I relaxed in what had to be a magical trance, my mousy brown hair was transformed. First, it was washed, then cut, curled and set in a style that was full and loose, but kept its shape whenever I turned my head. In the mirror, I saw that the rinse they had used had given it an almost reddish highlight.

Next, Vera had me put on a bra and panties which were silky to the feel and trimmed in scalloped lace. I was surprised at how good they felt against my skin, unlike the cotton bra and panties I had used before. She showed me how to put on panty hose, having selected a very sheer pair in a smoky shade. Next came a conservative but stylish gray dress with trim in a deeper shade of gray. It was nothing like the dress I had worn to dinner my first night as a girl. It seemed custom tailored to my new shape, with the skirt coming well above the knee and the tailored top giving just a glimpse of my new cleavage without being unduly provocative. As I was admiring myself in the mirror, Vera held up a two inch pair of heels in black leather.

I shook my head. "Oh, no. I can't wear heels. I don't know how to walk in them."

She smiled. "Surely you must know you can. There's nothing any other girl can do that you can't." Reluctantly, I took the shoes from her and slipped them on. Then, I took my first steps, wobbling unsteadily.

"Oh, Donna," Vera sighed. "You're trying too hard. Just relax. Relax and walk to me."

Her voice was once more mildly hypnotic, and I found that I could suddenly walk in the heels as if I had worn them all my life. I felt the odd shift and sway of my rear as I walked, realizing for the first time in this form how provocative my walk must look. I turned back to the mirror and watched myself as I glided with ease and grace across the office floor. I turned naturally and smiled at Vera.

She smiled back. "Now, for the finishing touches."

The first finishing touch was jewelry. Before I knew it, my ears had been pierced and I wore small delicate gold hoops on my ears. A small gold necklace and matching bracelets for my right wrist were next, followed by a small feminine watch, also in gold.

I suddenly had a terrible thought as I admired the watch. "Oh, Vera, all of this is so expensive. I don't have any money."

"Most of it, we'll take over time from your paycheck. You won't miss it," she assured me. "As to the watch, though, consider that my gift to you."

I smiled.

Last was a trip to the cosmetics counter. In some ways, my introduction to the world of cosmetics was the oddest part of my transformation. I had to learn about foundations (which I had previously thought of only as what is at the bottom of a building). Then there were blushes, eye shadow, mascara, eyebrow pencils, nail polish, and eyeliners. Had I left anything out? Oh, of course—lipstick. How did women ever get used to the odd, greasy feeling on their lips, impregnated with a perfume that changed both my sense of smell and taste?

Back in Vera's office again in front of the mirror, I now knew, though, how Cinderella must have felt when her fairy godmother was finished with her. I don't know that I was ready to try out for the Miss Oklahoma contest, but I had been transformed into a very, very attractive woman. Slowly, I approached the mirror, seeing for myself the gentle sway of my hips and the graceful sweep of my legs. Looking down at my fingers, I saw frosted pink color on newly shaped but not particularly long nails. Tossing my head, I felt the gentle wave of my styled hair, moving with the grace of wheat in the soft summer breeze.

Turning to Vera, I said, "You've enhanced me with your magic, haven't you?"

"No, dear," she laughed merrily. "What you see is all you. I'll admit, I gave your movements a little boost at first, like training wheels on a bike, but that wore off an hour ago. You're now the Donna Potter who will represent March's."

"Not Donna Mae Potter?" I asked.

In response, she pinned a gold name tag with the March's logo on it. Beneath it was the simple word 'Donna.'

"I think Donna Mae sounds a bit farmish, don't you?" she said.

I smiled and nodded.

I felt like an actor—or rather actress—ready to deliver her first lines before an audience as I walked into the lingerie department with Vera. A sign on the wall said 'Intimate Apparel' while displays of women posing in bras and nightgowns made the place look vaguely like the pages of a Victoria's Secret catalogue. As a man, I had never been able to really look at such a department. If I had, I would have risked being accused of voyeurism or cross-dressing. Now though, this was my temple, and I was one of the Vestal Virgins responsible for its success. An appropriate analogy, I thought, considering my employer.

There was no manager for the department per se. Instead, I reported to Nora Garcia, a very nice woman, about forty, with a pleasant smile and an honest desire to help young sales associates like me. She was also a shade—the first one I was to have an opportunity to get to know well. Within fifteen minutes, I was thinking of her as a real person. I wondered where the shades came from. Except for the little transparency problem, she seemed as real as me. Once she taught me the fundamentals, she left the department for Accessories, which was her main responsibility.

The noon hour was a busy time in the store, so most of us had lunch hours after one. I found myself getting a little hollow as noon approached. It was probably just as well, I told myself. Farm food could get to be habit forming, and it seemed as if it was always heavy and filled with calories. I resolved to start eating salad for lunch.

Customer traffic started to get heavy around eleven, as people took early lunch hours. It was a difficult time for me, for I was expected to recognize some of the customers. After all, Ovid was a small town. Also, I was expected to know a little about the products I sold, partially from experience. Of course, since I had only been wearing bras and panties for a couple of days, I was hardly an expert. Still, I managed, and soon was talking about cup fit and giggling with the customers as we speculated on what their husbands would think of them in the sexy teddies on one of the racks.

Just a little after noon, two girls about my age came into the department. They both called out to me by name, but of course, I had no idea who they were. One was a very well endowed blonde who the other one called Myra. In my previous life, I would have probably left a trail of saliva down on the floor as I followed her around. She was very well endowed, which her pink knit blouse did nothing to hide, and her legs, covered only by the shortest of white skirts, were nothing short of perfect. She had on open toed sandals with a small heel and wore no stockings. To be honest, she didn't need them. I was about to write her off as a bimbo until she began to speak.

"Look at this, Sam," she called to the other girl, holding a particularly sexy nightie up to herself. She was teasing her friend. "Do you think it's me?" she said in an obvious parody of the bimbo I had assumed her to be.

Her friend, a very attractive girl in her own right, laughed tossing her head back as auburn hair bobbed in amusement. "Oh, of course," she said, holding up a hot number over her own body, "and how about this for me?"

Both girls laughed, and I found myself smiling.

Then, Sam looked at me, as if really seeing me for the first time. "Myra, could I have a minute with Donna?"

"Sure," Myra agreed. "I'll be over looking at swim suits."

When she was gone, Sam turned to face me. She was dressed in a peach T-top and denim cutoffs, and she made them look good. She grinned. "You remember who you were, don't you?"

My mouth fell open. I hadn't suspected. "Are you a go-g—" I couldn't seem to get the word out.

"Like the Judge?" she said in a low voice. "No, I'm just like you."

"Then how did you know I was... someone else?" I asked carefully, not wanting to choke on the words again.

"All newcomers seem to have a look about them," she explained.

"When you've been here as long as I have, you start to recognize that look. Now, don't get all flustered. Most people would never notice. Even some of the ones who do notice wouldn't guess that you used to be male."

My face must have turned fire engine red from the feeling of heat in my cheeks. I felt like I was in drag.

Sam put a hand on my arm. "Don't get embarrassed. I used to be a guy, too. In fact, I was even a college football player. Can't you see me out on the field now?" she laughed.

I actually felt relieved by then. Although Vera had told me there were others like me who remembered who they had been, this was my first experience talking with one. "No more than I can see myself in a business suit," I replied with a little laugh of my own. "I assume your friend doesn't know?"

"Myra? Oh, she knows. I'll let her tell you her story some other time. Some people are sort of private about who they used to be, but Myra will tell you. It's just that the rules don't allow more than two of us to discuss this together."

"Rules?"

"Oh, you'll learn all about the rules," Sam told me. She got a slip of paper from the counter and wrote something down. When she handed it to me, I saw it was her full name—Samantha Wallace—and her phone number. "Give me a call some time and we'll discuss all this. Sometimes it helps to have someone explain the ropes to you. I'd do it now, but Myra and I are both working over at Rusty's Burger Barn this afternoon. You know, summer jobs. Bye."

“Wait!” I called. She turned. “Why is all this happening?”

She gave me a wistful smile. “We’ve all been asking ourselves that question. None of us knows. And the... ones who know aren’t telling.”

I was still pondering that as I was leaving the store for lunch. Why would the Roman gods go to all the trouble of creating a small town in Oklahoma? I suppose we all flattered ourselves that there was some cosmic purpose to it. In fact, maybe we were just the god’s version of an ant farm. They’d watch us closely every day as we built our little society, and we’d chug happily along, not knowing that it was all just a game.

“Oof!”

I practically had the wind knocked out of me. I was so preoccupied that I ran into someone, nearly knocking myself down in the process. Damned heels! A strong arm swept around me, pulling me upright.

“Are you okay?”

Oh lord, there they were again—those incredible blue eyes. What were the odds against running into the same guy two days in a row. I felt like such a klutz. Then, I realized he didn’t seem to recognize me. Of course, I looked a lot different than I had the day before. Yesterday I was just little ole Fanny Farm Girl. Today, I was a sophisticated sales associate at Ovid’s largest (and only) department store.

“I’m... I’m fine,” I managed. “I’m sorry, I wasn’t looking where I was going.”

“The fault’s at least half mine,” he said gallantly. “I’m afraid I wasn’t paying attention either. You look like you’re in a hurry.”

“Oh,” I replied stupidly. Why was I so tongue-tied around this guy? “I was... I was just going to lunch.”

He smiled. “Well, I haven’t eaten either. Why don’t you let me buy you lunch to make up for this?”

I blushed. “Oh, you don’t need to do that. I mean...”

“But I want to,” he interrupted as he broke into a disarming smile.

“Please say yes.”

“Well... yes.”

Why had I done that? What was there about this guy? Maybe I just wanted a chance to prove to him over lunch that I wasn't a blithering idiot.

He grinned. “Great. Let's walk over to the Greenhouse.”

I wouldn't have agreed to walk if I had known that the Greenhouse was two blocks away. No, it isn't that I was in bad shape in my new body, but I found out quickly why so many women take athletic shoes with them to walk around at noon. Even on Ovid's smooth sidewalks, my feet were aching within a block. My toes seemed to be squished into the front part of the shoe while my heels hurt with every step. How did women walk in these things? Maybe it was how I was doing it. Although I handled the shoes fairly well, I still wasn't that experienced walking in them.

“I'm Scott Gorman, by the way,” he told me as we walked.

Gorman was a familiar name, I thought, as I told him, “I'm Donna M... Donna Potter.”

“Are you a student at Capra?”

There was that name again. And speaking of names, why was the name Gorman so familiar?

“No,” I replied. “I just graduated from high school.”

“You're kidding!” he remarked.

I smiled at him as we walked. “Why? I don't look old enough to have graduated?”

He laughed. “No, just the opposite. I'm twenty. I thought you were my age. You look a lot more... sophisticated than a recent high school graduate. But you look so familiar. Have we met before?”

Happily, I realized that he didn't realize I was the same little hayseed he had run into the day before. “I don't think so.” I wouldn't have exactly called the previous day's encounter 'meeting.'

The Greenhouse was a nice little café. It would have hardly turned eyes in New York, but for Ovid, it was nice. There were lots of hanging plants and cozy little booths. Most of the lunch crowd had already left or was getting ready to leave. I even noticed the blonde from the courtroom, gathering up her purse and walking out. The woman lawyer was with her. They both gave me pleasant smiles as they walked past. Then, I heard one of them giggle. What was so funny? I wondered.

Scott showed me to a booth, and we each ordered an iced tea while looking at the menus. True to the promise I had made to myself, I ordered a small salad. After all of the meat and potatoes on the farm, I found myself really looking forward to as simple a fare as a salad.

Scott ordered the club. With the waitress gone, he leaned over and said to me, "You know, I'm really glad we bumped into each other. My social life was getting a little dull."

"Oh really?" I said, playing along. In spite of myself, I found I liked Scott. I'm not sure why. I've never really understood what attracts one person to another. Oh yes, I've heard of pheromones, but I've always been a bit of a romantic at heart. I've always thought attraction goes right down to the soul, whatever it is. Sure, I had only been a girl for a couple of days, but I was realistic enough to realize that if I was going to be a girl, I would develop a normal interest in guys. In fact, I had already realized from my little reveries that my attraction to men was growing steadily. I didn't plan to over-stimulate it, but I was realistic enough to know it as probably inevitable.

"Yes, really. You don't seem to believe me."

I grinned. "Well, a good-looking guy like you has to be pretty popular."

"Too much time studying," he explained. "Here, I've dropped right into the middle of finals."

"Dropped into?"

He lost his composure for a moment, coughing, "I mean, I wasn't exactly ready for them this semester.”

“So what’s your major?” I asked.

“Business,” he replied, taking a sip of tea.

I envied him. Whoever he had been before, for he was real, here he had the opportunity to attend college, for that’s what Capra had to be. And he was a business major as I had been. He had a life that I could have enjoyed. Why hadn’t the Judge made me into someone like Scott instead of a farm girl with limited options? What had I done to piss him off?

“I’ve always been interested in business,” I told him truthfully.

“Then maybe you should go to college and major in it,” he suggested.

“Sorry, no money,” I sighed. “I’m afraid I’ll just be like that line in Evita about being behind the jewelry counter—not in front.”

“I remember that line,” he laughed. “Was it in the movie, too?”

“I never saw the movie,” I told him. “I saw it in Lon... I saw it on stage.”

He looked at me, his eyes narrowing. “You were going to say in London, weren’t you?”

My answer was delayed as our waitress delivered our lunches. When she was gone, I said, “Okay, you got me. I saw it in London in a previous life.”

“Well, that’s great,” he said. “I remember my old life, too. You’re only the second person I’ve met who remembers.”

“Apparently there aren’t a lot of us,” I commented.

He shook his head. “Not a lot.”

We just stared at each other for a few moments. Finally, I got up the courage to ask, “Were you... male before?”

“It’s not polite to ask,” he admonished me with a smile.

He was right, I thought, turning red. Why did I care anyway? He was male now. Besides, I would be obliged to respond in kind. Did I really want him to know I had been a man? No, I answered myself honestly, I didn't. What I wasn't sure of was exactly why I didn't want him to know.

"Sorry," I said.

"Don't worry about it. I understand it's a common question," he told me. "I've just decided the less said about my previous life, the better. I've been given the chance to correct some old mistakes, so as far as I'm concerned, my previous life is a closed book."

"Fair enough," I agreed with a smile. "Mine, too."

Sitting there, looking at Scott, I meant it, too. I was never going to be Martin Brubaker, Jr. again, so there was no sense in discussing it. I needed to concentrate on what I was going to do as Donna Potter. And right now, for some reason I couldn't quite put my finger on, all I really wanted to do was to impress Scott. Fortunately, I seemed to be succeeding.

"So what do you think about this place?" he asked.

"It's a nice little café," I answered.

"No," he laughed. "I mean what do you think about Ovid?"

"I don't know what to think," I told him honestly. "I mean, none of this should be happening. With the g... I mean, with the powers that be like the Judge in charge, it's hard to imagine what their purpose is."

"You started to say something else," he noted. "Do you know who the Judge is?"

"Yes, do you?"

He shook his head. "I'm not sure. Can you tell me?"

"Nope," I said. "That seems to be one of the biggest taboos around here. If I try to tell you, I'll start gagging and won't be able to speak."

"Strange."

"That pretty well describes the whole town," I laughed.

“Well, I guess I’ll get to know it well. I’m signed up for summer school,” he told me.

That was great, I thought. He’d be here all summer and... I was getting very interested in him, wasn’t I? The thought of being interested in a man was extremely alien to me. Maybe we’d just be friends, I thought. Yes, that was it. We would be friends. It wouldn’t be a boy-girl thing. I wasn’t ready for that yet.

“So have you been in Ovid long?” I asked. “Or is that another one of those impolite questions?”

“I’ve been here a few days,” he replied vaguely. “And you?”

“Just two days,” I admitted. If Scott had been here longer than me, and it appeared that he had been, I was surprised that he hadn’t realized the nature of the gods. Of course, Vera had said I had been unusually quick to discover that aspect of Ovid.

We talked and laughed through lunch. Then, sadly, I realized I had to go back to work. He walked me back to March’s, and I found myself leaning on him a little to avoid putting too much weight on my sore feet.

“Sorry,” I told him after we had walked a block. “These shoes are a little tight.”

“Well, why didn’t you say something?” he asked. Before I could respond, he had picked me up, and to the astonished stares of Ovid’s pedestrians, carried me the last block to March’s front door.

“Thanks for lunch,” I said with a smile before he let me down.

He pulled me closer to him and gently kissed my lips. To my astonishment, I felt relieved. I kissed him back. “Any time,” he said, setting me down gently.

I thought that was it. I turned to go back to work.

“Say,” he called out. “How about dinner and a movie tonight to celebrate your new job?”

‘Why not?’ I thought. There was nothing holding me back. Besides, it would be a lot more pleasant to spend my evening with Scott than with my 'father.' I smiled and nodded.

I gave him directions to our farm, finding myself a little embarrassed to admit that I was a farm girl. He didn't seem to mind, though. I was two inches off the ground when I reported back to work.

"Who is he?" Charlene asked during afternoon break. We were seated together at a small table in the break room.

"Who is who?" I asked innocently over my Diet Pepsi.

"Don't be coy," she admonished me. "He is a hunk."

Yes, I supposed he was. I told her about Scott.

"This is great!" Charlene giggled. "I was starting to get worried about you. You never seemed to be very interested in dating."

That was an interesting piece of information. I wondered why Donna Mae didn't date much. Maybe she hadn't been that interested in the farm boys, and maybe the town boys hadn't been very interested in her. If they saw her—me—now, I was sure they would have changed their minds. I had gone from hick to babe in just a few hours.

Somehow, I didn't seem to mind being a babe.

I was tired when Charlene dropped me off. It had been a long day, and I was looking forward to a bath and getting out of my heels. I was glad Scott and I had agreed to go casual that night. Shorts and sandals would cool me off.

My mother was waiting at the door when I came in. "What have you done to yourself?" she asked me.

I had almost forgotten that I had been transformed into a sophisticated sales associate during the day. "This is how I need to look on my job," I explained.

She tsked at me. "Well, you look like some sort of a floozy. You get out of those clothes and wash your face. Mr. Spencer is coming over for dinner."

"I won't be here for dinner," I said with a more casual manner than I felt. I could see a crisis was about to occur. "I have a date."

The color drained from her face. "A date?"

"Yes," I said, setting down the sacks containing my old clothes, more new clothes, and my new cosmetics.

"You'll need to break it," she told me.

"I won't."

She was silent. "Your father won't like this at all."

I was thankful Scott was picking me up early. With any luck, I would be gone before he came in from the fields. I looked at my watch. Scott was supposed to pick me up in an hour. It would be one of the longest hours of my life, I realized.

I risked a bath. I was hot and sweaty after a day at work. Even under air conditioning, Oklahoma starts to get warm in May. It felt good to ease down into the tub, especially my poor sore feet. At least I would be in a lot better shape for my... date, thanks to the bath. I dressed quickly in khaki shorts and a cream-colored T-shirt. I slipped the most comfortable pair of sandals I could find on my feet. I was actually happy to note that the combination of instruction I had been given at the store and the auto pilot I had been given allowed me to put in earrings and do my hair and makeup about as fast as I would have been able to had I been a girl all my life.

Then, it was a waiting game. I wanted to be gone before my father found out about my date—or my job for that matter. I kept looking out the window of my room, listening anxiously and hoping not to hear the sound of his tractor coming in from the fields. My luck didn't hold, though. The deep rumble of the tractor engine could be heard approaching the house a good fifteen minutes before Scott was due. What would happen now? I wondered. Whatever it was, it wouldn't be good.

I heard the kitchen door slam, and faintly through the walls, I heard him talking to mother. At least he wasn't yelling. In fact, he seemed pretty calm. Then, I heard the door slam again and saw him heading out toward the equipment shed. I rushed into the kitchen.

“What happened?” I asked my mother as she busied herself at the sink.

“I told him you had to go back to the department store for a meeting,” she told me calmly as she pared the skin off a carrot.

“He knows about my job?” I asked cautiously.

“Of course he knows. I told him at noon when he came in for dinner. You weren’t here and I had to tell him something.”

I felt like an idiot. I had been thinking like a townie again, or more specifically, like a city dweller. The concept of going home for lunch—or dinner, as farmers called it—was alien to me. Of course he had come in at noon for his meal and asked where I was. I should have realized.

“And my job—that was okay with him?”

“No, it’s not okay,” my mother told me. It was funny, but I was really starting to think of her as my mother now. “He just doesn’t know what to do about it—yet.”

“He doesn’t want me to quit, does he?”

She shook her head. “No. To be honest, we can probably use the money. Crop prices haven’t been that good lately, and expenses are high. That’s why I got him to go along with the job—for now.”

I was actually proud of her. She might not be the God of Real Estate anymore, but she could still sell the customer when it counted.

“Thanks, mom.”

“Don’t be thanking me yet,” she warned. “He has his eye on that Jess Spencer as a son-in-law. You’d better not get too interested in some other fella. If he thinks that job of yours is interfering with that, he’ll more as likely make you quit.”

I don’t know what bothered me more—the effrontery of my father, presuming that he could make such a decision for me, or my mother, assuming that I was really interested in Scott. I mean, interested in Scott in that way. “Mother,” I said deliberately, “Scott is just a friend.”

“He’s a friend right now,” she told me. “But you just wait until he has his hand inside your blouse. Then you tell me he’s just a friend. You got hormones, girl. They don’t always know who your friends are.”

Before I could answer, I heard a car pull up in front of the house. I was going to rush out to meet Scott, but before I could, there was a knock on the door. I silently cursed him for being so polite. If my father suddenly came in from the equipment shed and talked to him, mother’s story of a business meeting would be exposed.

Scott was neatly dressed in a polo shirt and a pair of shorts not unlike my own. He wore loafers with no socks and looked very preppy. As my mother opened the door to him, he smiled broadly and introduced himself. It was a good move, I had to admit. I could see my mother liked him at once.

“Hi, Scott,” I said brightly. “Let’s go.” I wanted him out of there before my father came in and all hell broke loose. He seemed a little surprised at my haste, but thankfully, he didn’t argue.

When we were safely away from the house in his little silver BMW Z-3, he asked, “Was your father home? I’m sorry I didn’t get a chance to meet him.”

“Well, maybe next time,” I replied, hoping I could postpone that meeting for as long as possible.

It was a special evening, the first I could honestly say I had enjoyed in a long time. It was ironic that I had to become a girl to have a good time, though. I really did consider Scott a friend. We had a quick dinner at Rusty’s Burger Barn. I had to say, it was one of the best burgers I had ever eaten, and the waitress was the attractive blonde, Myra, who had been in my department earlier in the day. We even acted like old friends, in spite of the fact that we both knew we had known each other only a few hours.

I got a reminder of what Sam had told me, though, about only being able to talk about our old lives in twos. I tried to say something about all three of us remembering our former lives, but when I tried, my voice just sort of trailed off into nothing. Myra and Scott both gave me an amused look. They knew what had gone wrong.

“Sorry,” I said meekly.

Myra put her arm around me. “Don’t worry. It happens to all of us at one time or another.”

As she hurried off to take care of a new customer, I decided I really liked her and resolved to get to know her better. I looked at Scott.

“This is all kind of hard to get used to,” I told him.

“You’re doing fine,” he said with encouragement. “Just relax and be yourself—the self you are now, anyway.”

That was good advice, and I took it. We talked about lots of things, but never who we had been. When we spoke of our lives, we spoke of our current ones, as if they had been the only ones we had ever known.

I found out why Scott’s name was so familiar. His father was in real estate—or had been until his death. Scott was really Scott R. Gorman the Third, and his father had been an important figure in real estate along the Eastern seaboard. I remembered the name because he had been an actual person. To my knowledge, he didn’t have a son, so my Scott was a creation of the Judge. I wondered why he had done that. I suppose the local college needed a few well-to-do out of state students to meet expenses. Why not just create a few? I asked Scott about that, and he agreed.

“That’s what I figure, too,” he said between bites of burger. “In any case, it’s made me the principle heir to a pretty hefty fortune.”

That explained the Z-3.

“It sounds like you made out a lot better than many of the transformees,” I commented.

He looked at me seriously. “Including you?”

I flushed. “I thought we agreed not to discuss our old lives.”

“I’m not,” he pointed out. “I’m discussing your new life. I mean, it seems to me you didn’t do too badly. When I was in court, I saw another defendant turned into an eight-year-old black girl. She didn’t look like she was going to have an easy time of it.”

“Did she remember who she had been?” I asked, curious. I supposed misery loves company.

He shook his head. “I don’t think so. She walked out of the courtroom with her new mother as if she had been the little girl her entire life.”

As we walked out together to head for the movie, I was thinking about the other information I knew about Scott’s father. In my reality, he had made some serious mistakes. He had backed the wrong horse, so to speak. Scott’s father had thrown in with a guy named Donald Trump, a real estate baron who thought he could topple my father from his pinnacle. It hadn’t worked. Trump had been ruined, and men like Gorman who had backed him were ruined with him. I seemed to remember that Scott’s father had killed himself over the entire affair. His father was dead in this reality as well, but I was sure it wasn’t from the same cause.

“What did your ‘father’ die of?” I asked as we drove downtown to the theater.

“Heart attack,” he replied. “Apparently, the success was too much for him as nearly as I can tell. I only know that because I talked with his—my now—lawyer about it right after I was changed.”

So even though reality had shifted, the dead were still dead. I actually felt a little better knowing that my father’s actions had apparently not shortened Scott’s father’s life. Of course, maybe they did. It was just possible that not even the gods could bring someone back from the dead. Something else to ponder, I realized. If I remembered my mythology right, people came back from Hades on occasion. Come to think of it, the residents of Hades were often known as shades. Did that mean most of the residents of Ovid were dead? They didn’t seem dead.

In small towns, movies are often delayed by weeks or months compared to their runs in cities. Ovid had only one theater, an older building that had been remodelled into a twin screen. I doubted if the town would have even had two screens, except for the fact that there was a college in town. Titanic was just finishing up its week long run. I got the idea that it was the second time around for the film in Ovid, but it was still doing a brisk business. I supposed with school out, audiences got bigger.

Of course, like most people, I had already seen Titanic. From the conversations I heard in the lobby, most of the patrons had seen it before as well, either on its initial run in Ovid or someplace else, like Tulsa. Most people, though, probably didn't have the added experience that I had had seeing it for the second time. The first time, I had seen it through male eyes. I had been dazzled by the special effects and enthralled with the Herculean effort of the crew to evacuate the sinking ship. Now, though, I was seeing the film through different eyes. My mind seemed focused on the ill-fated romance of the two leads. The ship was just the setting for the romance. I found myself identifying with Kate Winslet's character, and during the romantic scenes, I found I had unconsciously snuggled up next to Scott.

The love scene had a particularly odd effect on me. When I had seen it as a man, I had thought it was a rather mild scene. As a woman, though, I found my body actually tingling with delight as she made love to him. Then, in the scenes in the water, as her lover was dying, I found there were tears in my eyes. I couldn't help it. The more I tried to hold back, the worse it got.

"Are you okay?" Scott whispered to me as we walked out of the movie.

I snuggled up tighter against him. "Uh-uh," I sniffed. He held me a little tighter and I felt better.

"What's wrong?" he asked me as we walked together back to his car. His arm was gently around my waist.

"I just feel like such a wimp," I told him. "I mean, crying in a movie like that."

"You weren't the only one," he pointed out.

“I know,” I agreed. I had heard other girls sniffing as well, and the number of red eyes coming out of the theater made it look like the passengers of an overnight flight from LA to New York. How could I explain it to him? He didn’t know I had been a man before. When he found out, he probably wouldn’t want anything to do with me—unless he had been a woman. I doubted that, though. He was just too good at being a man to have ever been a woman. “It’s just that... I don’t usually blubber like that in movies.”

He turned me to face him, his arms around me. “Well, I’m glad you did,” he said, bending down to kiss me.

So that’s where I got my second kiss as a woman—right there on the sidewalk in front of the Rivoli Twin Theater. I didn’t want to like it, but I did. I liked it very much. Hesitantly, I broke away.

“What do you want to do now?” he asked.

It was an important question. When I had asked it as a man, I had always hoped the response would involve someone’s bed. Not this time, though. I wasn’t ready for anything like that, although I was realistic enough to realize I would have to come to terms with sex as a woman eventually. “I have to work tomorrow,” I said softly. “I’d better go home.”

I knew he was disappointed, but he didn’t show it. He bent over, giving me another kiss, this time less passionate, and said, “Okay.”

So there I was, on the front porch of my little farmhouse, watching as Scott drove away. We had kissed again parked in front of the house, but it had gone no further. My internal thermostat seemed to have raised my temperature by a couple of degrees. I knew it didn’t really, but it had felt like it. Here I was, mentally a normal male, but my body was telling me something different. It was telling me I was a female with all the normal female drives. And it was telling me strongly enough that I knew it was only a matter of time until I had to give in to my body’s needs.

“So how was your date last night?” Charlene asked me as I hopped into her car the next morning.

It was the first time I had had to answer that question. My parents had been asleep when I got home, and my father was already in the fields when I came down for breakfast. My mother had said nothing. I think she was curious, but I supposed that the less she knew, the less she would have to hide from my father.

"It was fun," I said, trying to sound noncommittal.

"And how much fun was it?" she asked with a grin.

"None of your business," I answered with a grin of my own.

She laughed.

Vera March was on the floor, I suspect to see how well I had learned my lessons in femininity. She looked over my makeup carefully, nodding with approval. "The earrings are a little plain for that outfit," she told me. They were just a pair of cheap ones I had bought in the store that morning, since I had forgotten to put earrings in that morning. I was finding that getting ready for anything as a girl was a lot more work than I had imagined. There was so much to remember—like earrings.

"The blouse is fine," she commented. It should be, I thought. It was a light gray with enough ruffles to look feminine. I had bought it there in the store the day before.

"Where did you get the skirt?" she asked.

The skirt was a plum colored pleated skirt, coming down almost but not quite to my knees.

"It was in my closet," I replied. "I haven't had time to build up my wardrobe yet."

She smiled. "The skirt will do just fine. I hadn't realized there was anything stylish in that closet of yours. It looks good on you. I approve of the hose, too. They're just the right shade to go with that skirt. And the shoe—they're black and that's fine, but there's no heel."

"I thought flats would be okay," I told her. I cringed at the thought of walking the floor in heels again.

She shook her head. "I'm afraid not, dear. They make you look a little too girlish. A nice sling back with a two-no, make that three-inch heel will add a degree of sophistication to that outfit. Go over to the shoe department and get some. Just put them on your tab."

"Yes, ma'am." At this rate, there wouldn't be any pay check at the end of my week. I owed my soul to the company store, as the old song went.

"Oh, and Donna?"

I turned. "Yes, Ms. March?"

"How was your date last night?"

I gasped. Was nothing private from these... these... gods?

"It was fine," I managed to say with a gulp, turning again for the shoe department.

As expected, by noon, my feet were killing me. I had bought a pair of dark gray sling backs and decided to live dangerously—they had a three-inch heel. I had to admit, the shoes did improve the look of my outfit. On more than one occasion, I sneaked a look at myself in one of the mirrors. My legs were really quite pretty. I imagined as a farm girl, I would have had a fair amount of exercise, and my legs showed it. They were long and firm, and the higher heel made them look their best. The slightly gray shade of hose I wore made my legs part of an overall symphony in plum and gray. The gold of my jewelry, rather than conflicting, actually complemented the look. I was amazed at what I had learned about dressing as a woman in only a couple of days.

Another more troubling thought crossed my mind as I helped a customer. A very attractive shade woman was looking for just the right outfit for her anniversary, and I had been helping her. She chose a very daring number. It was what I had come to know in my new job as a merry widow. It was in black, with demi underwire cups and removable garters. It was designed to show off maximum cleavage and make men stiffen at the sight of a girl dressed in it. The disturbing thought was that as the woman held the outfit up to herself and said “What do you think?” I found myself thinking not of how attractive she would be in it, but rather what I might look like in it. I had the right color hose at home. Of course, mine were panty hose and I would need stockings for the outfit. My new shoes would look great in it. It would make Scott—I meant any man—hot for...

“I said, what do you think?”

“Oh!” I said, jerking myself out of the fantasy. “I think it’s just... darling. You’ll look great in that.”

“Do you think my Stan will like it?” she asked with a giggle.

“Oh, I’m sure he’ll love it,” I replied with a little giggle of my own.

As she walked away with her purchase, I couldn’t help but envy her. She might just be a shade—whatever they were—but she was comfortable with her femininity. I wondered if I would ever be that comfortable. I wondered if someday, it would be me looking at that rack of sexy nighties and slinky underwear. I touched one of the silky nighties, sighing gently to myself.

“It’s very pretty,” a male voice said behind me.

Embarrassed, I dropped my hand from the nightie and turned. “Scott! What are you doing here?”

He grinned. “Just passing by. I thought you might be free for lunch again.”

I looked at my watch. “It’s only twelve. I don’t get off until one.”

“Oh, go ahead,” Vera’s voice called out to me from the aisle. Had she been watching me as well as I caressed the nightie. Oh, god! What must they both think of me?

“But...” I began.

“We’re not very busy today,” Vera explained. “I’ll watch your department for a little while. Why don’t you go have lunch with the young man?”

It was a suggestion, but from the Goddess of Love, it somehow had the ring of a command. Yes, I wanted to be with Scott, but I could feel that need to be with him being amplified and widened in my heart. Scott offered me his arm. I took it with a smile, turning to Vera.

"Thanks Ms. March."

"Happy to help," she laughed. I turned from her and looked only at Scott as we walked to lunch.

"It's not as good as the Greenhouse," Scott explained as we walked into Moore's Café, "but since it's only a few doors from March's, I thought you'd appreciate not having to walk too far in heels."

I smiled in appreciation. If I was going to keep walking, I would have to bring a pair of sneakers to work to walk to lunch in. I was indeed grateful for the opportunity to have lunch without the long walk. Safely at a booth, I kicked off the heels and rubbed my nylon clad feet together, sighing in relief.

"You don't know how good it feels to get those off," I told him with a sigh as the menus were delivered.

"I can imagine," he said. Could he? I wondered if he was just being polite. Obviously, Scott had been someone else before he came to Ovid. Maybe that someone had been a woman. I didn't think so, though. He didn't act as if he had ever been a woman. He seemed content with being who he was. Of course, I was sure he had had at least a couple of weeks to adjust.

"I'd stick with the simple fare here," he told me. "I hear the sandwiches aren't bad, but there're no good salads or anything like down at the Greenhouse."

Ovid was lucky to have the Greenhouse, I thought. Moore's was more like cafés I had experienced in smaller towns. The tables and booths were dark wood, the chairs a little uncomfortable, and a slight smell of grease wafting out of the kitchen. It was strictly old-fashioned Midwestern cuisine. Go ahead and order the hot beef sandwich with lots of mashed potatoes, but don't look for an Oriental chicken salad because it won't be on the menu. I settled on a club sandwich, which appeared to be one of the entrees least likely to stop my heart in mid bite. Scott was more daring, ordering a burger and fries. I sighed to myself. If I were still male, I might have risked that, too, but I remembered the old saying—a moment on the lips and a lifetime on the hips.

“At least let me buy today,” I offered. “You’ve bought almost all of my food for the past two days.”

He grinned. “Nope. I’ll pay. It’s the price I have to pay to eat all my meals with a lovely lady. In fact, how about dinner tonight?”

“I shouldn’t,” I said reluctantly. “I really need to see my parents. I haven’t talked to my father in two days.” I needed to see what he thought of my job. Also, it would be a little hard to play the meeting at work card again.

“Then how about dessert?” he suggested. “I can pick you up about eight. We can go get an ice cream. There’s a little place over by the college that serves a great double dip.”

“Oh, all right!” I laughed, unconsciously laying my hand on the back of his. “But just for a little while. I’m a working girl now.”

He bought my lunch in spite of my protests and had me back at work by one.

“Did you have a good time?” Vera asked pleasantly.

“Yes,” I admitted. Then, after a moment, “Vera?”

“Yes, Donna?”

I had a question, but I didn’t know how to phrase it. I was very new at being a girl. By all rights, I should have been railing against my fate, but I wasn’t. I seemed actually almost comfortable being a girl. In spite of the restrictions placed upon me by my strict father, I felt I had more freedom as Donna Mae Potter than I had ever had in my previous life. Vera was a goddess. I needed to know why all of this was happening to me. Why was I a girl? What was I supposed to be doing?

“Those are interesting questions,” she commented with a smile.

“But I didn’t say anything,” I said.

She smiled at me. “Donna, you may never know why you’re a girl or why you’re here, or even what you should be doing. You are here to live your life as best you can, just as you were before Ovid. You are a girl now because you are, just as you were male before because you were. Don’t try to put too much meaning into these events. Just live your life as you think it should be lived.”

“You mean if I decide I can’t take the idea of making love to a man, I can be a lesbian?”

“I’m afraid not!” she laughed. “That’s frowned upon here. We’re a little too small town Midwestern for that. Besides, would you really want to be a lesbian?”

“I might,” I replied, more for the sake of argument than anything else. The truth of the matter was that the idea of having sex in this body with another woman had very little appeal to me. The problem was the better men—or specifically Scott—looked to me, the more frightened I became. As much as the void between my legs seemed to want to be filled, my mind argued that it wasn’t normal to have a man stick anything there.

“But it’s very natural,” Vera argued.

“Will you stop getting into my thoughts?” I said with exasperation, turning away from her.

“I wouldn’t be there if you didn’t want me to,” she explained. “Let me help you, Donna.”

Before I could reply, I felt a sudden sense of well being. It was as if the aching void between my legs had somehow been filled. There was nothing physically inside me; I knew that. But there was a feeling. I felt... accomplished. I felt whole. I looked at her as the wave ebbed inside me. “Is that what it’s like?” I asked in a whisper.

“No,” she replied. “When it’s done correctly, it’s much better.”

“But—” I turned to face her, but she was gone.

When Charlene dropped me off that evening after work, my father was waiting for me in the living room. He put down the paper he had been reading and inspected me critically. I had not felt uncomfortable when Vera had inspected me, but my father's scrutiny was most unpleasant. He just stared at me with his brow furrowed. "Is this the sort of thing you have to wear to work in town?" he asked at last. He made it sound as if 'working in town' was somehow immoral.

"Ms. March likes us to dress this way," I said in my own defense.

"Like a whore?"

I flushed. "I'm not dressed like a whore."

He put his thumb and forefinger on my chin and examined my face. "Look at you! You're wearing too much makeup."

I pulled away from him as he continued, "And that skirt. It's so short men will see your privates."

Thank god he hadn't seen my skirt the day before. It was even shorter.

"I want you to go into that bitch Miz March's office tomorrow and tell her you don't want that job."

"But I need a job," I protested. "I have to earn a living."

"No you don't," he told me harshly. "I talked just today to Jess Spencer. He's gonna ask you to marry him."

"Marry him?" I asked. "I barely know him!"

"You'll get to know him," my father replied. It wasn't a prediction; it was a pronouncement.

"I won't!" I practically yelled, storming out of the room and up to my room. I slammed the door behind me and threw myself on the bed, unbidden tears streaming from my eyes. What was going on here? Why was I being treated like this? If the Judge had to turn me into a girl, why couldn't it have been someone more in charge of her life? Why did it have to be someone ruled by an overbearing father...

I sat up on the side of the bed feeling very sorry for myself. I had always been ruled by an overbearing father, I suddenly realized. When I had been a man, I had been told where to go to school, what to major in, who I would marry, what job I would do. Oh yes, I had led a privileged life. Many would have envied me. But my life had never been my own if I were truly honest with myself. My life wasn't my own as Martin Brubaker Junior and it wasn't my own as Donna Mae Potter. I would never be Martin Brubaker again, I was sure of that by now. But as Donna Mae Potter, I had to become my own person.

But how? I had not been able to break away when I had been male, well educated, and well off in my own right from trust funds and savings. How was I to do it in the body of an eighteen-year-old, barely a grown woman, with no money, only a high school education, and a father who, although he had not physically hurt me, seemed capable of physically enforcing his will.

There was a gentle knock at my door. "Donna Mae, are you all right?" my mother's voice asked.

"I'm okay," I called out with a quaver in my voice.

The door opened. She stood there with a look of motherly concern on her face. How ironic, I thought, that my real father whose only concerns in all the years I had known him had been money was suddenly given the role of a concerned mother. If there was anything of the old man left in there, he must have been ready to blow a gasket.

"You know," she began, "your father only wants what's best for you."

"He only wants me to marry the farmer next door so he can operate a bigger farm," I grumbled.

She sat down beside me and put her arm tenderly around me. "I know it must seem like that, but Jess Spencer is a fine man. You'll not find a better one, dear."

She might be right, I thought, but that didn't change the fact that I wasn't the least bit interested in marrying Jess Spencer—or any other man for that matter. I supposed I might have to consider marriage sometime in the future. I knew my perspective was changing. I was starting to notice men. Worse yet, I was starting to wonder what it would be like to... be with a man. There would come a time when I'd have to surrender to my new body. But not yet, and certainly not in marriage.

Could I love a man? It was an odd question, I knew. I was a woman in every way that it counted, and I supposed I could, but Jess would never be the one. And how about Scott? Yes, I could, I realized. That's not to say that I did love him. We were just friends. But the potential was there. Of course, I really didn't know much about him, but that didn't matter—yet. Maybe someday. Maybe not.

I followed my mother downstairs, carefully avoiding my father who was busy sulking in the living room. I helped her fix dinner—excuse me, supper—then joined them in a mostly silent meal.

One thing I had learned about my new father was that when he was angry at me or my mother, he tended to sulk quietly. It was as if he was trying to tell us that we weren't worth talking to. He thought he was being strong. I thought he was being an ass. At least, I was grateful for the quiet. I really didn't want to talk to him.

Mother and I got the dishes put away just before I heard the sound of a car pulling up in front. I had almost forgotten that Scott was planning to take me out for ice cream. I hurried to the door, only to be stopped by my father's voice.

"And where do you think you're going?" he challenged me.

"Just out with a friend—for ice cream," I replied honestly. I heard Scott's footsteps on the porch. He knocked on the door.

My father opened the door and just stared at a startled Scott. "Is this your friend?"

"Yes," I replied.

He turned to Scott and said, "You'd better go on, boy. She can't go out with you tonight." His voice was harsh and the tone final.

Scott looked at me as if for guidance. "You'd better go," I told him. "I'll talk to you tomorrow.”

He looked at my father and me, obviously trying to decide if he should stay or go.

“Go on, Scott,” I urged him. “I’ll be fine. Just go.”

“If you need me, give me a call,” Scott said, leaving reluctantly.

My new father and I stared at each other like two savage animals until the sound of Scott’s car faded into the night.

“You had no right to do that,” I told him through clenched teeth. I was so frustrated in this body. I doubled my fists, longing to have the power to hit him and knock some sense into him. I knew I could do no damage, though. I was too weak—too much of a girl to be able to force my will on him physically. In that moment, even consumed by anger, I knew fear—the fear all women have when confronted with overwhelming physical force. I was too weak to hurt him, but he could hurt me in a heartbeat. Just because he hadn’t physically abused me before didn’t mean he couldn’t do it whenever he chose.

“I have every right!” he boomed. “I’m your father. Now, tomorrow, you’re gonna quit your job and you’re gonna tell that fella that you don’t want to see him again—ever. Do you hear me?”

I said nothing, so he came closer to me, raising his meaty fist and yelling, “I said do you hear me?”

I gulped. “I hear you.”

“Good. Then you get up to your room, and you get that whore paint off your face and get to bed. You’ve got a busy morning ahead of you.”

I obeyed. I wanted nothing at that moment but to be out of his reach. I practically ran to my room. I obediently removed my makeup, not sure if he would come up to check or not. I was frightened—truly frightened. I had never been so afraid in my entire life as either sex. I knew deep down that I had pushed him too far. If he sensed for a minute that the threats weren’t enough, he would hurt me.

“Donna Mae?” It was my mother’s soft voice at the door. She opened the door timidly and entered as I was getting on my nightie. "Are you all right, sweetheart?"

"No," I said, trembling. "He's a... a... monster!"

She rushed over to me. "Now you be quiet," she said just above a whisper. "He's still up and he's still mad. You don't want to rile him."

"Tell me something," I asked her. "Has he ever hit you?"

The question stunned her. "I've never given him any cause to hit me," she replied at last. "He's the man of the house. I wouldn't be a fit wife if I gave him cause to hit me, now would I?"

I looked at her dumbstruck. Was that really my father inside this mousy little farm wife? Was it really the man who had stared down governors who was wearing that frumpy print dress and apron, afraid to disobey some ignorant farmer who barely made a decent living on a small Oklahoma farm?

"But it's not right!" I told her. "He may have figured out how to run your life, but he's not going to run mine."

"Now you listen to me, Donna Mae Potter," she said seriously. "He's your father and you're going to do just what he tells you. You're going to quit your job, forget that town boy, and settle down to be Jess Spencer's bride and raise lots of farm babies. It's what your father wants."

"But what about what I want?"

"You're a grown woman now," she said primly. "You're not some little girl. What you want doesn't matter."

Oh yes it did, I thought after she had left. That creature calling itself my father hadn't won yet, I thought as I gripped my pillow in the dark, tears welling up in my tired eyes. What I wanted was going to matter. I had a plan.

I got up early the next morning—even earlier than usual. For the first time, since my transformation, I was happy to have to carry a purse. I selected the largest one I could find—not a new stylish one that I had purchased at March's, but an old ratty one, large enough to carry whatever I needed. I dumped as many of my new cosmetics as I could in the purse. I looked at my face, fighting back the urge to apply something to my face. No, I thought. I would probably have to stand inspection from my father. If I wore cosmetics, he would order me to wash off my face. I had no desire to confront him. If I did, he might decide to inspect closer.

Next, I got dressed. I put on the outfit that I had gotten my first day at Marches, thankful that the skirt was shorter than anything else I had in my closet. It would make the next step easier. I next selected one of my 'farm girl' dresses—knee length and drab tan in color, with long sleeves which were loose enough to fit over the sleeves of my good dress. I slipped on a pair of worn black flats, stuffing panty hose and my new two inch heels in the over sized purse. Jewelry to go with the outfit went into the purse, too. I hoped my father didn't find it suspicious that my purse was so full. I had to depend upon the fact that the contents of a woman's purse would always remain a mystery no man really wished to solve.

I drew my hair back into a flat, boring ponytail. I looked awful, I thought, without a trace of the male I used to be in that ruminant. But at least I looked like the farm girl my father expected me to be.

I rushed through my morning chores, thankful that my father hadn't interrupted his own tasks to examine me. With any luck, his inspection of me would be a short one as I walked out the door. My mother, too, was too busy to question me, but I thought as I hurried through the kitchen, setting the table as I went, that she wanted desperately to talk to me.

I wolfed down a bite of breakfast on the run so I wouldn't have to stand close inspection at the table. I used the excuse that Charlene had said she might be early that morning. I was sitting alone in the living room, hoping with all my might that she would actually be a little early when my father walked in.

He looked at me carefully, and I began to perspire, frightened that somehow, he would see through my disguise. How did all the comic book superheroes run around all day wearing two sets of clothes? Even early in the morning, it seemed too warm. At least I hoped it was the heat that was making me perspire. I hoped my father didn't notice.

"Well, now you look like a proper farm girl," he finally allowed, almost affectionately. "I'm glad you've given up this nonsense of trying to be something you're not."

Trying to be something I wasn't? I had to stifle a giggle. Here I was, trying to be a girl when my mind still told me I was a man. If that wasn't trying to be something I wasn't, I didn't know what was.

Before I had to answer him, I heard Charlene pull up in front. "Gotta go," I muttered, picking up a purse that must have weighed as much as an army backpack. To my relief, my father did nothing to stop me.

"What happened to you?" Charlene asked with a gasp as I slid into the car.

"My father wants me to quit and marry Farmer John down the road," I explained. Charlene knew all about Jess; we had talked about the problem on breaks.

"So what are you going to do?" she asked, concerned.

"I'm not sure," I admitted. "Look, Charlene, could I spend a few days at your house?"

She looked uncomfortable as she drove. "I'm sorry, honey," she said at last. "I'd like to help you, but things aren't so rosy at my house either. My dad doesn't think much of my working at March's. Besides, he and your dad are good friends. He wouldn't allow it."

My heart sank. Charlene was my best hope. The solution was going to be more difficult now, but there had to be an answer that didn't involve my becoming Mrs. Jessie Spencer.

Vera March saw me enter the store. There was no misreading the disappointed look on her face. "Is something wrong, Donna?" she asked me. "It doesn't look like you're dressed for work this morning."

"Oh, Vera," I said, tears forming. "I've got to talk to you."

In her office, I was able to tell her the whole story. She sat quietly, listening to every word. "And that's it," I said, finishing. "My work clothes are on underneath this dress. It will take me a few minutes to get ready, but I want this job, Vera. I want to be independent. I'm not going back to that farm, even if I have to sleep in the streets."

She gave me a motherly smile. "I don't think it will come to that," she assured me.

"Then... then you can help me?" I asked hopefully.

Her eyes were a little sad. "Oh, Donna, I wish I could. I'd love to take you home with me and help you through this, but it's against the rules."

"The rules?" I echoed.

She nodded. "Yes, there are rules, even for us. Only the Judge can interfere so directly, and he usually doesn't."

"But he could? Could he change me back—or at least change me into a man?"

"He could," she admitted, "but he won't. Besides, do you really want to be a man again?"

There was the question I had not dared to ask myself. Every hour I was in this female body made me more of a woman. If someone had asked me a week before what I would do if I were suddenly changed into a woman, I think I would have told them that I would roll myself up into a big ball and stay there until I either changed back or died. I would never in my wildest dreams imagine that I would learn to dress and act as a fashionable woman, and then risk my own personal safety for the right to go on dressing and acting in that fashion. Being Donna Mae Potter was becoming natural to me in ways I could never have imagined before.

"Well, do you?" she asked again.

"I... I don't know," I answered truthfully. "I guess no one gets to go back to their old life once they're changed, do they?"

She shook her head with a faint smile. "It hasn't happened yet, at least."

"Then if I have to be someone else, I think I like being who I am now," I finally admitted—both to Vera and to myself. "When I was a man, I never had the... courage." I snickered to myself. I had almost said 'the balls' instead of 'courage.' Vera smiled, too. I think she knew what I had almost said. "I just never had the courage to fight to be myself. I guess this is why the Judge did this to me. I guess he thought if I was not willing to fight to be my own person, I might as well be a little farm girl who did what her father told her to do—even if that meant marrying a man she didn't love."

"The Judge doesn't always explain why he does what he does," Vera told me, "but I suspect you're correct. It would fit the pattern of his sentences."

"So what can I do?" I asked, the tears coming again. I don't think I had cried more than twice since I reached puberty. Now, it seemed as if almost anything could turn on the waterworks.

"Well," Vera began slowly, "your job is secure. According to Nora, you're doing an excellent job." She grinned. "I think so, too, especially for someone who never wore women's clothing before this week."

I smiled in spite of myself. "I like my job," I told her. When I stopped and thought about it, it was really the first time in my life that I could say that.

"Then go ahead and get changed," she told me. "And just have faith, Donna. This will all work out eventually. It usually does here in Ovid."

I hurriedly made myself presentable, feeling almost as if I was stripping off a disguise as I did. I suppose I was when I thought about it. Because of my past life, I was much more of a town person than a country person, but to escape my father, I had had to wear a disguise.

I managed to get out on the floor only fifteen minutes late. Nora had covered for me. It hadn't been a problem. There were very few early morning shoppers in Ovid. I settled into what was becoming a comfortable pattern for me, helping customers and straightening up the merchandise. Nora had even taught me a little about displays that would sell, so I even had a chance to experiment with that.

I never dreamed I would feel happiest working in the lingerie department of a small town department store. It seemed about the most unlikely fate I could ever experience. I realized that no matter what happened, I had made the right choice. I never wanted to see the farm again.

“Good morning.”

I had been woolgathering—a common activity on a slow morning in retail. I hadn’t even heard him come up behind me.

“Scott!” I cried, turning to hug him. He returned my affection. I was so glad to see him. “I was afraid my father scared you off for good.”

“No such luck,” he said, kissing me gently on the lips. “I’m afraid you’re stuck with me. What happened last night?”

I quickly told him the story of my fight with my father.

“So are you quitting?” he asked.

“Does it look like I’m quitting?” I laughed.

He shook his head and smiled. “I guess not. What about the other part?”

“The other part?” I asked.

“About me,” he said.

“Oh Scott,” I said seriously taking his hand. He looked like a hurt puppy dog. “You’re my friend. I couldn’t change that even if I wanted to.”

“Well,” he said, “if I’m going to be your friend, what can I do to help?”

I thought about it for a moment. “Well, do you know of anybody I can stay with for a few days. I don’t think I want to chance going back to the farm, and I need someplace here in town until I sort things out.”

He smiled. “That’s a simple request. You can just stay with me until you find a place.”

I must have looked shocked, for he added quickly, “Look, it’s nothing like that. It’s a pretty good sized apartment. You can have the bedroom and I’ll take the couch in the living room. No hanky-panky. Scout’s honor and all that.”

I wondered what the good residents of Ovid would say about my staying with Scott. I suspected this town, like most small towns, was a little blue nosed. I didn’t want to be branded as the town harlot. But I realized I had little choice. All I had been to scrape up in cash was forty dollars, and even with my paycheck, that wouldn’t be enough to stay at a hotel, even in Ovid. Charlene had turned me down, and I really didn’t have many friends in Ovid—certainly none who I knew well enough to ask for help. If I didn’t stay with Scott, I would have to go back home, and that meant I would be a slave to my father’s wishes for the rest of my life.

“Thanks, Scott,” I replied sincerely. “It’ll be just until I can get on my feet.”

“Stay as long as you like,” he said, looking around at two women who were examining some foundation garments. “It looks like you have customers. What time do you get off?”

“Five.”

He smiled and gave me a gentle hug. “I’ll pick you up.”

The rest of the day went by quickly. Our department was busy, and I had little time to think about what I was about to do. Finally, it was five o’clock, and I saw Scott walking toward me. It was time to set my plan into action.

I picked up the phone and called home. My mother answered the phone. Thank god, I thought. I didn’t wasn’t to talk to my father.

“Have you quit yet?” she asked me without preamble. “I thought you might just quit this morning and come on home.”

“Mother, I’m not going to quit,” I told her. “I’m not coming home, either. I’ve made arrangements to stay in town. I’ll be moving into town, too.”

“Oh my god!” she exclaimed. “Donna Mae, you don’t know what you’re saying. Your father...”

“My father is a good part of the reason I’m doing this,” I interrupted. “I’m not going to let him run my life this way.”

“He won’t give up,” she warned me. “He won’t rest until you quit and marry Jess Spencer. You know how bull-headed your father can be.”

No, but I was starting to have a pretty good idea.

“Donna Mae, don’t ruin your life like this. You go tell that March woman you’re going to quit and get back out here. I’ll come pick you up.”

“I’m sorry, mother,” I replied as Scott walked up to me. “I’ll call you tomorrow.”

“But where will you be?” she asked tearfully.

“I let you know later,” I told her, hanging up. Thank god we had never discussed Scott in detail. Even if they figured out who I was staying with, they had no idea who Scott was or where he lived.

There. I had done it. The die was cast. I had no way of knowing what the cost would be, but I was determined to be my own person, and not the person my father wanted me to be. It was funny. If I had developed such resolve as Martin, I might not be in this position now, I noted. As Martin, I had made the mistake of letting my father run my life. I wouldn’t make the same mistake twice.

“Are you ready to go?” Scott asked softly. He could see in my eyes what I was going through.

“Yes,” I replied, equally softly.

His apartment wasn’t much, but by Ovid standards, it wasn’t bad. This was a small town, after all, and there weren’t large modern apartment complexes. It consisted of a living room, kitchen, bedroom, and a single bath. It was fairly Spartan in furnishings as well, but the couch looked comfortable, and good to his word, there was a blanket on it for later.

“Ovid could really use more apartments,” he told me. “Vulman Industries apparently has picked up a major military contract. They’re hiring like crazy and a lot of new people will be moving in.”

“Real ones?” I asked as I looked around his apartment. There was evidence he had spent a good part of the day just getting the place shaped up. I couldn’t help but think it was sweet of him.

He shrugged. “Your guess is as good as mine. Apparently all sorts of people wander into Ovid for all sorts of reasons. The Judge doesn’t seem to be short of raw material, although apparently there was an incident here not too long ago that has slowed down the process.”

“Where did you learn all this?” I asked, impressed.

“Oh, around campus. Some of the other students remember who they were. They all talk back and forth, spreading information. Did you know, though, that only two people can talk like this at a time? If someone else were to join us, we couldn’t discuss the magical aspects of Ovid.” Then he stopped, remembering our little conversation with Myra, I was sure.

“So I’ve noticed,” I replied wryly, dropping my stuff off at the end of the couch. “Look, Scott, I really appreciate your doing this for me. I don’t know what I would have done if you hadn’t offered me a place to stay.”

He smiled. “Don’t mention it. Look, let’s keep it light. I’m a pretty decent cook. Let’s make up a salad, some spaghetti, have a little wine, and celebrate your freedom.”

“It sounds like a plan,” I replied with a smile of my own.

He was, indeed, a pretty decent cook. In fact, I had expected a little Ragu out of a jar, but Scott made the sauce from scratch. I started wondering as we made dinner together, then ate, just who Scott had been before. By mutual consent, we hadn’t discussed our previous lives. I had assumed, though, that Scott had been in Ovid for a few weeks. He was very much at ease with who he was. He must have been male before, I thought. Yet he handled himself in the kitchen like many women I had known. Yes, I know there are men who are excellent cooks; I hadn't been bad at it myself. But there were some more feminine mannerisms that came into play when he was in the kitchen. First, there was the way he cut things. Men tend to cut toward themselves while women cut away. Then, there was his neatness. Men are notorious for making a mess in the kitchen, expecting someone else to clean up, or just not caring. Scott was the neatest male I had ever seen in the kitchen.

There was nothing effeminate about him, though. In fact, he was comfortably masculine. Of course, I was beginning to realize that it was easier to be a man than a woman. Oh, sure, men were expected to carry themselves in a certain way—to be strong, as it were. But women had to be correct in so many more ways. We had to dress properly, making sure everything was coordinated. We had to practically be artists just to get our hair and faces right. We had to be graceful as we teetered on heels and demure in our relations with others. And of course, many men—such as my new father (and the old one when he was male for that matter)—expected us to always defer to them.

“More spaghetti?”

Scott's voice brought me back to where I was. “Oh. No thanks. It was great, but I have to watch what I eat.” Another problem being a woman, I thought to myself.

“Well,” he said, “then go ahead and finish off your wine and I'll clean up.”

“No, I'll help,” I told him. “Besides, I think I've had enough wine.”

I had, too, I reflected as we cleaned up. I had drunk three glasses of Chianti. As Martin, that wouldn't have fazed me. As Donna, though, I was feeling a warm buzz from the stuff. To make it worse, as we finished, Scott put a snifter of brandy in front of me.

“Are you trying to get me drunk?” I asked suspiciously.

“Nope,” he grinned. “You have to be a real lush to get drunk on brandy. You're supposed to sip this stuff. I figure one shot of this should last about an hour."

It did, too. We sat together on the couch—close together—and watched a movie together. He had rented When Harry Met Sally. I know, it had been around a hundred times, but it was one of those enduring movies most people enjoy over and over. Of course, I found myself unconsciously identifying with Meg Ryan's character instead of being desperately in love with her as my male self had been. I had never thought much about Billy Crystal as a handsome guy, and as a girl, I still didn't, but I found there were other things which made him endearing.

I don't know exactly when it happened. I think it was about the scene where Meg Ryan finds out her former lover is getting married and is busily crying her eyes out. Scott had had his arm around me at first, then I was snuggled up against him. Then, suddenly, I turned, right next to his face. We just sort of blended together in a long kiss. I was used to the sudden swelling between the legs when kissing someone I was attracted to. Not this time, though. Instead, there was this warm feeling between my legs—a sensation of yielding and softening, unlike anything I had ever felt before. Then, of course, there were the nipples. How odd, I thought in an almost clinical way. It was as if instead of one big erection, there were little ones in my nipples and my crotch.

Then, I stopped thinking and started reacting. We didn't say a word to each other. Instead, we gently but insistently began to undress each other. I was starting to understand how important foreplay was for a woman. There was a desire building inside me, and the more it built, the more I wanted it to increase. I was nearly ready the moment Scott carried my now-nude body to the bed.

How to describe it? I had made love many times as a man. I had enjoyed it immensely. But I had never enjoyed it like that first time with Scott. As a man, I had felt the sudden explosion, concentrated between my legs. Oh sure, there had been a sense of well being, but there was also an almost immediate sense of loss, as if the pleasure had somehow flowed out of my body with the orgasmic burst. As a woman, though, the pleasure was more like a wave, commencing when he exploded into me and rushing through my body. In a word, it was incredible.

He held me tenderly afterwards, and I began to realize why that was important, too. It was almost as if in some small way, it allowed me to share the wave of pleasure with my lover. By holding me, it seemed to make the ebbing sensations last a little longer. Of course, it also gave me time to think about what I had just done and why as Scott slept gently beside me.

I hadn't intended it to happen. There had been no nagging question in my mind as to what sex was like for a woman. I had planned on being entirely platonic with Scott, and I think he really had meant his promises to me to keep it that way. Maybe it was the fact that I had just broken away from my family, as artificial as they might be. Maybe I just needed someone, and Scott was the closest thing I had to a friend in Ovid. Maybe Billy Crystal was right in When Harry Met Sally. Maybe men and women couldn't be friends. How do they explain it at the end of the film? First, we became friends. Then, we became lovers. And then, we got... married?

Oh god! Was that going to be next? Was this a one-night stand, or were we lovers? Would I become Mrs. Scott Gorman? I shuddered. I wasn't sure I was ready for that. But it might be necessary, I realized suddenly. Neither of us had considered protection. Oh good lord, could I be pregnant? What was in me now, swimming merrily upstream into a part of my anatomy that I could never have imagined having only a few days before?

As I drifted slowly off to sleep, I began to realize the next day could bring an entirely new set of problems.

I woke early. Being a farm girl had done that for me. So imagine my surprise when I saw Scott sitting naked on the side of the bed looking at me. I started to throw back the covers when I suddenly realized that I, too, was equally nude. I had a momentary pang of modesty before realizing that I had nothing that I hadn't already shown Scott the night before.

"You're up early," I said, trying desperately to sound cheerful.

"I couldn't sleep," he admitted.

"Bad dreams?"

He shook his head. "Conscience."

I said nothing. I simply looked at him, confused.

"Look, Donna, I know who you are—were, rather."

My mouth fell open. "But how...?"

"Look, it's confession time," he told me. "I'm Margo Simon, or at least that's the name you knew me by."

Now I was really shocked. Scott was Miss Simon, my father's secretary. I mean, I knew she and Rusty, our pilot, had probably met as odd a fate as we had, but I never would have imagined her being changed into Scott. Scott had seemed so comfortable with Ovid. I had just assumed that he had been around for a few weeks. His comment about finals threw me off. Most colleges would have been finished with finals by now, so I assumed he had meant that he had come to Ovid a week or two before me. Then there was the way he carried himself in his role as the young, wealthy heir. I could have kicked myself for not seeing through all of that.

"But are you saying you weren't really Margo Simon?" I ventured.

"No. My real name was Samantha Gorman."

"But wait," I said. "Your last name is Gorman now."

"That's true," he said with a sigh. "Look, do you know what your father did to my father?"

"Wait," I begged. "I'm confused. Are you telling me that you... your father was Scott Gorman Junior even before you came to Ovid?"

He nodded. "Strange, isn't it? I was his only child. I always used to think that if I had been born male instead of female, I could have been more help to him. Be careful what you wish for, though. Now, I'm male, and yet it didn't seem to make any difference. Now, do you remember what happened to my father?"

"Roughly," I admitted carefully. "I know he was ruined along with a guy named Trump when my father outmaneuvered them."

"Outmaneuvered!" he snorted. "That's a polite way of saying it. He arranged for loans for my father and Trump. What they didn't know is that he controlled the institutions that made the loans. He waited until my father and Trump were way out on a financial limb. Then, he made sure the loans were called in early. He ruined them both. That's when my father suffered a stroke and died. I blamed your father for it. I was going to college at Sarah Lawrence when he died. I couldn't help but think that if I had been at my father's side—and male—I could have helped him. But dad never thought a woman had any place as a real estate developer. So after he died, I vowed revenge against your father. I dropped out of school. I had a friend in college whose father ran a large private investigation firm—J. L. Rickett and Associates."

"I know them," I told her. "My father used them for background checks on key employees."

Scott smiled. "That's right. I used that contact to get my name in front of your father as a personal secretary. I planned to get the job and gather evidence against him. I could expose him to any number of government agencies who would have joyfully tacked his hide to the wall."

"But you might have gone down with him," I pointed out. "Everyone in his company signed non-disclosures."

He put his hand on mine and looked into my eyes. "Don't you understand, Donna? I didn't care. My father was my only family, and I loved him very much. I would have done anything to get even with your father for what he did. I would have even killed him if I had to."

I withdrew my hand and looked away. "Then this was all part of your revenge," I murmured softly.

"At first, yes," he admitted. "The Judge changed Rusty into that little black girl I told you about. Then he changed me into Scott. After I was changed, I knew it would only be a matter of time until the Judge got around to you and your father. I hung around the courts, hoping he hadn't changed you first. I was about ready to give up when that odd cop—Mercer—brought the two of you in. Imagine my surprise when the two of you walked out unchanged! So I followed you as you drove out to your farm. Then I saw you jump out at the mailbox and realized you had been changed as radically as I. It just took a little longer. From what I understand, that's not uncommon. The problem was, I wasn't sure if you were who you were or if you were your father. I staked out the farm the day you interviewed and followed you into town. I got too close, though, and bumped into you. I still didn't know if you were the son or the father."

"Did it matter to you?" I asked bitterly.

"Yes," he replied frankly. "I had nothing against you. Although I didn't get to know you very well—your father saw to that—I began to consider you as much of a victim of your father's machinations as I was. Then, on the plane, you tried to help me."

"I didn't think you'd remember that," I said. "I thought you were out cold."

"I was," he agreed, "but I seemed to remember hearing your concern for me. It was almost as if I could feel it. Also, I remembered that you volunteered to go up to the cockpit for me in the first place."

"Then why take out your revenge on me?" I asked, breaking into a sob. "Look what you've done to me."

He hurried to my side of the bed. Sitting next to me, he tried to put his arm around my naked shoulders, but I shrugged him away.

"Look, Donna, you're wrong. I admit, at first I just wanted to get closer to you to get at your father. I had to know if he remembered who he had been. Revenge wouldn't be any fun against some person who thought she had always been nothing but a farm wife. But then I got to know you. Donna, I really do love you."

That was too much for me to take. Exploding in tears, I rushed to the bathroom and slammed the door. To think, I had actually fallen for Scott! I had surrendered to this new female body of mine and given it over gladly to him. And he had used it. I felt dirty. Oh god, what if I was pregnant? I'd get an abortion. I wouldn't have his child. I'd show him. I wondered for a moment if abortions were even permitted in Ovid. Probably not, I realized.

There was a knock on the door. "Donna, please come out. Please listen to me. I'm sorry for what I did."

"You're sorry for screwing me?" I yelled as I hurriedly dressed.

"No I'm not sorry I made love to you," he corrected. "I'm sorry I deceived you. I should have been honest with you. You know the funny thing about all of this?"

"I don't find anything funny about it," I growled, wrestling with a bra strap. Damned breasts! Damned vagina!

"The funny thing," he went on, "is that my father died anyway. I thought his failure killed him. But in this reality, he was successful and still died. I guess he was just meant to die."

I finished dressing. It wasn't my best effort. It was just a pink spring weight knit blouse and a pleated gray skirt. A couple of accessories and a quick makeup job and I was about ready for work.

"Donna, at least let me drive you to work."

I looked down at my heels. It had to be over a mile to March's. I couldn't do it in heels. I would have to accept his offer. I opened the door and stared at him. "All right, but that's it. I'll be back tonight for my stuff. Then I never want to see you again."

The look on his face was one of pain. Was I being too hard on him? I didn't think so. He had used me to get to my father. Then, as soon as he found out he didn't need to get to him (now her), he screwed me and... and... told me he loved me? No! He had lied to me. He must have.

"Let's go," I said.

We didn't speak on the way to March's. I made it a point not to even look at him. When we got to the store, he stopped in front and said, "Donna, I know I hurt you. I used to be a woman. I should have remembered what it meant for a man to hurt a woman. Please find it in your heart to forgive me. I do love you."

I didn't look at him and I didn't answer. I slammed the car door and marched into the store. I should have felt triumphant, but I didn't. I felt lousy. By the time I was riding the escalator up to my department, I was feeling even worse. He told me he loved me. He meant it, I realized. I also realized that I had feelings for him as well. Was it love? No, it couldn't be! The bastard had deceived me. But if it wasn't love, what was it?

"What's wrong, Donna?" Vera asked me as she stepped out of her office.

"Oh, it's just... I can't explain. You wouldn't understand. And I don't want you to read my thoughts."

She laughed, "I don't really have to, Donna. I suspect it's about love. Think about it, dear. Who would know more about love than me?"

I stopped. She was the Goddess of Love. Who else would know more? I had to speak with her. She ushered me into her office to the now-familiar chair across from her desk. This time, though, she didn't sit behind the desk. She chose the mate of my chair and sat close, facing me.

"Now, tell me all about it," she commanded.

I did, leaving out nothing. I know I must have blushed when it came to admitting to having sex. I felt as if I had just admitted to some perverted exercise, but Vera merely nodded in sympathy.

"So now here I am," I summed up. "For all I know, I may even be pregnant."

"No, dear, you're not pregnant."

"I'm... I'm not?" I asked hesitantly.

“No,” she confirmed. “Usually, new girls like you are encouraged to take birth control pills. It’s often included as part of the automatic responses. However, for girls like you...”

“Virgins,” I clarified with a sigh.

“Yes, virgins, that often isn’t practical. So all new girls—virgin or not—are given a ninety day grace period in which they can’t get pregnant. I might add, new men get a similar dispensation, so with Scott, you’re doubly protected.”

At least that was off my mind. I leaned forward, toward Vera. “But what am I going to do now?”

Vera leaned toward me. “What do you want to do?”

It was a good question. I had to be honest with myself. What I really wanted was...

“You can’t go in there!” It was Nora’s voice, frightened from just outside the door. The door was flung open, and there he was—my father. My mother was trailing close behind, concern in her eyes.

“You’re interrupting a private meeting between me and one of my employees,” Vera said coldly, not in the least intimidated by my father’s murderous stare.

“She ain’t gonna be your employee no more!” he boomed. “She’s goin’ home with us!”

My mother rushed to my side. “Oh, Donna Mae, we were so worried about you! After you called we called the police, but that Officer Mercer said there was nothing he could do. Then your father and I drove into town, searching every street for some sign of you. We were afraid you had run away with that Scott boy, but we couldn’t remember his last name.”

“It’s Gorman,” a voice from the door said calmly but forcefully. I looked over my shoulder to see Scott in the doorway, staring as defiantly as my father. To me, he said, “I saw them pull up in front of the store as I was leaving. I thought I’d better make sure you were all right.”

My father turned to him, his fists clenched. “Were you with my daughter last night?”

Scott ignored the question. “Donna, do you need some help?”

“I... I don’t think so,” I told him. I stood and faced my father, coming between him and Scott. “Where I was and what I do isn’t your business,” I told him, trying to sound calmer than I felt.

“You’re my daughter! It is my business!” he yelled.

I would have loved to tell him that I really wasn’t his daughter, but he would never have understood. Even if he had understood, I don’t think it would have changed his mind.

“Mr. Potter,” Vera said suddenly, “do you love your daughter?”

“You stay out of this,” he growled, his gaze never leaving me.

“MR. POTTER, DO YOU LOVE YOUR DAUGHTER?” Vera never raised her voice, yet somehow, her question drowned out every other sound in the room.

My father turned to face her, his face white. “What?” he said softly. “Of course I... love her.”

“What is love, Mr. Potter?” she asked.

“It’s... it’s just love,” he replied, confused with the question.

“Do you love her enough to let her go?” she asked quietly.

“Let her go?”

I know there was magic in the room. Vera was, after all, the Goddess of Love. I don’t know what rules the gods were required to follow, but I know that Vera—or rather Venus—did something to let us all know what love was. It wasn’t something that could be verbalized, but it could be felt. I think in that moment, my father understood for the first time in his life what it meant to love someone enough to let them go. He had, of course, rationalized that he was doing what was best for me. Jess Spencer was a good man, and I had no doubt he would make some girl a fine husband, but he wasn’t right for me. Somehow, I could see into his mind and realized that he really did love me—and my mother as well. And he seemed to come to an understanding of what he needed to do if he was to have that love returned.

He turned to me. The blood lust had left his eyes, and the look he gave me was unlike any look I had ever gotten from a male parent. “Do you want to go, Donna Mae?”

I shook my head. “I don’t want to go anywhere,” I said honestly. “I just want to be my own person. This the first time in either... in my life that I’ve had the opportunity to be my own person. I want to keep on being my own person, wherever that leads me. Do you understand?”

“I... I think so,” he told me.

It was impulsive, I know, but I rushed to him and hugged him. I think there may have even been a little tear in his eye. He gave me a little smile, and I smiled back.

“Well,” Vera said suddenly, “if that is settled, we do have a store to run here. Donna, Saturday is our busiest day. I need you out on the floor, but I’ll give you a few minutes here to wrap things up while I help Nora.”

She was suddenly gone, leaving me with my parents—for they were now my parents—and Scott.

“Honey?” my mother ventured, “are you coming home tonight?”

I looked at them for a moment before answering. “I’ll be there after work,” I told them at last. “I’ll get a ride with Charlene.”

“I’ll take you home,” Scott volunteered.

I could see the look of suspicion rising in my father’s eyes again.

“I’d like to look over the Casper farm, so it’s on my way,” he explained.

“The Casper farm?” my father asked carefully. “That’s right next to our farm.”

“Yes it is,” Scott agreed. “And it stretches all the way to the edge of Ovid in the other direction. I understand it's for sale. I think the edge next to Ovid would be a good place to build a few homes and some apartments. Ovid's growing, you know."

"You've got that kind of money?" my father asked bluntly.

"I sure do," Scott answered glibly. "I've been thinking about just settling down here in Ovid. Of course, there's more land there than I'd need. I'd have to lease the rest of the Casper place out for farming."

My father thought for a moment. "I might be able to help you there."

"I'd be much obliged," Scott said formally. "Maybe we can talk about it this evening."

My father looked at my mother. The only signal she gave him was a smile. Turning back to Scott, he said, "Well, seein' as how you're gonna be bringing my little girl home, you might as well stay for supper. We can talk about it then."

As they left, I saw the twinkle in Scott's eyes.

"You bastard!" I muttered. "You had that all planned out."

"It's a good business move," Scott protested. "Ovid is growing, and there aren't enough apartments here. I've got the cash from my inheritance, and I'm sure I can leverage it into a bank loan to buy that farm. Your father can farm the land and pay the debt service for me. Then I'll free up enough credit to build on the land next to Ovid."

"Oh, it's a good business deal all right," I admitted grimly, "but you used it like a dowry to buy my hand."

He laughed, putting his arms around me. "Oh, come on, Donna. Sure, it works out well, but you are your own person now, just like you wanted. I'll do that deal no matter what you decide. It's good business as we both know. But I love you, Donna, and I do want to marry you."

"Marry me?" I asked in a tiny voice.

"Marry you," he confirmed with a smile.

I was silent for a moment, but I didn't shirk from his arms. Finally, I felt my own arms moving around his waist, and I began to feel the attraction I had felt the night before.

“Well,” I said coyly, “since you’re going to be talking to my father tonight, I suppose you could ask him for my hand, too...”

“Wow!” Diana remarked. “I like that Donna. She sounds like she has cojones.”

“Actually,” I said drolly, “I believe the Judge took away her cojones.”

“There are different kinds of balls,” Diana said with a dismissive wave of her hand. “Just because girls have their balls inside with an entirely different function doesn’t mean they don’t have them at least in a metaphorical sense.”

“So one question,” I said as I refilled her coffee cup. “Donna speculated that some of the transformees who don’t seem to remember who they were might really just be prisoners in their own bodies. Is it true?”

I had asked the question for a reason. I hated to think that my former fraternity brothers might be trapped inside the bodies of my family whom I had come to love as a wife and mother.

“Nope,” she said simply, sipping at her coffee. “For the most part, the Judge lets random chance decide who remembers and who doesn’t, but he hasn’t created a situation like you described—yet.”

I was relieved. “Well, it sounds like the Judge has it all under control.”

To my surprise, Diana laughed. “You think so? Silly girl!”

I didn’t know what to say.

“Well,” she told me, rising to her feet and, with a wave of her hand, redonning her leather and silver tunic, “coffee break is over. I’ve got to get back to the set. See you in the movies!”

She was gone in the blink of an eye, but her laughter lingered on.

Ovid VII: The Director

©1999 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

You would never expect to find a beach in Oklahoma, would you? Well, Sunset Beach was a pleasant surprise. Of course, it was really situated on a clear blue lake called Lake Pelias, and the sand was all trucked in, but on a hot summer afternoon, it was just the place to be.

All the land around the lake was owned by a Brad Nelson. He had trucked in the sand and installed a gravel parking lot. Two dollars apiece got you in past the gate. Then, you could use the bathhouse, rent a locker, ride the merry-go-round, pig out on the overpriced hot dogs and snow cones, or just lie around on the beach and work on your tan. No beer, though. After all, this was a family place and it was Oklahoma.

Brad Nelson would stroll around the beach, chatting with his patrons, even delivering drinks and food if someone requested it. He was a wiry little guy with a full beard, brown with a touch or two of gray. He usually just wore swim trunks and thongs on the beach, so he sported a full, even tan.

Brad was probably Neleus, one of Neptune's sons, I realized. I was really getting pretty good at my Greek and Roman mythology. Of course, living in Ovid tended to do that to you. After a few months in Ovid, you tended to wonder when you met someone (a real someone—not a shade) if they were part of the pantheon of Olympic gods. Then again, he might have been just a pleasant guy named Brad Nelson, transformed by the Judge into the upbeat guy who ran Sunset Beach. I tended to believe he was Neleus, though. After all, if he was, Lake Pelias was named for his twin brother.

"Hi, Cindy!" he called out to me. He didn't look me in the eye, though. Although I had been a woman for several months now, this was my first experience wearing a bikini—in public at least. It seemed that being an attractive woman meant that the less you wore, the more you got stared at—particularly the more impressive parts of your anatomy. I was glad I had been transformed in the fall. That had given me a chance to get used to my new sex before displaying the merchandise so obviously. I kind of liked being stared at, though. When you're a mother of two, it's nice to know you can still get a guy's attention.

"Hi, Brad," I called back, looking up from the romance novel I had been reading. That was one of the occupational hazards of being a woman. I would never have dreamed of reading one of those romances when I was a man, but as a woman, they seemed just about the right thing to read.

"Where's Jerry?"

"Over there," I said, pointing to the handsome man laughing and splashing with the two young blonde children—one a boy and the other a girl—that were our twins. We had all once been fraternity brothers at Notre Dame. Then, we went through Ovid and our lives—and identities—were completely changed. Only I remembered our previous lives, though, and I didn't really care about that any more. We were just the happy young family we appeared to be, and that was fine with me.

Brad turned to the lovely young woman next to me. "And how are you, Susan?"

"Never better," the attractive brunette lying next to me engrossed in her own romance novel replied with a friendly smile. A passerby, seeing her lying there in her white bikini would never have imagined that she had once been one of the top criminal lawyers in the country—and a man at that. She was still a lawyer, but no trace of the man remained. Susan Jager was all woman, and happily married to a man who had once been her wife. Ovid could be so confusing sometimes.

"I saw Steve over playing volleyball with some of his students," Brad said.

"That's Steve for you," Susan grinned. "He can be so macho sometimes." If Brad was in on the true nature of Ovid, he would understand the humor in Susan's statement, since her husband Steve had only been a man for less than two years. Brad gave a noncommittal smile. If he was associated with the gods, he didn't want to discuss it. Some of them did, but most were indistinguishable from the regular citizens of Ovid—and they seemed to prefer it that way.

One of the most distinguishable was suddenly standing before us as Brad sauntered away. She appeared to be about sixteen, with long blonde hair and a pink bikini about the same shade as mine that emphasized rather than hid her ample figure. One look in her dancing eyes made you realize she was no ordinary sixteen year old. She was instead a goddess, her eyes wise beyond her years. She appeared in many different forms in the time I had known her, but somehow, I could always recognize her.

“Why the youthful appearance, Diana?” I asked her, smiling.

She gave me a little girl smile in return. “Because it's the best age to be when you're at the beach.” She plopped down beside us, her breasts sagging so suddenly that a poor teenage boy carrying two cokes nearly tripped and spilled them all over himself. “Old ladies like you are always content to sit around reading romances instead of living them.”

“Now wait a minute!” Susan and I chorused as we threw down our books.

Diana giggled. “So now are you two going to tell me about your love lives?”

Susan smiled sweetly. “Mine may not match yours for variety, but for quality, Steve can't be topped.”

Diana laughed, “I think you've just zinged me. Good one, too!”

It was hard to be catty around Diana. She always appreciated a good cut, even when she was the target. Of all the gods and goddesses who inhabited Ovid, Diana seemed to be the true free spirit. Sometimes, I think she liked us poor humans more than she liked her fellow Olympians.

“So you're going after the high school boys today?” I asked her.

“I might,” she said coyly.

“But first, you’d like to hear a story,” I surmised.

“Got any good ones?” she asked excitedly, turning to smile at a young lad who actually had to shift his swim trunks so his erection wouldn’t show.

“How about Sly?” Susan suggested.

“Yes, I want to see Sly’s story,” Diana said excitedly as she sat beside us. I didn’t blame her. Sly was one of our more interesting new residents. Since the Judge had given me the power to document the stories of our new residents, it would be almost like climbing inside Sly’s mind—and an interesting mind it was, too.

“Okay,” I agreed. “Are you both ready?”

They nodded avidly.

I began to slip into my trance as I mumbled, “Then here we go...”

“So are you going to sleep all day?”

The melodious baritone cut through the fog of my sleep like an icebreaker through thin ice. It was noisy and it hurt. I silently vowed to myself to use a little more moderation the next time I partied. I couldn’t carry on now like I could when I was twenty. Or thirty. Or forty. I groaned, rolling over, my arm flopping out until it landed on a soft mound of flesh next to me.

“Ow, Phil!” a whiny voice cried out next to me. “You bruised my right boob, you dick!”

“Don’t call me a dick or you’ll be looking for work,” I managed to growl. Actresses. You always have to remind them who the boss is, I thought. I didn’t have to even open my eyes to know that the whiny voice next to me belonged to Janice Lamuse, my number one porno—excuse me—exotic star. She had all the acting talent of a walk-on in a high school play, but she could shake those silicon-enhanced hooters all over the screen and make it look like she just couldn’t get enough of that big schlong all those porno—excuse me—exotic actors seemed to have.

“Come on, it’s ten o’clock,” the baritone voice urged. “We’ve got a plane to catch.”

“Plane?” I muttered, rubbing the back of my neck in a vain attempt to keep the back of my head from splitting open. Damned Italian wine. It always sneaked up on me. Sure, it tasted mellow the night before, but this morning, after a couple of bottles of it the night before, mixed with a pack of cigarettes and a line of coke, I felt like shit. No, I take that back. Shit had to feel a whole lot better than I felt.

“Yeah, the plane,” the baritone repeated, over the whimpers of my lovely bed mate. “The one taking us to the location—remember?”

“Fucking movie business,” I grumbled, pushing myself up off soft flesh.

“Ow! now you got the left one!”

“Tough shit,” I muttered, opening my eyes in the bright California sunlight for the first time that day. The baritone was standing in front of me, a grin on his too-handsome face. God, what I wouldn’t give to look like him, I thought. Six-two, muscles that seemed to ripple even when he wore a suit, blonde hair that was bleached almost white from years of surfing, and a tan that would make George Hamilton green with envy—what a package! To get girls in bed with me, I had to promise them a part in my next movie. To get girls in bed with him, all my baritone had to do was smile and look into their eyes. They would be pulling their own clothes off while they followed him to the nearest bed.

“Come on, Sunshine, I need to take a piss and you’re standing in the way,” I growled at him.

Apollo Sun—what a name, huh?—just smiled that little smile of his. “I told you to go easy last night.”

That was Apollo Sun for you—the master of going easy. I was sure it wasn’t his real name. Hell, who in Southern California used their own name if they were in the entertainment business? The lovely Janice Lamuse, for example, was born with a different name, I was sure. Cute name for a porn... exotic actress, I thought. So who knew what Apollo's real name was? Under that name, he had been a professional surfer and won more than his share of championships. Nobody seemed to know where he was from or what his real name was, and I suppose nobody cared. Besides, it was probably something like Apollonius. He was probably named for his old Greek grandfather or something, although he didn't look Greek. I called him Sunshine just to jerk his chain, but he didn't seem to mind.

As he stood aside, allowing me the closest route to the bathroom, I had to admit he was a lucky find. I had been shooting a little Beach Bunny film not too far away from my Malibu digs, and he had been one of the extras. Unlike most of the male bimbos that strutted up and down the beach, surfboards in hand, Apollo seemed to have some smarts. He had asked me about the movie business, and I had given him the answers.

It was funny, I thought as I relieved myself, I took an instant liking to him. That was unusual for me. I think it was because he treated me as if I was an artist and not just another sleaze-ball T&A director. Also, he didn't seem to be interested in showing off his pecs in front of the camera like his surfer brethren. Instead, he wanted to know about the business of movies.

So I told him. I told him that behind all the perceived glamour of the movies, there was a business that was more like running a circus than running a company. There were egos to be soothed, locations to be scoped, palms to be greased, and deals to be done. Most good ideas go down the shitter, and bad ideas get made into movies. Usually, the reality of the movie business is enough to send most guys like Apollo back into the waves playing Surfer Dude. In other words, it's hard work, and most male bimbos don't want anything to do with hard work.

Apollo was different, though. He was actually able to grasp the business end of movies quicker than anybody else I ever saw. I wondered if he was the reincarnation of Jack Warner. Whatever he was, he was a godsend to me. With Apollo on my team, I could stay busy writing and directing and let him take care of the nitty-gritty details. He got a co-producer credit on film, along with me.

Me? I'm Phil Malone. Never heard of me? Well, I'm not surprised. Hollywood is the home of the great and the forgotten. Guys like George Lucas, a classmate at USC, are the great. Me? I'm the forgotten. Mostly, movie buffs remembered me for one film. It was made back in '75 when I was just twenty-seven. The film was called A Night in Olympus. No, it wasn't one of those Clash of the Titans things. It was about a kid whose dad deserted him and his mom died when he was sixteen. He thinks his dad was somebody important and seeks him out, finally confronting him one night at his palatial home. Want to know the ending? Rent the movie—or I guess you can't now.

Anyhow, it looked like my career was going up, up, up. But it wasn't. I only thought it was.

The next movie I was offered was the one that was supposed to put me up there in lights. It was a little story, written by some minor Italian actor named Stallone. I forget his first name. It was about a boxer who takes on the champ—a real David and Goliath story. The only problem was this Stallone guy wanted to play David. I told the studio “no.” He was too short and mumbled his lines. Either I picked the cast or I didn't direct. They caved in. After all, after A Night in Olympus, I was the wunderkid. I picked a young rising star for the part. His name was Matt Cardone, and even though he had never made a movie before, I touted him as the next Brando.

In a word, the movie tanked. Oh, the Italian kid—Stallone—got an Oscar for his screenplay. He went on to be one of the top screenwriters in Hollywood. Me? I got the reputation of being a perfectionist who couldn't bring in the big box-office bucks, even when they dumped an Oscar winning script in my lap.

As I've said, making movies is a business. It may not be like making cars or computers, but it's still a business with a bottom line. When the powers that be decided I couldn't pad the bottom line, my phone stopped ringing.

Oh, I got some little films, but they had limited distribution. Finally, I had to lower my price to even get those films. Eventually, even the little art film companies stopped calling.

To say I had gotten both frustrated and jaded would be an understatement. The frustration led to a few bad habits involving booze and drugs. The jaded part led to a whole new career which, if not satisfying, was at least profitable.

We live in an era of video recorders and hundreds of channels on satellite and cable. Everybody is looking for programming, and it doesn't have to be good. It just needs to be cheap and fill time. See where the jaded part comes in? So I found a whole new career making cheap films. I'd make a little adventure epic à la Roger Corman. You know the type—a lot of action and plenty of T&A to make the viewers forget that none of the players can act their way out of a paper bag. Then you sell them to direct-to-video outfits and cable networks. Then, you take some of the action scenes and splice them to make them into mild porn films. That way, all you have to shoot are the really steamy parts. Of course, I never use my real name as director of the porn films. I do have some pride left, I thought to myself. Not much, but some.

“Are you going to stay in there all day?” Apollo called out.

I squeezed my eyes. There I was, leaning against the wall with one hand, my dick in the other dribbling the last few drops into the toilet bowl. I had practically ruminated my way back to Dreamland. I needed some sleep. I needed a shower. I needed a smoke and a line of coke. I needed...

It took an hour, but I managed to get myself together. I looked more like those guys who spit on your windshield and try to clean it for a buck than I did a Hollywood director. My skin looked pasty under the fading Malibu tan. My gray hair was getting thinner, and my gut showed I hadn't gotten much exercise in years. I wore a shirt that although still flamboyant had not been stylish in five years and some tan Dockers deck shoes with no socks completed my ensemble. For accessories, I chose a pair of cheap sunglasses. Anything to block out the day.

As I re-emerged, looking—I thought—reasonably human, I lit a cigarette and was rewarded with my ever-increasing smoker's cough.

"You need to put that out," Apollo told me. "The cab is here."

"Cab? What's this about a fucking cab?" I muttered, taking another drag of smoke into my lungs. "Since when don't you have a car?" Apollo never seemed to drive the same car twice. "My chariot" he would always call whatever car he was driving. Leased them, he said whenever I would ask him why he seemed to have an unlimited supply of cars. I didn't argue, though. Wherever the money came from, our pictures always made plenty of money. That's what I really liked about him. We were 'co-producers,' but the truth was that Apollo handled the business end. All I did was direct. I liked it better that way.

"My car isn't available now," he said simply. I knew better than to ask more. All I would get was another of his cryptic answers. Sometimes, I didn't know what to think of Apollo. It was as if the kid dropped down here from another planet. Maybe all that surfing affected his mind.

As usual, he had taken care of everything. My bags were packed and being loaded in the trunk of the cab. I knew Apollo would have packed everything I needed. He always did. Damn, but the kid was a find! Janice was already snuggling her ample butt into the faded back seat. Why the hell had I agreed to let her star in my next picture anyway? Oh well, I thought, she'd provide a lot more entertainment than the girls out in...

"Where the hell did you say we're going?" I asked Apollo. "Kansas?"

"Oklahoma," he corrected.

"Oh, yeah," I agreed, throwing my cigarette into the potted plant just outside my front door. I got a breath of sea air. It cleared my head a little bit. The house wasn't much, but the view of the Malibu coast from my deck was worth it. Now, I'd be spending the next three weeks in Oklafuckinghoma making another flick for late night cable. What the hell?—it was a living.

Apollo from the front seat gave the driver our destination as I sagged back into the back seat next to Janice trying to make my head stop pounding. I nestled my head down into her soft breasts and sighed as she stroked the top of my head. I managed to actually fall asleep, hoping that the ride to the airport would take about three days.

"Time to get out!" Apollo called cheerfully only what seemed to be seconds later.

"Let me sleep," I grumbled, trying to burrow further into Janice's breasts.

"Come on," he urged. "We're at the airport."

I opened my eyes and looked around. "What airport? Where the hell is the terminal?"

"It's a private field," he explained.

Yeah, real private, I thought. There was nothing there but a dirt strip that looked far too short for any airplane I had ever seen. Come to think of it, the plane wasn't any airplane I had ever seen. I didn't know much about private planes, but the aircraft poised for takeoff on the strip didn't look quite right. First, its lines were a little too clean and too streamlined. Next, it was hard to tell where the fuselage ended and the wings and tail began since there were no seams. The windows were tinted so heavily that I couldn't understand how the pilot could even see out. There appeared to be no windows at all in the passenger cabin. To top it off, the plane was gold in color rather than the expected silver or white, and there were no markings on it anywhere.

"What the hell kind of a plane is this?" I asked him.

He just grinned. "A very fast and reliable one. Now, if you'll hurry along, we'll be on our way."

Reluctantly, I stumbled out of the cab with a little help from Janice. She steadied me up the stairs to the plane. Funny, I thought, I hadn't seen those stairs before, and I hadn't heard them extend from the plane. I had a bad feeling about that plane. Of course, I didn't like to fly in the first place—especially on private planes.

Inside, the plane would have done Air Force One proud. I swear it actually looked bigger on the inside than it was on the outside. It was bright as daylight, in spite of the lack of cabin windows, and the seats were so plush and luxurious that they made regular first class airline seats look like camp stools. Gratefully, I sank down into one and sighed.

“Bloody Mary, sir?”

“Huh?” I opened my eyes and saw a young woman dressed as a flight attendant. Where the hell had she come from? I hadn’t seen her when I got on board. She was incredible. She was tall, dark hair, laughing eyes, and a figure that made Janice look like some cartoonist’s version of a woman. I mean, she was absolutely perfect in her proportions. She reminded me a little of an actress Apollo had found for our last picture. We used her to play a Xena-type warrior princess, although this girl wasn’t as statuesque. I wondered if the two were related.

“Bloody Mary, sir?” she repeated with a twinkle in her eye.

“Uh... sure, honey,” I managed. “What’s your name anyhow?”

“Oh, just call me Di,” she replied, placing a drink on the little tray next to my chair. “Just call me if you need anything else.”

“I can think of a few things I might need,” I said with a leer. She didn’t seem offended. She just gave me a little smile and walked to the rear of the plane. I swivelled my seat around. “Oh, Di...”

She wasn’t there. I wondered if she had just served the drinks and left. No, there was a compartment in the tail of the plane. It was probably a restroom, I reasoned. She must have gone in there. Funny I hadn’t heard the door open or close.

“Strap in,” Apollo reminded me from the seat in front of me. He was helping Janice get her seat belt on in the seat across the aisle from him, and he appeared to be enjoying every second of it.

We were airborne in moments. It was one of the smoothest takeoffs I could ever remember. Since there were no windows, it was hard to tell that we had even left the ground. No windows was fine with me, though. I've always hated looking out when I fly. I don't like to be reminded of how far down the ground is.

"Is the rest of the cast and crew going to meet us in this... what was the name of the town again?" I asked.

Apollo swivelled around to face me. "Ovid," he replied with a smile.

"And yes, they're going to meet us day after tomorrow."

"Mostly locals?" I asked. It wasn't an idle question. One of the reasons so many movies are made in the hinterlands is that it is easier to avoid paying union scale. Oh, the actors are Guild members: Screen Actors Guild, but you don't have to have a union electrician, for example, every time you want to move a light. Low budget movies like mine had to cut corners to make a profit. One of the best ways was to keep the unions out of the mix.

"Pretty much," he said. "You want to go over the shooting script?"

"Sure," I agreed, accepting a copy from him. I knew the story well. After all, I had written it. It was the typical low budget stuff. The story revolved around a gang of toughs who had taken over a truck stop in a small Midwestern town. The hero—I had signed a former NFL linebacker for the part—was going to team up with a saucy heroine—Janice. She was to be a waitress in the truck stop who falls for the hero and helps him beat the bad guys. There would be lots of explosions, a fair amount of blood, a great rape scene where the waitress's best friend gets gang banged, and of course, a long steamy love scene between Janice and the hero. I had decided to make it a really steamy scene. It would be one of the scenes I showed potential distributors. The film wasn't a challenge. I had made at least half a dozen just like it. In fact, I had written this one over a weekend when I was about half-stoned.

I put a cigarette in my mouth, but Apollo grabbed it before I could light it.

"Hey, what's the idea?" I yelled.

“You can’t smoke on board,” Apollo explained. “It bothers some of the equipment on the plane.”

“Bullshit.”

“No, it’s true,” he insisted. “I think you noticed this plane is a little different.”

“Yeah. So?”

“So to get the speed we need to get there in ninety minutes, we need to keep the cabin pressurized differently,” he told me. “It has a higher oxygen content. Your cigarette might cause a nasty explosion.”

I shuddered. I didn’t understand a word he was telling me, except that somehow, we were flying a lot faster than a commercial airliner and if I lit a match, we were going to be flying toast. “You gotta be shittin’ me. Where the hell did you get this plane anyway?” I asked.

He shrugged. “I know the owner. Don’t worry, though. It’s safe. Shall we go over the script?”

I settled back into my seat. Damn! I could really use a smoke, I thought. Or something. I wondered if Apollo had packed any nose candy in my bag. He’d better have. I hated to think of being stuck in some little burg in the middle of nowhere without something to powder my nose with. Maybe I could get at the bag now.

“Don’t even think about it,” Apollo said suddenly.

I looked over at Janice. She was asleep, so he had to be addressing me. “What?”

“The coke,” Apollo explained. “There’s some in your luggage, but you can’t reach it now. The luggage is in a locked compartment that can only be accessed from outside.”

“What makes you think I was thinking about the coke?” I asked him, truly curious. Sometimes, Apollo could be downright spooky.

“You were licking your lips,” he told me. “You do it whenever you think you need coke. And by the way, you’ve been licking your lips a lot lately.”

“Hey, Sunshine, I thought we were going to go over the script,” I said, trying to change the subject.

“Fine,” he agreed, relaxing in his seat as he looked down at the script.

That’s what I liked about Apollo, I thought as we looked over the script. He might not approve of what I did, but he never got too judgmental. When I mentioned that to him once, he had simply shrugged and told me that being judgmental was for others. It was funny, too, because he never touched drugs or smokes. Booze, sure—every now and then he’d take a glass of wine, but I never saw him drunk.

As we paged through the script of Road Kill Babes—that was the tentative title of the flick—I had to pat myself on the back. It was better than most of the stuff I had written lately. Writing was actually my first love, but even in college, I seemed to show more promise as a director, so I had moved in that direction. My instructors said it was my artistic skills. I was pretty good at drawing, too, making more than one of them suggest I do art direction in films.

But I digress. The story was actually pretty tight. There was just enough sex to get the soft porn guys interested. We’d make two versions of the film. One would be for general cable and satellite distribution. That would be the version with lots of noise and violence. Then we’d throw a few more sex scenes in the longer version, call it the ‘Director’s Cut,’ and peddle it to video stores. What a business.

“Are you sure this Ovid will be right for the film?” I asked him. I wasn’t worried about what the locals thought of our little project. It would probably be like films I had made in some little towns on the fringes of LA. They would be flattered that their little hamlet was going to be in the movies. Everybody from the Mayor’s wife to the town slut would be lined up just to be extras in the film. From our reception, you would think I was James Cameron in to do the follow-up to Titanic. We’d be well out of town before they realized our cheesy little movie wouldn’t be shown on cable until long after these farm folks were in bed.

“The town is perfect,” Apollo told me, “except for the truck stop.”

“What do you mean ‘except for the truck stop’?” I asked. “Janice’s character works in a truck stop. That’s in the script.”

“Yeah, except we don’t use any trucks in the film—just bikes. Don’t worry—I found a bar that will be perfect for it, and it’ll cost us a lot less than a truck stop to rent,” he explained.

“How so?”

“Well, since a bar doesn’t pump gas, we won’t have to pay the owner for sales lost at the pump. And since we’ll get a lot of the filming done during the day, we won’t cut into sales much. I know the owner, so I got us a good deal.”

My eyes narrowed. I smelled a kickback. Not that it mattered, I supposed. So what if Apollo made a little on the side? If the location was right for the film, it didn’t matter. “Is there a big parking lot? We’ve got to have a big parking lot for the scene where Rex gets attacked by the bikers.”

Apollo smiled. He knew he had me. “The parking lot is huge, and it’s right on the highway. Trust me, Phil. This is a great location.”

“So when does the rest of the crew arrive?” I asked him. Or had I already asked him that? Jeez, I couldn’t remember jack shit. I had to start going easy on the wine. Or maybe the coke.

“Cast and crew will be in day after tomorrow,” he replied. “That gives us a day or so to scout out locations. Then we’ll have a week to shoot.”

It sounded good to me. In and out in a little over a week. I could take anything for that long—even a little Oklahoma town. I hoped there was enough coke in my bag, though. I hated to admit it, but Apollo was right. I had been powdering my nose a little too much of late. Yeah, I knew it wasn’t good for me, but somehow, I felt more in control when I took it. It allowed me to focus on the important shit and ignore the rest. At least that’s what I told myself.

By the time we had finished going through the script, I could hear the engines changing pitch and felt the plane dropping slightly. Apollo saw the alarm in my eyes. "Don't worry, Phil, the landing will be just as smooth as the takeoff."

It was, too. In fact, Janice slept through the whole thing. I guessed I wore her out the night before. She needed her sleep. Well, she'd get her reward. She was a fairly decent actress as exotic actresses went, although that wasn't saying much. And she was great in the sack. A film like Road Kill Babes was about as far into respectability as her career would ever go. Maybe some young stud with a lot of money and an inexplicable desire to marry a 'movie star' would notice her and take her off my hands. That's what happened to most girls like Janice. Either that or prostitution. I supposed there wasn't a lot of difference sometimes.

The plane came to a complete stop and the hatch opened, seemingly automatically.

"Great flight," I told Apollo. "May I should thank the pilot for a smooth ride."

"I'll thank him for you," Apollo said smoothly. "He'll be a little busy for a while."

We stepped off the plane and into the bright Midwestern sunlight. The air was hot and sticky, and unlike California, there was no gentle sea breeze to stir it around. I could feel perspiration coating my body. What a lousy place to make a movie, I thought to myself. Welcome to Hickville, USA.

There was no terminal at the airport. It appeared to be strictly a private field, with a couple of hangars housing what seemed to be modest private planes. Our bird was by far the most impressive airplane on the tarmac.

A young man in jeans and a red T-shirt that had 'Oklahoma Sooners' emblazoned on it in white was removing our luggage from the belly of the plane and placing it in the trunk of a white Ford Taurus. Great, I thought. The best Apollo could do was a lousy Ford. I missed my Beemer. Then I took a closer look at the man. There seemed to be something wrong about him. It was almost as if he was transparent. It couldn't be, I realized. It had to be a trick of the heat compounded by the illegal substances still not flushed out of my bloodstream.

At least the car was air conditioned, I noted as I slumped into the back seat, Janice sliding in next to me. She looked as if she had been dropped on an alien world. Janice was even more of a city kid than I was. Raised in LA, she had never been in the wide open spaces before. She obviously didn't know what to think about it. Well, I thought with a chuckle, there were a lot of things Janice didn't know what to think about.

Apollo slid behind the wheel. "We're lucky—the weather can be pretty nasty this time of year."

"And this isn't nasty?" I growled, thinking that it was only June and yet it was uncomfortably hot and sticky. I would have bet that by the Fourth of July, they could cook hot dogs just by placing them in the sun on the sidewalk.

"I'm talking about storms," he explained, slipping the car in gear. "We were lucky we didn't have any storms flying in today."

"Storms?"

"Sure," he said easily. "You know, this part of the Midwest gets some huge thunderstorms this time of year. A lot of them produce tornadoes."

"Yeah, I know," I agreed uncomfortably. I had seen Twister, and come to think of it, that had been filmed in Oklahoma. "Look, you don't think we'll have anything like a tornado here, do you?"

"No," he laughed. "Scared?"

"Of course not," I lied. "I'm just worrying about anything that might upset our shooting schedule. You're sure there's no chance of storms?"

"Not in Ovid," he replied confidently. "We're protected."

Protected? I wondered what he meant by that. I supposed it had something to do with topography. I seemed to remember hearing someplace that some areas tended to have less chance of the violent winds than others. I hoped he was right. I didn't like storms any more than I liked flying. I think it was because both were pretty much out of my control. That's why I had chosen directing over other paths like writing, even though I was probably best at writing. When I was directing, I was in control. I hated the idea of being out of control.

We drove into Ovid, and to say that I wasn't impressed would be like saying water wasn't dry. As a city kid growing up on the coast, I had only seen places like Ovid from the First Class section of an airliner at thirty-five thousand feet. From there, they appeared as neat little grids of squared blocks with one or two main streets and a lot of nondescript houses surrounded by trees. Up close, it looked about the same. As we approached, I could see only a couple of buildings poking above the taller trees, and they appeared to be no more than three stories tall. We were met at first by a collection of metal business buildings with stucco fronts and signs that proclaimed them to be such things as Ovid Well Digging Services and Ovid Farm Implements. There were a couple of car lots and some little fast food joints, the most prominent of which was Rusty's Burger Barn. Hell, I thought, that place is probably the closest thing they have to a five star restaurant.

"Are you sure you grew up here?" I asked Apollo as he pulled up in front of a modest motel that declared itself to be the Ovid Inn.

"Well, I wasn't here very long," he admitted. "My parents moved around a lot."

"That explains it," I muttered. There was nothing about Apollo—even his name—that smacked of a small farm town upbringing. When I had first met him, I had assumed he was, like me, a Californian through and through. It was hard for me to imagine him sauntering down the streets of Ovid on a sultry afternoon. Of course, if he did, I'm sure all the little farm girls would have been wetting their panties just to get a smile from him. Hell, the California girls did.

Reluctantly, I stepped back out into the Ovid heat. It wasn't quite as bad in town as it had been at the airport. More trees, I supposed, to keep it cool. Or maybe I was just getting used to it. I hoped not. The only thing I wanted out of Ovid was out of Ovid. We'd try to shoot the picture in seven days and get out.

The lobby of the Ovid Inn was as nondescript as the rest of the place. It consisted of a bulletin board with the names of local restaurants and attractions, a couple of cheap chairs that looked to be about one step above metal folding chairs, and a reception desk, clean except for a pen, a bell, and a name plate that read 'Z Proctor, Proprietor.' There was no one at the desk, but from a room behind, I could hear the sound of a television blaring over the soft hum of a window air conditioner. I found myself wishing the air conditioner were in the reception area, as it was hot and stuffy.

Apollo rang the bell while Janice and I wilted into the two chairs. In a short time, a tall, wiry man about forty with graying hair, thin on top, and a bushy little moustache meandered out of the back room. All at once, his face broke into a smile. "Well, Apollo, haven't seen you in a coon's age. Where have you been?"

"California," Apollo answered with a disarming grin. "Been doing a little surfing and making a few movies, Zach."

Well, now I knew what the 'Z' stood for. And was it my imagination, or had Apollo picked up a little Oklahoma twang?

The proprietor looked us over. "So how many rooms will you all need?"

"Just one," Apollo replied. "My two friends here will be staying together. I'll be staying out with my dad."

I hadn't realized Apollo's father still lived in Ovid. I supposed his dad would be somewhere on my payroll, too. That was the way things went when you produced movies. There was more nepotism in the movie business than anywhere else I could think of.

"I got a great room for you folks," Zach said. "The beds are something special."

"None of that, Zach," Apollo cautioned. "Just give them normal rooms."

I looked questioningly at Apollo. "Trust me on this one," he said.

"Well, all right," the proprietor agreed, pulling out two keys. "Room one seventeen. It's on this level two doors down from the Coke machine."

Apollo took the keys with another smile. "Thanks, Zach."

Apollo pulled the car up in front of the room, right next to a police car with 'City of Ovid' emblazoned in black on the front doors. City my ass, I thought. There was a cop standing next to the car, lean and alert. He wore mirrored sunglasses that hid his eyes, and his blue uniform shirt was creased with military precision. He looked almost like a Marine standing on the parade ground as he watched us walk up to the car. Apollo nodded a friendly greeting to the cop as he unlocked the trunk, and the cop nodded back without a word.

"Friend of yours?" I asked him under my breath as I pulled my bag out of the trunk.

"An old friend," Apollo confirmed quietly.

"Then what..."

I never got to finish asking the question. I was going to ask what the cop was doing just standing there watching us unload. But as I started to ask, disaster struck. One of the compartments in my suitcase was unzipped, and a small, clear plastic bag containing about half a pound of snow-white powder dropped to the asphalt with a discernible plop.

Shit, I thought to myself as I watched the cop's eyes move purposefully from my face to the object on the ground. I had to make it look as if nothing was wrong. Maybe he hadn't realized what the bag contained. After all, this was a small town. I knew even small towns had a drug problem, but maybe he wouldn't recognize it as a bag of cocaine. I had no choice but to bluff my way through it.

"What's in the bag, sir?" the cop said calmly. His voice was as strong and authoritative as any LA cop's.

"Oh, that?" I said, I hoped equally calmly. "That's just special body powder. You know, to cool the skin? I have it specially blended for me." No city cop would have bought that, but I was hoping he knew who we were and would believe movie people were just strange enough to have body powder blended especially for them.

He put out his hand. "May I see it?"

"It's just body powder," I told him, unwilling to relinquish the bag. My heart was pounding. Two decades of cocaine use without a single incident, and I was about to be busted by a tank town cop.

"May I see it?" he repeated with just a bit more menace in his tone. Reluctantly, I handed him the bag. He hefted it in his hand, finally opening the zip-lock top and dipping his finger into the substance. He lifted the finger to his tongue, placing a small amount there.

He looked up at me. "Interesting body powder. You should tell whoever makes it for you that cocaine is an illegal substance. He should find a substitute."

"Look, officer," I said, reaching slowly for the wallet in my rear pocket, taking it out carefully so he could see it wasn't a threat. "I'm sure we can work something out."

"Look, Phil," Apollo whispered, "that's not a good idea with Officer Mercer."

"Are you trying to bribe me?" this Officer Mercer asked.

"Oh, no," I said quickly. "I just thought you would need some identification." I handed him the wallet. "You see, we're here to make a movie and..."

"I'm going to have to ask you to come with me," he said, opening the back door of the police car and motioning me into the caged backseat. "You, too, Miss," he said with a nod to Janice.

"Why me?" she squealed. "It was his suitcase. There's nothing in my suitcase. I mean, there's no drugs." She looked worried, but I doubted if any of the little sex toys she always carried in her bag were illegal in Ovid. Still, there was no telling. This was the Bible Belt. Maybe just being from California was illegal here.

"Please, both of you, get in." It was more than a request. Somehow, it was an order which had to be obeyed. We both slid into the rear seat together. I think we were both more frightened than we had ever been before.

“Apollo,” I yelled, “get us a lawyer and meet us.”

“I will,” he promised. As we drove away, I wondered suddenly why the cop hadn’t hauled Apollo in, too. Then I remembered that Apollo was from Ovid. Maybe this dad of his was a prominent figure. Cops never liked to pick up relatives of prominent people in any town large or small. Maybe his dad could help us. Suddenly, I wasn’t quite as worried. With any luck at all, we’d be free in a couple of hours and back to making a movie. I had a lot of locations to scout before the rest of the crew and cast arrived.

We drove further into town along what appeared to be the main highway business street, populated with gas stations, fast food restaurants, and even a small strip shopping center. There was even a place called Randy Andy’s, which appeared to be a small strip club. Although it was only mid afternoon, there were already a few cars and pickup trucks parked in front of the place. I suspected this was the place Apollo had chosen for our film’s heroine to be working in. My director’s mind went into high gear, sizing up the property. Yes, it should work. It was just sleazy enough that it should work.

Then I started noticing something really weird about Ovid. I saw several people walking down the broad sidewalks of Ovid on that sultry afternoon. Some looked as normal as could be. Others, though, had that same almost transparent appearance as the guy who had helped us with our luggage at the airport.

I nudged Janice as we stopped at a stop light. “Look at those kids,” I told her, motioning to three young girls in shorts and T-shirts who were waiting to cross the street. “Notice anything odd about them?”

She peered at them for a moment. “Aren’t they a little young for you?” she asked. “I mean, Jeez, Phil. They don’t even have boobs yet.”

“Not that,” I growled in frustration. “Look at them. I mean, really look at them.”

She did, her brow furrowing. Thinking had never appeared to be Janice's strong suit. "So? They're kids—little girls. What else am I supposed to see?"

Our car pulled away, and I slumped down into the seat. Maybe my doctor was right. He said I wasn't taking care of myself. Too much booze and drugs. Maybe I was starting to hallucinate.

Finally, we came upon a gray granite building with Doric columns in front. The words 'City Hall' were carved into the granite above the columns. It looked like every other small town city hall I had ever seen in the movies. There was what I presumed to be a state flag flying next to the American flag. That and a few flowers growing in a bed next to the well-manicured lawn next to the parking lot gave the place a little color. Other than that, the whole place was drab gray.

"Come with me," Officer Mercer said, opening the back door for us. We followed him into the building. Although it was mid afternoon and we were obviously in a police station, there appeared to be no other officers present. I expected to be taken into an office where I would be advised of my rights and given the opportunity to see a lawyer. No such luck, though. I was suddenly aware that he was taking us into a small block of neat, gray cells.

"Now wait a minute!" I barked, coming to a halt. Janice, who had been clutching me fearfully practically fell down when she collided with me. "You can't just throw us into a cell. We have our rights."

I gritted my teeth as Officer Mercer gave me the faintest of smiles. "You're in Ovid now," he said, as if that somehow explained everything.

"I don't care where we are," I argued. "This is still the United States. You can't just throw us in jail. We have laws in this country."

His smile was wider now.

Suddenly, I felt my legs begin to move. I hadn't tried to move them. In fact, I had been determined to stop where I was. Let him try to move me. Then I would have a case for police brutality. But for some reason, I had begun walking toward the cell. I tried to stop, but it was if I was only an observer in my own body. I tried to yell in protest, but my voice seemed to be useless as well.

I could still turn my head. I saw Janice, a terrified look on her face, slowly walking into the cell next to mine. There were fearful tears streaming down her cheeks, and I could tell she had no more control over her body than I did. Then, I lost control of my head as well. I was forced to look straight ahead at the uncomfortable cot bolted to the wall along the far side of the cell. I walked to the cot and sat down, completely unable to stop myself.

“You should be comfortable here,” Officer Mercer said to us. “Your trial will be at ten in the morning. Rest well until then.”

With a sudden grunt, I realized my voice had been restored. “You can’t do this!” I yelled at the retreating footsteps. “Wait until my lawyer gets finished with you!”

Of course, my lawyer was fifteen hundred miles away—maybe more. I had to hope that Apollo would be able to get me a local lawyer. That would probably be better anyway, I realized. A local lawyer could schmooze the Judge and maybe get us off. I mean, who was to say I knew about the drugs? I would just claim someone put them there without my knowledge. I would agree to pay a hefty fine. Then I had to get back to work. We were going to make Ovid famous, after all. Their little town would be in the movies. How much of a fine would they need? Five thousand? Ten thousand? Fifty thousand? It didn’t matter. I’d pay it. I would just take it out of the film budget somewhere. All I had to do was wait until Apollo showed up with a lawyer.

“Phil, I’m scared,” Janice whimpered from the next cell. “What did he do to us?”

Yeah, I thought, remembering suddenly how I had been marched into the cell. How did he do that to us? Hypnosis? I supposed it was possible. What else could it have been? I had been determined not to march into the cell—yet I had. Sure, it had to be hypnosis, I told myself. If it wasn’t hypnosis, it would have to be magic, and everybody knew there was no such thing—right?

I sighed. At least the cell was clean. I bounced up and down on the cot. It was actually fairly comfortable. Well, it wasn't the first time I had been in jail for drugs. There was that time five years earlier in Mexico when I ended up in jail. Take my word for it—the worst US jail has got to be better than the best Mexican jail. As I thought about it, it had only taken a thousand US currency to get out of that jam. That is, a thousand plus the cops kept all my coke.

“Phil?”

It was Apollo's voice. “Back here, Sunshine,” I called happily.

Suddenly, there he was in front of my cell, a wide grin on his face.

“What the hell are you grinning at?” I snapped.

“It's just good to see you,” he explained, wrapping his hands around the bars. “Your lawyer will be here in the morning before trial.”

“Now wait a minute,” I said. “That would mean we have to stay in jail overnight. What happened to bail?”

“No bail in Ovid,” he told me. “The Judge won't allow it. He doesn't believe in it. He always says swift justice is the best alternative to bail.”

“Swift my ass,” I growled. “If I gotta stay here overnight, it isn't swift enough. Who is this Judge anyway?”

Apollo thought for a moment. “Well, let's just say he runs things around here. I'd better warn you, he doesn't like drugs. By the way, you've never dealt drugs, have you?”

I puffed up to my full six one height to face Apollo. “Who do you think I am? Of course I've never dealt drugs. I've been generous to my friends, but I've never charged anyone a penny.”

“That's good,” he said with a nod. “In that case, you'll probably be okay. If you had ever dealt drugs, things would go badly for you.”

“Things are going badly now,” I observed. “I don't see how they could go much worse.”

“Oh, they could,” he said with a grin as he pushed away from the cell door. “Take my word for it, things could be a lot worse.”

“Hey, wait!” I yelled, but he had moved out of my line of sight.

“Who are you talking to?” Janice asked meekly from the next cell.

“Apollo,” I told her. “Didn’t you see him?”

“No.”

How had she missed him? He had to walk right past her cell. I was starting to get worried. There was something that went well beyond strange going on in Ovid, and we seemed to be right at the center of it. I was starting to think only the Judge, whoever he was, would have the answers.

At least they fed us well. Dinner was delivered to our cells. It consisted of a small steak, some French fries, and a slice of homemade cake. The steak was incredible, but there was no file in the cake.

Of most interest to me, though, was the girl who delivered the meal through the slot in the bars was one of those transparent people. I stared impolitely at her as she handed me the tray. She noticed, looking up at me in puzzlement.

“Is something wrong, Mister?”

Her voice sounded normal. For that matter, she looked normal. She was just an average looking girl, slim, reasonably well built, with brown hair and a few freckles. She wore a plaid short-sleeved shirt and jeans, and if it weren’t for her slight transparency, I wouldn’t have been able to describe her five minutes after she left the jail.

“I... ah... was just wondering,” I began uncertainly. “Has anybody ever told you that they could... well, see through you? I don’t mean really see through you, but...”

She looked down nervously, checking to see if her shirt was properly buttoned.

“I don’t mean like that,” I said, trying to clarify my question.

She looked at me in confusion. It was obvious that she didn’t have the slightest notion what I was talking about. She looked solid enough. I mean, she was able to lift my dinner tray without a problem. And it wasn’t as if she was ghost-like. It was just that if I concentrated very hard, I could almost see what was directly behind her.

“Look, I’m sorry,” I finally said. “I just meant that...”

She looked up at me with a grin. “Oh, you just wanted to make me think the twins were peeking out.”

“The twins?”

“Sure,” she said with a grin as she bounced slightly to make her breasts bounce up and down. “I heard all about you. You’re that friend of Apollo’s who makes movies. You thinking about putting somebody like me in your movie?”

Another time and another place, the conversation would have probably led to an interesting evening. We each would have gotten what we wanted. I would have gotten laid, and she would have ended up with a walk-on so she could brag to all of her friends that she knew a famous director who put her in one of his films. Hey, I wasn’t the only sleazy director to play my part in that story. It had been going on since Edison opened his first studio back in New Jersey. It probably even went back a lot further than that. Gee, Mr. Shakespeare, what would I have to do to get a part in your play? Of course, come to think of it, boys played the parts of girls then. Well, maybe old Willie liked boys. Who knew?

Well, there were steel bars between me and the would-be starlet, so all I could do was say, “Show up on the set and I’ll see what I can do.”

That made her happy, and she bounced away happy. I wondered what she would look like on screen. Would she look normal or transparent? With a shudder, I wondered if she would even show up at all.

“Are you okay, Janice?” I asked as I hungrily wolfed down my dinner.

“I’m not talking to you,” she replied quietly.

“Why not?” I managed to say over another bite of steak.

“You got me into this mess with your drugs,” she replied.

“It seems to me you always use some of them,” I pointed out.

“Yes, but they were in your luggage,” she responded, as if this somehow proved her point. Female logic, I thought. It had to be an oxymoron.

I actually got a good night’s sleep that night. There was something peaceful about the jail. It was quiet—none of the expected late-night drunks being rolled in to sleep it off. In fact, I didn’t hear a thing except for Janice moving around in her cell. Also, the cot was more comfortable than I thought. So, it wasn’t the Waldorf, but when Officer Mercer woke me up the next morning, I actually felt rested and ready to go. Besides, I thought to myself, my last drink had been on the plane and my last line of coke almost a day and a half ago. Come to think of it, I hadn’t had a smoke since California. Maybe all that had something to do with how I felt.

Janice and I were led to a small conference room near the cell block. Waiting for us was an attractive woman with papers spread out before her. She wore a powder blue suit and white silk blouse. Although sitting, I estimated her to be about five six or seven with a nice figure and cute face, surrounded by long, well-styled brown hair. As she looked up at us with a smile, I could tell she was wearing contacts. As a director, I could always tell that. Contacts force you to stare just a little bit more. One other thing about her—she wasn’t transparent.

“Hi, I’m Susan Jager,” she said pleasantly with just a trace of the ever-present Oklahoma twang, rising to offer us a well-manicured hand. I noticed as I took it that I had been right about both her height and her figure. “I’m your attorney—with your approval of course.”

Janice took her hand with reserve, sizing Susan up like one wildcat studying another. Of course, Susan was everything that Janice wasn’t. Susan was a trained professional, obviously intelligent and sophisticated. Janice was... well, Janice was Janice. I found myself wondering if Susan was as great in bed as Janice. Janice might have had her there. Then again, maybe not.

"I'm sure you'll be fine," I replied enthusiastically. It was no act. What Judge in the world could help but be impressed with someone like Susan? She was the answer to my prayers. She was a local attorney, she was attractive, and I had a gut feeling she knew her stuff. A woman like her was wasted in a burg like Ovid.

"Then let's get down to business," she said a little primly, taking her seat once more. "Mr. Malone, these are very serious charges."

I leaned back in one of the chairs. "Oh come now, Susan—may I call you Susan?"

She nodded.

"A lot of people use drugs," I went on. "It isn't as if this were heroin or something. It's just plain old coke. Why, I wouldn't be surprised to learn that half of Congress uses this stuff. It's a recreational drug and I don't have to steal to pay for it. Surely that can't be that serious here."

"Have you ever sold drugs?" she asked quietly.

"Sold? Of course not. I make movies for a living; I don't deal in drugs."

"Be careful now," she cautioned. "The Judge will know if you're lying. If you've ever dealt in drugs, I need to know right now."

I leaned forward. "Ms. Jager—Susan—I have never in my life sold drugs." Of course I had provided them to my cast upon occasion, but I had never sold them. Come to think of it, Apollo had asked the same question. Apparently this Judge was a real hard ass when it came to drug dealers.

"All right, then we have a fighting chance," she concluded.

Janice frowned. "A chance for what?" she asked nervously.

"A chance to make sure you are still human at the end of the day," Susan said. As I started to speak, she raised her hand to stop me.

"Don't ask now. We have to be in court in just a few minutes. For your own well being, though, I caution you, this court is not like any court you have ever seen before. The law in Ovid works a little differently. Be respectful—very, very respectful—and tell only the truth. I'll do what I can for you, but if you annoy the Judge, my hands will be tied and you could be in grave danger. Do you both understand?"

I don't think either of us had any inkling of what she was saying, except for the part about being in grave danger. And what the hell was she talking about when she said that bit about being human at the end of the day?

Then I remembered a movie I had made a few years back. It was called 'Magicmaster.' It was the story of a wizard who could change men into beasts. I marketed it directly to Cinemax. They eat that sort of crap up. The X-rated version was called 'Lustmaster's Magic'. Is that what Ovid was all about? Come on, Phil, I told myself, that kind of crap only happens in the movies. I wouldn't have imagined such a thing a day before, but I had seen and even touched transparent people. There was something very odd about Ovid. I resolved to follow Susan's advice.

The courtroom looked like the courtroom I had used in 'Justice Takes a Holiday.' It was really pretty well done for a small town. Either there was big money in Ovid or the Judge had a lot of clout. The room was empty of spectators, though, except for a cute blonde who sat demurely in the last row of the visitor's gallery. Nice legs, I thought as I walked past her. I gave her a smile which was pleasantly returned.

"Who's she?" I asked Susan as we settled into comfortable chairs at the defense table.

Susan laughed, "Oh, that's Cindy—Cindy Patton. I don't think you want anything to do with her. She's married with two kids."

"Married, huh?" Janice jabbed my shoulder angrily. Now, to be honest, I wasn't really interested in this Cindy. Since I had met Janice, I had become a one-girl guy—at least most of the time.

"She's also the Judge's assistant," Susan told me.

“All rise!”

I looked up, surprised to see Officer Mercer acting as bailiff. He’s playing a dual part, I thought. Maybe Ovid didn’t have a very big budget after all.

The Judge was fairly impressive. If I had been casting for a Judge, I would have been happy to pick this one. He was middle aged—forty-five or fifty—with mostly brown hair accented by an occasional touch of gray. He wore gold-framed glasses which gave him a distinguished, almost scholarly appearance. His black robe was neatly pressed, and the shirt cuffs showing out of its sleeves were crisp and brilliantly white.

“Be seated,” he ordered as he sat. His voice was deep and commanding. I was duly impressed.

From the bench, the Judge shuffled purposely through a small sheaf of papers. “Officer Mercer, what is the first case to come before the court today?”

“We have a drug possession case, your honor,” he intoned formally.

“Ah, yes,” the Judge agreed. “We have the People versus Phillip Malone on a charge of drug possession and a Ms. Miriam Finklestein as accessory to drug possession.”

I looked at Janice who was wincing. That was her real name? Miriam Finklestein?

“Your Honor!” Susan broke in.

“Yes, Ms. Jager?”

“Your Honor, I am not aware of an accessory charge that can relate to drug possession,” she explained.

To my surprise, the Judge actually smiled. I could tell he actually liked Susan. I wondered if she was giving him a little on the side.

“Perhaps you’re right,” he said finally. “Officer Mercer, I’m surprised at you. You’ve brought this young lady up on a non-existent charge.”

Officer Mercer showed no change of expression as the Judge went on, “Ms. Finklestein—or if you prefer, Ms. Lamuse—will you please approach the bench.”

Nervously, but with visible relief that apparently no charges would be brought against her, Janice walked meekly to face the Judge, Susan at her side.

“Ms. Lamuse,” the Judge began, “what is your IQ?”

“Uh... my IQ, Your Honor?”

The Judge nodded. “Yes, my dear—your Intelligence Quotient.”

“Uh... one hundred and eighty, Your Honor.”

I nearly fell out of my chair. Janice was a genius? My Janice? The girl who could orgasm on command in front of a camera? The girl that had never uttered an intelligent thought in my presence was a mental marvel? It couldn't be!

“Yet you have chosen as a career being a pornographic actress,” the Judge mused. “Could you explain why?”

“Well,” Janice began, “I guess I just thought this was what was expected of me. I mean, I was a blonde with big ti... breasts and all. And I could memorize lines and deliver them well, so...”

“And you had a father who didn't think much of women,” the Judge continued for her. “In fact, he even told you that women were only good for one thing, didn't he?”

“Yes,” Janice murmured.

“And he showed you what that one thing was on a number of occasions before you were even out of high school, didn't he?”

“Yes,” Janice agreed, her head hanging low.

This was a Janice I had never seen before. I had no idea that she was so smart, or that her father had taken advantage of her. What a prick! If he were standing in front of me, I thought, I'd kick him in the balls for what he had done to his daughter. Hey, I wasn't perfect, but guys like her father made me want to puke.

The Judge apparently was having similar thoughts. "It is too bad that your father is no longer living," he told her. "I would enjoy dispensing justice to such a man. But that isn't possible. Now, we must deal with what he has done. Now, Ms. Lamuse, consider carefully your answer to my next questions. Cocaine was found in the suitcase of Mr. Malone. Did you have any reason to suspect that it was there?"

There was a heavy silence before Janice finally replied meekly, "Yes, Your Honor."

"And do you use cocaine, Ms. Lamuse?"

Susan looked ready to say something, but she bit her tongue and remained silent.

"Yes, Your Honor," Janice replied.

"Then by all rights, since you shared a room with Mr. Malone, you were in possession of the drugs as well."

"I guess so, Your Honor," Janice said with a small sigh.

I had to give it to him, he knew his stuff. I could see Susan looking a bit crestfallen. She had almost gotten her client off, but the Judge had found another avenue to make the charge stick. Susan had been right. This Judge was a dangerous character.

"Don't worry, Ms. Lamuse," the Judge said gently. "Justice in Ovid is not without compassion where compassion is deserved." Then, he did something unexpected. He began to chant. It sounded like Latin, but it could have been anything, I suppose. Languages were never my strong suit. Whatever it was, it seemed to have a noticeable effect on Janice. Her body began to shimmer until it had become somewhat indistinct. Then, it began to grow smaller and darker. Where a buxom blonde had stood moments before, a brunette, somewhat flat-chested of no more than fifteen or so now was in her place, and she seemed to be slowly growing still smaller.

"So, what do you want to be when you grow up, Stephanie?" the Judge asked, looking down at the new girl.

“A nurse!” the girl who had been Janice said in a childish voice, sounding no more than five or so. She swayed back and forth, as little girls do.

“A nurse, eh?” the Judge said. “But you’re very smart, Stephanie. Have you ever thought about being a doctor?”

Janice was smaller still, no more than ten now as a thoughtful look crossed her face. “No...”

The Judge smiled. The little girl that Janice had become was smaller still—perhaps six or seven, wearing a pink T-shirt, white shorts, and sandals. She was not an unattractive little girl, but it was obvious that she would never grow up to be the bombshell Janice had been. “Well, you should,” he said. “You know, you’re a very smart little girl, Stephanie.”

Janice—no, Stephanie—giggled.

“There you are!” a voice called from the back of the courtroom. I turned to see a rather plain woman, somewhat transparent and dressed in an outfit not unlike Stephanie’s, rushing toward the bench. “Oh, Judge, I’m so sorry. Was Stephanie bothering you?”

“Not at all,” the Judge said smoothly. “Stephanie and I were just talking about what she wants to do when she grows up.”

“The Judge said I should be a doctor!” the little girl told her happily.

The woman squatted down to face the little girl. “Well, you’re certainly smart enough,” she agreed. “You’ll need to study very, very hard, though.”

“Oh, I will, Mommy!” the little girl agreed, smiling. Then, back to the Judge, “I’m going to be in second grade next fall.”

The Judge smiled. “Come by any time, Stephanie.”

“Thank you!” she said cheerfully, taking the woman’s hand and skipping merrily out of the room.

I was dumbfounded. I had just seen something that looked as if it came out of one of Hollywood’s top special effects houses, and yet I knew this was no special effect. The woman I had known and slept with for a long time had just been changed into a little girl who apparently had no memory of her previous life. Now I knew what Susan had been warning me about. The Judge had powers I had never dreamed possible. I was most certainly in grave danger. I sensed Janice had been dealt with lightly by the Judge's standards. Yet she had been changed beyond all recognition. Now it was going to be my turn.

"Mr. Malone!" the Judge intoned as the courtroom returned to normal—if anything could be said to be 'normal' about it.

"Yes, Your Honor," I managed to say, a quaver in my voice. I rose unsteadily to my feet. I could never remember being so frightened in my entire life.

The Judge motioned me forward with his hand. When I had managed reluctantly to stand in the place where my former lover had been transformed, he began, "Mr. Malone, you have been charged with bringing an illegal substance—drugs—into Ovid. Do you have any idea how serious that offense is?"

I didn't, but I was starting to get the idea.

"Let me tell you then," the Judge said, without waiting for an answer from me. "If you had been dealing drugs, you would forfeit your humanity, but I realize you are only a user. I also know that you see no harm in using them, or in using people like Janice Lamuse. You are a sleaze merchant, Mr. Malone."

I had to defend myself. "I'm just giving the public what they want, Your Honor," I explained.

His raised an eyebrow. "Oh? Is that important to you, Mr. Malone?"

"I've made it my life's work," I said, trying to sound proud of my accomplishments.

"As far as I'm concerned, Mr. Malone, your 'life's work' consists of one very good film—'A Night in Olympus'—and a subsequent parade of garbage," the Judge growled. "But who am I to argue with the public's taste? Isn't that right, Mr. Malone?"

"The public pays the bills," I replied with a shrug.

"Yes, it does," the Judge said ominously. "I think I have just the thing for you, Mr. Malone. Allow me to introduce you to Marty Bachman."

I turned, following his eyes. "Pleased to meet you," a voice said with a thick, raspy Oklahoma drawl. I looked behind me and saw a man in black trousers and a blue and white striped shirt. He was tall and thin, and his hawk-like nose and receding hairline made me think of Ichabod Crane.

"You will be 'paroled' shall we say to Mr. Bachman." Then the Judge began that strange chanting again. I cringed, expecting changes to envelop my body, but when the chanting had stopped, nothing had changed. I could only feel a small tingle. "Good day to you, Mr. Malone."

The Judge rose from the bench and returned to his chambers. I looked questioningly at my attorney. She actually looked relieved.

"That's it?" I asked. I was so nervous my voice seemed to actually go up a register. "It's over?"

Susan shook her head. "No, it's just beginning, Mr. Malone. But don't worry. Things often turn out for the best. I'm still your attorney, no matter what happens. Remember that."

"Come on," Marty Bachman said, grabbing my arm and pulling me along. I nearly tripped and lost my shoe.

"What's happening?" I asked as he led me to a red Mustang convertible in the parking lot. "Why didn't he change me, too?"

He stopped and looked at me for a moment. Then he burst into laughter.

"What's so funny?"

"Look at yourself in the mirror," he told me.

I looked in the side mirror of the Mustang. I gasped as I realized that my features were changing as I watched. My face had become smoother and less angular, and long, dark—almost black—hair was growing before my eyes. I held a hand to my face, alarmed to find that my hand was now slender, fingernails tipped with a frosted pink glaze.

“What the hell is happening to me?” I screamed. But I knew. I had seen what the Judge could do. If he could change Janice into a little girl, then he could change me into... into...

“Just get in the car, Sylvia,” he said. “I’ll explain everything.”

I turned to him. Moments ago, we had been the same height. I was several inches shorter now. “What... what did you call me?”

“Sylvia. Sylvia Conners. That’s your name now, so you’d better get used to it.”

Numbly, I crouched down into the car. Marty slid into the driver’s seat and started the car. I was too busy looking down at myself to see where we were going. My body was almost a blur, flesh moving and rearranging itself under my white dress shirt and gray slacks that I had been wearing since the day before. As I watched, they, too, began to shift. My shirt was becoming a black knit top with short sleeves and a low neckline that accentuated the two small mountains that were growing like weeds out of my chest. I could feel a sudden pressure as my waist dented inward, the leftover flesh pooling itself on my hips and ass. There was a tickling sensation as the legs of my slacks fused together, turned from gray to dark red, and began sliding up my legs.

“Don’t worry,” he said cheerfully as we drove down peaceful tree-lined streets. “It will be all done in a couple of minutes. Do you still remember who you were?”

“Yes,” I managed to say in a voice that was shockingly high in pitch.

“I’m Phil Malone.” I had to remember that. No matter what happened to me, I was Phil Malone. They couldn’t take away my identity like they did with Janice. Phil Malone. I’m Phil Malone. Phil Malone.

“No, babe, you were Phil Malone,” he chuckled. “You’re Sylvia Conners now. Or ‘Sly’ to your friends.”

Damn. That was the name of the Italian guy who wrote Rocky. Sly—Sylvester Stallone. Even in this, I would be constantly reminded of the failure that had started my downward slide.

“You know, you’re lucky,” Marty went on. “Most people just have to figure out for themselves what’s going on. You’ve got old Marty to help you, though. I’ll tell you everything you need to know to be Sylvia.”

The changes were nearly complete, I realized. Long, almost black hair hung over my newly narrowed shoulders. I could taste something sweet on my lips and realized I was wearing lipstick—and probably a whole lot more, I thought. My breasts were now full sized—or at least I hoped they were, for they stuck out what seemed like a mile from my chest. My dark red skirt came up to mid thigh, leaving my long legs exposed to show dark nylons which went all the way down to a pair of red heels that had to be at least three inches.

“Not bad,” Marty said, looking at me as the changes ended with the appearance of imitation gold bracelets at my wrists and the tug of fairly large hoop earrings at my ears. “You’re not exactly what I had in mind, but I guess you’ll do.”

“Do for what?” I gasped. I couldn’t help it. I touched my breasts and crotch, feeling for the first time the sensitive tips of my nipples and experiencing the feeling of loss as I realized there was nothing male left of my crotch.

“You work for me now,” he replied.

Doing what? I wondered. Was I a whore? Was he my pimp? There was no way in the world that I was going to go down on some guy. I’d die first!

“I’ve got a little place out on the highway,” he went on with a distinctive leer. “It’s called Randy Andy’s. You’ll be one of my girls now.”

“Is it... a strip joint?” I managed to ask.

That brought on a wave of laughter. “No. I wish it were, but there’s no way the Judge would allow that in his precious Ovid. No, it’s just a bar. Your job will be waitressing. It’s mostly drinks, but we serve lunch and dinner. You'll pick it up pretty quickly. The job pays minimum wage, but you keep all your tips. That means the more you swing that cute little ass of yours, the more you'll make. No whoring, though. The Judge doesn't allow any of that, either."

"Whoring!" I practically yelled. "What do you think I am anyway?"

"You're a nineteen-year-old girl with a fake ID that says you're twenty one. That lets you work for me," he said with a grin. "Like it or not, you've got all the plumbing of a nineteen-year-old girl, and that plumbing will be in prime condition. Somebody like you will be tempted to sell that plumbing for good money."

"Why would I want to do that?" I asked indignantly.

"Because the old you has been selling sex for money for a long time, babe," he told me. "I know. I've got most of your movies on tape. Or I did have them. They're probably all gone by now."

That almost disturbed me more than my transformation. "What do you mean they're gone?"

"When you changed, the world changed, too," he explained. "Phil Malone never existed. If you were able to leave Ovid now, you'd find that no one outside had ever heard of Phil Malone. We remember here in Ovid, but even that's not enough to save your movies. Of course, I'll bet the Judge still has a copy of 'A Night in Olympus.' He loves that stupid movie."

I felt faint. This just wasn't possible, I thought. I remembered my entire life as Phil Malone. I remembered growing up, making movies, making love, and doing a thousand other things. Could they really all be gone now—just shadow memories of a reality only I and beings like Marty could recall? And what of who I had become? I looked down at myself. There was a cheap black purse propped against the seat.

"Go ahead—open it," he urged.

I did. There were the usual female possessions—a tube of lipstick, a compact, several tissues, and an imitation leather wallet, well worn and quite thin. Inside the wallet were a few ones and a five, totalling not more than fifteen dollars, and a driver's license made out to a Sylvia Jean Conners. It indicated that I was a twenty-one year old female, but as Marty had told me, the age was phony. I was really only nineteen. I suppose I should have been happy on one hand. I had regained over thirty years of life. No more middle-aged aches and pains for me. No, I was nineteen and in the full flower of youth. Of course, I had a slit between my legs now. I would have rather been a middle-aged man than a female of any age.

"Don't cry, babe—it'll ruin the makeup."

"I'm not crying!" I insisted. I wasn't either. My eyes were just squeezing out a few tears of frustration. This wasn't right. I had done nothing to deserve this. I was an American citizen. I had my rights.

"Take me back to see the Judge. I'll demand my old body back."

"Oh, that's rich!" Marty chortled as we pulled up in front of a wood-framed tavern situated in the middle of a large parking lot. "You'd better hope you never see the Judge again. If you do, you might be a bitch with four legs instead of two. If you think life is unpleasant now, imagine being a cocker spaniel for a while."

I didn't want to think about it. I looked around. There was a large neon sign just off the highway that said 'Randy Andy's.'

"Randy Andy's?"

He smiled. "Clever, don't you think? I came up with that myself."

I was going to be waitress at a place called Randy Andy's? Something told me I would need a baseball bat to fend off the clientele.

"C'mon, babe, I'll show you around," Marty said, leaping out of the car.

Leaping out of the car was out of the question for me. My skirt was tight enough to cut off circulation, and balancing on one heel to stand up was downright impossible. Then, I remembered how I had seen most women get out of a car. I swivelled around on my plumper ass and put both heeled feet on the ground at the same time. As I rose to my feet as a complete woman for the first time, I nearly fell over, not used to the moving weights on my chest. Fortunately (if it could be called fortunate), my widened hips seemed to give a little counter balance to my body. It still wasn't easy to stand, but I managed. Marty got a good laugh out of my efforts. I saw nothing funny, though.

"I'm not sure I can walk in heels," I said nervously.

He grinned. "Get used to 'em, babe. All my waitresses wear them. It's required. It gives you that sexy wiggle when you walk. It makes all the guys want to stick around just to watch."

"I've got to be a waitress in heels?" I shouted. "Look, I can't do this."

"Yes, you can," he insisted. "You don't really have a choice. This is who you are. You don't have any marketable skills. As far as most of these farmers are concerned, you're just one more girl from the wrong side of the tracks. None of 'em would give you the time of day. You're lucky to be working for me. Without me, you'd be on welfare, and believe me, doll, a welfare check won't take you very far."

Was he right? Was I trapped in this role? In this town? I'd better just play along, I realized, until I figured things out.

I was relieved to find the bar was actually fairly clean. Of course, I realized suddenly it was probably women like me who kept it that way. There were two rooms. The first consisted of a long bar with cheap stools padded in dark blue or black plastic. The few tables were along the opposite wall, leaving a wide aisle in between. The second room was actually a little larger. It consisted of more tables, some booths along the far wall, and a large pool table lit by a fancy pool table light advertising Coors Beer.

"Your shift starts at eleven," Marty told me, "and ends at midnight. You get a break from one to four."

Thanks a lot, I thought. That meant I had an eight-hour day with three hours in between. What kind of a life was that? What was I supposed to do during the three-hour break?

"You get Sundays off," he went on as if this was a fantastic company benefit. "We're closed Sundays."

He showed me around the place, acquainting me with my new duties. I couldn't help but think of all the pictures I had made that took place in a little bar like this one. Hell, the picture I had come to Ovid to make was supposed to be filmed in a bar—probably this one, or one very much like it. I always had sleazy girls waiting on tables in those pictures. They usually had big tits and low IQs and liked to show off both. They almost always got laid by the end of the first reel.

Holy shit! I thought. Is that what was going to happen to me? Was that what I had become? As Marty explained the operation of the bar, I stared into the mirror behind the bar at my new visage. Well, I certainly had the big tits. They were out front for everybody to see. As for my IQ, I didn't seem to have lost any points there. I still thought like Phil Malone. Now as for the rest of my body, sure, I was attractive. I had a nice figure and pretty long, dark hair. But the rest of the package? Well, my face was okay, but not great. I had a fairly good tan, but there were a fair number of silky black hairs on the back of my arms, and my face was a little too angular and my nose a little too straight to be considered beautiful. I was fine in the leg department, but my hips were a little wide. In other words, I was small town attractive, but hardly the kind of girl I would have picked to play a sleazy waitress in a bar.

"Are you listening to me?"

"Huh? Oh, yeah," I lied.

Marty studied me for a moment. "Well, pay attention, because we open at ten. That's just five minutes from now. And don't expect to be paid for your first hour. Usually, I'll expect you here at eleven. This is just your orientation period."

I winced at the word 'period,' realizing that would take on new meaning for me now.

"Morning, boss." I turned to see a short, stocky Hispanic man in a white T-shirt and white pants. He had long black hair neatly tied into a ponytail and a thin black moustache. He was also transparent.

"Morning, Sly."

“Morning, Pepe,” Marty said easily. I numbly echoed his greeting.

“Best short order cook in Oklahoma,” Marty said to me in a low voice as Pepe disappeared into the kitchen behind the bar.

“What’s with the transparent people around here?” I managed to ask him when Pepe was gone.

“We call them shades,” he explained. “They’re real—as real as you and I—but they’re... different. You see, all the residents of Ovid fall into four categories. Some are transformed into their current roles and remember who they were—like you. Some are like your friend. They get transformed but don’t remember ever being anyone else. The transparent people are the ones we need to run the town, but the Judge hasn’t transformed anyone into them yet. There was a Sylvia Conners before you arrived, but she was a shade.”

“Where is she now?” I asked. I would have been happy to return this identity to her and move on.

Marty shrugged. “That’s not my department. I don’t know. I probably couldn’t tell you if I did know.”

“You mentioned a fourth category,” I pressed. “Are you in that category?”

He grinned. “I sure am, babe. Don’t ask any more, though. There are some answers you have to come up with on your own. Those are the rules.”

I leaned against the bar, happy to take a little weight off my heels.

“Damn, this is confusing. I need a smoke.”

“No joy there, babe. No smoking is allowed in Ovid. If it helps, I know what you mean. There’s times when I could use a smoke, too.”

“Smoking’s bad for you,” a woman’s voice called out. I turned and saw an attractive blonde slinging her purse on the bar. She was about my new height, but her figure was a little better proportioned than mine, with better breasts and hips. Not bigger, mind you—just better proportioned. Her hair was long and hung loose over her shoulders, and her face was the kind men stared at for hours. She was dressed in an outfit much like my own, but in different colors—a white blouse, royal blue skirt, white heels and tan hose. She was one of the shades, but nobody's perfect. If I were still male, I would have been in love with her. Hell, I was female and I was still practically in love with her. "Hi, Marty. Hi, Sly."

"Hi," I managed, not knowing her name.

"Hi, Shelly," Marty said, filling in the blank for me.

"Honey, you still want to go shopping on our break?" she asked me. "I mean, you don't have to get home to Johnny or anything, do you?"

Oh great. There was somebody named Johnny waiting for me at home. I supposed he was some beer-swilling clod who would want to lay me the minute I walked in the... whatever I lived in.

"No, I can go," I said, faking it. "Johnny's not expecting me until tonight."

She grinned. "He's a great guy, isn't he?"

"Oh, sure. A great guy."

Marty coughed to get our attention. "I'm gonna set up the bar. You guys had better get busy, too."

"Come on," Shelly said with a smile. "I'll get the silverware ready and you fill the water pitchers."

Following Shelly's lead, we got everything set up. I had worked in a restaurant when I was in college, and things hadn't changed much through the years. I was able to act as if I knew what I was doing. After a while, I fell into the routine, just as if I were playing a part in one of my own movies. The lunch crowd wasn't very big, and it was pretty tame. Not too many people ordered any alcohol, settling on tea or soda pop. I guess they all had jobs to go back to. A few ordered a beer, but most of the drinkers sat at the bar, hunching over a liquid lunch. I had done that a few times myself, but I was unsettled to note how dreary just sitting at the bar seemed.

Marty kept prompting me, giving me the names of the customers.

Most were friendly enough, and nobody pulled any funny stuff. I suppose living in a small town meant that a guy's misbehavior in a bar might get reported back to a wife or girlfriend pretty quickly. Still, I was nervous during the entire lunch hour. I kept expecting someone to put the moves on me. A couple of them thought about it, but I shut them down pretty fast. I tried to distance myself from the customers as much as I could.

Tips were sparse. When we saw the last of the lunch crowd leave, with only a couple of boozers remaining at the bar, I counted up the tips. Four bucks. Big deal.

"Not much, huh?" Shelly asked. I showed her the take. "Well, a lot of the lunch crowd are cheapskates, but that's pretty bad. I only got about fifteen."

"Fifteen?" I gasped. Funny, but the day before, fifteen bucks wouldn't have gotten my shoes shined. Now, though, I needed money. I wasn't sure how much minimum wage was, but I suspected it wasn't much.

"How come you got so much more than me?"

"Well, for starters, I'm blonde," she said with a grin. When she saw the pained look on my face, the grin faded. "Hey, look honey, I'm just joking. You were kind of off the mark today."

If only she knew. "What do you mean?" I asked glumly.

"Well," she explained, "you weren't your usual friendly self today. I think the customers noticed. I mean, it wouldn't have hurt you to smile a little."

I certainly hadn't found anything to smile about. I had been out there on a hardwood floor tottering around on three-inch heels taking lunch orders from guys with a pound of grease under their fingernails who sat around making cute comments while they took in my cleavage. Then, I got to heft heavy trays loaded with greasy food and clean up whatever they left for quarters and dimes.

"And wiggle that pretty ass of yours a little more," she went on. "The guys like that. A good wiggle can increase your tips by a bunch. You never had any trouble doing it before. Tell me honey, you didn't get your period early this month, did you?"

Jesus! I hadn't even thought about that. Period? I had to get out of this body. If the waitressing didn't kill me, the period would. What did this Judge have against me anyway? If he wanted to make me fit into Ovid, why didn't he just make me into one of those guys with all the grease under the fingernails? Anything was better than this.

"N... no," I managed. "It's not time for my period." At least I hoped it wasn't.

She gave me a sympathetic look. "Oh, I'm sorry, honey. I know you've been under a lot of stress lately. Are they going to have your car ready today?"

"Car?"

"Yeah. You told me yesterday that there was something wrong with it and that you barely got it in to the shop. Weren't they going to give you an estimate today?"

"Oh, yeah," I managed. At least I had a car. I'd go get it and go over to see the Judge. Maybe there was something I could say or do to get a male body. "Do you think we could go by there first? I mean, maybe it's okay now."

"Sure," she replied. "Let's go."

This was the fourth time I had ridden down the streets of Ovid. The first time, I had a massive hangover. The second, I was in a police cruiser and the hangover wasn't any better. The third time had been with Marty, and I had been too busy handling my transformation to look around. This time, though, I could look around.

Ovid was the poster child for Small Town America. It was neat and clean and looked to be prosperous. The pace was slower, though. As we drove down the main street—creatively called 'Main Street'—I could see shoppers slowly window-shopping in the Oklahoma heat, stopping to greet and talk to friends, and generally taking their time. The majority of them were shades, but nobody seemed to notice or mind.

For that matter, I was starting to think of Shelly as a friend, and she was a shade. I guessed they were just another manifestation of the magic of Ovid, just like I was.

Forester Ford occupied half a block at the far end of Main Street. There was nothing unusual about it. Like many smaller car dealers, it consisted of a large building that housed a showroom in front and a long series of service bays in the rear. The rest of the lot was parking for cars, both new and used, with the newest and shiniest upfront. There seemed to be as many pickups on the lot as cars, which surprised me. Of course, the only car dealership I had visited for years was BMW, and they didn't make a pickup—at least not for American consumption.

Shelly pulled into a parking spot next to the service office. I swung out of her little Capri gracefully enough, as if I had been doing it all my life. I was starting to find out that if I didn't think too much about it, moving as a woman became more natural. I grabbed my purse and walked into the service area.

As a man, mechanics had always treated me as if I knew about cars. The truth is I didn't know a fuel injector from a shock absorber, but that didn't matter. Men always assumed other men knew about cars until they proved otherwise. Now, though, I was a woman. I could have shown the mechanics my Doctorate in Auto Mechanics personally signed by Mr. Goodwrench and they would have still scratched their heads wondering how I managed to get a car in gear to bring it in to them.

"What can I do for you, ma'am?" a shade carrying a clipboard asked. He was a beefy guy dressed in a pair of dark slacks and a white shirt with a nametag that declared him to be Joe Mellon, Service Manager.

"Uh, I brought my car in for an estimate," I managed meekly, completely intimidated by his patronizing look and tone. "I'm... Sylvia Conners."

"Oh yeah," he grunted. "You work over at Randy Andy's, don't you?" The way he said it, he might as well have accused me of working on my back.

“Yes,” I said, feeling my face flush. I hoped he didn’t notice. I was sure that he wouldn’t, though, because his eyes had yet to rise above the level of my breasts.

“Well, you’ve got a pretty sick car,” he said, leading me over to an aging Ford Tempo, its dark blue paint fading badly. “Take a look,” he went on, raising the hood.

I looked down into the engine compartment, not really having any idea what I was supposed to be seeing.

“Things are pretty gummed up in there,” he told me. “For a start, you need a new fuel pump. Then that whole fuel line looks pretty bad. Your fuel injectors are clogged, too. There’s some other things, as well. I’m surprised you even got it in here.”

“How much?” I sighed. In the car, I had looked in my purse. There were no credit cards and the checkbook showed a balance in a neat feminine hand of two hundred and twelve dollars. Something told me there was no money market account in my name that I could transfer to checking, or any other financial resources for that matter. The Judge had made me as poor as the proverbial church mouse. It was a new feeling for me, and I didn’t like it.

“Five fifty for everything,” he said easily.

There was a sinking feeling in the bottom of my newly shrunken stomach. “Can I pay over time?”

He shifted his weight. “Well, to tell you the truth,” he began in a low, conspiratorial tone, “the boss doesn’t like to do that. I could probably arrange it for you if you could do a little something for me.”

“What?” I asked nervously. I wanted that car.

“Well, I figure you and me could go back to that storeroom over there.” He nodded toward a room in the back of the service bay. “You do a little swallow the sausage for me and I think I can get you credit.”

“You want me to do what?” I practically screamed. I would have hit him if I thought it would have done any good.

“Hey, quiet,” he ordered, looking around to make sure no one had heard. If anyone had heard me over the noise in the service area, they didn’t acknowledge it. Then, back to me, “So what’s the big deal? I’ve seen you swinging that ass of yours over at Randy Andy’s. I’m sure you’ve put out for a lot of guys. All I’m asking for is a little blowjob. You do me and your car will be ready tonight.”

“Fuck you!” I growled, turning on my heel and storming away.

“Yeah, we could do that instead,” he called after me.

As I stormed out, I nearly collided with a young salesman, or at least I assumed that’s what he was. He was wearing a tie anyway. “Have a nice day,” he said lamely.

“Yeah, right,” I responded through gritted teeth, not bothering to look back at him.

“So what’s the damage?” Shelly asked as I jumped back into the car and slammed the door.

“More than I’ve got,” I muttered, feeling the sting of tears in my eyes.

“Look, honey,” Shelly said, facing me. “If you need a loan, I’ve got a couple of hundred. Will that help?”

So that’s where I had come to. I was a lowly-paid waitress with big tits and a nice ass who couldn’t even pay to have her car fixed without a loan from another lowly-paid waitress with big tits and a nice ass. I felt more tears flow. “I can’t take your money, Shelly.”

“Hey, it’s just a loan,” she assured me. “You can pay me back, and I don’t need it now.”

It was nice of her, but it still wouldn’t be enough to bail out my car. “I’ll think about it.”

“Okay, then let’s go shopping.”

I put a hand on her arm. “Look Shelly,” I began, “I’ve got something I need to take care of. Could you drop me off over at City Hall?”

She looked at me as if I had just asked her for a ride to the dark side of the moon. I didn't want to explain anything to her, but I needed to see the Judge. There had to be another punishment he could inflict upon me. This one was too harsh. I couldn't stand it any longer. I'd rather kill myself than suffer the continual embarrassment and harassment to which I had been subjected.

"What do you need to go there for?" she asked slowly.

"It's a personal matter," was all I would tell her. "Please, Shelly?"

She sighed, "Okay. Here we go."

We made arrangements for her to pick me up again in time to get back to work. With any luck, though, there wouldn't be a Sylvia for her to pick up by then. It all depended upon how good I was at making a deal. I had been a deal maker all my life. Every picture I ever made had been the result of one of those deals. Of course, I had never tried to make a deal with someone like the Judge before, but there had to be something I could offer him.

As Shelly drove away, I took a deep breath and entered City Hall. I was greeted by a pleasant shade receptionist who directed me to the Judge's office. I had no trouble finding it, and wasn't really surprised to see the pretty blonde from the courtroom—Cindy something-or-other, Susan had told me—seated at the desk in his outer office.

She looked up at me in surprise. "Ms. Conners... did you want to make an appointment?"

I had played this scene with a number of studio executives. "Don't call us; we'll call you," as the old joke went, only they never called. Neither would the Judge. I had to see him now. I couldn't stand to be in this body for another hour. I had to cut a new deal with him.

"I really need to see him now," I told her, glancing furtively at his closed door, wondering if I could make it through there before she stopped me.

She shook her head. "I'm sorry—that just isn't possible. The Judge won't see you without an appointment."

She was doing her job well. It was up to me to do mine well, too. Before she realized what was happening, I had bolted for the door.

“No! You mustn’t.”

It was too late. I had opened the door. The Judge looked up from the papers on his desk, a frown on his face.

“Your Honor, I must talk with you,” I pleaded. “It’s very important.”

“I tried to stop her,” the blonde explained.

The Judge dismissed her excuse with a wave of his hand. “It’s all right, Cindy. Ms. Conners has made her point. You can go.”

Reluctantly, she nodded and left, closing the door behind her. The Judge motioned me to a comfortable leather chair in front of his large oak desk. I seated myself with as much dignity as my short skirt permitted, embarrassed that I had to cross my legs at the thigh in a most ladylike fashion to avoid giving him a beaver shot.

“Now, Ms. Conners, what is so important that you couldn’t wait and make an appointment with me?” His tone was cool. I had a tough audience, I knew. I had to get my point across quickly or he’d throw me out. But as I said, I had charmed many a studio executive into backing my films. Surely I could talk the Judge into seeing I had no business being a girl.

“Your Honor,” I began as respectfully as I could, “I understand your need to punish me for drug possession, but surely there must be something else I can do to serve my sentence. By the way, how long is my sentence as a girl?”

“The rest of your life,” he said without emotion.

“Yes... well, maybe there’s something else I can do. I mean, I could maybe make a documentary for the city—free, of course. I’d be glad to do it. I can promise you that if you make me a man again, I’ll produce the kind of documentary that will really help your town grow.”

I was starting to really get into my pitch, but he suddenly silenced me with a wave of his hand. “You don’t seem to understand, Ms. Conners.

We have a very strict policy on growth here in Ovid. Your Hollywood skills are of little use to us. To the contrary, I think your new identity serves us very well."

"But I don't want to be a girl!" I blurted out. I cursed myself. I was never so emotional in a presentation. It had to be this female body taking partial control of me.

"What you want is of no importance," he said calmly. "You should actually feel very fortunate, Ms. Conners."

"Fortunate?"

He nodded. "Yes, I have no use for people who abuse their bodies by taking drugs. There is a tree in a nearby park who was once a drug dealer. There are also some stray animals who once dealt in drugs. Had I any proof that you ever sold drugs, I would have given you a similar fate."

I shuddered. It was bad enough being a girl. Being a stray dog or something sounded a hell of a lot worse.

"In fact," he went on, "I was very gentle with you. When Marty asked me to make a new waitress for him, he was very specific in what he requested. I modified his request somewhat. Perhaps it's time you realized how fortunate you are."

He waived his hand at me, muttering a few words I couldn't understand. Suddenly, I felt a tingling in my breasts again. With alarm, I noticed they were swelling outward. I could feel my hair growing again. As I pulled a strand of it in front of my eyes, I could see it had turned to a shade of blonde so pale it could only have come from a bottle.

"What are you doing to me?" I asked in a perky little voice that had gone up another half an octave, giving me an almost childish tone.

"See for yourself," he replied as the air in front of me suddenly shimmered and became reflective like a mirror.

I stood up in shock. My hair was now curly and very, very blonde, hanging nearly to my ass. My face had become almost childlike, but there was nothing childish about my makeup, which had suddenly become almost clownish, particularly where the very pink lipstick accentuated my thicker pouting lips. My figure had become something out of a cartoon, with exaggerated breasts and hips and an even slimmer waist. My clothes had changed as well, becoming even tighter and whorish. My feet were now in platform heels, so high I could only guess at their height. I could see at my ankle, there was even a tattoo. It appeared to be of a bird—probably an eagle—taking flight.

“Perhaps you would prefer this version of yourself,” the Judge teased. “I thought it a little extreme for Ovid, but perhaps this would convince you that I mean business.”

“But there aren’t any women like this is nature!” I protested, nearly cringing at the sound of my high, almost childish voice.

“Oh, but there are,” the Judge told me with a leer. “It’s just that most of them have been enhanced with surgery. You’ll be pleased to know that your new breasts are natural—no silicone there. It’s a shame for them to go to waste, though. Perhaps I should give in to Marty’s request and allow strip show at...”

“No!” I screamed, tears streaming down my face, leaving black trails of moistened mascara on my cheeks. I looked away from the image, unable to stand what I had become. “Please, Your Honor. Don’t leave me like this. I’ll do anything—anything you ask, but don’t leave me this way.”

He gave me a solemn stare while tapping the ends of his fingers together. It seemed as if hours were going by with the only sound being my whimpering. I couldn’t remain like this. I knew what would happen to me if I did. Already, I could feel odd new sensations coursing through my body. My crotch was damp and my giant nipples seemed about to explode. I would be out of control in this body. I would be a stereotypical whore. I would be one of the bimbos I had written into my movies, a masturbatory fantasy that would have every male in Ovid ready to jump me.

“Very well,” the Judge said at last. “I’ll make you a deal, but not the one you asked for. Here is what I require. Think of this as one of your tamer movies. You will act the part you have been given. You will be a good little waitress at Marty's bar. You will be feminine and servile while you are there. In return, I will make you into the Sylvia Connors I originally designed for you."

"But for how long?" I managed to ask.

"Why, for the rest of your life," he told me.

My heart sank. What choice did I have, though? The Judge had the very powers I had ascribed to the godlike character in 'A Night in Olympus.' Perhaps he really was from Olympus. Of course. Ovid had written of the gods. Perhaps they had really existed—still existed. But whether the Judge was a god or not, he had divine power over me. I looked down at my exaggerated form with the massive breasts and the large hips that would swivel with inhuman seductiveness every time I moved.

"Do we have a deal?" he asked calmly.

I closed my eyes. "Yes, we have a deal." I felt my body shifting once again. When it was done, I opened my eyes to see once more the attractive but no longer voluptuous version of Sylvia Connors. I would never have dreamed before I had walked into the Judge's office how happy I would be to see this version again.

"You are as you were with one exception," the Judge told me. An exception? What had he done to me. Looking down, I saw it. I still had the tattoo of the eagle he had given me. "It will serve as a reminder to you," he explained. "Should you decide to renege on our deal, you will be transformed into a creature not unlike the one I have shown you tonight. Whenever you feel the urge to break our deal, just look at the tattoo and remember what will happen to you. Am I clear?"

"Very clear," I replied, actually pleased to have a normal feminine voice once more.

"Then our business is concluded," he said gruffly. "Good day to you, Ms. Connors." With that, he returned to the pile of papers on his desk.

I had been summarily dismissed. I rose without a word and left the office.

The blonde—Cindy—looked relieved when she saw me. “Are you all right?” she asked.

“I think so,” I replied. But was I all right? Physically, I felt fine—better than I had as a fifty-year-old man. About the only physical problem I had (other than the fact that I was involuntarily female) was that my breasts felt bloated. I wondered if the Judge had left them a little larger. Also, I was a man in spirit who had just been told that I would remain a woman for the rest of my life. Maybe I could have tolerated being a different woman, but Sylvia Connors wasn’t who I was. I was used to power lunches and being in charge. I was used to a home on the beach, fast cars, and even faster women. I was used to the glamour of Hollywood.

Wait a minute, I thought as I waited at the curb for Shelly, what glamour? Was it glamorous to be always running fast just to keep up with the rest of the world? Was it glamorous to go to bed with women who wouldn’t have given me a second look if I hadn’t had a part to offer them? Was it glamorous to be stoned out of my mind three or four times a week? Was it glamorous to be fifty, looking at waking up every day with a new ache or pain that might not ever go away?

I could do this, I told myself. I could be Sylvia Connors. Oh, it wasn’t my first choice, but I was now young again. I was fairly good looking, especially in a small town. I might not have an education as Sylvia, but I still had my native wits. I’d use my assets to improve my new persona. First, I’d dump this Johnny guy who sat around back at my place while I worked. Then I’d keep my eyes and ears open for opportunities. I wouldn’t let the Judge grind me down. The bastard might be incredibly powerful, but he hadn’t heard the last of Phil Malone yet.

It was a different Sylvia who went back to work at Randy Andy’s that afternoon. I knew the Judge would somehow be aware of what I did, so I resolved to treat my new identity like a role in a movie. I would be the teasing waitress in a sleazy bar that my part called for. I would wiggle my ass seductively and smile at guys who would want me but never be able to have me. I would be as seductive as I could be without getting myself raped.

“Now you’re getting the hang of it!” Marty said with encouragement from behind the bar. I gave him one of the same little smiles I had been giving the customers, and he reacted just like they did, with a happy little smile of his own.

And my god, how the money rolled in. It was only Wednesday night, but you would have thought it was Friday night from the crowd. Most of the tables were filled, and there was a line waiting to use the pool table.

“At least it’ll die off early tonight,” Shelly said. “Most of these guys are working to build that new addition out at Vulman Industries. They all have to get up early.”

“You wouldn’t guess it from the way they’re drinking,” I replied. We were both waiting at the bar for Marty to fill our trays with drinks.

“Oh, that’s construction workers for you,” Shelly laughed. “I used to be married to one right out of high school. He could party half the night and still be at work at sunrise.”

I knew Shelly was a little older than me, but I hadn’t known she had been married. Of course, as a shade, it was hard to tell if she had really been married or just thought she had been. “So why did you breakup?”

She shrugged. “I caught him partying with somebody else. I threw him out, bag and baggage. I didn’t even keep a picture of him as a reminder. You know, you’re lucky you have Johnny.”

“Yeah, real lucky,” I agreed, but I didn’t feel lucky. I had been thinking about Johnny all evening. What was he like? I didn’t relish the idea of going home to a boyfriend. Johnny meant that I couldn’t be myself, even at home. He would probably want me to spread my legs for him the minute I walked in the door. I didn’t think I could do that, but it was probably expected of me—by both Johnny and the Judge.

At least most of the customers were pretty well behaved. Not that they really needed my attention. The Borland twins—Jean and Tina—were apparently fixtures at Randy Andy's, and they kept the boys happy. Although they weren't particularly attractive, they seemed to be spending a lot of their time leading guys on. Occasionally, one of them would lead one of the patrons out into the parking lot, presumably into the cab of his pickup truck for a little action. Better them than me, I thought grimly.

Although most of the customers were in groups, I had one customer who sat alone. He had come in early and had staked out a corner booth. From there, he seemed to be observing the crowd. He would order a beer every now and then, just for appearances, I thought, for he didn't seem to be particularly anxious to drink it.

"Anything else you need?" I asked him in a friendly tone.

He looked up at me. He was a handsome man, I realized. That wasn't something I would have probably noticed before my transformation. Even sitting, he appeared tall (of course I was now much shorter, so all things are relative) with dark brown hair and an evenly tanned complexion. He gave me a wan smile and said, "No, I'm fine. But I suspect there is something you need."

I stepped back a step. Was this a come-on? God (or the gods) knew I had had enough of them during the evening. Most were innocent enough, but it seemed every horny male—in other words, all the males—in the place wanted to take me home as a personal play toy.

He smiled a little broader. "Don't worry. I didn't mean that. In fact, since you used to be a man, I doubt seriously if you would want that anyway. At least now. Of course, if you remain as you are now, it won't be long until you'll actually look forward to it."

I cringed internally at that thought. "Look, Mister, who are you and what do you want?"

"Who I am isn't important. My name wouldn't mean anything to you anyway. As for what I want, I want information, and I'm willing to pay for it in a way you can use."

I looked around to see if anyone was listening to our conversation. Not only weren't the customers listening to us, but they seemed to be unaware we were even there. Also, their conversations seemed muted, as if I were listening to them with cotton in my ears.

"It's magic, of course," he told me. "I can't use it long, though, or I'll be discovered. All I want you to do for me is find someone connected with Vulman Industries—it can be one of these construction workers or an actual Vulman employee—who would be willing to help me with a little industrial espionage. You just need to introduce me—I'll do the rest."

"And what do I get for this?" I asked suspiciously.

"Your manhood back," he said simply.

I gasped. "You can do that?"

He nodded. "That and much more. I can see to it that you are returned to your rightful identity and made immune to the Judge's magic."

"You'd have to be very powerful to do that," I pointed out sceptically.

"You'd have to be as powerful as the Judge, and I think he may be Jup..." I suddenly choked, unable to say "Jupiter." When I stopped trying to say it, the choking stopped.

"Can't say Jupiter?" he asked with a little smile. "See? I can say it. Jupiter. That, of course is who the Judge is; you are correct. Consider that a little demonstration of my power. Now, do we have a deal?"

It was tempting. I had only been female for a few hours, but that was long enough for me to realize I didn't like it. But I was afraid of crossing the Judge. No matter how powerful this man—if he was a man—turned out to be, I would be resisting powers I was only now beginning to understand. The results could be unpleasant at best and fatal at worst. Or maybe there was even something worse than fatal.

"I'd like to think about it," I said finally.

He was silent for a moment. "Very well, but don't take too long. Ovid has a bad habit of growing on its new residents. I can return tomorrow at this same time for an answer."

I nodded in agreement. Suddenly, the noise level in the room returned to normal.

“Hey, Sly!” a big farm boy called out. “How about another round?”

“Sure,” I called with a smile I didn’t feel. I turned back to my mysterious would-be conspirator, but the booth was empty. Not even his empty beer bottle remained.

I was still turning his offer over in my mind as Shelly drove me home.

Home turned out to be a trailer park, and my trailer appeared to be one of the more modest ones—older with a few dents and fading paint that looked bad at night and probably even worse in the daylight. So that was the way it was going to be, I thought. I was trailer trash. I found myself regretting I had ever made that film ‘Tanya, Queen of the Trailer Park.’ Somehow, it seemed as if a number of my raunchier films were coming back to bite me in my newly plump ass.

“Give Johnny a kiss for me,” Shelly said with a smile. “He’s such a sweetheart.”

You want him? You can have him, I thought. I was going to walk through that door to be greeted by some beer-swilling cretin who would want me to spread my tired legs for him. If I killed him, I wondered if I could get Susan to get me off by pleading justifiable homicide. No, with my luck, the Judge would bring him back from the dead.

Tentatively, I opened the trailer door with my key. I wasn’t sure how I knew it was the right key. It seemed as if when you just relaxed and did something, it was the right thing. I wondered if it would work for putting on makeup before work.

There was a light on in the small, modest living room of the trailer, and the flicker of a small television could be seen, reflected against the far wall. To my surprise, though, there was no guy parked in front of it in a T-shirt. Instead, a middle-aged black woman was there. She wore a long, shapeless dress, but it would have been fair to say that she was a few pounds over her ideal weight. Her hair was black with noticeable streaks of gray, pulled back in a bun. Her skin was nice, though, dark and without blemishes. In all, she was not an unattractive woman, but hardly the sort a lot of men would have been terribly interested in. I guess there were worse people to be changed into than Sylvia Conners.

She looked up at me with cheery brown eyes. "Well, well, I see the Judge has gone and made a real person out of you."

"Yes, I'm new," I admitted, "but how did you know? How did you know I still had my memory? And who are you?"

"Well," she chuckled, "I knew you were real because you ain't no shade anymore. That's an easy one. As for knowing you had your memory, you don't act quite like Sly. She was a little more trampy than you. And you don't act like you know what's goin' on just yet. As for who I am, I'm Callie, and I'm your neighbor."

"But, what are you doing here?"

"Lord, you are just full of questions," she commented with a wide grin of perfect white teeth. "I been watching Johnny. What did you'all think?"

"Johnny?" It was starting to dawn on me. I would have come up with the right answer even without the sudden little cry from the next room. "Johnny's a baby?"

"Of course he's a baby," Callie replied. "What did you think? ... Oh, I see," she laughed. "You thought you had yourself a big ole boyfriend, didn't you? Well, that's a good one on you."

She got up and went into the room, returning shortly with a baby, dressed in thin sleeper pajamas. He couldn't have been much more than a year old. I felt sudden relief as I watched the little guy, gently rubbing the sleep out of his eyes.

"This here's Johnny," Callie told me, "and he's all yours."

He was, too. As Callie placed him in my arms, I could see the family resemblance. He had dark hair and fair skin, and an angular little face not unlike my own. He giggled when he looked up into my face. I involuntarily smiled, as if there was something within me that wanted to bond with this little miniature person.

“How old is he?” I asked softly as the little guy reached up with a tiny hand to brush my face.

“He just had his first birthday a couple of weeks ago,” she told me, almost as proudly as if she were the parent. “He’s startin’ to walk, too. Walks pretty good for a porch baby.”

“And the father?” I asked with a nervous tightness in my stomach.

Callie sighed. “I expect you know by now how Ovid works.”

“Sort of,” I agreed, sitting in a cheap dinette chair. Little Johnny was getting heavy.

“Then you know that you got a past. Yours ain’t too good. Your momma was kinda trampy. She moved here about three... maybe four years ago with no sign of your daddy. Then she picked up with some fella from Tulsa last year. They took off for Dallas and ain’t been seen or heard from since.”

In other words, they probably didn’t even exist except in people’s memories. That made things simpler for the Judge. He could makeup somebody like me and not worry about giving me much of a family.

“Anyhow,” she went on, “you was kinda trampy yourself. You picked up with a boy who was just passin’ through. He knocked you up and then left town.”

Another loose end taken care of. In a way, I was relieved. That meant there was nobody waiting in the next room to spread my legs. I wasn’t ready for that and didn’t know if I would ever be.

“So here I am, a trampy waitress in a two-bit bar and a rug rat to support,” I summed up.

She chuckled, “That’s just about the size of it, honey. Don’t you pout about it, though. It could be a lot worse. I heard tell you brought drugs into Ovid.”

“I wasn’t going to sell them,” I pointed out. “They were just—you know—recreational drugs.”

“The Judge doesn’t like drugs,” she told me. “There’s a drug dealer who came through Ovid about a year ago. Now, he’s a big oak tree in one the parks. If you were a drug dealer and not just a drug user, you might be out there makin’ acorns with him.”

I shuddered at the thought. It seemed everybody knew that story. I had no doubt that the Judge could have done that to me if he had wished. My thoughts were interrupted by a tiny hand pulling at my blouse and an insistent squeal.

“What’s wrong with him?” I asked. I had never been around babies. I was the youngest child in my family, and I never sired a child, so holding this squirming creature was a new experience for me.

“He’s hungry,” she laughed.

“Hungry? Well, okay, what does he eat?”

With a smile, she pointed at one of my prominent breasts.

I shook my head. “Oh, no, I’m not going to... I mean, I don’t know how...”

“Here,” she said pleasantly. “Let me show you. First, get that top off.”

I handed her the baby and removed my top, experiencing as I did the swollen sensation in my breasts. Callie helped me pull a breast out of its cup with a minimum of discomfiture. Then, she handed Johnny back to me. Almost at once, he instinctively moved his little mouth up to my waiting nipple. I cringed, expecting a pinching pain, but to my surprise, the sensation was not painful. Instead, I felt a feeling I had never experienced before. It was as if I was one with the baby, letting him suck the milk out of my breast with a contented sigh. I could actually feel the swollen sensation beginning to abate as he worked on the nipple. Suddenly, I sighed, too. The feeling was almost sexual.

“Well,” Callie said, rising to go, “I can see you got the hang of it. I’ll be goin’ now. You’ll sleep tight tonight.”

“Wait!” I begged. “Don’t go. I don’t know what to do with him.”

“Oh, you’ll get it all figured out,” she told me. “Just let yourself go. The answers will be there, all natural-like. Now I need my beauty sleep, so I’ll see you in the morning. You goin’ to work at eleven?”

“I guess so,” I replied.

“Then I’ll see you about ten thirty. We can have ourselves a cup of coffee and talk.”

With that, she was gone, leaving me with a suckling baby. Had it only been—what—a little over twelve hours ago that I had been turned into a woman? It didn’t seem possible, and yet here I was, sitting in a chair in women’s clothing, my bra pushed up as a baby nursed hungrily at my engorged breast. By all rights, I should have run screaming from the trailer and thrown myself off the nearest cliff, but I couldn’t bring myself to seriously contemplate it. I felt oddly satisfied, as if I was... needed. Yes, that was it. In my entire life, I had never been needed, and yet here I was, a nursing mother, needed by this little lump of flesh who was falling asleep attached to my nipple. Without thinking much about it, I shifted him to the other breast. After a small grumble, he settled in on it, relieving the swollen feeling with his tiny mouth.

I had never contemplated having children—at least not seriously. Early in my career, the idea of a family never occurred to me. I was too busy trying to become a popular director. Then, as my career degenerated into the sleazy side of the force, I had begun to think of women as merely objects. I realized as I sat there in a maternal position condition that all women were not bimbos, but the ones I had long associated with were. None of them qualified to be the mother of my child.

Of course, I was little more than a bimbo myself now. Here I was, the proverbial unwed mother, scrambling to make a modest living by swinging ass in some cheap bar, walking the tightrope between being sexy enough to get sufficient tips to live and demure enough to keep from ending up in some patron’s back seat.

Speaking of patrons, what about the man who had offered me a way out of this mess? What if he could really do what he said? If he could, he was probably my only ticket out of this town. I was certain the Judge would never change me back. So that was it. I either took the man's offer and hoped for the best, or I remained Sylvia Conners, resident trailer tramp for the rest of my life.

I looked down. The little guy was asleep. I smiled in spite of myself. This might all be a sham, but it actually felt good to have a part of myself go on, even if it was from Sylvia's genes and not Phil's genes. Since the little tyke was real, that meant he would grow up as a real person. I supposed he had been someone else before, changed by the Judge, but like Janice, he seemed to have no knowledge of who he had been. He was just little Johnny Conners—a baby. My baby.

I carefully put him down in his crib, covering him with a light summer blanket, protection against the trailer's humming ancient air conditioner. I wondered if he was warm enough. Or maybe I should change his diaper. No, he seemed happy. I left him to sleep.

Alone in my own humble bedroom, I stripped out of my clothes, really seeing myself for the first time. Oh, I had seen bits and pieces before. I had, of course, seen my breasts while nursing, and I had had the dubious opportunity to examine myself between my legs while going to the can, but this was the first time I had had to just stand before the mirror and examine the whole package. I wasn't bad, in a small town sort of way. The figure was reasonably good for a woman who had given birth. I mean, the hips were a little wide and the breasts a little large, but there was no excess fat that I could detect. Apparently Sylvia worked to get back in shape after I—she—gave birth. Of course, shagging drinks at Randy Andy's was good exercise, I realized feeling an ache in my calf muscles.

The hair and face were okay, too, but I was wearing too much makeup. Well, maybe I wasn't, given my role in this new life. I didn't look too tarty—just a little tarty. It figured. I was wearing enough makeup to get tips, but not enough to get pawed.

My legs were probably my best feature. They were the sort of legs that in my movies would have required a close-up, panning slowly out to show them walking away in four-inch heels while the ass swayed to the music. Now, I would have to keep them shaved, I realized.

I remembered how in the movies I had made, girls would often stand in front of a mirror, feeling their nipples and massaging their clits as they undulated to the cheap jazz soundtrack. Well, there was no jazz playing, and I didn't particularly want to experience an orgasm looking into the mirror any more than as a man, I would have wanted to watch myself jack off. But I was curious. Having Johnny at my breasts had shown me that the nipples were, indeed, sensitive. What would it feel like, I wondered, to have a man licking those nipples? Would it feel good? Of course it would, I realized, stroking one of them lightly.

As a man, I had never taken very long to get it up. One look at a hot babe and I had a tent pole between my legs. So as a woman, I didn't really think I was doing anything that provocative, for there was nothing getting hard between my legs. The wetness that had begun and the feeling in my clitoris were too subtle for me to recognize until it was nearly too late. I looked down at myself, realizing suddenly what I had done. I didn't want to masturbate. I was just curious. I released my nipples and turned from the mirror.

My body was demanding something, I thought, ashamed that I could feel the sexual needs of a woman so quickly. Perhaps it was part of the magic of Ovid. Would I crave the sexual attentions of men as I had once craved those of numerous women? God, I hoped not. Experimentally, though, I tried to imagine what it would be like, to have a big, strong man slide his dick between my legs and into my...

No! There it was again—that feeling between my legs. I began to cry for no reason at all. My tears were tears of frustration. I was frustrated at being poor, being a woman, being horny. I fell on the bed, sobbing softly to myself. I had to relieve the frustration somehow. No matter what, when I woke up the next day, I would still be poor. I would still be a woman. Damn it, there was no way I was going to be so horny, though. Before my rational male mind could stop me, I thrust my hand back between my legs.

Oh God! It happened quicker than I could have imagined. Who could have known? Who could have known? The wave of pleasure was intense. It began between my legs and at my breasts and spread through my entire being. I gave a sudden gasp and squeezed my eyes tightly shut. Could there be a better feeling in the entire universe? My sobs had turned to whimpers as I basked in the afterglow of my orgasm. Unlike my male self, I felt no urge to fall asleep. Instead, it was as if all of my senses were heightened. No wonder women resented it when their male lovers fell asleep right after sex. Male orgasm was like an explosion, uncontrolled and overwhelming, but gone in an instant. Female orgasm, though, was like the tide, ebbing and flowing with power, but with grace as well. I did fall asleep eventually as the tide flowed in and out once more...

Every now and then, I had read a script where a man gets changed into a woman. He wakes up the next day and stumbles off to the bathroom, unaware that he has changed. Believe me, it doesn't work that way, or at least it didn't for me. When my eyes opened in the morning brightness, I was instantly aware of who and what I was. Of course, it helped that there was the insistent crying of a baby demanding to be fed that brought me back to my new reality. Just the sound of his cries made my nipples become sensitive.

I threw on a worn robe and stumbled into Johnny's room. He was there waiting for me, standing unsteadily at the rail of his crib. He brightened considerably upon seeing me. "Ma-ma!" he called, or something that sounded like that. Babies I discovered have a language of their own. It's just we adults aren't always smart enough to understand it.

"I guess so, kid," I mumbled tiredly as I pulled him up. He was a heavy little bugger, or maybe I was just weaker. And he smelled like the bottom of a cesspool.

"Christ!" I muttered, peeling the disposable diaper off his little rear. At least it wasn't too hard to change him, I thought confidently. Of course, just as I was ready to attach a new one to his little bottom, a warm spray erupted from his tiny penis. I was quick enough to cover him before it streamed upward into my face, but my hand was suddenly wet. Great—a valuable lesson had been learned. Never leave a male baby exposed or you might have the nursery version of a golden shower. I wouldn't make that mistake again.

Nursing was easier the second time, and in a perverse fashion, I again found it enjoyable. It wasn't enough, though. Apparently, a one year old still likes to nurse, but requires other food as well. I was wondering what to feed him when there was a knock at the door.

It was Callie, bright and cheerful. "How you getting along, honey?"

"Okay, I guess," I said. "Look, do you have any idea what he eats now?"

She grinned. "Now that you've had a good night's sleep, let Callie show you the ropes."

She did, too. She showed me where everything was, told me what Johnny liked and didn't like, and even went over a few other things I would need to know to be a successful woman. Thank God for Callie, I thought. I would probably have accidentally killed the baby if I had had to figure out everything for myself. That was a dark thought, I realized. I was actually starting to feel attached to Johnny. He was acute little thing. If I had to be his mother, I wanted to be a good one. He couldn't help who he was any more than I could help who I had become.

Then I made us a pot of coffee. As I poured it, I said, "Callie, you're a godsend. How long have you been here in Ovid?"

"Oh, not long, honey," she said nodding gratefully at the coffee.

"Who were you before? I mean, before Ovid."

She shook her head and chuckled. "Just another woman. Most of us don't talk much about what came before Ovid. It doesn't mean much."

"Oh," I said, sipping my own coffee. At least I wouldn't have to tell her my story. I wondered what she would think if she knew I had been a man.

"I didn't see your car this morning," Callie said over her coffee. It was just Folgers instead of the special Italian roast I was used to, but it felt good to be sitting there with Callie drinking it. Then, when she mentioned the car, my face clouded, as I felt my plight once again.

“It’s still in the shop,” I told her. “I don’t have the money to get it out yet.”

She put a black hand on the back of my arm. “You poor thing. Old Henry on the other side of me—he’s retired and gets groceries and things for me. Why don’t we make up a list of what you and the baby will need and give it to him? Then you won’t have to worry about shopping.”

I agreed that that was a great idea. But there was still one errand that I had to do by myself. While I nursed, I had been thinking about the offer the stranger had made to me. It was tempting. Yesterday, I would have made a deal with the devil to get my old life back. Now, though, I wasn’t so sure. Oh, of course if the Judge had offered me the opportunity, I would have taken it in a heartbeat. But the stranger wasn’t the Judge. In fact, he was probably an enemy of the Judge. I had seen what the Judge could do when he was angry. If I chose the wrong side, I could be endangering my very existence. And what about Johnny? If something happened to me, what would happen to him?

It was funny, I thought. I had really never cared that much about anybody or anything except my career. Now, a little rug rat I had not even known had in a few hours become the center of my thoughts. It was magic, I knew. The Judge had given me a healthy dose of maternal instinct along with my new sex. That was obvious, but it made it no less real.

“Callie,” I asked carefully, “do you think Old Henry could give me a ride this morning?”

Old Henry proved to be a slender, jovial man about as black as Callie. He was bald with just a fringe of white hair over his ears. Callie had said he was retired, but in reality, he was a shade. I suspected the only work he had ever performed was being Old Henry. Still, he was pleasant to chat with, and he told me that he would give my groceries to Callie. He offered to pick me up, but I told him to go on. In truth, I didn’t want him to know what I was up to.

I had looked up the address of Susan Jager's office. She had a Main Street address. How original, I thought sarcastically. The main street of Ovid was 'Main Street.' I was probably going to find that funny for a long time. Still it had made it easy for me. I had simply told Old Henry to drop me off on Main Street. I told him I was going to the bank.

"Farmers' and Merchants'?" he asked.

"Sure," I replied. I had noticed in my checkbook that it was my bank. I had no idea how far her office would be from the bank, but it couldn't be too far, I thought. Ovid didn't look like that big of a town.

Sometimes, you get lucky, I thought with a smile as I stood in front of the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank. There it was, an inconspicuous door right next to the bank proclaiming that the law offices of Susan Jager were on the second floor. I carefully climbed up the stairs, afraid that I would stumble and fall since I was wearing the heels and a tight skirt that I would be wearing at work. At least my practice at work the day before seemed to have done me some good. I had no trouble negotiating the old wooden stairs in my heels.

A fortyish woman sat at a computer in the reception area. She was an attractive shade for her age, with fairly short brown hair just beginning to go gray. "Can I help you?" she asked pleasantly, but I realized that in spite of her manner, she didn't approve of me. There I was, all dolled up for work with my makeup just a little overdone, my white blouse cut a little low, my black skirt just a little short and my heels just a little high. It would have really blown her mind if her desk hadn't blocked her view of my tattoo.

"Yes, I'd like to see Ms. Jager," I replied, trying to sound as professional as I had in the outer office of many a Hollywood producer.

"Do you have an appointment?"

"No, but I think she'll want to see me," I said confidently. It was an old line in Hollywood, but I hoped that the secretarial screen wasn't quite as sophisticated in Ovid.

She studied me for a moment, then called out, "Susan, there's a young lady out here to see you." The word 'lady' had sounded a little forced. I shifted a little uneasily on my heels.

Susan Jager appeared suddenly at the door to her office. She looked at me for a moment, a bit puzzled. We were about the same height now, I noted. Then, a little smile of recognition crossed her face. "Come on in, Sly," she said, eyes twinkling. "Dori, would you get us some coffee?"

When we had settled in with our coffee at Susan's conference table, Dori closed the door behind her, leaving us in private. Susan looked at me with narrowed eyes. "If you've come to get me to talk the Judge into changing you back, you can forget it," she said.

I shook my head, feeling my long hair caress my neck. "No, I know that won't do any good. I've already tried." I stretched my leg out where she could see it. Through the nylons, my tattoo was clearly visible. "I got this as a reminder not to try again."

"Nice tattoo," she commented. "I'd say he let you off easily."

"I suppose," I sighed. "But to be honest, I'd do about anything to get my old body back. I can't say I'm crazy about being a woman."

Susan gave me a little smile. "You'll get used to it. We all do."

I looked at her, stunned. I had never imagined for a moment that this woman before me had ever been anything but a woman. She looked and acted so feminine. Professional, but feminine, I should say. I noticed the wedding ring on her finger. "So he made you into a married woman," I ventured.

She shook her head with another smile. "No, I did that to myself—the married part, that is."

My eyes were wide. "You mean you actually married a guy after you changed?"

"Sure. Why not? It's a little hard to maintain an interest in women around here when you are one. You'll find out all about that. Your mind will say 'no' for a while, but your body will say 'yes.' Eventually, your body will win.”

I wasn't sure I liked the sound of that. Men didn't look that interesting to me. I mean, I could appreciate that some of them were nice looking, but the idea of becoming romantically attracted to one was a little more than I had thought about.

“In any case,” Susan said, getting down to business, “I don't imagine you came in this morning just to discuss this. And if you don't want me to try to get you changed back, what can I do for you?”

“Well,” I began, shifting uneasily in my chair. I seemed to have nothing in my wardrobe except thong panties, and they were riding up a little uncomfortably, “I need to know something. Are you still my lawyer?”

“If you want me to be.”

“I do, so this conversation is confidential?”

She nodded carefully.

“Well, there was this man in the bar yesterday...” I went on to tell her what had happened. She listened carefully, stopping me occasionally to ask a question. When I had finished, I asked, “What do you think I should do? Can he do what he says? Can he change me back?”

“Perhaps,” Susan said cautiously.

“Then should I do what he asks?” I pressed. “I mean, he didn't ask me to do anything illegal. All he wanted me to do was report back any conversations I overheard. What could be the harm?”

Susan sighed, gathering her thoughts. Then, she began, “Sly, have you figured out who the Judge is? Don't try to tell me. You won't be able to speak his name to me. Do you know, though?”

I nodded.

“Then you might remember from your mythology that... beings like the Judge had powerful enemies.”

It was true. As I remembered, they had overthrown the Titans, a pantheon of gods far older than themselves. Most legends even allowed that Jupiter and the other major gods were offspring of the Titans. I nodded again.

"I'm not privy to all the information," Susan told me. "In fact, I think only the ones like the Judge really know all the facts. Apparently some of their enemies weren't destroyed. Instead, they're still out there someplace. In any case, they have made some... probes in Ovid in the past few months. Most of these probes are minor when taken individually. For some reason, though, they keep happening. Maybe in the aggregate, they are important. It's obviously no business of mere mortals."

"So what you're saying is that I should keep my pretty little nose out of this," I surmised. "But what if this is my only chance to get my old life back? If I don't do this, Susan, I'll be stuck as a bar waitress for the rest of my life. You don't know what that's like. You at least got to be a lawyer. You get to wear subtle makeup and business suits and reasonable heels while I have to go around looking like a tart. You're a respected member of the community while I'm trailer trash." There were tears forming in my eyes, and my voice was quavering. I felt so frustrated and helpless as I balled my hands into fists, only to be reminded painfully of who I was as my long nails sunk into the flesh of my palms.

Susan rose and came over to me, putting her arm around me in a womanly manner. "Listen, Sly, it's always hardest at first. I know the offer looks tempting right now. That's why this guy—whoever he is—offered it to you the first day. Things will get better for you, I'm sure."

I wasn't sure. I lived in a trailer, I had a baby, I didn't have enough money to get my car out of the shop, I worked in a bar, and I had big tits. I had done enough movies about girls like I had become to know that my future was questionable at best. "Susan, what can I do? I never did anything to deserve this. What if I'm turning down my one chance to get my life back to normal?"

"Look, Sly," she said squeezing my shoulders in a sisterly hug, "I'm going to give you some lawyerly advice. Go to the authorities about this. Do it right now so there's no question as to which side you're on."

I'll even drive you over."

"To see who?"

She shrugged. "The Judge, of course."

I didn't look forward to meeting with the Judge again. My last meeting with him had almost left me a stereotypical bimbo. When I expressed hesitation though, Susan argued forcefully in favor of it. In the end, I took my lawyer's advice. Years in the movie business had taught me many valuable lessons. One of the most valuable was that it was often disastrous to go against the advice of your attorney. In a matter of minutes, we were in the Judge's office.

It was obvious that Susan and the Judge's secretary, Cindy, were very good friends. I supposed it was natural given that Susan probably spent a substantial amount of time talking to the Judge. In any event, we were shown in immediately. The Judge rose and gently shook Susan's hand, favoring me only with a reserved nod.

"I assume you have advised your client that it is not a good idea to attempt to appeal my sentence," the Judge said to Susan, ignoring me even though I was seated next to her.

"We've come about another matter, Your Honor," she said smoothly. I was relieved to have her doing the talking. The less I had to say to the Judge, the better I liked it.

When Susan finished her story, explaining to the Judge what had happened to me and the offer the stranger had proffered, he looked at me with a stern eye. "You have agreed to come here and cooperate with us unconditionally?" he asked suspiciously.

"I have," I managed to say in a meek voice.

"You realize that you will be Sylvia Connors for the rest of your life, no matter what the outcome of this incident?" he asked.

I had had a pretty good idea that no matter what I did, the Judge was determined to leave me in this form. It could have been worse, I rationalized. I had only been a girl for a day, but in that time, I had been immersed in the role until it was almost starting to feel natural. If I were to help the stranger and cross the Judge, my fate might be far worse, I realized. "I understand, Your Honor."

The Judge visibly relaxed. "Very well. Since we all understand that, here is what I expect you to do. I want you to accept his offer."

"What?" Susan and I interjected at the same time.

"Yes," he confirmed with no change of expression. "You will agree to his terms, whatever they are, and carefully report back to him as he requires. Is that clear?"

Susan and I could only nod our heads.

"Good!" he exclaimed with a wide smile. "Then I believe our business is ended. Good day to you both."

Susan drove me to Randy Andy's so we could talk in the car. "I don't understand," I told her. "Why doesn't he just arrest the guy and change him? He can be me. I'd gladly let him wiggle his ass for tips for the rest of his life."

"Don't be bitter," Susan admonished. "Our meeting with the Judge went well."

"How can you tell?"

"I've been dealing with him for some time now," she told me. "By coming to him, he has given you the benefit of the doubt. That might pay off some day."

Soon, I hoped, as we pulled up in front of the bar. I had to admit, my job was getting easier. Working lunch the day before had been traumatic since I had just been transformed. Now, though, I was getting used to the job. Not that I liked it, mind you, but it wasn't quite so alien. I was quickly learning who the regulars were. Needless to say, they got the best service since a tip a day keeps the bill collectors away. I was also learning how to move so I gracefully avoided the little pats on the butt and peeks down my blouse. For the most part, lunch at Randy Andy's wasn't any worse than lunch at a Hooter's. And the mostly male clientele was pretty well behaved.

Then, half way through the lunch hour, I spotted a familiar face. Apollo was sitting by himself in one of the back booths. He smiled when he saw me approach. "Hi, Sly. How's the meatloaf sandwich today?"

"Which end would you like me to stuff it in?" I growled. I had been making an honest effort to be nice to the customers, but I knew Apollo was directly responsible for my situation.

"Did I do something wrong?" he asked innocently. Damn, he had a handsome face in a boyish sort of way. Even as a man, I had noticed it, but as a woman, I couldn't help but wonder...

No! Apollo was not my friend. "You set me up, you son of a bitch," I told him. "Didn't I read someplace that there was once a God of Truth named Apollo?"

"Speaking," he said with a grin.

"You lied to me!" I insisted. "There was never a movie crew coming here. And you could have warned me what would happen if I brought drugs into Ovid. You knew all of this was going to happen."

"Not exactly," he clarified, "but I knew what would happen if you didn't come to Ovid."

He slid a copy of Variety in front of me. It almost felt like home to see the trade paper of the entertainment industry in front of me. Then, I looked at the date. It was date two months from the present date.

"What kind of a joke is this?" I asked.

He shook his head. "No joke. Just check the page I have marked."

I opened the paper. It was the obituaries page. The name Phillip T. Malone was half way down the column. I dropped the paper to the floor. "This isn't funny," I muttered.

"It isn't meant to be," was his rejoinder. "I assure you, it's real. Or at least, it would have been if Phillip Malone still existed. It says you died of a drug overdose. That's a rough way to go, Sly. Ovid was your only chance."

"You could have told me," I said softly, feeling tears form in my eyes. I think I was crying for the loss of an old friend—me.

“You wouldn’t have believed me. I really did have a movie set up for here, but when you ceased to exist, time changed. The crew is working on other things. They’ve never heard of Phil Malone since he never existed. As far as what the Judge did to you, I’ll admit your possession of drugs probably had something to do with his choice for your new identity, but if I had told you not to bring them, would you have listened?”

I wanted to answer him, but all that came out was a choked sob. He gently took my arm. “Sly, when you were Phil, believe me, I was your best friend. Sometimes, I think I may have been your only friend. Look, give this life a fair shot. There’s an old quote—I believe from the Koran—that says God does not close one door without opening another.”

“Or the gods,” I managed.

“Or the gods,” he agreed.

More customers were coming in, so I wasn’t able to talk to him anymore. I turned to take care of another table. Then, remembering that I hadn’t taken his order, I turned back, but he was gone, as if he had never even been there. Damn, I wished these gods would stop doing that.

Shelly took me home again for the afternoon break. I had to admit to myself that I was really anxious to get back to Johnny. Just being with the little guy seemed to give some purpose to this whole mess. When he was at my breast, it was as if the whole world made some sort of perverse sense. I was really getting to enjoy him.

I took him outside to get some fresh air. In a grassy area near the trailers, he toddled under the trees, happy as a little clam—until a squirrel suddenly rushed by, frightening him. He let out a screech so loud it brought Callie back out of her trailer where she had gone when I returned home.

“Don’t worry, Callie,” I said picking him up. “He just saw a squirrel.

He'll be okay."

The squirrel sat perched on the limb of an old oak tree, chittering a warning at us as he braced to run in case of danger. I found myself idly wondering if the little fellow was another of the Judge's victims. If he was, I suppose there really were worse fates than becoming a cocktail waitress. Johnny shrank in my arms, whimpering.

"Easy little guy," I cooed to him. "It's just a squirrel. That's just Sammy the Squirrel. Can you say 'hi' to Sammy?"

His little blue eyes got wider. I had given the squirrel a name. Something with a name didn't seem quite as frightening. "H-hi," he managed, or something close to 'hi.' He was still a baby in most ways, just learning to be a toddler.

"Maybe you could tell him a story about Sammy," Callie urged.

"Good idea," I agreed, feeling Johnny's fear ebb away. "Sammy is a smart little squirrel, but sometimes he doesn't always get along with the other squirrels..." Before I knew it, I was spinning a tale of Sammy the Smart Little Squirrel. He was on a quest, it seemed, to find his long-lost father. Within minutes, Johnny was smiling again. I took him back inside for his nap.

When I got him to sleep, which required a little nursing, I settled in on my dilapidated couch while Callie watched me from over her knitting. I was exhausted and still had all evening to work.

"That was a nice little story you told him," Callie commented.

"Yeah. It's a little like a story I wrote once." It was, too. It was sort of the children's version of 'A Night in Olympus.' I felt like a plagiarist, but what the heck. After all, I had actually written the story, even if it was in a different existence. Besides, nobody remembered the story anyway. It disappeared with all traces when Phil Malone ceased to exist.

"It has a nice ring to it," she continued. "You should write it down."

"Write it down?" I laughed. "It was just a little tale to help Johnny understand what animals are all about."

“Ain’t that what all children’s stories are?” she asked. “Ain’t they just a way to explain the real world to the little ones?”

I smiled. “I’m not even sure Johnny is old enough to understand the story I was telling him.”

“They understand a lot more than you think,” she told me. “Take it from me. You ought to write that down.”

“I’ll think about it,” I told her. I really didn’t plan to do it, though. Trying to make ends meet and raise Johnny were both full-time jobs, it seemed. I didn’t have time to be a writer.

Maybe that’s what I should have been all along, I thought to myself. Writing was my first love. It was from writing that I got into directing. Directing just seemed to be where it was at. I had a lot more power as a director. Maybe I would have been happier as just a writer. Maybe if I had just written ‘A Night in Olympus’ and let a better director run the movie, it might have been more of a commercial success. All it had really gotten me was a chance to fail at making a boxing movie that nobody even remembered. I hoped that movie disappeared with the rest of Phil Malone.

I didn’t have much time to think about it, though. Shelly picked me up and we headed back to work together as I reluctantly left Johnny behind with Callie. Thank god for Callie. At least Johnny was in good hands. I had never before realized the awesome responsibility of being a parent—particularly a mother. When I left Johnny behind, it was almost as if I was leaving a part of myself in that trailer.

Business on Thursday evening was good. I didn’t have much time to think about my situation or to worry about my mysterious contact. I have to admit, I actually started having a little fun. I had pretty much gotten over my embarrassment about being a girl, and I was starting to feel normal with my long hair brushing my neck and my swaying breasts. I still was a little unsteady on my high heels, and the tightness of my short skirt didn’t improve my balance. At least when I had to sit, it was easy to cross my legs demurely since there was no male equipment to get squeezed in the process. I would have given a lot to have had my male organs back, but I had to admit some things were easier without dick and the gang getting in the way.

I had started to think of my time as Sylvia as a role like the ones in some of my movies. I began to try different things—friendly smiles thrown over my shoulder, an extra wiggle in my walk, a silly giggle. The guys ate it up, and when they ate it up, the tips rolled in.

I was reminded of my double-agent role when a group of people from Vulman Industries came in. There were about ten of them, laughing and talking. They put a couple of tables together and began to order. Two of them really caught my eye. The first was a great looking guy (now where had that description come from?) who appeared to be the leader of the group. He even made sure I gave him the tab. The other was a woman seated next to him—very close to him, in fact. She was very dark—probably Indian or Hispanic, I thought—dressed in a business suit. She had an engagement ring the size of a small state on her hand, and the way she cuddled up to the good looking guy—I think she called him Darren—it was pretty obvious who had given her the rock.

I was sure I had struck pay dirt. These weren't just lowly workers at Vulman—whatever Vulman was. Instead, they appeared to be executives and engineers. Well, the Judge had told me to agree to be a spy. Here I was—Sly the spy. So I listened to what they had to say. Most of it was technical jargon, so I understood about a quarter of it. Apparently, this Vulman Industries was a defense contractor. They made some sort of device that allowed jets to fly longer and faster. I hoped my contact didn't expect me to memorize much of the information since I didn't have the slightest idea what was important and what wasn't. Apparently the Judge wasn't worried about what I told the contact. Otherwise, he would have told me to hold back information.

Ironically, by taking good care of the Vulman people just so I could hear what they were saying, I got a very nice tip for being so attentive. This Darren guy had given me twenty-five bucks.

“What did you do? Give him a blow job?” Marty asked crudely when he saw the cash.

“Right, Marty,” I said condescendingly. Considering the fact that Marty was apparently a god, he was in the lower quartile of the gods. He was as much a competent god as Homer Simpson was a competent nuclear power technician. I wondered which god he was.

Wait a minute, I thought. Bachman. Bacchus. Sure, it fit. Wasn’t Bacchus the fat little wino that fell off the donkey in Fantasia? Well, he might not be fat, but he was certainly around booze. I suppose it figured. Some god. I suddenly realized that I probably needed to bone up on my mythology if I was going to be a resident of Ovid. How many other gods were there? Let’s see... the Judge was Jupiter, Apollo was, well, Apollo. Then there was Marty, or Bacchus. What about that cop—Officer Mercer? Mercer—Mercury? Wasn’t he the dude with the wings on his feet? Well, I guessed it made some sense. A successful cop needed to be everywhere at once. Who better than the fleetest of the gods?

“Well, take care of that new guy who just came in,” Marty ordered with a nod to a newly occupied table. My heart stopped. It was my contact. Well, time to play James Bond, I thought. Or rather Jane Bond.

He looked up at me with his dark eyes. The wan smile was there again. “Well, have you given any thought to my proposal?”

I nodded. “We have a deal.”

His eyes squeezed shut, almost cat-like. “You’ve made a good decision. You won’t regret it.”

I already regretted it, even if I was playing double agent. The Judge was powerful—there was no denying that. But there was a power behind those dark eyes as well—a power beyond mortal understanding. This man—if he was a man—could probably do as much to me as the Judge had done. I was in the middle of some divine war. I felt like the island peoples of the Pacific must have felt in the Second World War when the technically advanced Japanese and Allies wreaked havoc in their lives. I was being asked to choose sides in a conflict I could never hope to understand.

“So what do I do now?” I asked.

“Have you seen anyone from Vulman Industries?” he asked.

“There were some in here earlier, but they’ve left,” I replied. “I didn’t understand much of what they were talking about.”

“Let’s see,” he said softly, placing a hand on my bare arm. There was a sudden disorientation. Then, I could see and hear what had happened earlier in the evening. The entire conversation I had heard with the Vulman people was replayed. They were discussing a flight control system far more advanced than anything that existed. They were not terribly detailed in their comments, but I could tell that they were discussing something secret. Even when they barely whispered, it was as if I could hear every word they said.

Then, suddenly, time returned to normal. I looked around, embarrassed. I had been in a trance for—what?—thirty minutes or so, I was certain.

“Don’t worry,” he told me, apparently reading my concern. “You were only in the trance for a few seconds. Time has a way of moving slowly when you report to me. No one suspects a thing.”

Then, he reached inside his shirt pocket, pulling out a set of car keys held together by twisted wire. “Consider this a bonus,” he explained. “Your car is now paid for. It’s outside in the parking lot.”

I took the keys and stared at them, as if they were made of solid gold. I had wheels! I might still be Sly the barmaid, but I could at least get around Ovid without asking for someone’s help. I wondered what would happen if I just got into the car and headed out of town. I probably wouldn’t be able to do it, I realized. I was probably stuck in this town forever. Besides, what would I do with Johnny? So I guessed I was stuck. At least I had a car.

Then another thought struck me. Why hadn’t the Judge done this for me? I had agreed to help him. Had I really picked the right side? The stranger offered the carrot while the Judge offered only the stick. No, I realized as I turned back to him. My decision had been made. It was bad enough being a double agent. Being a triple agent would be bad—maybe even fatal. “Did you want something...?” I started to ask, but there was no one there. He had disappeared without a trace. I wished he would stop doing that!

I was exhausted when we closed up, but it had been another goodnight for tips. Plus, I had my car. It wasn’t exactly my black BMW 740i, but I was feeling well-pleased as I scooted into the old Ford Tempo. I had no trouble finding the trailer park. After all, the population of Ovid couldn’t have been more than about fifteen thousand, so it wasn’t easy to get lost.

Callie was waiting for me. She had Johnny in her arms. He was furiously sucking on a bottle, little tears in his tiny eyes.

“Honey, I’m glad to see you!” she sighed. “He just don’t want to go to bed ’til he sees his mama.”

“Oh, come here,” I laughed with arms outstretched. It was actually nice to have somebody waiting up at home for me. Even as tired as I was, it seemed to make the whole day worthwhile.

Callie went home, leaving me with Johnny. He was sharp enough to decide he had had enough of the bottle and demand the real thing. I sat down and pulled out a breast with practiced ease, and he happily sucked on it until sleep claimed him.

It was odd how quickly things which had seemed unbelievably strange only a day before were suddenly becoming normal. Breastfeeding, peeing while sitting down, makeup, and wearing heels were all almost normal. It was a life I wouldn’t have chosen for myself, but it was becoming a life I felt I could tolerate. Of course, I would have preferred another job. Being a waitress in a bar wasn’t my idea of a high class career.

Maybe I could get another job, I thought after I had put Johnny to bed and gotten into a short nightie to go to bed myself. No, I realized. That wasn’t likely. I had seen the way other women in Ovid looked at me. As far as they were concerned, I might as well be a cheap whore. I was the trashy broad with the big boobs who wiggled her ass for tips down at Randy Andy's. I kept their husbands and boyfriends out late, drinking beer and leering at my long legs. I was their little sexual fantasy who lived in a trailer and had kids out of wedlock. Why, they wouldn't have been surprised to find my picture in the latest issue of Hustler their men kept hidden in the basement under the sheets of sandpaper. No woman in Ovid would hire me, I was sure. And god help the man who hired me when his wife or girlfriend found out.

I also doubted if there was a job in Ovid I was qualified for which would pay more. Marty paid Shelly and me a pittance, but when you added the tips on top of our wages, we didn't do too badly. In a strange way, the Judge had been consistent when he had assigned me a role, I thought. As Phil Malone, I had peddled sex and vice. Oh, my films weren't really what you would call hardcore, but they weren't the sort of things you'd show to the kiddies. Now, as Sylvia Connors, I was doing the same thing. I was peddling soft porn every time I wiggled my ass, and to some, booze is as much of a vice as porn. Ironical, wasn't it?

I fell asleep with that thought. It may have had something to do with my dreams.

I woke up the next morning with a start. I had been dreaming. I was making a film in the dream. It was one of those soft porn films I did so well. Only this time, I wasn't in the director's chair. Instead, it was me on that bed, looking down at the guy with the unnaturally long dick, moving my long-nailed hands breathlessly over his body. Then things were about to go hardcore, as I sat up ready to ride him, my hands reaching down for his...

I gasped. I was awake. There was no man with a long... long... No, there was no man in my bed. I felt strange, though. There was a wetness between my legs. Wonderful, I thought. Girls have wet dreams, too—only they're really wet.

As I got ready to face the day, I kept thinking about that dream. Apparently, I was going to be your run-of-the-mill heterosexual girl. I had already begun to look at guys as being sexy, although I wasn't sure I was ready to play hide the salami with one. Girls, on the other hand, I seemed to be no longer interested in—at least from a sexual standpoint. Oh, I still looked at them, but more from a perspective of how they dressed or did their hair or makeup.

So it was one Sylvia Conners, single mom and waitress extraordinaire who puttered around the trailer that morning. I handed Johnny off to Callie and headed off to work with an actual smile on my face. Every day seemed to be more... normal.

Until that night.

Friday night was party night in Ovid, just like it is in every other town in the country. Most people had their forty hours in. Now, it was two days of kicking back, doing the yard work, watching a baseball game, or just sitting around on the back patio listening to tunes. First, though, was the ritual of TGIF.

Randy Andy's was really hopping. Even Marty had to take a few drink orders as the tables filled up, pulling Pepe out of the kitchen to pull beers and wash the glasses behind the counter. Nobody was ordering anything from the kitchen anyway. Taco chips and salsa and a bowl of beer nuts and the Friday crowd was happy. More Vulman folks wandered in. I tried to pick up on their conversations, but I was too busy to concentrate on them. So when my mysterious friend came in that night near closing, I had little to give him.

"You need to stay closer to them," he told me as another table of rowdy drunks staggered out to their cars.

"Look," I told him, "you try it. Everybody was thirsty tonight. I couldn't just park by their table and listen in." I wasn't very pleasant when I talked to him. I was tired. My feet ached and my arms were sore from carrying trays loaded with pitchers of cheap beer. I found myself actually glad there was no smoking in Ovid. If I had had to breathe a fog of cigarette smoke while running around, I would probably be wheezing all evening.

"It is in your best interests to cooperate with me," he said between clenched teeth. "You have no idea the eventual fate the Judge has in store for you if I don't change you back."

“What fate?” I asked, suddenly interested—and concerned.

“With every passing day,” he began, “you will become more and more the person you have been transformed into. Sylvia Connors was little more than an ignorant tramp. Her whelp is only the first of many she will bear—all without the presence of a father. Is that what you want?”

“But I won’t...”

“You won’t have a choice. Even now, your body is being filled with new desires, new needs.”

He was right. I could actually feel them. It was like the dream that morning, only stronger. With every passing moment, my sexual orientation was changing. Curious glances at men were becoming longer stares. More than once I had idly speculated at what one of my male customers had under the hood, especially when I noticed something rising in their pants as they looked at my breasts.

“Come with me and I’ll show you,” he said, his voice hypnotic.

“I can’t,” I protested. “We haven’t closed yet.” Besides, I didn’t want to be shown anything—especially by this... creature.

“You won’t be missed,” he replied, brushing the back of my hand, producing an electric thrill through my body.

“But...”

“No buts,” he ordered softly. “Come.”

So that was how I lost my virginity. I suppose I wasn’t technically a virgin any way you sliced it. As a man, I had lost it at fifteen. Sylvia was obviously not a virgin, unless Johnny was the Second Coming. No, I wasn’t a virgin, but it was the first time I had sex as a woman. And I didn’t like it one bit.

Oh, I know, the sensations were enthralling, but there I was, practically in heat, in the small back seat of my own car, grunting and panting as the stranger entered me. He was rough and insistent, and only my hypnotically weakened will and small female body stood in his path. It was not ‘making love.’ Instead, it was ‘having sex.’

As he finished with me, I lay there, still mostly clothed although dishevelled, in a pool of my own sweat. I know, ladies don't sweat—they perspire, but I was no lady. It was sweat, partially from our activity and partially from the heat of the car. Yes, there had been a moment of physical pleasure. It was like nothing I could ever have imagined as a man. But in my mind, I was cheapened. He had hypnotized me into this and might as well have raped me. I was sore and sticky. My god, what if he had actually gotten me pregnant?

“See what you have to look forward to?” he taunted me. I couldn't think of anything to say, so I just glared at him. “This will be your life, Sylvia,” he went on. “With some men, you will find a moment of love, but with most, it will be animal passion. You will be penetrated in every possible way.”

I shuddered as I thought of that. Involuntarily, I looked down at his penis. As a man, I had enjoyed a good blowjob every now and then. Would I now be expected to give them? Of course I would. I pressed my lips tightly together, feeling them slide over the thin layer of lipstick. He rewarded me with an evil smile as he watched my lips. “You will come to enjoy them,” he told me, reading my thoughts by noting the motion of my eyes. “Shall we try one now?”

“Sly!”

It was Shelly. She was out in the parking lot.

“Over here!” I practically screamed.

She rushed over to the car. “Are you all right?” she asked. “What are you doing in the back seat?”

It should have been obvious, I thought, but I suddenly realized I was alone. For once, I was thankful for that little disappearing act these beings all seemed to have.

“Marty said you had to go home. You weren't feeling well. It's not your time of the month, is it?”

“N... no,” I managed. “I was just looking for a comb. I thought maybe it fell back here.” So Marty knew I had left. Was he covering for the stranger, or had he been influenced hypnotically?

She studied me. "Are you sure you're all right?"

I gave her a smile I didn't feel. "I'm fine."

"Okay," she said, not really believing me. "I'll see you tomorrow."

"Right."

As she walked away, I half-expected the stranger to reappear in my back seat next to me and start up where he left off. With a sigh of relief, I realized that wasn't going to happen. I straightened my clothes out the best I could and drove home.

If Callie noticed there was something wrong, she had the good sense to keep it to herself. I wished her a good night and packed her off. Johnny was asleep, so I was alone. That was when I finally let the tears flow.

I just wasn't cut out to be a girl, I thought to myself. It was as if I was living out the lives of the women I had put on film. There was this waitress in 'Backroad Babe' who made it with a stranger in the back seat of her car—just like me. Of course, she had enjoyed it a lot more than I had. I felt... used. I had never imagined what a woman might feel like after such an experience. I suppose in the truest sense, I hadn't been raped. I had been a willing participant in one sense. If my will had been stronger, maybe I could have fought off the trance. I never ever wanted to do that again, though, I thought as I climbed into bed. Never.

Saturday was bright and sunny. In spite of it, I felt like shit. What had ever possessed me to have sex with that... that... whatever he was. But of course that's exactly what it was—possession. I had been magically forced into the act.

"What's wrong?" Callie asked, seeing me outside my trailer just staring into space.

"Nothing," I lied.

From her expression, I could see she didn't believe me. "So how's that story of yours going?”

“Story?” I said, coming out of my malaise for a moment.

She shook her head and sighed. “Girl, you just gotta get yourself together. I’m talkin’ about that cute little story about the squirrel you were telling your little lamb. I told you, you should write it down.”

“I haven’t had time,” I told her. It was true. When did I have time to write out a children’s story? I was too busy just working eating and sleeping... and getting poked in the back seat of a Tempo.

“Write... it... down...” she said slowly. “Then next time you’re too tired to make up a story for Johnny, you’ll have one all ready.”

“I’ll try,” I promised.

Saturday wasn’t much of a lunch day at Randy Andy’s, so it turned out Marty didn’t usually have us come in until four to get ready for the evening crowd. In fact, the kitchen was closed Saturday. Marty had a weekend bartender—some kid from the local college—who handled all of the chores until things got busy. By city ordinance all the bars were closed Sunday, so after that night, I would have a little time to recover. My feet and legs needed it. That was a small town for you, I thought. Raise hell on Saturday but no beer sold on Sunday.

In a way, though, I was sorry that I didn’t have to work. I needed to stay busy to take my mind off my sexual encounter. When Johnny was up and fed, I took him out for a little while. He was still too young to get much out of the playground, but he seemed to enjoy the fresh air and sunshine. Then, I took him to a supermarket I had found. It wasn’t exactly a Ralph’s like in California. It was called Duggan’s IGA. At least I was able to pick up enough food to get me through the next few days. Thank god my long years as a bachelor had made me into a halfway decent cook.

I noticed many of the patrons at Duggan’s were staring at me. The men were obviously interested in my body. I caught more than one staring at my breasts when he didn’t think I was noticing. I could almost handle those stares, though. At least they were looks of appreciation. It was the women's stares that bothered me. They were looking at me as if I had a big red 'A' sewn onto my blouse. I was dressed in a fairly loose blouse and only moderately tight jeans, but they gave me a look that made me feel like I wasn't wearing anything at all. Okay, I thought, so I'm trailer trash—a tramp. I'm an unwed mother who works in a bar and who spends her late nights in the backseat of a car doing the dirty deed.

Please, god, I silently prayed, if you're really out there get me out of this mess. It was a cinch the gods of Ovid weren't going to help me.

When I got home, there was a brand-new gold sports car of a type I hadn't seen before, convertible top down in front of my trailer. I didn't have to guess who was in it.

"Hi, Apollo," I said, looking down into the car.

Apollo grinned. "How you doing, Sly?"

"I see you have your chariot back," I commented, admiring the car and pretending not to notice as Johnny drooled down on it from my arms. Serves him right, I thought.

"You're pissed," he observed, "and I have good news."

"What?"

"Well," he drawled, "tonight is the last night you'll have to play spy. When our friend comes in, just keep him occupied for a few minutes. Then, we'll nab him."

The thought of that slimy son of a bitch being caught actually brought tears to my eyes. Apollo looked at me with concern. "What's wrong, Sly?"

Oh hell, I thought. I had to tell somebody. My sexual encounter was eating me alive. "Come on in," I told him. "I'll feed Johnny and put him down for his nap. Then I'll tell you."

It took me quite a while to tell the story of my little tumble in the back seat. I would pause from embarrassment, then cry from frustration. When I was done, Apollo was sitting on the couch next to me. He tried to put a comforting arm around me, but I pushed it away, bringing on still more tears. I would have to redo my makeup before I went back to work.

"I never want to have sex again!" I cried. "I hate this! I hate being a woman!"

"I don't blame you," he said quietly.

"You don't?" My tears actually stopped for a moment.

He shook his head. "No, I wouldn't want it. Some of the other gods have tried it, but not me."

"You... you can all shift sex?" I asked.

"Not exactly," he explained. "But the Judge can. If any of us asked him, I'm sure he'd do it for us. I just don't want to be a woman. I hear the sex is so good, I'm not sure I'd have the willpower to change back."

"If that's all that's holding you back," I said bitterly, "then don't worry about it. Take it from me—it's not that great." I nearly began crying again.

"Oh, Sly, you were practically raped," he reminded me. "That was just sex. It wasn't making love."

"I couldn't 'make love' to a man," I protested.

"How do you know?"

"I just couldn't," I replied, this time allowing him to put his arm around me. Before I knew it, he turned my head toward his and our lips met. It was a gentle, chaste kiss, but I felt a tingle down my spine. When he released me, I uttered, "What was that for?"

"That was just to show you that love can be gentle," he murmured.

"What are you talking about?" I whispered, suddenly unsure of myself.

"I don't want you using any magic on me."

"I'm not," he said gently. "It wouldn't be right. But tell me, what did you think?"

“About what?”

“The kiss, of course.”

I felt that tingle again just thinking about the kiss. “I... I...”

Before I could say anything else, he kissed me again. Only this time, the kiss was long and charged with passion. What had been a gentle tingle before was now a shudder through my whole body. What was I doing? I was kissing a... a... man. To make matters worse, I was actually enjoying it.

He said he wasn't using magic on me, and he was the God of Truth, but what is truth? Or to be more to the point, what is magic? Maybe love in all of its forms is magic and maybe it isn't. Whatever it was, I suddenly realized that I loved Apollo. Oh, I don't mean in the permanent sort of way. But as Phil, I had loved him as a friend. Now, I could express my love for him in a different way.

Wordlessly, we walked to my small bedroom. We didn't have to say anything to each other as we removed each other's clothing. There was no torrid passion between us—instead, we were succumbing to a gentle but insistent need. He was hard and ready while I was wet and giving in to a pressure to yield. When he finally entered me, it was nothing like the soiled feeling I had experienced the night before. This felt somehow... right.

Because it was a slow and gentle experience for us both, the experience seemed to go on forever, my body locked in a pattern where each sensation in answer to a need produced still another need until...

“Oh my god!” I breathed, not sure if I was uttering a general explicative or speaking directly to the actual god between my legs. The sensation was like nothing I had ever imagined. Friday night in the car had been rough, and the little pleasure I had experienced from the act was outweighed by the psychological pain of knowing it was just an animal act. In Apollo's arms though, I felt a sense of rebirth. If the Judge had appeared in my bedroom that moment and offered to change me back into a man, I would have emphatically said ‘no.’ I never wanted to lose the feeling I now had.

As a man, I usually fell asleep after making love. Now, though, as a woman, I was wide-awake, revelling in the ebbing orgasm, delighting in every tingle it gave me. Apollo was awake as well, gently moving his hands over my body, actually heightening the experience.

“That was incredible,” I whispered softly.

He smiled.

My reverie was broken by the sudden wail of a baby. “I’ve got to take care of Johnny,” I told him, reluctant to leave the bed.

Before I left, he took my hand. “Be well,” he said.

I rushed in to find Johnny standing up in his crib, wet and hungry. “Poor little guy,” I cooed, snatching him up to show him to Apollo. But when I got into my bedroom, there was no sign of him. Only the ebbing sensations in my own body were evidence that he had ever been there.

Oh well, I thought as I changed Johnny. Wasn’t that the way I had treated women? Wham! Bam! Thank you, ma’am! No, it wasn’t really like that. The Phil side of me probably wasn’t sensitive enough to understand what Apollo had done for me, but the Sylvia side knew. Apollo had wanted to show me that there could be fulfillment for me as a woman. I was beginning to accept that, I realized, and accept it more each time Johnny’s hungry mouth reached up for my breast.

And there he was, I thought with a smile as he greedily latched on to my nipple. I felt a sense of warmth once more. It wasn’t like my orgasm, but in its own way, it was equally satisfying.

I still had some time before work, so I got Johnny dressed and we made an excursion to the Ovid Public Library. To be honest, I hadn’t been in a library since I was in college, so I didn’t really know what to expect.

The library itself was located about a block from City Hall. It was in an old gray stone building, complete with two small stone lions in front. I know it was my imagination, but the eyes on both of the lions seemed to follow me as I approached the library steps.

My first impression inside was that the library was small, but as I perused the Mythology and Folklore section, I was pleased to find it well stocked. 'And why shouldn't it be?' I thought. Books on Greek and Roman mythology were like a Who's Who of Ovid.

I found one that seemed to have a pretty good description of the gods. Out of curiosity, I looked up Jupiter. I just scanned the lengthy section on him, but the old boy had quite a varied history. He was accused of more affairs than Bill Clinton, and seemed to be the illegitimate father of about half of the gods. Now, though, he was a straight-laced judge in a small Oklahoma town. Talk about a career change!

Officer Mercer was there, too, as Mercury, the swift messenger of the gods. The book didn't have a lot about Marty, though. Apparently, Bacchus wasn't much of a big fish. Of course, I had a basic knowledge of mythology, gained when I had written 'A Night in Olympus,' but that had been very basic since the magic of the gods was only hinted at in the film. I was learning all sorts of details about the gods I had never known before. I was just turning to the section on Apollo when Johnny let out a demanding grunt. I looked up to see that other library patrons were giving me cold looks that said I should keep my kid quiet in the library.

I looked over to see what he had caught his interest. It was the children's section, highlighted by a cut-out of a happy cat in a red and white hat holding a Dr Seuss book.

"Oh, all right," I told him. "Let's see if they have a book for you, too."

The section brought back memories. There were books that I remembered reading but hadn't seen since I was a small child. As I looked through them, I kept comparing them to the story of Sammy the Smart Squirrel that I had been telling Johnny. The thought that kept running through my mind was that the story of Sammy was every bit as good as many of these books. I hadn't been a bad artist in college. I thought if I wanted to, I could even illustrate a book. Well, maybe someday I would get around to it. I picked up three books for little Johnny.

I wasn't surprised to find out that Sylvia Connors did not have a library card. I quickly filled out an application for one while the librarian stared at me as if I were a vegetarian trying to order a steak. Apparently, barmaids weren't expected to read in Ovid. Well, screw them. I'd read War and Peace in the original Russian if I thought it would get their goats.

I got back to my trailer and dropped Johnny off with Callie. The time had come for me to go to work. I had mixed feelings about what was supposed to happen that evening. On one hand, I was proving my loyalty to the Judge. That should be worth something, I thought. Okay, so he wouldn't change me back, but maybe he could use a little of his magic to give me a little respect. I could continue to be Sylvia, but maybe Sylvia could be a teacher or a secretary or a bank teller. There was no reason why he had to leave me as a waitress in a bar.

On the other hand, though, I might have picked the wrong side if I had any hope of getting my old life back. Maybe my contact did have the power to change me back. I might be giving up my only opportunity to ever return to my old life again.

I think it was at that moment that I realized that although I didn't want to be a waitress in a bar for the rest of my life, I wasn't too sure I wanted my old life back. In the first place, it might kill me. Even if I could avoid the drug overdose that Apollo said was to kill me, what did I have to look forward to? I was middle-aged, alone, a virtual failure in my profession, reduced to cranking out cheap, sleazy films to satisfy a prurient, indiscriminating audience. And the worst thing about having my old life back would be that I would lose Johnny.

'Ah, Johnny,' I thought as I drove to work. I loved to see him smile, and when I heard him cry, it nearly broke my heart. I could never remember being so close to anyone else in my entire life. I wanted to see him grow and learn. I wanted to be there his first day in school. I wanted to teach him how to be the man I had failed to be. I wanted... I wanted to be his... mother.

“You’re late!” Marty growled. Actually, I wasn’t, but Marty always set his clocks a few minutes early so he could hustle everyone out at closing time.

“Sorry, Marty,” I replied contritely. There was no sense in arguing with him. I hit the deck running. The place was already starting to fill up, and many of the patrons looked like they were planning to spend the entire evening.

There was a baseball game on TV in each of the rooms and one over the bar itself. The Kansas City Royals were playing a series with the Texas Rangers. Since Ovid was about halfway between the two, there were plenty of fans of each team. T-shirts and ball caps were well in evidence, and the beer was flowing freely. Bets were being placed on practically every pitch and the winnings were often taken in more beer.

By the time the game ended, the bar was really rocking. Shelly and I were running our legs off, and even with Marty helping while his weekend bartender drew more pitchers of beer, we could barely keep up. The tips were great, though. The winners on the baseball bets were generous with their tips, and even the losers tipped well, just to see the smiles on Shelly’s and my face.

I recognized some of the Vulman crowd. There were at least two tables with Vulman employees and another two with construction workers from Vulman. I didn’t get to listen to any of them, though. I was too busy waiting other tables. Besides, I thought, after tonight, it didn’t matter. My mysterious contact would be in the custody of the Judge.

He came in once again as the crowd began to thin. There was no concern on his face. He hadn’t a clue that he was about to be apprehended. Instead, he leered at me as he slipped into an empty booth. He motioned for me to come to his table as a king would summon a servant. I did his bidding, though. I didn’t want anything to look suspicious.

“Any more information for me tonight, my dear?” he asked

“It’s been pretty busy,” I told him truthfully.

“Yes,” he drawled, rather disappointed. “Well, perhaps next week will be better. By the way, my employers are well pleased with what you have given them so far. In another week, we will have everything we need. I can change you back then. You’ll be back in Hollywood before you know it.”

“As Phil Malone?” I asked. A few days before, I would have been thrilled with the news. Of course, that was before I realized who Phil Malone—who I—had been.

He smiled a condescending smile. “Of course, my dear. Of course, for the remainder of the week, I would be happy to help you to explore your feminine side.”

“I’m afraid you won’t get the chance, Lycus.” It was the voice of Officer Mercer. I hadn’t seen him come in, but suddenly, he was standing by the bar. Strangely, none of the other bar patrons seemed to have heard him. They continued to laugh and drink and play pool as if nothing was going on.

“Merc...” the man he had called Lycus started to say before nearly strangling on the word.

“No names, please,” Officer Mercer said with a faint smile.

Lycus’s eyes narrowed as he looked at me. “This is your doing, isn’t it? What did they offer you? I know the Judge. He would never agree to change you back. Only I would have done that. So have you decided that you like being a little trollop with a little brat at your breast? Then so be it!”

He began to motion his hands at me, but Officer Mercer stepped in front of me to protect me. Then, at the last second, Lycus’s gesture was directed not at me but at himself. It was as if he was suddenly changed from a three-dimensional image to a two-dimensional one. Then that image crumpled itself up into a ball, continually folding in on itself until it had disappeared with a loud pop.

Officer Mercer turned to Marty who was standing stunned by the bar. “I thought I told you to suppress all inter-dimensional pathways in the bar!" he growled.

"I did!" Marty protested. "There wasn't any way in or out of this place except the doors. I checked myself."

Officer Mercer closed his eyes and moved his head from side to side for a moment. Then he sighed, "All right, Marty. You're right. He must have found some way around your spell."

Marty relaxed visibly. I was beginning to suspect that some of the gods didn't trust Marty any more than I did.

"Can I start time again?" Marty asked, gesturing at the frozen figures around the room.

Officer Mercer gave a wave of his arm. "Yes, yes. Go ahead. We can't accomplish anything else tonight. The Judge will be most disappointed."

"Wait a minute," I said to Officer Mercer as he turned to leave. "What just happened here? Who was that guy and what is this all about?"

"You don't have any need to know, Ms. Connors," he told me.

"Now wait just a minute," I insisted. "I risked my neck for you and your Judge. He could have done anything to me. As it was, he practically raped me. What if he comes back? I'm not exactly on his Christmas card list, you know."

"We will protect you from him and his allies," Officer Mercer assured me as the normal noise and activity in the bar resumed. "You have nothing to fear."

"Hey, Sly!" a voice called out from one of the tables. "We're getting dry over here. How about another pitcher?"

"In a minute," I called over my shoulder. Time had apparently started up again. Then, I turned back to talk to Officer Mercer, but he was gone. I looked at Marty. He had returned to taking care of the customers. Everyone in the place looked as if nothing had happened. I suppose for most of them, nothing really had happened.

"Marty," I called, "what's going on?"

He shook his head. "Later, Sly, after we close. Now get back to work!"

I spent the rest of the evening looking nervously over my shoulder. I half expected this Lycus to come charging back into the place, throwing spells around like a pitcher at a baseball game. He said he could change me back. Well, that was out the window now, but that didn't mean he couldn't change me into something else. I had already seen what the Judge could do to me when he was angry. The look Lycus had given me before he disappeared was worse than the Judge's anger. If the Judge was willing to turn me into a bimbo in heat, what would Lycus do? It wasn't a pleasant thought.

Finally, we closed. Only Marty and I were left in the bar. I really didn't trust Marty. I had half-expected him to put a move on me ever since I had started working there. He hadn't, though, and there was no evidence that he had ever put a move on Shelly either. He seemed content to work us to death. He was an equal opportunity slave driver.

Marty poured himself a beer. "Want one?" he asked.

"No thanks," I replied. Funny, but I really had had no desire to drink since my transformation. Something in the back of my mind had told me that as long as I was breastfeeding, alcohol was a bad idea. Considering my bad habits as Phil Malone, I should have craved the stuff, but I didn't. In fact, this body seemed to lack any interest in drugs or cigarettes as well. I might be female now, but I had never been healthier.

"Rough night," he commented, taking a sip of his beer as he leaned back against the bar.

I sat on one of the bar stools and tried to figure out how to lean forward to talk to him without giving him a great view of my breasts. No way to avoid it, I decided, relaxing a little. "So what was this all about, Marty?"

He shook his head. "I can't tell you."

"Can't or won't?"

"Look, Sly, some of this is a mystery to me, too. I take it you know who

I am?"

I nodded. "I guess I can't say it, though."

"You can right now," he explained. "Some of us can grant dispensation."

"Then you're Bacchus."

"I think I prefer the Greek—Dionysus. The Greeks really appreciated us more than the Romans," he explained. "So you know that Ovid is run by the Olympians?"

I nodded.

"Have you ever heard of the Titans?"

"I heard of them," I replied, "and I got a book out of the library today and read up a little more on them. As I understand it, they were the original gods and Jupiter and his gods overthrew them."

"That's something of an oversimplification, but it gets the main idea across," he commented. "I wasn't around then. Some of the senior gods talk about it like your older people talk about the Second World War. In any case, it was one hell of a war."

"But I thought the old gods were killed," I pointed out.

He shrugged. "Maybe. Maybe not. We aren't really sure. Something of them remains. It may be the Titans themselves, or it may be their children. We know some of their children survived, and one even worked for me for a time." He gave a tired smile. "That's why some of the Olympians think I may have had something to do with them. Believe me, I'm not that stupid."

No, he wasn't, I thought. But Marty was sly. He deserved that name instead of me. For him, it was an apt description. I suspected that if there was a conflict, Marty would do his best to be on the winning side, regardless of any ideals he may have had.

"And there is another possibility," Marty went on. "It is just possible that there is another line of gods."

“Another line?” I repeated.

He nodded. “Yes. All of the gods you humans know came from one major line of the Titans. But there were other Titans with many offspring. Some survived the uprising but weren’t part of the conflict. You may have heard of some of them. Atlas and Prometheus come to mind.”

“So now I’ve crossed them, whoever they are,” I said slowly, as much to myself as to Marty.

“Yes, you have.”

It’s funny. I was probably in danger of their revenge, but I wasn’t all that worried about myself. Instead, I was worried about what they might do to Johnny. Marty must have read the concern in my face, for he assured me, “Sly, you haven’t got anything to worry about. Have you ever played chess?”

“I little,” I replied. With a smile, I added, “I was always more a poker kind of guy.”

“Well, in chess, you’re a pawn. You can be valuable when the game is being played on your side of the board, but much of the time, you aren’t worth the effort to take. Whoever or whatever we’re up against won’t bother with you,” Marty explained. “At least not unless the game moves in your direction again, but I don’t think it will.”

That was both a relief and an insult, I realized. I’m sure Marty meant it in the best way, but it was also a little disturbing to think I was out of the game. At least I had enjoyed a little excitement for a couple of days. Now, my world would be reduced to serving boozehounds most of the day. At least my time with Johnny was becoming enjoyable. I thought I could actually enjoy raising the little guy. Of course, it would have been fun to raise him as his father, playing ball with him and doing guy things. But it wasn’t so bad to be his mother, either. As Bill Cosby once observed, as a father, you play ball with your son, and then when he reaches the big time, the first thing he says when the camera zooms in on him is “Hi, Mom!” Maybe that wouldn’t be so bad after all.

"You look beat," Callie observed when I got home.

"I am," I admitted. I wanted to tell her what had happened, but I knew I couldn't. The gods didn't want mere mortals discussing their business. I plopped down on the couch next to her, rubbing my aching feet.

Callie shook her head. "That Marty Bachman—I hear he's a real slave driver. Makes you gals wear those high heels and all. You oughta tell him you ain't gonna do it anymore."

"And he'd fire us in a heartbeat," I countered.

"I doubt that. Not too many folks around these parts would put up with working for him."

"Maybe," I conceded, "but I'm stuck here now. I realize that. I'm going to be Sylvia Connors for the rest of my life, and I need a pay check. If that means I have to destroy my feet while I serve beer at Randy Andy's, then I guess I don't have much of a choice."

She chuckled, rising to her feet and gathering her things. "Don't be so hard on yourself, Sly. You could do lots of things. Just 'cause that Marty Bachman tells you you can't doesn't mean a thing. Why, I'll bet you could be anything you wanted."

"Like what?"

She thought for a moment. "Well, if you polished up that story about the squirrel you started writing, I'll bet you could be a writer."

"And if I were a blonde, I could be Meg Ryan," I said sarcastically.

"Just don't sell yourself short," she chuckled starting to leave. Then she stopped. "Oh, I almost forgot. While you were at work, a fine looking guy dropped off a note for you."

She handed me a sealed letter. It was addressed simply to 'Sly' but I could tell from just those three letters that it was Apollo's handwriting.

"Thanks," I told her. After she was gone, I opened the letter, curious about why Apollo would be writing me. I read:

Dear Sly,

It's time for me to move on. I've seen all the relatives and talked about old times, but a town like Ovid could never hold me down. I didn't want to leave, though, without letting you know. I'm not much good at person-to-person goodbyes, so this letter will have to do.

When we first met, I saw great potential in you. No, not the potential you think. You were in no position to achieve your potential when we were in California. Believe it or not, your potential can only be achieved here in Ovid.

How? You say. Well, you'll have to figure that out for yourself.

We'll meet again someday, I'm sure. Until then, be well, Sly.

Love,

Apollo

Well wasn't that a kick in the pants? I thought—if I still wore pants. He made love to me and left town. Why not? I was just a small-town girl from the wrong side of the tracks, and he was a... god. No, I realized. There was more to it than that. He had taken the time to teach me that 'making love' and 'having sex' weren't really the same thing. In fact, if I thought about it, I 'made love' maybe for the first time in my entire life—male and female—when I was with him. Besides, he was the God of Truth. If he said we'd meet again, we would. I would always have a special place in my heart for him, no matter where my path led me.

There was no more time to think about him, though. The other man in my life was crying. He needed his mother. Woman's work is never done. How true, I thought, as I went to his room.

I would have slept in on Sunday, but when you're the mother of a would-be toddler, there's no such luck. The little guy was up at the break of dawn, and I was there with him. After a nice breakfast of oatmeal and pureed fruit, he settled down for a nice long drink of warm mother's milk. As I watched the little urchin sucking away, I felt another wave of contentment almost equal to his. He was a little darling. Well, I hadn't been a family man, but it looked as if I was destined to be a family woman.

When he had finished, I got one of the library books I had picked up the day before. He seemed to like having me read to him, and he was delighted with the pictures. I couldn't help but think, though, that the story I had been telling him about Sammy Squirrel was every bit as good. And although I wasn't the greatest artist in the world, I had enough talent to illustrate a children's book. Maybe Callie was right. What the heck. It couldn't hurt.

While Johnny played, I searched my trailer for something to write on. I had no computer, so I hoped there would be at least an old typewriter available. No such luck. Maybe Callie had one.

She did, and I could see by the look on her face that she was pleased I had decided to write. "Do you want me to watch Johnny while you write?" she asked me.

"No," I replied with a smile. "He's really the one I'm writing for."

I worked like a demon all day. Fortunately, I had the basis of a plot already laid out. This was to be the children's version of 'A Night in Olympus,' only instead of a god, Sammy the Smart Little Squirrel and his friend, Sally the Sweet Little Squirrel were searching for Sammy's father, King of the Squirrels. I chuckled to myself as I wrote, realizing how ironic it was that a story like 'A Night in Olympus' which had made the critics rave could be so easily changed into a children's story.

By dinnertime, it was done. Well, the writing was done. I had only roughed out three good illustrations—one of Acorn City where the squirrels all lived, one of Sammy and Sally walking hand in hand through the forest, and one of the King of the Squirrels, resting on his throne. I thought they were pretty good.

"These aren't just good," Callie said as she looked at them. "These are great! And the story—honey, I ain't never seen a children's book this good before. You've got to send this in."

"Send it in?" I echoed.

"To a publisher, child! This book is that good. It might even win a prize. You ever hear of the Newberry Prize?"

I shook my head.

"It's a prize for children's literature. I got a big envelope over at my place. We'll send this off and see what the publishers think."

"But shouldn't we make a copy first?" I asked, actually getting a little excited about it myself.

"I'll take care of it," she grinned.

There was a sudden knock at the door. When I looked out, I saw the serious face of Officer Mercer, his eyes still covered by his reflective sunglasses even though the sun was going down. "Ms. Conners..." he began.

"Yes, Officer?" I replied, stepping outside and trying to look dignified as I stood there in a rumpled T-shirt and denim cut-offs, looking for all the world like a high school coed.

"I've just come from the Judge."

The Judge? Had I done something wrong? Was I going to be blamed for the escape of Lycus?

"He asked me to convey to you his thanks for your help these last few days." With that, he nodded and turned to go.

"Wait a minute!" I called. He turned. "Is that all?"

"Yes, ma'am," he said dryly. "That's all."

I didn't know what to say. I mean, I hadn't expected a reward or anything. But somehow, the abrupt thanks and sudden dismissal seemed a little cold. Before I could think of anything to say, Callie called out to him, "Oh, Officer Mercer?"

Officer Mercer turned. "Yes, ma'am?"

"I wonder if you could take this for me and mail it?" She was holding my manuscript in her hand. "Of course, we'll need a copy of it. Then just put the original in this envelope. It's already made out."

Officer Mercer looked reluctant. I gave Callie a 'what are you doing?' look. "Trust me, sweetheart," she said softly.

Almost reluctantly, he accepted the manuscript. “When does this need to be delivered?”

“As soon as you can,” Callie replied with a satisfied smile.

With no change of expression, Officer Mercer replied, “I’ll take care of it.”

As he drove away, I looked at Callie. “How did you do that? He’s a cop—not a messenger.”

“Oh, isn’t he a messenger?” she asked coyly. Yes, she was right. We couldn’t speak of it—we both realized that. But Officer Mercer was Mercury, the fleetest of the gods. Jupiter had often used him as a messenger. And now here he was, acting as my messenger.

“But how did you...” my voice trailed off. I was going to ask her how she could get Officer Mercer to act in his role of messenger, but the answer was obvious. I looked into her soft brown eyes, not sure what to say. She just smiled at me and said, “Don’t concern yourself with it, child. It’ll be all clear to you in the morning. Right now, you’ve had a long day. You’d better see to that little boy of yours and get some rest. You’ve got a big day tomorrow.”

I wanted to question Callie. There was something suspiciously powerful about the way she had ordered Officer Mercer to take the manuscript. Was she one of them? I didn’t get the chance to ask her, though. Instead, I just turned and went back inside. I don’t really remember going inside. In fact, I don’t really remember the rest of the evening. The next thing I remembered was being awakened by the sound of Johnny crying in his crib. It was morning, I realized. How long had I slept? It was as if I had spent the rest of Sunday evening in a trance.

Monday morning. I had to face another week of endless weeks, on my feet in heels serving beer and wiggling for good tips. Thank god—or the gods—I had Johnny to come home to each evening. I got dressed after I took care of Johnny. It was finally beginning to feel normal to dress in bras and panties and slide the pantyhose up my legs. Sitting with my legs demurely crossed while in a short skirt was practically second nature to me now. It was almost natural to check the low-cut white knit blouse I wore to make sure the bra wasn't showing. I even got my makeup done early instead of waiting until it was almost time to go to work.

So here I was, Sylvia Conners, waitress and mother—and of course, woman. I would survive. No, we would survive—Johnny and me. To hell with the Judge, Marty, Officer Mercer and all their cohorts. Only Callie—if she was one of them—had been decent to me.

As I sat there, thinking as I drank my coffee and bracing myself to go to work, there was a knock at my door. Callie? No, it was still early. She wasn't due for another half hour. I opened the door. A shade postman was waiting patiently for me, looking very official in his summer uniform. "I have a registered letter for you, Ms. Conners," he said formally, his eyes happily looking down the front of my blouse. "Just sign here," he said, handing me a pen and a form.

Who could be sending me a registered letter? I wondered. Back in my days of making movies, they were as common as junk mail. Who did Sylvia Conners know who would be sending her a registered letter? As the postman left, I quickly tore it open, nearly breaking a nail in the process. To my amazement, it was from one of the large publishing houses in New York. With trembling hands, I read:

Dear Ms. Conners:

This letter is to convey to you the agreed-upon advance for all US rights to your manuscript, Sammy the Smart Little Squirrel. While your agent, Ms. Musgrave, has indicated that this manuscript is the first of a proposed series of children's books, this advance is for this manuscript only. We, of course, are most interested in optioning the rights of all future books in this series.

I read on. The letter talked about publishing dates and a proposed book tour. I was too stunned for the details to soak in. I felt much as I had the day of my transformation. My life was being turned upside down again—albeit for the better this time.

But how? The manuscript had just been mailed out the night before.

Obviously, the publisher had had it for weeks—time enough to negotiate with my agent, a Ms. Musgrave, whoever she was. Wait. Callie had told Officer Mercer to deliver the manuscript as soon as possible. How soon was soon when you were the messenger of the gods? Maybe delivering it several weeks before I wrote it was child's play for Mercury. Callie would have the answers. I jumped up and ran out the door, heading for Callie's trailer.

Somehow, I wasn't too surprised when I found a vacant lot where Callie's trailer had been. There was no evidence that it had ever been there.

"Something wrong, Sly?"

I turned and saw a woman, not much older than I, dressed in a blue and white Texas Cowboys T-shirt and denim shorts. She was blonde, not at all unattractive, and held a little girl not much older than Johnny in her arms. Both she and the little girl were shades. I knew who she was. Her name was Rita Michaels, and she lived with her husband and daughter a couple of trailers away. Callie had pointed her out to me, but we had never met. Or at least, in my memories we had never met.

"No... no... Rita, nothing at all," I managed with a smile.

She shrugged. "Well, I know I'm a few minutes early, but I thought I'd pick up Johnny now. I wanted to give Trina here her bath."

So there was no Callie now, I realized quickly. Instead, Rita was my babysitter while I worked. Well, she appeared to be a good mother. The little girl hugged her dearly and was smiling. She wasn't Callie, but then again, who was?

For that matter, I wondered after she had left with Johnny, exactly who was Callie? The mythology book offered a clue or two. Besides, I was getting used to the way the gods operated. Callie had to be Calliope, one of the muses. She was listed as the muse of lyric poetry, but the book also said that some sources didn't assign particular areas of expertise to a muse. I suppose there was no muse of things like TV sitcoms or children's books. Who knows? Maybe she was my muse when I wrote all those sleazy movie plots. No, probably not. I don't think so, I said to myself. There probably wasn't a muse for sleazy movie plots. Maybe Marty handled those.

My thoughts were interrupted by the ringing of my phone. "Hello?"

"Please hold, Ms. Connors. Ms. Musgrave will be right with you," a secretarial voice said pleasantly.

Musgrave? Oh, of course, I remembered. She was apparently my agent. I only had to listen to elevator music for a few seconds before a somehow familiar voice said, "Sly? Sorry about that. I was just talking with your publisher."

"Callie?" I ventured. Musgrave—muse. Of course.

"The same," she laughed. "Of course I'm now white, blonde, and a couple of years younger, but it's still Callie."

"You're my agent?"

"Who better, honey? What did you think of the check?"

"What check?"

"In the envelope, silly."

"I never got past the letter," I said breathlessly, shaking the envelope to be rewarded with a slip of blue paper. I looked at it. It was a check made out in my name for twenty thousand dollars. There was a time in my life when twenty thousand had been chickenfeed, but now it was an unimaginable fortune. I touched the check reverently, as if I was afraid it was not real.

"Of course, that's just an advance," she told me. "I admit, I forged your name on the contracts, but I didn't think you'd mind. After all, it took your new publisher about six weeks to put it together right, so I can assure you it's a very good deal."

I was sure it was. I had a gut feeling muses made very good literary agents.

"I can't wait for the book tour to start," she gushed. "You'll have to bring Johnny along, too. I'll watch him for you, and you won't even have to pay childcare. It'll be part of my percentage."

I had to giggle. "Oh, Callie, I miss you already."

"Just keep writing those wonderful books and you'll see me lots," she laughed. "Oops, got to go now. I've got a movie deal cooking on line two."

We said our goodbyes. Then, I rushed to get my purse. I wanted to get that check in my account before it disappeared as magically as my worries about my new life had.

The trip to the bank made me a few minutes late to work. The teller had been a little hesitant. It wasn't too often that a waitress from Randy Andy's swivelled into the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank of Ovid to make a twenty thousand dollar deposit. Fortunately, Susan Jager was in the lobby, too, doing her banking, so the teller relaxed with Susan's help and made the deposit with no fuss.

"A book deal!" Susan said with a smile. "I didn't realize you were so talented."

"Neither did I," I laughed as I hurried off to work.

Marty was looking at his watch as I rushed in. "You're half an hour late," he growled. "I'm going to have to dock your pay."

"Marty, I'm only fifteen minutes late," I corrected him.

"Well," he allowed, "that may be true, but Shelly just got here, too."

"I had a doctor's appointment," Shelly called out from behind the bar. "I couldn't help it."

"What's wrong, Shelly?" I asked. It hadn't occurred to me that a shade could need a doctor.

"Oh, it's just my feet again," she sighed. "It's these stupid heels."

Yes, it was stupid to expect us to work all day in heels. Much more of it and I'd be in the doctor's office, too. Wait a minute, I thought. I had twenty thousand in the bank, and there was a lot more where that came from. But what was it they always tell writers when they sign their first book deal. Oh, yeah. Don't give up the day job. I still needed this job, but I had a little leverage now with twenty big ones in the bank.

"Listen, Marty," I said sternly, "I think this heels bit is just a little silly. I mean, this is a bar—not a strip joint."

"But the customers expect it," Marty protested.

I looked over at the only four customers who had come in to drink an early lunch. "Marty, those guys would still be in here if Shelly and I didn't shave our legs for six months. Come on, be a sport. We'll wear the short skirts and low-cut tops. Just let us wear flats."

"Well, I don't know," he said slowly. He sensed a little rebellion. He wasn't sure why, but he realized I might just tell him to take the job and shove it. Shelly was remaining quiet, though. The poor kid needed the job. I knew how she felt. I had felt the same way until this morning.

"Well, that's okay," I said lightly. "I really didn't want to work this many hours anyway. I'll just quit."

"You'll what?" Marty practically yelled. "You can't! You need this job."

"Not anymore," I smiled, waving my deposit slip. "I wrote a book. It's going to be published."

"Oh, Sly!" Shelly gushed, practically crushing my breasts with a hug. "That's great!" Then sadly, she added, "But I'll miss you around here."

The funny thing was I didn't want to quit. Oh sure, I wanted to spend more time with Johnny, and I sure didn't want to spend so many hours in heels, but I liked Shelly and the rest of Marty's crew. I was also going to miss some of the customers. Some of the guys were pretty decent, and if you gave them a big cheery smile, they tipped pretty well. Oh what the heck, I was even starting to like Marty—in a way.

"Uh, Sly," Marty began, "let's not be hasty. Maybe we can work something out."

In the few minutes that followed, I began to understand just how hard it was for Marty to get employees. With Vulman expanding, there were plenty of jobs that either paid better or didn't require a girl to be a sexy tease to make a buck. In the end, we worked something out. Shelly and I convinced him that one waitress wearing flats could move a lot quicker than two swaying in heels. As a result, he could get by with one waitress at lunch when it wasn't very busy. The same was true of Monday and Tuesday evenings, which were slow. Marty finally agreed. His desire to both save money and not lose a waitress overcame his desire (and make no mistake about it—it was his desire) to see us in heels.

Shelly still needed the money, so she took the bulk of the hours. I would come in Friday for lunch and work evenings Wednesday through Saturday. Of course, I didn't tell him about the book tour. Maybe by then, the Judge would create another waitress for Marty. I was certain he would be lobbying for one if business continued to pick up.

"So are you going to work today?" Marty wanted to know.

"It would just be an extra expense for you," I reminded him. "Do you really need me?"

He thought about it for a moment. "I suppose not."

"Great!" I called with a departing grin. "In that case, I think I'll go see a guy named Johnny!"

"Well," I said, coming out of my trance, "for once one of the Judge's victims didn't find the man of her dreams."

"Oh, I don't know about that," Susan commented. "Johnny is a quite a little charmer."

"Who was Johnny?" I asked Diana.

She shrugged. "Beats me. The ones who don't remember don't interest me that much."

I looked over at Jerry, who was walking back over to me, kids in tow. "Well, there's one who doesn't remember who is of great interest to me," I told her.

"Tell me, Diana," Susan asked quickly before Jerry and the kids could get in earshot, "who are these challengers? Are they the old Titans?"

"We're not completely sure," Diana replied. "What Marty told Sly was pretty much the story. Of course, what he didn't know was that we wanted Lycus to get away."

"What?" Susan and I chorused.

"Sure, but that's another story," Diana laughed. "Right now, I need a little fun." Over her shoulder, she called, "I hear there's a cute young college professor playing volleyball with the coeds. I think I'll join them."

Recognition crossed Susan's face as she gasped, "Hey, wait a minute, Diana. That's my husband you're talking about!"

Diana laughed as she ran down the beach, a laughing Susan close behind.

Ovid VIII: The Team

©1999 The Professor

FictionMania: Ovid 8: The Team Pts 1-5 FictionMania: Ovid 8: The Team Pts 6-10 BigCloset TopShelf

Part 1

I could remember being frightened before, and I could remember being elated. I was frightened back in high school when in a football game, I was being covered on a pass pattern by a guy who seemed to be twice my size. I thought he would kill me before I could haul in the ball that would win the game for us. Then I remembered the fear wash away as I caught the ball just inside the goal line. Then, I was elated. But that was another lifetime ago. Now, here I was an attractive young blonde woman named Cindy Patton, destined to live out her life as a wife, mother, and assistant to the all- powerful Judge in Ovid, Oklahoma. And for the first time in my memory of either life, I was both frightened and elated at the same time.

I was also hot and tired as I walked up the stairs to the offices over the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank of Ovid. It was a hot July day in Ovid. The fireworks of the Fourth were over, and the hottest days of the summer were upon us. I suspected the gods mitigated the temperatures a little for this town of theirs, but even though we were usually a few degrees cooler in the summer than nearby Tulsa, it was still hot and sticky as I walked up the stairs. Dressing in pantyhose made it even hotter. Still, I supposed, if I were still male, I'd have to wear a tie. Somehow, that seemed even worse. I still hadn't cooled off from the ride in the Taurus. I had been out to Duggan's IGA to see Jerry my husband before going downtown, and the short ride hadn't given the car's air conditioner enough time to cool the vehicle down. I would have killed in that moment for an elevator, but there was none.

So it was with a silent prayer of thanks that I opened the door to Susan's office and breathed in the air- conditioned air of her law office. Dori sat at the reception desk, to the casual observer the model of an efficient, middle-aged secretary, but to those of us who were aware of the forces behind Ovid, a shade, almost but not quite transparent.

“Cindy!” she said brightly, looking up from her computer. “We haven’t seen you over here in quite a while.”

“I’ve been busy, Dori, but it’s too hot to work today,” I quipped. Actually, I hadn’t been all that busy. Usually, I was in Susan’s office a couple of times a week, since Susan often had to defend people coming before the Judge. While she often was called upon by the court to defend a person destined to become a new resident of Ovid, she had begun to develop a substantial local practice as well. This required us to meet often, which we enjoyed, as we had become best friends since our own transformations.

Lately though, things had been slow in the courts of Ovid. The only cases had been in the hands of a more junior municipal judge and had been mundane in nature—the sort of cases which came before the courts in every small town in America—things like property disputes and other civil matters.

There had been no transformations in nearly a month, as the Judge had been out of town. Those of us on the inside understood why. June Webster, an attractive woman of indeterminate age, had been staying at the Ovid Inn. She was supposedly with the GAO—the Government Accounting Office—on a mission to look into the accounting procedures at Vulman Industries, which currently had a large government contract. Although no one had told us for certain, Susan and I were convinced that June Webster was in fact Juno, the Judge’s wife. If I remembered my mythology, Jupiter and Juno had a rather stormy relationship. It seemed the myths were right.

The door to Susan’s office opened suddenly, and I saw Susan with her arm around her husband, Steven. Both were smiling, so I wondered what they were doing in her office with the door closed. I don’t think there was a couple in Ovid more deeply in love than Susan and Steven. Who would have believed that they had both been born the opposite sex, married in their old lives only later to divorce, and ended up falling in love all over again under the spell of Ovid?

“See you tonight, sweetheart,” Susan practically cooed, giving Steven a chaste but meaningful kiss. He actually blushed a little, said, “Hi, Cindy,” and left quickly.

“A little afternoon delight?” I smiled at Susan.

She smiled back. “Wouldn’t you like to know?” she grinned as she shut the door behind us.

Well, yes, I would, I thought. It sounded like fun. It was a shame Jerry’s office over at the supermarket was so exposed or I might try it myself. Maybe I’d visit him at closing some night...

“To what do I owe the honor of your visit?” Susan asked brightly as we stepped into her office. “I thought with the Judge out of town, you’d be playing hooky.”

“I already am,” I admitted. It was an hour before I was due off work. I’d still be going back, but just long enough to close my office for the night before picking up the twins at day-care.

Susan looked at her watch. “I suppose you are. Well, I can’t even offer you a Diet Coke. I ran out and was just on my way to pick some more up.”

“Don’t worry about it,” I said, trying not to sound disappointed. In the heat of an Ovid summer afternoon, a Diet Coke sounded like ambrosia. “I’ll just settle for a glass of water.”

“No need for water,” a voice called happily as the air in the room suddenly popped. There was Diana, a very busty blonde this time in a short red dress that was so tight on her it looked as if it might explode. In each hand, she carried a bottle of chilled champagne that bore the label of an expensive brand. “All we need are glasses.”

Susan wrinkled her nose a little. She never drank alcohol. “You don’t have a bottle of Diet Coke tucked in that dress anywhere, do you?”

Diana looked confused. “Where?” she asked, batting her eyelashes in mock surprise while she indicated with her hands that there was absolutely no room in the dress for anything else. Then, with a smaller pop than the one that had transported her into the office, one of the champagne bottles became a liter of Diet Coke. “Party pooper,” she muttered.

“I thought maybe you were out of town too,” I told her as she opened the two bottles with a snap of her finger. “I haven’t seen you since that day at the beach.”

“I am out of town,” she told me. She tried to pour a glass of champagne for me, but I shook my head. “You’re going to make me drink alone?” she asked.

“I’ll take a glass of the Diet Coke,” I told her. She shrugged and poured glasses of Diet Coke for Susan and me and a glass of champagne for herself. When we had all settled into Susan’s comfortable leather chairs, Diana continued.

“As I said, I am out of town. Or at least I have been. July isn’t exactly my favorite month in Oklahoma. Even the men wilt in this heat, and a hard man is good to find.”

“I thought myths said you were a virgin,” Susan laughed over her Diet Coke.

Diana frowned. “You try being a virgin for a couple of thousand years. Who wrote those stupid myths anyway?”

“Well, the Judge has been out of town, too,” I commented, quickly changing the subject.

Diana laughed a broad laugh. “I’m not surprised. I heard that Juno was back in town. He’ll stay out of town until the little woman leaves.”

Susan looked confused, so I took a moment to tell her about June Webster. “So the Judge is married?” Susan asked. She had never been the fan of mythology I was.

“So to speak,” Diana told her. “It’s what you might call a common law marriage, but they’ve been married for as long as any of us can remember—and that’s a long, long time.”

“But they don’t get along very well,” I explained to Susan. “The Judge apparently cheated on her quite a few times.”

“The Judge?” Susan said, incredulous. I had to admit, it was hard to picture the Judge, stern disciplinarian that he always appeared to be, as a philanderer. I had found in my experience of working with the gods that they weren’t always exactly as the myths portrayed them, but there was invariably a grain of truth in each of the myths. While I doubted that the Judge had fathered quite as many bastards as the myths related, he had probably sowed a few wild oats in his youth—if the time of the Roman Empire could be said to be his youth. Juno—or Hera as the Greeks called her—was a powerful goddess in her own right—and a jealous one.

“Oh, you don’t really know our Judge,” Diana laughed. “In any case, it appears their trial separation may be about to end. I suspect she’s come back either to reconcile or dissolve the marriage.”

“The gods have divorce?” I asked, suddenly curious.

Diana shook her head. “Not exactly. We dissolve marriages rather than divorcing. Maybe someday Eric Vulman will tell you how he dissolved the marriage with Vera March sometime.”

Now Susan’s mouth was wide open. “Eric Vulman was married to Vera March? When?”

“A long time ago,” I told her with a friendly pat on her hand. “Susan, you really need to read more mythology.”

“I guess I do,” she agreed, nodding.

Our conversation was suddenly interrupted as three very attractive teenage girls burst into our office. One was Dori’s daughter, Myra. Susan had hired her for the summer since the girl had an interest in becoming a lawyer someday. She was dressed very professionally, a khaki shirtdress doing little to disguise her terrific figure, punctuated by two magnificent breasts. Her blonde hair was tied back in a demure ponytail, but it was easy to visualize what it looked like when it was allowed to flow loose over her shoulders. She wore a pair of conservative brown heels, only an inch high, and her legs were encased in tan nylon. For all her attempts to look conservative, she was a stunner.

The second girl was dressed much more informally. She had long, luxurious auburn hair and was wearing shorts which showed off her magnificent legs and a sleeveless white blouse. Although not as well endowed as her friend Myra, Samantha Wallace was a very, very attractive girl. Bright and vivacious, she was a born leader and one of the most popular girls in town. Sam had also been of great help to many of the women of Ovid who had been born as men and remembered their male pasts. Her acceptance of her growing womanhood had been an inspiration to many of us.

I didn't know the third girl all that well. Like Samantha, she had been transformed before I came to Ovid. Her name was Jennifer Tilton, the daughter of the President of the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank. When I had first come to Ovid, she had been a little tomboy. A couple of years younger than Samantha, she had seemed to fight being a girl with every ounce of her energy. She had come around, though, the last few months, under the influence of her mother, also a transformee. Now, she appeared to be a blonde version of Samantha, her knit top proudly displaying her budding breasts while her own shorts showed a pair of legs that were already driving all the boys in her class wild.

"I dropped those papers off at the County Clerk's office like you asked," Myra said, proudly displaying the receipt.

"And?" Susan asked, amused.

Myra grinned. "And the defendant missed the three o'clock deadline. Becky Marshall from my class at school is working there over the summer, and she told me ours was the only one filed."

"Good work," Susan said with a smile. "You'll make a lawyer yet."

Myra beamed. Then, she asked, "Do you suppose it would be all right if I left a little early this afternoon? We'd like to do a little shopping and..."

"Meet your boyfriends before the party at the country club?" Susan finished for her.

“Well... yes,” Myra said. “But how did you know about the party? I thought it was just for teens.”

“Oh, you have your sources and I have mine,” Susan drawled. I was sure Dori had told her all about the dance. “Sure, go on. You girls have fun. And be careful.”

“We will!” they all chorused as they rushed out the door, closing it with a loud slam.

I shook my head, taking another sip of Diet Coke. “Who would believe that not so long ago they were all male?” I mused absently.

Susan sighed. “I suppose we could say the same about ourselves.”

“It’s the magic of Ovid,” Diana explained. “Ovid gives you what you need to be who you’ve become. Would either of you go back to your old lives if I gave you the chance?”

“No!” Susan and I both said together. The very thought of giving up my life in Ovid, my family, my job, my friends, sent chills up and down my spine.

Diana’s eyes narrowed. “Would you like to see what it was like here back at the start?”

“The start?” I asked.

Diana shrugged. “Well, not exactly the start, but close to it. I’m talking about the time Samantha and Jennifer came here. Since we don’t have any new stories, an old one will have to do.”

“But I don’t have that information,” I protested. “I can only show the lives of the people whose trials I have attended. Samantha and Jennifer were here almost a year before I was.”

Diana tapped the side of her head. “It’s all in here, girls. All the cases before you came to town Cindy are locked in here. Now, since you don’t have any good stories for me, what say I give you one?”

“Sure,” I said happily as Susan nodded in agreement.

“Okay, ladies,” Diana said, hunching over the desk with Susan and me, “here we go...”

“What was that?”

The nervous question sounded out of place, coming from the deep rumble that served as a voice for Dusty Stephenson. I barely heard it over the hoots and laughs chorusing from dozens of throats as the Northwest Missouri State Bearcats celebrated their good fortune.

We were on a jet—a rare experience for our team. Usually, we travelled short distances to play nearby colleges in towns as small as our own Maryville, Missouri. Not this time, though. While we might have expected to be bussed to Muskogee, Oklahoma for Saturday’s important game, a wealthy alumnus, overjoyed with the season that had left our football team with eight wins and no losses so far, had culled a plane from his fleet of charters and made it available to the team. Yes, we were travelling in style all right. We felt as if we were going to swoop down from the sky and frighten the Muskogee State players to death. After all, we were travelling like the big teams that day.

“It was just an air pocket,” I leaned across the aisle and told Dusty. “It’s nothing to worry about.”

Worry crossed his Neanderthal brow anyhow. “Are you sure?” Dusty had never flown before. He had grown up and lived his whole life before college on a farm in Southern Iowa, not even a hundred miles from Maryville. In fact, until he had come to college, he had never even been out of Iowa. Everybody liked Dusty. He was one of those big, slow farm boys who, if he liked you, was your friend for life. And Dusty liked just about everybody—everybody except Wild Bill.

“You’re gonna have to get off, Dusty,” Bill ‘Wild Bill’ Moreland quipped from a couple of rows forward. “We can’t gain altitude with you on board.”

Wild Bill’s friends—or maybe ‘sycophants’ was a better word—laughed at his joke. Dusty had always been a little sensitive about his size.

Coach Wallace had been on him to lose twenty pounds, but Dusty was just one of those guys who could polish off a three-pound steak and still be hungry. At least Wild Bill's jibe had made him forget about the rough air. His dislike for our overrated quarterback was sufficient to chase away all other thoughts.

Come to think of it, I felt the same way about him. Wild Bill Moreland had come out of a top high school football powerhouse over in Nebraska—in Lincoln to be exact. He had one hell of a throwing arm. He could rocket the ball on target all the way across the field and a good fifty yards downfield with pinpoint accuracy. Normally, the University of Nebraska would have been interested in him, but Wild Bill had a little problem—namely, he had trouble reading defenses. He could have studied the other team's defensive playbook for a week and he would have still thrown into coverage. I understood that at his high school, he held the record for passing yards, but he also held the record for interceptions. Nobody was going to play QB for the Huskers who couldn't read a defense. They offered him a chance to walk on, but no scholarship.

Northwest Missouri State was perfect for him, though. Coach Wallace had developed a winning program based on the full house backfield, where two halfbacks and a fullback lined up behind the quarterback, either running the ball or running short pass patterns. Our wide receivers were used primarily to keep the defense honest. Wild Bill had direct orders from the Coach to throw to them only when there wasn't a defender within twenty yards. So the result was that Wild Bill actually looked like a pretty good quarterback, instead of the mediocre one he would have been with most teams. Many of us on the team believed he would be able to look good enough to make it to the pros, but few of us thought he had what it took to last.

Wild Bill even looked like a quarterback. He was tall, slim but well muscled, square jawed, with keen blue eyes, and with a shock of blonde hair that all the girls loved to run their fingers through. But when he opened his mouth, it was usually to say something stupid or cutting or both. In short, he was a jerk.

“Can’t a guy get any sleep around here?” a voice grumbled in the window seat next to me. It was Larry Gunn, one of our starting defensive ends—I was the other. Larry could read an opposing pass pattern better than their own quarterback—and certainly better than our quarterback. He was quick, intelligent, and would probably have been playing for one of the top football powers if he had been taller, but at five- eleven, no matter how quick and smart he was, wide receivers could catch the passes over his head.

If you could put the two of us together, you would have had one hell of a defensive end. I was reasonably intelligent—or at least my grade point said I was—and I was six-three. Unfortunately, I wasn’t terribly fast. I had to depend upon my size and my ability to figure out where the ball was going to succeed. If the receiver managed to get a step on me, I was toast.

Larry and I had been friends since our freshman year. By sheer chance, we had ended up as roommates, then we pledged the same fraternity. We were both good students—probably the best on the team—and we both had the same taste in girls—bright and well built with long brown hair. In fact, that had been our only bone of contention during our junior year when we both went after the same girl. We both lost out to Dennis Mahoney, our starting halfback. It was no big deal, though. Larry and I were both pretty decent-looking guys, so there were plenty more girls where that one came from. Besides, Dennis was a pretty decent guy.

“Okay, listen up!” Coach Wallace suddenly yelled as soon as the seat belt sign went off. He was on his feet, his Bearcats ball cap pushed back on his forehead to reveal a thinning hairline. He was in good shape for sixty, but it hadn’t saved his hair. “This is a short flight. We’ll land in Muskogee in about thirty minutes, so keep all your gear together.”

It isn’t as if we had much gear. All the uniforms and equipment had been shipped by bus along with some of the assistant coaches and support people. The only support person on the plane was Jill Wentworth, the Team Manager. By all rights, Jill should have been on the bus with the equipment, but she had begged Coach Wallace to let her ride with the team. Jill wasn't the kind of girl who wanted to be surrounded by big beefy guys all the time, and she wasn't the kind of girl who was dyke. No, she just loved the game of football. Raised by a widowed father back in Wisconsin, she had grown up playing football with her two brothers. They attended all the Wisconsin Badger games from the time she was old enough to walk. Actually, she could even throw the football pretty good—for a girl.

Jill wasn't bad looking either. She had short blonde hair curled in sort of a Meg Ryan style. Come to think of it, she looked a little like Meg Ryan. Only a little, though.

"Hey Wentworth!" Wild Bill called out to her as she stood in the aisle, a football in hand as she talked to Horace White, the big black starting wide receiver. "What say you come back here and check out my equipment before we get to Muskogee?"

That got a few laughs from Wild Bill's usual followers, but the rest of us just looked away so as not to embarrass Jill. We needn't have bothered. Jill didn't reply, or even look embarrassed. She didn't even seem to be looking at Wild Bill, but she knew exactly where the prick was. In one fluid motion, she rifled the ball in her hand—not hard enough to hurt, but hard enough to sting—right at the top of Wild Bill's head. The ball thudded off his forehead with an audible smack.

"Ow!" Wild Bill screamed to the sudden roar of laughter from most of the players who had seen it all. "That hurt!"

"No it didn't," Jill called smugly in a feminine but confident tone. "If I wanted to hurt you, I would have thrown harder."

That got another laugh before Coach Wallace jumped to his feet. "All right Moreland, Wentworth. Knock it off before somebody gets hurt."

"She already hurt me!" Wild Bill protested.

"Then maybe I should put you down as injured for tomorrow's game?" the coach asked.

"No," Wild Bill said petulantly. "I'm fine." Of course, he knew that there were two other quarterbacks just waiting in the wings to see what they could do if Wild Bill weren't in the game, and they weren't too bad themselves. The crown always weighs heavy.

Larry was wide awake now. He snorted at Wild Bill's little act and said to me, "Jace, when is that clown going to grow up?"

I'm not sure, but I think Wild Bill heard him, for he winced suddenly. Larry could get away with putting Wild Bill down. Like me, he was defense, so we didn't have to take orders from our overrated field general. Also, either one of us was strong enough to dismantle Wild Bill while eating breakfast. You don't get to be a defensive end without a fair amount of muscle. Of course, we still kept remarks like that mostly to ourselves. It was bad for team morale, and we were a team bound for glory.

Northwest Missouri State had been a growing football power for the last few years. Coach Wallace, now in his tenth season, had built us into a winning team. Many thought this would be the year we took it all—the NCAA Division II Title, making us the top team in the nation in our division. Oh, it didn't get you a spot on nationwide TV on New Year's Day, but it was as high as a school like ours could go, and for the players like Wild Bill and Dennis Mahoney who were potential pro players, it was a chance to get at least a little media time. That might mean a lot of money when the NFL draft came around in the spring.

I didn't really want to see Wild Bill go too high in the draft. He didn't deserve it. It was the team around him that made him look good. I could only hope that the pro scouts would realize it. Dennis Mahoney, on the other hand, I wished well. I looked back at Dennis, sitting calmly next to his best friend and old high school classmate, Darren McDougal. They were unlikely friends, and although their paths while similar in some ways were very different in others. For similarities, they were both from the little Missouri town of Cameron, not too far from Maryville, and neither of them was particularly worldly. Both planned to be teachers, although Darren liked math and Dennis was aiming more toward social studies. But their paths were starting to diverge. Dennis had a steady girl—the aforementioned brunette—whereas Darren preferred to shop around. And Dennis had definite NFL potential and would probably play several years before settling down to teach—if he ever did. Darren, although the typical big Midwestern farm boy who ends up playing tackle or guard was way too slow to make it in the pros. It didn't really matter to him, since all he really wanted to do was go back to Cameron and teach math.

All in all, we were a great team. I was proud to be a part of it. Here I was, Jason Stromberg, a big kid from the suburbs of Kansas City, playing for a team which could go all the way to an undefeated season. If we did well enough, maybe I would even get a shot in the draft. Or I might decide to walk on at the Chief's camp if I wasn't drafted. No, I realized with a smile. I wasn't destined to play pro football. I had never even wanted to be a pro. I wasn't really sure what I wanted to do with my life. I started out with ambitions to become a doctor like my father, but although my grades were very good, they weren't the sort of grades that would get me into medical school. So I gave up on that major. I was now a history major, but I didn't particularly want to teach. That meant I would probably gravitate to something where a degree was a degree was a degree. Something like selling, I thought. Many large companies liked big former football players who were personable and reasonably intelligent as sales people. They tended to be reasonably aggressive, friendly, and good team players. Well, it wasn't the life I would have picked for myself, but it wouldn't be a bad one. I'd probably end up in Kansas City or some similar city just like my parents had done and marry the first girl I asked and raise two point three children in my tract house. I'd drive a company car until I reached middle management. Then, I'd opt for a BMW as part of my midlife crisis. I'd find a girlfriend on the side and watch my wife grow old while we held together our marriage for the sake of the children.

And why not? Wasn't that what my family had done? My older sister, Joan, had left for college two years before me. At that time, I could already see my parent's marriage beginning to unravel. It got even worse after I left for school. My younger brother, Johnny, was a senior in high school, so by the time he started college, I figured my parents would be splitsville. Maybe not, though. Maybe they'd just stay together and hate each other.

My musings were interrupted by a loud pop coming from the rear of the plane, followed by what sounded like tearing metal. The entire fuselage shuddered suddenly, causing a collective gasp from the entire team. Whatever had just happened wasn't supposed to happen. We all realized that.

Suddenly, a tense woman's voice filled the cabin. It was our pilot. "I know you all felt that," she said, trying to sound upbeat—and failing. "That was our starboard engine. It just flamed out, but don't worry. This is a BAC-111, and it's designed to operate on one engine if need be."

Maybe so, I thought, but that didn't mean we should sit back and enjoy the ride. The plane was obviously much harder to fly with one engine gone, which meant it was going to be much harder to land also. And the sound of tearing metal was more than just a flame out.

"We'll be setting down shortly. We're about fifteen minutes out of Muskogee right now and..."

Whatever she was going to say would be forever lost, for the plane began to roll lazily to the left with another shudder. All we heard from the cockpit was a muttered "damn!" as the speaker went silent.

If we were worried before, we were petrified now. Several members of the team were yelling "What the fuck?" and "Oh Jesus!" and anything else they could think of to yell as the plane began to drop. Something had gone terribly—fatally—wrong. I thought about my family. I thought about how they would handle my death. Maybe it would bring them closer together. Maybe some good could come out of...

Then, all at once, the shuddering stopped. We were still dropping, but it was the typical drop you always feel when a plane is making a normal descent. We all became suddenly quiet, except for Dusty next to me who uttered, "Thank you, God."

"What's happening?" I asked Larry who had his face pressed to the window.

“We’re landing,” he said softly.

“I thought the pilot said we were still fifteen minutes from Muskogee,” I pointed out.

“I thought she did, too,” Larry replied. Then he pointed out the window. “But look.”

Part 2

Leaning over him, I looked out the window. It was a clear fall day, and it looked as if I could see forever. What was laid out below me was a long valley with fairly impressive hills on either side. There was something odd about the hills, though, I thought. It was almost as if they were identical on each side of the valley, as if the valley were somehow squeezed into a nonexistent space. Of more immediate interest, though, was the landing field that we were banking to approach. Before we turned too far for me to see, I had seen a long concrete runway in our path.

I marvelled at how our pilot had regained control of the plane. I had actually thought we were goners, about to have ourselves splattered all over the Oklahoma landscape. Maybe this was a good omen, I speculated. Maybe this meant we’d beat Muskogee State, for now nothing could stop us.

Funny, though, I mused. The town in the distance didn’t look big enough to be Muskogee. Maybe it wasn’t. Perhaps the pilot had opted for a nearby field instead of flying on to Muskogee. Yes, I thought. That must be it. Well, I didn’t much care where we landed as long as I got off this plane in one piece.

The ground rushed up to meet us, and it felt as if we were floating down the runway rather than flying. It was honest to God the smoothest landing I had ever seen. We never even felt the wheels touch the ground, and the roar of the engines reversing was like sweet music to us all.

The plane taxied up to a small collection of hangars that housed several private planes. But there was no sign of any airline activity; nor was there a sign displaying where we had landed.

“Where the fuck are we?” somebody muttered.

“I don’t know, man,” someone else drawled in an accent that would be right at home in this place. “I grew up down here and I don’t know where we are.”

Well, we couldn’t be far from Muskogee, I thought. A plane on its descent travels at—what?—two hundred miles per hour? Fifteen minutes meant fifty miles, give or take a mile or two. That meant we were about an hour away by bus. I wondered if they had radioed ahead so that a bus could be waiting.

“Okay,” Coach Wallace called out, bracing himself on the back of a seat as we taxied in. “We’ve had our excitement for the day.”

There was nervous laughter at that remark. The coach even smiled himself before going on, “We should still be able to get into Muskogee at a reasonable time, so I expect we’ll still have some time to practice today. Go ahead and gather everything up. The sooner we get out of this plane, the sooner we can be on our way.”

“And welcome to the Sooner State,” Wild Bill called out with a laugh.

The coach frowned for a minute before realizing what had just happened. Then even he broke out into a grin. “Yeah, right. Now let’s get out of here.”

The plane rolled to a stop, and our single flight attendant opened the forward door. I wondered how we were going to get down from the plane. Obviously, this airport was too small to have modern jetways. I watched, though, as two men wheeled a large metal stairway into place, but I wasn’t really watching the stairway as much as I was watching the men. To a casual observer, they would probably have appeared normal, but I was studying them intently. Both men were... not exactly transparent, but they didn’t appear completely solid either. It just seemed to be how intently I looked at them that made the difference.

“Jace,” Larry said nervously, “do you see what I see?”

I was hesitant to admit what I saw. “What do you mean, Larry?”

“Those men,” Larry said, emphasizing whom he meant with a nod of his head. “Do they seem odd to you?”

I had to say it some time. “Do you mean, almost transparent?”

“Yeah,” he replied, relieved that he wasn’t the only one who noticed.

“Do you suppose they’re ghosts? Did we really crash? Is this like—you know—Heaven’s airport or something?”

That seemed to be a ridiculous statement on the surface of it, but things hadn’t seemed quite right ever since the explosion in the engine. Reality seemed to be suddenly tilted, as if... No, we couldn’t be dead, I thought. I reached over to pinch my own arm. Ouch! If I was dead, why had that hurt? Besides, I didn’t feel dead. I felt as young and healthy as ever.

A man suddenly appeared in the doorway of the plane. He was tall and slender, a serious look on what we could see of his face—his eyes were hidden by reflective sunglasses. He was some sort of official, his gray-blue shirt, dark trousers, and boots indicated that. Then, I noticed the badge. Police, perhaps, I thought, or State Patrol.

“Listen up, please,” he ordered in an authoritative voice. He didn’t have to speak too loudly. All of us had been silent since the plane had landed, as if we all noticed something out of order. “You have just landed at the Ovid Municipal Airport in Ovid, Oklahoma. Your plane has been damaged, and there may be some danger of a fuel leak and fire, so I am going to ask you to deplane immediately. Do not worry about your personal belongings. Those will be taken care of once the plane has been checked. As I step by your rows, please exit at once and go directly to the bus outside.”

“What bus?” I whispered to Larry. Then, together we looked out the cabin window at a large silver bus which I could have sworn had not been there a moment before. There were no markings on the bus. In fact, there were no seams on the bus. It was as if it was made out of a single piece of silver metal, gleaming brightly in the Oklahoma sun.

“Hey man, this is getting weird,” Larry murmured.

He was right, but as I looked around the bus, no one else seemed unduly upset. No wait, that wasn't quite true. Of course, I couldn't see everyone on the plane, but I could see Wild Bill. He was unusually subdued, as if he, too, noticed something not quite right.

I began to watch as each row emptied, studying the faces of my teammates if I could to see some evidence of alarm or confusion. Most seemed normal, I observed, if just a little shaken from their brush with disaster. But occasionally, I caught a glimpse of uncertainty similar to the one that must have been on my own face.

Coach Jessup, our defensive coordinator, was among that small group. As he rose to his full six foot four height, he looked back at those of us still seated. He was really second only to Coach Wallace in authority. Given his height and build—he had once played safety for the Rams—he was an impressive figure. Just in his mid thirties, many thought he would be head coach when Coach Wallace finally retired. When his eyes caught mine, the confusion registered. He shifted his eyes a little to indicate that I needed to talk to him when I could. Jill looked around, almost in terror. Again, she saw me. I gave her a curt nod as if to say it would be all right. She gave me a small nod herself before deplaning.

In all, I noticed perhaps half a dozen of my teammates sensed that something was wrong. I could tell. These guys were practically my family. Some of them had been teammates for all four years with me. I could tell when something was bothering them, and something was bothering them now.

All of us hustled over to the bus as quickly as we could. Nobody wanted to take a chance on the plane suddenly exploding. I looked back at the tail of the plane and got quite a shock. The BAC-111 has two engines, one mounted on either side of the fuselage near the tail, sort of like a DC-9. The engine on the left side of the plane was just so many pounds of scrap metal, its cowling shredded and blackened.

That we could have survived, I knew was miraculous. The plane could have flown on one engine with relative ease. Unfortunately, whatever had caused the engine to disintegrate had thrown debris into the tail of the aircraft, leaving it twisted as well. My father had his own plane, and I had grown up in it. I knew there was no way the pilot could have controlled a plane in that condition as well as she did. By all rights, we should have lost control and plummeted to the ground.

“What now?” Larry asked, seeing my face devoid of color.

“I’ll tell you later, man,” I promised. I didn’t want to tell him then because I thought it would have sounded crazy. I didn’t realize it then, but the craziness hadn’t even started yet.

Larry and I sat together on the bus, and Coach Jessup slid into the aisle seat across from us. Jill was sitting next to him. Once all the players had boarded the bus and cleared the aisles, he asked, “Jace, I know you saw something weird. I could see it in your eyes. What was it?”

“I don’t know,” I said honestly after a moment’s thought. “Nothing seems right. Did you see those people out there on the tarmac? They... it almost looked as if you could see through them.”

“What are you talking about?” a woman’s voice said from the row behind me. I turned to see it was our pilot, her white shirt, once crisp, now stained and wilted with perspiration. It was warm in the bus, but not that warm.

“Those men.” I gestured with my hand at two workers who were now moving the ramp away from the plane. Odd, I thought, since they’d want to board it later to check it out and remove our possessions.

“Look at them. Do you notice something odd about them?”

“I do,” Larry volunteered next to me.

The pilot shook her head, her short brown locks springing as she did.

“I don’t. They just look like two workers. Why? What do you see?”

“They’re... sort of transparent,” I explained.

She looked at me for a moment, then giggled. “You’re joking, right?”

This is some sort of a prank you guys pull on people?”

Jill leaned over me, her breasts practically in my face. Good old Jill. She might be cute, but she was always just one of the guys. I guess that came from being the only girl in her home. Still, I practically got hard while she did it. I mean, she might have been just one of the guys, but she was a fine looking girl, too.

She peered at the two men. “I see what you mean. What do you think...” she began, but the bus lurched ahead suddenly, causing her to fall in my lap. I was more than a little embarrassed as I realized she could feel my growing erection. She grinned at me. “Not right now,” she jibed. “Maybe later.” She got up to return to her seat, impishly moving her hand across my crotch as she got off me.

“I think you have a new girlfriend,” Larry practically whispered in my ear. I looked at Jill’s butt as she maneuvered past Coach Jessup to reach her seat. New girlfriend, eh? Well, who knows? I thought. I could do a lot worse.

“Oh my god!” our pilot exclaimed as we pulled away.

“Did you see what I meant?” I turned and asked.

“No—I’m looking at the plane,” she explained. “I shouldn’t have been able to turn on final with one engine out and the tail in that condition.”

I nodded. She had confirmed my suspicions as well.

“For that matter,” Larry chimed in, “why did there just happen to be a bus waiting for us when we landed?”

“That’s not so strange,” Jill told us. “Airports have buses to take people off the planes in emergencies. I saw one do it when I changed planes at O’Hare last summer.”

“But that was O’Hare,” our pilot pointed out. “Big airports have those, but I imagine we’re the largest plane to ever land here. Your friend had a good point. What was a big bus like this doing just waiting for us?”

“You’re not suggesting they knew we were coming, are you?” Coach

Jessup asked. It was obvious from his tone that he didn't think much of our pilot.

"I'm not suggesting anything," she said.

"Neither am I," Larry said, as if to remind Coach Jessup that he was the one who had initially mentioned the bus. "I just find it one more oddity."

We were in for a lot of oddities as it turned out. After a couple of miles on the open road, we passed a sign that said 'Welcome to Ovid' followed by a collection of the usual roadside businesses—metal warehouses with brick fronts housing a host of firms, implement and car dealers, and so on. As the road widened to four lanes, the businesses became the usual collection of fast food restaurants, convenience stores, and gas stations. The funny thing was they were all brands I had never heard of. I supposed this Ovid was too small for the usual franchises like Burger King and KFC. I hoped we didn't have to spend much time here.

Trees began to line the street, their leaves still green, but hints of yellow and red were already present, announcing a fall a little later than we experienced further north, but fall nonetheless. It was a bigger town than I had imagined—perhaps as big or bigger than Maryville. I saw a directional sign announcing the way to Capta College. So Ovid was a college town. It was beginning to remind me in some ways of Maryville.

But only in some ways. In other ways, it was as different from Maryville as Earth is from the Moon. Nearly everyone I saw walking in the warm fall weather of Ovid bore that same almost but not quite transparent look. Except for that, they all seemed normal enough. There were men in suits and work clothes as you would expect on a working day. The only children in evidence were very young—preschoolers on a school day. I saw one of them who didn't have that transparent look, and the little guy seemed to see nothing wrong with the fact that the woman who pulled him along by the hand had that same transparent look.

Finally, the bus pulled into a large parking lot in front of a large granite building with the words 'City Hall' engraved between its entry columns. It was a typical Midwest city building—a little nicer and neater than most, but still not out of character. The building was tastefully surrounded by trees and a grassy lawn which sported two flying flags: one the US flag and the other what appeared to be a state flag. 'What were we doing here?' I wondered. I looked a few rows up at our coach. 'Why wasn't he raising hell?' We needed to be in Muskogee, not stuck at City Hall in some town I had never heard of.

It was then that I noticed still another oddity. When the plane had landed, all of us were very animated. We were relieved that we had landed safely, apparently avoiding a grisly end only through the Herculean efforts of our flight crew. Some had even cheered. Now, though, that animation was gone, replaced by an almost hypnotic silence. Oh, there were a few small conversations like the one I had been involved in, but most of the team seemed tranquil almost to the point of a stupor.

I looked at Coach Jessup. "What's happening?" I asked him. "What's the matter with Coach Wallace?"

"I don't know," he admitted. He began to rise to question the head coach, but suddenly the bus doors swung open and the strange police officer got on board. "All right, please get off the bus in an orderly fashion just like before. Then wait for me on the sidewalk."

Almost like robots, my teammates began to stand and get off the bus in almost military precision. Here and there, an individual would look around in confusion. I saw Bert Hazleton, our big halfback, look around almost in fear, but he got off just like everyone else. Soon, our row was moving. I kept looking around, trying to figure out what was going on. I stole a look at the driver—or I tried to. There was no driver. Come to think of it, I hadn't seen a driver get on or off. But how could a bus be driven without a driver? Wouldn't the guys in the front of the bus notice something was wrong? What was happening to all of us?

"Please follow me," the police officer said with authority once we were all gathered on the sidewalk. Like lemmings, we followed him into the building. We were led into a room with wide oak doors. I realized at once it was a courtroom. But what were we doing in a courtroom? It was empty except for our group. Maybe they were just gathering us here until another bus could be brought in from Muskogee State, I rationalized. After all, what possible reason would anyone have to take us into a court?

"All rise!" the police officer suddenly intoned. We were all still on our feet, so why did he say that? I wondered. "Municipal Court of and for the City of Ovid is now in session, the Honorable Judge presiding."

A man in a crisp black robe entered the room from behind the bench. He was a dignified man, striding with the confidence of a man who is in charge and knows it. He was tall, but not as tall as many on our team and appeared to be in good shape for his age, which I estimated to be low to mid fifties. His hair and beard were both neatly trimmed and brown with just a touch of gray. He stopped at his seat, looking over at the officer. "Thank you, Officer Mercer. Spectators may be seated."

Did he mean us? There were no chairs for us, as we were before the bench. No one made a motion to sit anyway, and there were no spectators in the visitor's gallery. Then if we weren't spectators, what were we?

"Officer Mercer, will you read the charges, please?"

We all stood there in an eerie silence, either too dumbfounded or too frightened to open our mouths as Officer Mercer recited formally, "In the case of the people versus the football team of Northwest Missouri State and associated parties, the defendants are charged with unsafe operation of an aircraft and landing such aircraft on the property of the City of Ovid without proper clearances."

"Very well," the Judge said with a nod. "I hereby find the defendants..."

"Wait!" I suddenly yelled. I regretted it the moment I had done so, but I knew this wasn't right. Somebody had to say something. It might as well be me. I certainly had second thoughts about it when I saw all eyes turned toward me, the Judge's the most piercing of all.

"Yes, Mr. Stromberg?" the Judge said in a tone that made me want to run and hide. "Do you have something to say before I pass judgement?"

I looked at my teammates. Some, like Larry, Darren and Dennis were watching me with encouragement. Most were watching with the same level of interest they might have shown if I had been a bug on the wall—which is to say, none at all.

I suppose I should have wondered how he knew my name, but when a man with as much of a powerful presence as the Judge stares at you, it is hardly the time to ask questions. Something in the back of my mind told me I had better come up with the right answer or the consequences might be most unpleasant.

"Your Honor," I began meekly, "we were just on our way to play a football game."

"I know that," he said with grim amusement.

"Well, I mean, I don't think we've done anything wrong."

"Didn't you hear the charges Officer Mercer just read?"

I sighed. "Well, yes, Your Honor, I did, but it seems there were extenuating circumstances." Now there was a good word. My college education might pay off at last. "We didn't intend to land in Ovid."

The Judge snorted, "Mr. Stromberg, you should have tried the law as a profession. I must admire your courage in this matter. However, if you say another word, I will find you in contempt of this court, and the penalty for that might well be more than you would want to pay."

I believed him, and I shut up at once. I had never been so frightened in my life. There was something about this magistrate that exuded raw power of a kind I had never imagined before. Was it a premonition of what was about to happen? Maybe. There was certainly magic in the air. It was enough to calm some and confuse others, and most were calmed by it. It was as if most of my teammates had no idea where they were or what was happening to them. The rest of us—the confused—could only stand and brace ourselves as best we could for whatever was about to happen.

The Judge turned his attention away from me and back to the rest of our team. “I find you guilty of all charges and specifications. In accordance with the Ovid City Code...” His voice suddenly became a little deeper, uttering words I had never heard before.

At first, I thought there was something wrong. Maybe he was having a stroke or something. But no, whatever he was saying was powerful, for the level of magic in the room suddenly increased like a light breeze becoming a strong March wind. I felt it on my face, like tendrils of wind moving the air along my cheeks. Then, it was in my hair, blowing my hair, making it feel longer than it really was.

I looked around at my teammates. Some, like me, seemed to be bracing against the wind. Horace White stood there defiantly as he had many times in our backfield, but he was becoming pale, almost as if the ebony color of his skin was being blown away, revealing skin which became a light flesh pink. His shaved head was sprouting hair, but instead of its natural black, it was a light blonde shade, becoming longer and longer as his facial features changed from their natural broad masculine aspect to a more feminine appearance. His broad shoulders were narrowing swiftly, and what were those two mounds of flesh rising from his chest?

The changes were coming more quickly, and there were so many of them that I couldn't follow them all and still pay attention to what was starting to happen to my own body. A few of my teammates stayed the size they were, and one or two became even larger. Most, however, were becoming smaller—some much smaller. I watched with alarm as Jill Wentworth became suddenly taller, more muscular, as her hair seemed to pull back into her scalp. To my left, Larry seemed as tall as I was, but his nearly black hair had become a wavy brown. He looked younger, too, almost like a young version of Brad Pitt.

“What's happening?” I asked him, surprised to hear my own voice over the gasps and cries emanating from the team. My voice seemed higher and more melodic.

Larry looked at me in stunned silence.

I frowned. "What is it?" I asked.

Ignoring for a moment the sudden gasps and chaos that was swirling around me, I looked first at Larry's eyes to see where he was staring. His eyes were fixed on my chest, so I looked down. With a decidedly high-pitched gasp, I watched as my green and white Bearcats sweatshirt began to expand in two prominent places. As I watched in fascinated horror, two breasts were growing from my chest. I could feel their weight growing with each frightened breath. Incredulous, I raised my hand to touch them, noting almost as an afterthought that the hand was smaller and slimmer, and that my nails were far longer than they should be, glistening with a clear polish.

"Larry..." I started, but my voice trailed off. What was I going to say? Larry, please help me? How could he help me? Powers far greater than I had ever imagined were remolding my entire body. I could feel it coursing over my entire body, leaving behind the weight of longer hair already tickling my ears. And what was clinging to the bottom of my ears? I could feel it in my face as the bones in my cheeks began to shift, almost as if there was something alive in there scuttling around.

My waist and stomach seemed to be contracting, almost as if air were being let out of a balloon, but I could feel the shift of bones in my pelvis as it became wider, and like my new chest, it was suddenly as if I had new weight in my butt. There was a tickling sensation in my legs as well, as if the hair on them was suddenly just not there any longer. That feeling was quickly replaced by the sensation of my legs, feet and ass being encased in something which clung to me almost like a second skin.

"My god, Jace!" Larry exclaimed. Except it didn't sound exactly like Larry. It was still a male voice, but not as deep or as mature. Was he being changed into a girl, too? Part of me hoped not—for his sake. Part of me, though, didn't want to be alone in this humiliation.

Of course, when I looked beyond Larry for a moment, it was obvious that I was not alone. Still in the throes of change, my teammates were meeting their fate with a variety of reactions. While roughly half of them were taking on feminine characteristics at an alarming rate, the rest, although still male, were like Larry, becoming younger, more callow youths. Some seemed unaware of what was happening to them, staring at the Judge as if listening to a lecture. Others—only a few actually—were like Larry and me, examining our new anatomies as best we could with expressions of disbelief.

Why weren't we yelling and screaming? I don't really know. Maybe it was part of the magic which kept us under control. Maybe it was simply fear or shock. I knew—and I was certain some of my teammates knew—that this was the supernatural work of the mysterious Judge. Somehow, he was gifted with powers I had never imagined even existed. He had taken our entire team and, with the power of a few words in some arcane tongue, had transformed us into a group of young men and women who appeared no more than fifteen or sixteen years old. Part of me did want to cry out, but I was afraid. Yes, I'll admit it—I was very afraid. Now was not the time to challenge this powerful man—if he was, in fact, a man at all.

The sensations of transformation were beginning to abate at last. There had been no pain to endure, and I have no idea exactly how long the process took. I suspect it may have differed a little for each of us. I no longer felt as if there were live things crawling beneath my skin, and my anatomy appeared to have settled into its new form. The only odd sensations remaining were those I felt as my clothing continued to shift. My jeans had transformed into a soft aqua skirt cut well above the knee with small slits along the side. That had revealed dark pantyhose clinging to shapely legs, ending in a pair of black patent shoes—fortunately with only the hint of a heel. My new breasts were covered with a light sweater which matched my skirt. It did little to disguise my new shape. There was a small weight on my shoulder—a purse strap, I realized as I looked down. A strand or two of auburn hair lay over my slimmer shoulders as well, ending where I could see a slender gold chain which formed a feminine necklace ending about where my breasts began.

“My god, Jace,” the boy who had been Larry murmured, “you’re beautiful.”

But I didn’t want to be beautiful. I was weak in the knees from shock, and a look around the room told me I wasn’t alone. I didn’t know who was who. When you are enduring the sudden shock of watching your own body transform, becoming younger and changing sex in the process, it is a little difficult to take note of everything happening around you. I no longer recognized the collection of youths who shared the courtroom with me. I knew, of course, that the nice looking boy who stood next to me was my good friend, Larry, for I had watched him change. Why had he remained male while I became a... a girl?

I wasn’t alone in my sex change, though. Fully half the room had become female. Most of my teammates looked as if nothing was wrong. They shared the look of bored high school students everywhere, seemingly unconcerned that they were wearing skirts—and in some cases heels—for the first time in their lives. Several whispered to each other, occasionally eyeing one of the boys and giggling. Others patted their hair or stood trying to look interested with their arms folded under breasts that they treated as if they had had them all their lives.

A few, though, were like me, looking from side to side, trying to make some sense out of what had happened. Some were still boys, like Larry. There was confusion written on their faces, but also relief as well. They could see for themselves that about half of us had joined the distaff side, and they were thanking whatever powers were at work that they had been spared such an indignity. Some were like me, though, radically changed, our hair long, makeup in place, breasts heaving in alarm, and knees bare and shaking.

I looked up at the Judge. His face was impassive. Who—or what—was he? How could he wield such power over us? I wanted to demand an explanation. Perhaps I would have managed to work up enough courage to do so if I had had more time, but a woman’s voice suddenly called, “Thank you very much, Your Honor, for explaining the municipal court system to us.”

Most of the crowd ignored her, but some of us who seemed to be more aware of what had happened turned to see a rather plain, well-dressed woman, perhaps fifty or so with her gray hair drawn back into a neat bun. Wasn't she standing where Coach Wallace had been only a few minutes before? Was this woman our transformed coach? If so, she had dropped about ten years and a lot of pounds, not to mention a whole new set of contours.

The Judge smiled an indulgent smile. “I'm always pleased to explain our legal system to your students, Miss Samson. I'm sure that I'll see at least one of your students as an attorney practicing in this very courtroom some fine day.” He looked out at all of us with a mock stern expression. “I certainly hope that is the only way I see any of you in this courtroom.”

Part 3

There was a smile on his face, and several of the ‘students’ laughed, but the message wasn't lost on those of us who realized what had happened to them. We were not expected to question what had been done to us. We were to accept it and move on with the new lives we had been given, or the consequences might not—would not—be pleasant. I looked around. No one appeared to be ready to challenge him. Then I looked back at the Judge. He was staring right at me! I lowered my eyes quickly. A cowardly act? Maybe, but I had just lost my manhood to powers I could not even imagine. I wasn't about to see what else I might lose.

“All right,” Miss Samson called out. “Now, everybody, go back to the bus. We need to get back to school for lunch before the cafeteria closes.”

A gaggle of talking, laughing students made their way back to the bus, oblivious to the fact that only minutes before, they were the Northwest Missouri State football team. Or at least most of them were oblivious. Here and there, there were furtive glances, worried looks, and awkward movements, as if those individuals were unfamiliar with their bodies. I felt it myself.

When you're six-three and in shape to play football, you move through a crowd with authority, looking over shorter people and walking wherever you want to walk. People get out of your way. Now, thought, I was no longer a strong, powerful figure. My diminutive size made it difficult to see where I needed to go to get ahead. I was, I estimated, no more than five-five or five-six. While that made me as tall as many of the other girls in the crowd, I was considerably shorter than most of the boys. Also, I lacked the physical presence that had once made others get out of my way. Now, I was just a weak, puny girl. It was enough to bring me to the brink of tears. Tears! Oh my god! I hadn't cried since I was ten. Whatever was happening to me must be going past the physical aspects, I realized.

Suddenly, a hand gently grabbed my arm. I turned in surprise to see it was Larry—or at least the boy Larry had become. "Act natural," he whispered to me.

Gratefully, I let him guide me along. Although not as imposing as he had been when we played football together, Larry was still male, and the aura of male self-assuredness was still there. As grateful as I was, though, it bothered me to allow myself to be led as if I was his girlfriend or something through the meandering crowd, but what choice did I have?

The bus was still waiting for us in the parking lot, but although the same shape and size, it was now painted in the familiar orange-yellow with black trim that always identified school buses. 'Ovid School District' was printed neatly in black on the side of the bus beneath the windows. Had they changed buses on us? No, I thought, this bus looked to be the same as the one we had arrived on. Only the details had been changed to make it a school bus. After all, whatever power had changed us into a group of high school students would probably have little difficulty changing a bus to match.

We climbed on the bus, and for the first time in my new life, I learned what a problem wearing a skirt could be. There wasn't enough give in the tight skirt to allow me to balance myself well enough to step onto the bus easily. Again, I was grateful and embarrassed at the same time to have Larry steady me up the step of the bus.

I chose a seat toward the rear of the bus, Larry sliding in next to me. I wanted to be in a position to see as many of my 'classmates' as possible, to determine who, like Larry and me, remembered our previous lives. I couldn't see everyone, but here and there, I could recognize telltale clues.

One big guy (of course most of the guys were big to me now) looked about with keen blue eyes. He wore a black letter sweater with a gold 'O' on it. With his blonde hair and square jaw, he looked almost like Wild Bill, but I suspected that wasn't who he was. He seemed too uncomfortable with who he was. I watched with amusement as he absently tugged at his pants, as if his crotch was uncomfortable. Whoever he had been, I mused, he apparently had a bigger set of balls than before. I found myself envying him.

Another 'couple' boarded the bus in apparent discomfort. The boy was tall and well muscled, but not in an obscene way. In fact, I found myself thinking he was... handsome. He had brown hair and big blue eyes that seemed unsure of what to make of the situation. He looked as if he wanted to put his arm around the girl who preceded him but had thought better about it. The girl was an attractive blonde, almost delicate in features with every pore of her body exuding femininity. She wore a very short, very feminine dress, and she was obviously not pleased about it. I felt sorry for her, since she was stumbling a bit in two-inch heels. At least I had been spared that indignity. They sat together, but I noticed she was practically out of her seat toward the aisle, as if the thought of sitting next to a boy was the worst thing she could imagine.

One of the last to board the bus was someone I assumed to be a teacher. She was much younger than Miss Samson and much prettier. She had dark reddish skin and nearly black hair, and the long silver earrings dangling from her small, half-hidden ears made her look like an exotic Indian princess. She wore a moderate amount of makeup and a tan dress, belted at the waist. Like the blonde girl, she seemed to be having just a little difficulty walking in heels, but hers were a little higher and narrower than the blonde's. Like me, she was studying the transformees, looking for signs of recognition. She spotted me, and I could see her make a mental note of me.

The bus lurched forward, the roar of the engine causing the chatter on the bus to rise to an even higher level. It was just like all the high school bus rides I had been on when I was growing up, only now I was one of the girls.

"Sam!"

I ignored the call, although it seemed to be aimed at me, coming from an attractive brunette across the aisle. Then, she put a hand on my arm. "Sam, are you okay?"

Was that my name? Sam? How ironic that I would have a name which could easily belong to one of the boys. Oh, how I wished I was one of the boys!

"Sam, are you okay?"

Oh, sure, I thought. Never better. But I said, "Yes, I'm fine..." My voice trailed off. I had no idea what her name was.

"What time are you and Danny going to the game?"

"The game?" I said stupidly.

The girl looked at me with concern. "Samantha Wallace, what is wrong with you?"

"I'm sorry," I said, recovering as quickly as I could. "I was just thinking about something else."

"Probably just thinking about Danny," she said with a mischievous grin, looking meaningfully at Larry. So that was his name now—Danny. And I was Samantha—Sam for short—Wallace. I wondered perversely if I was related to Coach Wallace's family now. Did he have relatives in Ovid? I doubted it.

"Just... thinking," I replied.

“Anyhow, you guys want to sit with Jack and me?” She was sitting next to a tall guy with a shock of blond hair. He was grinning in a satisfied manner, his arm draped around the brunette’s shoulders. It was almost impossible to believe that they had once been teammates who would never dream of acting the way they were acting now. It was obvious they had no idea who they had once been.

“Sure,” I managed to say. I couldn’t think of anything else to say.

Fortunately, I didn’t need to say anything else. The bus screeched to a halt, and I realized I had paid no attention to our route. I supposed it didn’t really matter. I was at a high school now, expected to be a high school coed. But what did that mean? Once, I had a dream that I was back in high school but had no idea of what classes to attend or what my assignments were. It was an uncomfortable dream, but I hadn’t considered it a nightmare. Now, I was living that dream, and it seemed to be a certified nightmare.

I looked quickly in the purse. There were the standard women’s cosmetics, which caused me to shudder a bit, a wallet, and a key ring. There appeared to be a locker key on the ring, but which locker?

The brunette came to my unexpected rescue. “Let’s let Jack and Danny save us a place at lunch while we freshen up,” she suggested, motioning with her head at a tall, lanky blond guy I assumed rightly to be Jack.

Freshen up? Oh my god, I thought, she wants me to go touch up our makeup and maybe even go to the bathroom. I had no knowledge of the first activity and wanted to put off the second one for as long as possible. But there was this little odd feeling inside me which told me I would not be able to avoid an introduction to my new anatomy very long.

Dutifully, I followed her off the bus, while Jack led ‘Danny’ off, presumably to the cafeteria. We entered a large, one-story building made of tan brick. A flag flew in front, next to a large wooden sign which proclaimed in black letters over a gold background, ‘Ovid High School.’ In smaller script, the black letters declared, ‘Home of the Fighting Eagles!’

It took me back, to walk down the main hallway of Ovid High for the very first time. I remembered my own high school days so clearly. Of course, I had been one of the jocks. I was a good student, too, but my scholastic interests often took a back seat to my interest in sports—particularly football. Now here I was, back in high school. Only this time, I was in a skirt. This wasn’t going to be easy, I thought.

“Aren’t you going to get anything out of your locker?” the brunette asked. I suddenly realized we had stopped in front of a bank of lockers and she was opening hers.

“Huh?” Gee, that sounded intelligent, I thought to myself.

“Boy, you really are a space case today, Sam,” she said, shaking her head. “It’s not time for your period yet is it?”

Period? Period?

“Uh...no.” At least I hoped it wasn’t. My god, I could—would—have periods. I could get pregnant. No, I couldn’t. To get pregnant, I would have to let some guy... No, that wouldn’t happen. I’d never ever let that happen—not in a million zillion years. Never.

The brunette dived into my purse, which I had forgotten to close. She deftly pulled my keys out and opened the locker next to her own.

“Sam, I don’t know what’s wrong with you, but maybe you should go see the school nurse. You just aren’t yourself today.”

I’m not myself? I thought, almost laughing out loud. Was that ever an understatement! What would this girl say if I told her I was supposed to be a six foot three football player. She would look at me as if I was crazy. Then I could tell her that she used to be one, too. Yes, I’m sure the school nurse would prescribe a nice rubber room for me someplace where I could twiddle my toes for the rest of my life.

“I’m just a little off balance,” I said with a wan smile.

She touched my arm. “Sam, you and Danny aren’t having problems, are you?”

Oh, so ‘Danny’ was more than just a casual Friday night date. Somehow, it figured. How serious were we supposed to be? Had he gotten to first base? Second? Third? Home run?

“No, we’re fine,” I assured her. But were we? I could use a friend now, and Larry—or Danny as I would have to get used to calling him—had been my friend for a long time. Could our friendship survive my abrupt change of sex? I found myself hoping that it would.

“Then get your notebook and your history book and let’s get to lunch.”

I grabbed the notebook and history text she had indicated and meekly followed her down the hall. Students along the way called out, “Hi, Sam! Hi, Jessica!” I just smiled and called “hi” back to them. At least I had found out the brunette’s name.

I felt like an interloper in the girl’s restroom. I tried to emulate what Jessica was doing. She mostly touched up her lipstick which, to me, didn’t even look like it needed touching up. Of course, neither did mine, I thought, noticing its taste for the first time. Still, I went through the motions. I didn’t want to appear out of character.

Danny and Jack were waiting for us as we got our lunch trays. I sat the tray down and looked at the food. The portions were almost minuscule. Years of football training tables had left me with a big appetite, and I couldn’t see how this tiny lunch was going to get me through the day.

“We thought you guys got lost,” Jack commented.

“We had to make ourselves beautiful for you,” Jessica explained. Well, she had made herself beautiful. I had merely followed her into the girl’s room and pretended to touch up my lipstick. Actually, as I said, I had barely let it touch my lips. It felt like there was plenty there already.

Jessica hadn’t used one of the stalls, so I put that off, too. I was now finding I had cause to regret that. The need to pee seemed far more urgent to me than it had when I was male. I would have to eat quickly and get back into the girl’s room before class.

The conversation was inconsequential. We were just four high school friends having lunch together. Danny and I let Jack and Jessica carry most of the conversation, keeping to short answers whenever we could. I was amazed at how complete the transformation had been for Jack and Jessica. I knew they had been our teammates—either that or members of the flight crew. Yet they seemed to have become exactly what they looked like—two high school students. And there was no way of telling that Jessica had ever been male. Who had she been before? I wondered. Was she one of my good friends, or maybe one of the guys I didn't talk to much. I would probably never know, I realized.

I almost envied Jack and Jessica. They were unaware that they had ever been anyone else. They fit into the community perfectly. Neither would ever have to pretend to be someone they had not been before, as Danny and I would. But another part of me disagreed. I might not look like Jason Stromberg anymore, but I knew I had been him once. All my memories, all my ideas, were still there. If I had to build a new life as Samantha Wallace, it would be Jason Stromberg who did it.

Jessica looked suddenly at her watch, then at me. "We need to go to the little girl's room before class." It wasn't a request—it was a command. Of course, I realized. This was part of the female ritual. If one girl in a group had to go to the bathroom, every girl in the group had to go to the bathroom. Well, why not? I had planned to go on my own if I had to.

Jack gave Jessica a chaste kiss, promising to see her in class. I swear Danny was thinking about doing the same, but instead he just gave me a little wave. I was off to the girl's room again.

This time, there was no avoiding the inevitable—I had to pee and I had to pee badly. I was afraid by the time I hiked up my skirt and pulled down my pantyhose, being careful not to rip them, I would find wet panties, but I had managed to hold back. The instant my newly expanded bottom hit the seat, my new muscles relaxed, and I felt instantaneous relief. It was a different feeling than peeing as a male, but the relief was equally pleasant. I felt as if I had two gallons stored up inside me, so I was surprised when only a small amount sprayed out of me. Apparently, my bladder was much smaller.

A lot of things were smaller, I thought to myself. The lunch I had thought would be far too small had proven to be adequate. In fact, I had even left part of it, my new stomach full. Of course, I was much smaller than I had been before, I knew, as I unconsciously wiped myself and got dressed. At least I wouldn't have the temptation to bulk up as I had while playing football, I realized as I touched up my lipstick. That would save on food...

Wait a minute! I looked at myself in the mirror as if I had just come out of a trance. In a way, I suppose I had. I had wiped myself like a girl. Sure, I knew they did that after they peed, but I had never done that before—yet I seemed to know just what to do. I hadn't even taken the time to examine my new privates. Then, I had been so deep in thought that I had marched right over to the mirror and reapplied lipstick as if I had done it hundreds of times before—again without really thinking about it.

What did all this mean? Was I about to lose my identity like so many of the others? I hoped not. As much as I disliked being this girl, I didn't want to forget who I had been. Maybe it was just part of the magic, I thought. Maybe when you didn't fight it, you just acted the way you were supposed to act. Was there some way to test that thought? Maybe.

Jessica was waiting for me outside the restroom. "Come on, let's go to class," she said.

I shook my head, feeling the auburn tresses drift across my shoulders. "You go ahead," I told her. "I need to go back to my locker." I didn't really need to go to my locker. I just wanted to test my theory. If I was right, I would be able to walk to class without thinking about where I was going. Of course, if I was wrong, I had given up a golden opportunity to be led to where I needed to be. Still, that was part of my nature. I had to try.

"Okay," she said. Then, stopping her turn, "Are you sure you're okay?"

I smiled what I hoped was a confident smile. "I'm fine."

After Jessica left, I tried to blank my mind. I couldn't do it—I don't think anyone really can. Then I realized that we do things by rote when we're thinking about something else. What could I think about? My past life? I wondered what had become of us outside Ovid. Had we been reported missing when our plane was overdue? Surely we had. That meant there would be a search for us. It wasn't every day that a plane drops out of sight in clear weather while carrying a college football team.

But what if we weren't missing—at least as far as the world outside Ovid was concerned? After all, any agency powerful enough to turn a college football team into a group of high school students might be able to reshape the rest of the world enough to make it seem as if we had never existed.

But if that was the case, what agency could have such power? Countless thousands of lives would have been changed. My parents, my brother and sister, all my relatives and friends, and everyone else I had ever met would have a different set of memories. Multiply that by all of my teammates on the plane and the number would be incredible. But wait! That would mean there would be a new team at Northwest Missouri State composed of guys who weren't there before. All their lives would be changed as well. Instead of playing for another school, they would now be Bearcats. Where would it all end? How could such a power exist? It went beyond magic; it was god-like.

I sat down, and the world I had been seeking to ignore rushed back around me. I had been walking down the hall, lost in thought, and my feet had taken me into a classroom and over to an empty desk right next to Larry—er, Danny.

"Are you okay?" he asked me over the din of the pre-class conversation.

"Why does everybody keep asking me that?" I muttered.

"How did you find this classroom?" he wanted to know, speaking so that only I could hear.

“It was an experiment,” I replied. “It seems if we sit back and just let things happen, we act like the people we’ve become.” I gave a little shudder. How far would that go? What sort of a girl was Samantha Wallace anyway? If I just let myself go, would I find myself in the back seat of some guy’s car on some lonely country road? I would have to be careful.

“We need to talk after class,” he offered.

I nodded. Maybe we could go somewhere after school and talk. Did one of us have a car? For that matter, were either of us now old enough to drive? I quickly looked in my purse, pushing by all the cosmetics to find my wallet and keys. The keys were on top of the wallet, but there was nothing that looked like a car key. That was a bad sign. The wallet confirmed it. There was no driver’s license anywhere. The only picture ID I had was my student ID. According to my birth date, I was only fifteen. That was going to throw a crimp in any plans I might come up with.

It turned out we were in a World History class. The teacher was Miss Samson who I suspected had once been our coach. If so, she showed no signs of remembering who she had been. She taught the class with the poise and experience of someone who had been teaching it for years, and her manner was decidedly feminine.

The class was made up mostly of students who had that same semi-transparent appearance we had first observed at the airport. Although they seemed normal enough and were apparently solid as evidenced by the way their seats moved when they leaned back, there was something about them that made you think you could see through them. Some of the other students were apparently our former teammates—or at least people like them. They seemed to be completely at ease with who they had become and noticed nothing unusual.

Two of the girls looked a little uncomfortable, though. One was a very attractive Hispanic girl, with long black hair that practically shined. She kept tugging at her short skirt as if by doing so she could cover her smooth legs. She would look around every now and then as if embarrassed that someone might see them. Then, she would redden when it became apparent to her that more than one boy in the room was watching her appreciatively.

The other girl was an attractive although hardly beautiful brunette who seemed to be tuned out as far as Miss Samson's lecture was concerned. She instead was closely examining her hands, touching the tips of her feminine fingernails as if to test if they were real. She kept brushing her long brown hair away from her face as if she wasn't used to wearing it that long.

Danny noticed, too, and we made eye contact long enough to realize that we had to stop both of those girls and talk with them after class. I took the Hispanic girl as the class bell rang, gently touching her arm. She jumped suddenly. I think she had been afraid that one of the boys had grabbed her. I wish, I thought.

Danny had gotten the attention of the other girl, and in moments, we were huddled outside the classroom. The two girls looked a little nervous at Danny's presence. It was obvious that neither had ever socialized with boys in the role of girls before.

"Look," I started out, "we haven't got much time until the next class. I was Jace Stromberg and this guy was Larry Gunn. You both remember who you were, too, don't you?"

"Thank god!" the Hispanic girl practically cried. "I was wondering if I was the only one who remembered." Like all of us, she had also picked up a little bit of an Oklahoma twang, but her voice also carried the lilting inflections of someone who had been raised to speak another language. "I'm—or I was—Bert Hazleton."

My mouth flew open. Bert had been about my size when he played second-string wide receiver for the team. He had also been blonde and very fair skinned, almost to the point that he tended to sunburn rather than tan. Now, here he was, petite and dark, looking absolutely nothing like the Bert I remembered.

"My name is Teresa Gonzales now," she continued nervously. "I've got to figure out a way to get back to my own life. There's a big guy on the football team here who thinks I'm his girl. He told me he'd meet me after the game, and I'm scared to death."

I hoped there was a way, but what would it be? I just gave her a sympathetic nod and looked at the other girl.

"I was Austin Blake," she said simply. Austin had been a junior and a second string halfback. I hadn't known him very well. He was one of the guys who kept pretty much to himself. I knew that he had a long-time girlfriend who had followed him to college, and he lived with her off campus. He didn't party much with the team, and I didn't think I had said a dozen words to him since we had met.

"Have you found any others who remember?" Danny asked.

The girl who had been Austin bit her lip in thought, leaving a small amount of bright pink lipstick on her teeth. "No..." she replied at last, shaking her head slowly. "At least I'm not sure. No, wait! The pilot—I noticed the pilot."

"Is she a student here now?" I asked.

"I don't think so. I saw her change into another young woman. When we went to the bus, she left the group. She didn't seem to notice anything odd. I don't think she remembers a thing. I think she's older than we are—now."

I filed that in memory. If we ever came up with a plan for getting out of Ovid, it would have been handy to have a pilot. No such luck, though.

The bell rang again. We were due in another class. Bert—Teresa now—looked stricken. "I don't know where I'm supposed to be."

"Calm down," I told him—her. Then I explained to all of my former teammates the technique I had discovered to find my next class. I used it myself again, finding myself in a home economics class surrounded by two dozen other girls. If I had still been Jace, I would have thought I had died and gone to heaven. Not one of the girls was homely. While some were prettier than others, there wasn't a one I wouldn't have found attractive as Jace. Apparently, the powers that ruled Ovid had decided that ugly was out.

Most of the girls had that same transparent look that was so common in Ovid, but a few were real. Of the real ones, only three of us seemed to know who we had been. Austin—who was now named Darla Hastings—and a pretty blonde girl who was carefully watching Darla and me. She was the same blonde I had noticed on the bus—the girl who looked so uncomfortable. I didn't have a chance to talk to her before class, though. In fact, Darla and I had arrived late, suffering the silent frown of the teacher.

Our teacher, who I later learned was named Ms. Morrison, really got into her subject. She really looked like the Beaver's mother. Not exactly, I mean, but she wore a skirt and blouse, neatly pressed and very feminine, her blonde hair was neatly in place, and her makeup was flawlessly feminine without exaggeration. The fact that she was partially transparent did nothing to detract from her appearance. Apparently, I had landed smack dab in the middle of the sewing part of the syllabus. Now, I had never so much as sewed a button back on a shirt before, so if I was going to look normal, I had a lot of learning to do. Fortunately, we were still in the lecture stage, so I had a chance to catch up.

By the end of the class, I had even sewed a button on a shirt and a hemmed a skirt. To be honest, I wasn't very good at it.

"Samantha, haven't you ever helped your mother with sewing before?" Miss Morrison asked with an almost motherly frown.

"I'm afraid not," I answered truthfully. In my real family, my mother did most of the sewing for my sister, brother, dad and me. Even my older sister never did much sewing. Oh, I suppose mom had at least taught her how, but she never took to it.

"Darla, show her how to do that hem straighter," she said, moving along to the next girl.

Darla? I looked over at my former teammate. She had an embarrassed smile on her face.

"You know how to sew?" I asked her in a whisper as I looked down at the straight hem she had just finished.

She shrugged and whispered back, "I grew up with three sisters. Mom taught them to sew and just figured why not teach me while she was at it?"

"I suppose you can cook, too," I ventured.

"Sure can. I do a mean pineapple upside down cake."

I'll be darned if we didn't both giggle.

The blonde stopped us after class. "I'm Darren McDougal," she said without preamble. When Darla and I had introduced ourselves, she went on, "Look, we've got to figure some way out of this."

Part 4

"I'm all for that," I said honestly. I didn't want to remain a girl if I didn't have to, but I didn't think it was the sort of thing you went to the doctor to get an antibiotic for. 'Hi, doc, I've just grown tits and my balls have disappeared. Do you have something for that?'

"Then let's get organized," she said with a grin.

I held up my hand. "Look... Say, what do I call you?"

She frowned. "I told you, Jace, I'm Darren."

I shook my head. "Look, that isn't going to work. We can't go around here calling ourselves Austin, Darren and Jace. Look at us. People will think we've lost our minds."

Darren growled, "What do we care if these ghosts think we've lost our minds?"

"Shades."

We both turned to Darla, who up to now had had little to say. "They're called shades," she clarified. "I was talking to a girl at lunch about it and..."

"Wait a minute," I stopped her. "A real girl? Not one of these shades?"

"Yes," Darla confirmed. "A real girl. We aren't the only ones who've been transformed. Apparently, the Judge has been doing this to people for a couple of months now. The girl I was talking to had been a guy like us. She—he then—was caught speeding by that weird cop. The Judge told him he'd change him and make him young enough that he wouldn't be able to speed for a while. She's too young to drive now."

'Talk about revoking someone's license,' I thought.

"Anyhow, I guess these shades are as real as we are. They're solid to the touch and they don't have any more inkling of what's going on here than most of our teammates do."

"But the girl you were talking to," Darren pressed. "That means there's more people here who remember who they were. We need to contact them."

"She won't help us," Darla said. "She's been here long enough that she's gotten used to being a girl. She even has a steady boyfriend."

Darren blanched. "Then we have to do whatever we're going to do before some of our guys feel the same way. I'll let Coach Jessup know."

"Coach Jessup remembers?" I asked, suddenly curious.

Darren nodded. "Yeah. He's the Social Studies teacher now. They gave him the name of Ms. Drew. I got a chance to talk to him on the bus. Since they made him a teacher, he thinks he might be able to get us organized."

"Organized?" Darla asked.

"Yeah," Darren said. "Look Austin, we're still a team, no matter what we look like. If we all stand up to that Judge, we should be able to force him to change us back."

Darla shook her head. "I don't know. I don't think that's such a good idea."

Darren snorted, "Pussy!" She then stormed away.

"Yeah," Darla agreed. "So?" But I don't think Darren heard her. And we still didn't know her name.

As I came out of my last class, Danny was there to meet me. "How did the rest of your day go?" he asked me with a little grin.

"Oh great," I said sarcastically. "How did you know where to meet me?"

He shrugged. "I just did the same thing you did and let my feet do the walking. I stopped here, so I assumed this was where I was supposed to be. I found out I have a car, so I guess I'm supposed to drive you home."

"You don't even know where I live," I pointed out.

Another shrug. "I'll just think about something else and drive there on autopilot."

I wasn't so sure I wanted someone driving me around this strange town without thinking about where they were going. But what other choice did I really have? I was too tired to try to figure out which school bus went by my house. I fell in step with him.

His car was an old Mazda, but it was in decent shape. Apparently Danny's family had enough money to buy him a car when he turned sixteen because I knew he couldn't be much older than me. Either that or he had one heck of a paper route.

As we drove, I told Danny what had happened that afternoon.

He nodded. "I know all about Coach Jessup."

"You do? How?"

"Wild Bill Moreland was in Spanish class with me this afternoon," Danny explained.

"So who did he become?" I secretly hoped he had become a girl with big tits. He was always bragging about his sexual exploits, claiming to be 'a boob man.' It would be very appropriate if he had a set of his own.

I was doomed to be disappointed though. "He's still a guy," Danny told me. "He isn't quite as big as he was, but he's all male. And get this, he's a quarterback on the high school football team."

“No!” I was pissed beyond belief. Here I was, in makeup and skirts while that big prick... well, he still had a prick. It wasn’t fair.

We had pulled up in front of a comfortable middle class two-story not too dissimilar from the one I had grown up in. “Do you live here?” I asked.

He grinned. “No, but I think you do. Your technique for getting around works pretty well.”

“Uh, do you want to come in?” I really didn’t want to face my ‘family’ alone.

“Sorry. I have to go home myself. Besides, I have to get ready to take you out on our date.” He was grinning impishly.

I gave him a playful slug on his shoulder. “You asshole. It’s not a date. We’re just going to the game together.”

“Can I hold your hand tonight?”

I flushed. “Danny!”

He laughed, “Okay, I’ll see you tonight.”

As he drove away, I was left alone in front of the house that was supposed to be my home.

I sighed to myself. At least I lived in a nice neighborhood. I suppose I could have been stuck with a lot worse. Having grown up in a nice suburb of Kansas City, the son of a doctor, I had become accustomed to pleasant surroundings. I wondered what my new parents did for a living. And did I have any brothers or sisters? Well, there was only one way to find out.

I opened the door with the house key I had found in my purse. To be honest, I was frightened half to death. It was one thing to try to be Samantha Wallace while surrounded by casual friends and my former teammates at the high school. It was quite another to try to play my role with my new ‘family.’ There were just so many variables—all of which I would be expected to know. I would just have to be as passive as I possibly could until I got the lay of the land.

“Is that you, Samantha?” a woman’s voice called from somewhere in the house.

“It’s me!” I called back. I almost added “mom” but I wasn’t sure if the voice belonged to my mother. It might be an older sister, an aunt, my father’s mistress (just joking) or whoever. I looked around quickly for some clue and was rewarded by what was obviously a family portrait over the fireplace. It showed a middle-aged couple, quite attractive, a girl—me—and a boy of perhaps twelve. Judging from the face I had seen in the mirror and comparing it to my face in the picture, it appeared to be quite recent.

“I’m glad you’re home early,” my ‘mom’ said entering the room. She could not deny me. She had the same auburn hair I now had and looked like an older version of me. Although the portrait had not shown it, she was one of the shades. She was wearing a pair of khaki slacks and a white knit blouse. She smiled when she saw me. “You always look so pretty in that outfit, Samantha.”

I felt my face flushing. I wasn’t used to being called pretty, although I knew I now was.

“Your father and I have to go to that barbecue over at the Hendersons,” she explained. “He’s coming by to pick me up in a few minutes. I left you a note on the counter, and your dinner is in the oven. You’re still going to the game tonight with Danny, aren’t you?”

“Uh, yes.”

“Okay,” she said with a smile. “By the way, Josh will be staying over at Paul’s house tonight. I left you the number and the Henderson’s number in case anything comes up. Of course, your dad will have his pager if you need him.”

I just listened. She was giving me a wealth of information. Josh had to be my brother, and if my new father had a pager, it meant he had to be on call. What was he? A doctor like my father? I wasn’t sure. It also meant I would be left alone in the house for a while. That would give me plenty of time to explore my new surroundings. By the time my new family had returned, I would at least have a rough idea of where everything was.

“There’s your father now,” she announced as I heard the sound of a vehicle in the driveway. She rushed away, presumably back to her bedroom to finish getting ready.

The door opened, and the man in the portrait walked in. He was tall—about as tall as I had been until a few hours ago. His hair was short and partially gray, and he had a rugged, suntanned face, even if it was a little transparent. Apparently, I was to be surrounded by shades. Somehow, that didn’t bother me. From what I had seen of the shades so far, they were just normal people.

He grinned at me. “Hi, sweetheart! I’m surprised to see you here. I thought you’d be with Danny.”

“I’ll see him tonight,” I replied, a little uncomfortable at being called ‘sweetheart.’

“Well, give him my best,” he said, heading for the bedroom. “I’ve got to get cleaned up. I’ve been treating Jim Carson’s horse and I smell a little like one.”

With that, he was off to get changed. So he was a vet. One of my friends in high school had been the son of a vet. I knew that in many ways, being a vet was as demanding as my own real father’s occupation—particularly in a small agricultural town like Ovid. He would be expected to treat everything from small dogs and cats to horses and cows.

At least I had been given a normal, middle class family, I thought. I had a professional father, a mother who I suspected stayed at home, a younger brother, and... What was Danny? He was my old friend, Larry, of course. But what else was he in the scheme of things in Ovid? He was obviously my boyfriend. My friends knew it and my family knew it. But how close were we supposed to be? I hoped not very close because I wasn’t ready to be somebody’s girlfriend. Not now—and maybe not ever. I was grateful Danny remembered being Larry. It would make it much easier for us to stay just friends than if he had nothing but memories of me being his close girlfriend. I pitied Teresa who would have to fight off a big football player who thought she had always been his girlfriend.

The game was at seven, and Danny had agreed to pick me up about six thirty so we could get good seats with Jack and Jessica. It was not even five yet, so I had plenty of time to get ready. I mean, how much time would I need? I'd just slip on a pair of jeans and be ready to go in five minutes, so I had plenty of time to look around.

While my parents got ready for their own social event, I checked out what 'mom' had made for my dinner. I had been surprised that the tiny lunch I had been given at school had actually lasted me all afternoon. It must have been because I was smaller and less athletic now, because had I tried to eat so little at lunch when I was Jace, I would have been starving by now. Dinner looked a lot better and the portion was larger than lunch. There was another plus, I thought as I looked at the plate of baked chicken. My new mother was apparently a good cook. Thank God for small favors.

My new parents left for their barbecue as I was eating. I found that waving goodbye to them wasn't sufficient. As their daughter, I was expected to hug and kiss them. It felt okay to hug my mother, but getting a kiss from my father seemed unnatural. My real father and I had not kissed since I was a small child, so the experience felt odd—not unpleasant, but odd.

So I was left alone in my new house, dinner eaten, 'family' gone, and time to kill. I used it to my advantage, exploring the house, figuring out all the little things I would be expected to know. I moved from room to room, stopping to explore, to examine everything I saw. I was actually relieved to see that if I had to be a girl, at least I was going to be part of a family not too different in some ways from my own. It would make it easier for me to adapt.

Adapt?

I had been a girl for only a few hours and yet I was thinking about adapting. Shouldn't I be thinking about how to get this magic reversed? I thought. After all, I wasn't meant to be a girl. I was meant to be Jason Stromberg, football player and history major. I suppose I should be less resigned to my fate, but I knew powerful magic was at work. What could I do to overcome it? My best strategy was to wait and see if Coach Jessup could do something and help him—her. Our only chance was to stick together as a team. Until then, I would have to play the hand I was dealt.

I had saved my room and my ‘brother’s’ room for last. As I walked into his room, I felt pangs of envy. Why couldn’t I have been turned into a boy—even a younger one like my new brother? I knew how to be a boy. I could still play football then and do all the things boys do. It might have actually been fun to be twelve or so again—as a boy—and grow up all over again. What would I do differently if I could? Well, I would probably have concentrated on school a little more. I made good grades, but not good enough to give me the background and study habits I would have needed to follow in my real father’s footsteps as a doctor. I had often regretted that I hadn’t been a more serious student. The idea of being a doctor actually appealed to me.

I sighed, looking around—what was his name? Oh yes, Josh—around Josh’s room one more time. Lucky little prick, I thought. I’d give a lot to change places with him.

At last came the room I had been avoiding—my own. I had visions of what it would look like. I was sure it would be all feminine with plenty of lace and soft pastels like my sister’s room had been. There would be little fluffy pillows, a doll or teddy bear on the bed, and maybe a poster of some rock star displaying lots of muscles and a bulge in the crotch of his tight pants.

I was a little relieved when I saw I was wrong. Well, partially wrong at least. There were a couple of fluffy pillows. And the peach-colored walls and small flower patterns on the curtains were most certainly feminine, but there were no dolls, teddy bears, or rock star posters in evidence. Apparently, Samantha was feminine in tastes but not overtly so.

I still had plenty of time before Danny picked me up. I even thought about calling him and cancelling out to take advantage of my time alone, but to be honest, I did want to watch the football game. I still loved the game and regretted that my playing days seemed to be over, but some of my old teammates were still male and could be on the team. I wanted to be there to cheer them on.

I had no intention of doing so dressed like a wanna-be cheerleader. There would be no skirts for me. Of course, I couldn't exactly dress out of character, but a lot of girls wore jeans and sweatshirts and sneakers to football games. I planned to be one of them.

I have to admit, what happened after that was my own fault. I really did have plenty of time, particularly, I thought, if I allowed myself to go into automatic mode to get dressed. I looked through my large closet, selecting an Ovid High sweatshirt, a pair of jeans, and white sneakers. From a drawer, I found a pair of athletic socks. No one would mistake me for a boy, but at least I would be dressed in a manner that was comfortable and familiar to me.

The mistake I made was using time I could have spent getting ready to examine myself. I had gone to the restroom earlier at school, but I had been in a hurry and had been in no mood to examine what was in my panties. I had just made a quick wipe and gotten dressed again as quickly as possible. Now, though, I had had a few more hours to adjust to who I had become. As a result, I decided to play just a little bit.

Like my real sister's room, Sam had a full-length mirror attached to the back of the door. After carefully closing the curtains, I decided to treat myself to a striptease. Humming a little bump and grind music to myself, a seductively pulled off my dress, admiring myself standing there in a bra, panties and pantyhose. It wasn't exactly spangles and garter belts like I had seen on a quick trip to a Kansas City topless joint a few weeks earlier with Larry and some of my other teammates. But I had to admit that if I were in my old body, Sam would turn me on.

She—I—had a very nice body. Although I was only fifteen and still developing, my breasts were already large and firm, and the rest of my figure, although not fully adult, would be mature in a matter of months. My legs were long and graceful. Maybe I could actually be a model. That long auburn hair and classic face were of a type photographers looked for.

Or I could be the Playboy Playmate in a couple of years, I thought wickedly. I sat down on my bed, still looking into the mirror, trying to imitate the poses I had often seen in the men's magazines—or at least the more tasteful magazines. Maybe a little more skin. I peeled off the pantyhose and flipped my long hair up with my hand, posing in front of the mirror.

Looking back on it, I don't think I had really accepted my new body yet. It was more like divorcing my mind from my body, pretending to watch an attractive girl go through the poses for me. The girl posing seductively in the mirror wasn't really me. I was still Jace Stromberg, sitting in my room back at college, looking through the latest issue of Playboy at the dynamite young girl represented in the glossy pictures. It wasn't really me who pulled out a pair of off-white heels from the closet, removed her bra, and stood with bedroom eyes, one hand under a breast while the other hand played with the waistband of her panties. It wasn't really me who pulled off those panties and stood with her legs spread and her sex prominently displayed. It wasn't really me who jumped guiltily a foot into the air when the phone at her bedside suddenly rang.

"He... hello?" I stammered, standing there in the nude, the phone shaking in my hand. Whoever it is can't see you, I kept telling myself, but I still felt like I had been caught in the act.

"It's just me," Danny's voice said. I unconsciously tried to cover my crotch and breasts with the one hand that wasn't holding the phone. I nearly dropped the phone in the process.

"I had to look up your number. Your own phone, huh?" Danny asked.

"Uh...yes."

"Well," he went on, "I just thought I'd call and tell you I'll be there in about fifteen minutes."

"Fifteen minutes?" I looked at the clock on my nightstand. I had lost track of time. My little act in front of the mirror had gone on longer than I thought.

“Is that a problem?”

I wasn’t about to develop a reputation of not being ready on time. So many girls almost made it a point to be late. It couldn’t be that hard to get ready, could it? “No—not at all—bye!” I was in such a hurry I practically slammed down the phone.

I quickly put the panties back on. The bra was another matter, but with a little effort, I managed to get it on, too. Next would be the sweatshirt. I got in on in no time, but somehow, it just didn’t look right. Having worn sweatshirts most of my life, I just couldn’t stand what it did to me. As Jace, I had looked manly in a sweatshirt since I was fifteen. This sweatshirt was almost a parody of that. True, it hid my breasts, but the huge sweatshirt on my slender frame just didn’t look good at all. I looked like a war refugee. Slipping it off and pulling the hair back out of my eyes, I managed to find a cranberry turtleneck sweater in the closet. It didn’t look too feminine, and it did look as if it would be warm enough to ward off the fall evening chill. I slipped it on. It looked fine. The breasts were in evidence, but not voluptuously so.

Next came the jeans. I pulled them up over my legs. They felt like jeans, but something was wrong. They were way too tight. I managed to pull them up over my widened hips. They fastened fine at my slender waist, but the way they fit...

I looked in the mirror. They honestly looked as if they had been painted on. Every curve and smooth line of my body was outlined in denim blue. This wasn’t the look I wanted! I wanted a pair of nice, baggy jeans. Instead of hiding my femininity, I had accentuated it. I looked at the clock. Danny would be there any minute. I couldn’t go like this, though, could I?

There was only one thing to do. Since I was making a hash of things, it was time to go on automatic. I only hoped my automatic side would agree with my need to be on time. Apparently, it did. I dashed into the bathroom, ran a hairbrush through my long hair, touched up my lipstick, and grabbed a pair of shoes from the closet, all in record time just as the doorbell rang. All of this was done without conscious effort, which was fine with me since I had obviously severely underestimated how much time it would take me to get ready to go.

Danny was dressed in a very similar fashion to me. His sweater was navy blue, though, and of course, his jeans had a traditional male fit instead of the ones I had painted on. It allowed him to wear sneakers as well. Unfortunately the shoes my unconscious mind had selected were a pair of black flats. It was too late to go back for sneakers, and to be honest, I don't think I would have been able to pull athletic socks up under the tight fitting leg of the jeans.

Danny grinned appreciatively when I opened the door. "Hey, how about that? A girl who can be ready to go on time."

"I'm not a girl," I argued, still pleased that I had been able to do something that wasn't stereotypically feminine—like getting ready on time.

He looked at me carefully. "Well, you could have fooled me."

For some reason, I was pleased again. I should have been annoyed at his statement, for I didn't want to be a girl. Still, I supposed, if I had to be a girl, it was better to be one as attractive as Samantha Wallace.

"Let's go," I said.

"Aren't you going to take your purse?"

"Oh, sure." Damn, I had forgotten that girls always carry a purse. I was so used to carrying everything I needed in a wallet in my back pocket. With the extra padding I had back there covered by skin tight jeans, I would have no choice but to carry a purse. "I'll just be a minute."

I rushed back upstairs and grabbed the purse off my bed, stopping for a moment to look at myself in the mirror. I fussed a little with a lock of hair that didn't look quite right. I looked great—for a girl—but I wondered if in my rush I had forgotten anything. I studied myself for a moment until I heard, "Are you ready?" from the bottom of the stairs.

Good lord! I was primping. I was all ready to go. All I had needed to do was get the damn purse and go. Instead, I had started looking at myself in the mirror again. I was only going to a stupid high school football game. If I spent this much time and effort getting ready for this, how much time would I spend when I had to be really dressed up? I had only been a girl for a few hours and it was already becoming a pain in the ass—both figuratively and with the tight jeans, literally.

“We ought to be able to identify a few more of our teammates tonight,” Danny suggested as we drove to the game.

“I hope so,” I agreed. “If we can find a large enough group that remembers who they were, we might be able to figure a way out of here.”

“So how is your family?” he asked.

I gave him a quick rundown on my new parents. As I told him about them, I began to realize to myself that I had been very fortunate. I could have done a lot worse. “How about yours?” I asked.

He smiled. “Well, it took me a little time to get home after I left your house. I had a little car trouble.”

“What happened?” I asked. “It seems to be running fine now.”

“Oh, it is,” he agreed. “It was just a flat. I hit a nail. That strange cop—Officer Mercer—saw me and helped me out. He even took me home and promised he’d get my car to me later. Sure enough, an hour later, it was in my driveway, the tire as good as new. Even the gas tank was filled. You know, while he was helping, he never cracked a smile. And how did he happen to be there just when I needed help?”

“It’s strange all right,” I agreed. It seemed as if the mysterious Officer Mercer was always just where he needed to be—at the airport, in the courtroom, even helping Danny. At least the last had been of benefit to one of my teammates. Maybe it was because he saw us as residents of Ovid now. Protect and serve and all that.

“My parents are about like yours,” Danny explained. “They’re both shades. My ‘father’ runs a farm equipment business selling tractors and farm implements like ploughs and stuff. My ‘mother’ sells real estate. Apparently, I've got an older brother, but he's away at college at the University of Oklahoma."

"Do you suppose he's really at the university?" I asked suddenly.

Danny looked at me. "What makes you say that?"

I almost quipped that it was feminine intuition but I was afraid it might really be that. "I don't know. It just seems that maybe these shades exist only here in Ovid. And I have no idea where Ovid exists."

"I know what you mean," he agreed. "I've never heard of Ovid, and I wouldn't be surprised to find out that it doesn't show up on any map either. What sort of beings would have the ability to create something like Ovid and then alter us to live in it?"

"Gods," I said simply.

"Gods?" Danny repeated. "You mean God?"

"Don't go religious on me," I told Danny as we pulled into the school parking lot. "I mean beings with godlike powers. Up until today, I didn't believe anything like Ovid was even possible. Now, we have to grant that magic exists, but this seems to be a bit beyond the capabilities of traditional wizards from out of folklore. I'd say the Judge and his minions like Officer Mercer are some kind of gods."

"You mean like the old Greek or Norse gods?"

"Maybe," I replied. "You know, I was a history major. I do recall that there was a Roman poet named Ovid. The Roman gods came from the Greek gods—or at least a number of them did. Maybe they really existed."

"That sounds sacrilegious," Danny cautioned. I suddenly remembered that as Larry he had been raised in a strict religious family.

Part 5

"I don't mean it that way," I assured him. "An author once said that science sufficiently advanced would be viewed by others as magic. Taking that one step further, if we allow that magic exists—and I think we have to now—we might conclude that wielders of very powerful magic are gods.”

“So you don’t mean they’re really gods,” he concluded. I let him think that if it made him feel better. By my definition, the Judge and his followers were gods of one sort or another. If they look like gods and act like gods and change your sex like gods, they must be gods.

Ovid High School had a nice little football stadium. It was built out of flint stone, a popular building material in parts of the Midwest. A soft, tan-colored stone, it made a very attractive little stadium. There was even a bronze plaque attached to it that indicated it had been built by the WPA in the thirties. I doubted it, though. I didn’t think there had been an Ovid in the thirties. I was certain Ovid had been built for the benefit of its transformed residents, and since other than my teammates, there seemed to be very few of those around, I suspected that Ovid had been created quite recently—but for what purpose? Why were we being changed in this way, our real lives destroyed and these artificial ones created for us?

I had to put those thoughts aside and concentrate on being Samantha Wallace, I realized as we entered the stadium. Cries of “Hi, Danny” and “Hi, Sam,” were demanding our attention. We had to pretend to be what we had been changed into—namely two high school students on a date. Well, not exactly a date. I mean, we could have just been two friends out doing something together. Larry and I used to do that all the time.

But Danny wasn’t Larry and I wasn’t Jace, I realized as we sat down together with Jessica and Jack and some other couples. We weren’t being seen by others as just two friends going to the game together. As far as the rest of our ‘friends’ were concerned, we were a couple.

In fact, the only other person in our section who I knew realized she had been changed was Darla Hastings, formerly Austin Blake. She was sitting with a guy I assumed was one of our old teammates, but whoever he had been, he seemed to not realize he had ever been anyone else. He kept putting his arm around Darla, much to her discomfort. I felt very sorry for her. At least Danny knew who he had been and kept his distance from me.

There was no sign of the attractive blonde who had been Darren McDougal. I wasn't surprised. Whatever her name was now, she was fighting her new sex with everything she had. I wished she'd chill out a little bit. If it turned out that we were stuck with these new lives, she was letting herself in for a lot of misery.

Just by listening to the conversation around me, I realized there was at least one other person in the stands who remembered her previous life. Bert Hazleton, who had become Teresa Gonzales, was seated about six rows from us, closer to the team. Someone pointed out that all of the group of girls she was sitting with were dating football players. A few girls would come up and speak to that group, but boys in the stands knew to stay away. They were all spoken for. Teresa was carrying on an animated conversation with an attractive black girl. I didn't know who she was, but I suspected that like us, she remembered her previous life.

Danny pointed out the player who had been Wild Bill Moreland. He was now Glen MacReady, one of our quarterbacks. He even wore a number eight jersey just like he had back in college. The lucky bastard. As I watched the pre-game warm-ups on the field, I began to realize that maybe Wild Bill wasn't so lucky after all. He lacked the throwing arm he had once possessed, throwing such wobbly passes that I heard Jack mutter to no one in particular, "Damned if MacReady doesn't throw like a girl."

Throw like a girl? Come to think of it, he did throw a little like a girl. I could remember when I was younger how my older sister would always want to toss the football around with us. We always told her she threw like a girl, and the way she threw was very much like the former Wild Bill threw. No, the former Wild Bill Moreland would never realize his dream of professional football in the body of Glen MacReady. In fact, he'd probably never even have the chance to play college football. For an insensitive jock like Wild Bill, maybe that was a greater hardship than being changed into a girl.

It was easy to see who the star quarterback of Ovid High was. His number was seven—just like John Elway. And as luck would have it, he even threw like a young John Elway, effortlessly hurling the ball in the air more than fifty yards with uncanny accuracy.

“James is right on target tonight,” one of the boys said to murmurs of agreement. So that was his name, eh? He was real, too, so one of our teammates had possibly come out of this orgy of transformation with the grand prize. I envied him whoever he had been. I only hoped it was one of the guys I liked. Maybe somebody like Dusty Stephenson, the big, likeable lineman, had finally gotten a chance to be the hero.

For a little while, I was able to forget the new body that was under my clothes. I was watching football. Becoming a girl had not lessened my interest in the game one little bit. And why should it? I realized. I knew a lot of girls who enjoyed football. Some could even play a pretty good game of touch football.

I had thought perhaps that the game would be a sham with a shade team brought in. Apparently, it was a real team, though, from a fairly large school in a suburb of Tulsa. Ovid’s magic was probably at work again, I thought. The small crowd across the field rooting for the visitors looked a little strange, sitting more passively for most of the game than the action would seem to demand.

And there was plenty of action. The opposing team in their red and silver uniforms were not passive like their fans. Their team played hard and played well. While our quarterback, who I now knew was named George James, played extremely well, our opponent’s quarterback was nearly as good, and their running game was actually a little better.

Both defenses fought hard as well, making the offense earn every yard. The game seesawed throughout the first half, and when the whistle blew signalling halftime, Ovid was ahead by a field goal, clinging tenaciously to a 17-14 lead.

I found myself enthralled by the game. It was almost exciting enough to make me forget what had happened to me. Then, I would be reminded as I yelled in support of our team and heard my sweet feminine voice. Or when I jumped to my feet in excitement, feeling the sway of my breasts and the bounce of my long hair. And suddenly, it was halftime, and I would have to play my new role once again.

In many ways, halftime was very much like halftime at high school football games all over the country. While announcements were made over the PA system and the school marching band played stirring renditions of tunes which were never meant to be marches, the crowd's attention turned from the field to the stands. Some mobbed the concession stands while others, like our group, took the opportunity to stand and talk. We were in the latter group, surrounded by our fellow students. Mostly, Danny and I just listened.

As the focus of the conversation drifted away from us, we found ourselves on the fringes of the group. It was then that I felt a soft hand touch my own. I turned to see Teresa standing there with the attractive black girl she had been talking with during the game.

"Guys," she said softly so that only Danny and I would hear, "meet Geena Johnson. Of course, you supposedly already know her."

Danny and I both fought impulses to shake hands with the new girl. She was about my height, with long gently curling hair, and a soft brown complexion of coffee and cream. She looked athletic without losing an ounce of femininity. I noted that both Geena and Teresa were dressed in outfits similar to my own.

"She used to be Dusty Stephenson," Teresa explained.

I was momentarily speechless. No transformation I had yet seen was as surprising as this one. Dusty had been changed from a big, hulking white farm boy with all the grace of a drunken bull into a svelte, graceful black girl. She smiled at me with amusement. "You've... you've changed," I managed stupidly.

"So have you," she replied with a grin, showing perfect white teeth.

"I've been talking with Geena during the game," Teresa explained. "It seems she has the same problem I do—a football playing boyfriend. And you know possessive those guys can be." She gave us a little grin almost as good as Geena's.

“We got it all worked out, though,” Geena told us. “If they get too fresh, we’ll hit ‘em where it hurts.”

“And we know where that is,” Teresa added with a smile.

I didn’t envy the players these two were ‘dating.’ Real or shade, they were in for more than they’d bargained for. Teresa had been frightened that afternoon, almost to the point of hysteria. Now, though, she was ready to joke about it. When she had discovered Geena had the same problem, she was able to cope. In numbers there is strength, even if the number is only two. The two left us laughing and giggling as if they had been friends—female friends—for years.

Maybe that was why I had found it fairly easy to cope. Although Larry had remained male, both of us had been uprooted from our old lives and both of us had been good friends before. As Danny, I still considered Larry a friend, although obviously our relationship would be a little different. Others saw us as a couple. Just how different was brought home to me in the next few minutes.

“Is there something wrong between you and Danny?” Jessica asked when she had me alone for a minute.

Had we done something out of character? I wondered. “No, why?”

She hesitated before replying, “Oh, I don’t know. It’s just that you two seem... distant. You’ve been going together since summer, but you just don’t seem... well, you know. You don’t... snuggle.”

Snuggle!

“I mean,” she went on in reaction to the look that must have been on my face, “you don’t hold hands or put your arm around him or anything. Jack noticed, too.”

How I longed to tell her that only hours before, she and Jack would have gagged at the idea of ‘snuggling’ since they had both been guys. Unfortunately, I knew that she would look at me as if I had lost my mind. Maybe I had. Maybe this was some sort of a weird pizza-and-beer-induced nightmare. I wish, I thought. No, it was very real.

“Look,” I tried to explain, “Danny and I are fine. We’re... you know, friends.”

“Sure,” she said with an impish grin. “Close friends.”

It was no use. Besides, our conversation was cut off as the teams came back onto the field to the cheers of the Ovid crowd.

Danny leaned over to me and said softly, “Jack thinks there’s something wrong because we aren’t... close together.”

“I know,” I sighed. “Jessica said the same thing.”

“Maybe we should...” his voice trailed off.

We had to maintain our roles, at least until we could find a way—if any—of returning to our original selves. Besides, I realized, with Danny as my boyfriend, I was safe from other guys. I wouldn’t have to face the problems Teresa and Geena were facing with guys claiming them who had no idea they were staking out former men. In reply to Danny, I shifted closer to him and allowed him to gently put his arm around me.

‘There, everyone,’ I thought to myself, ‘are you happy now? Don’t Danny and I look like just another couple? See? There was nothing to worry about. It’s just Danny and me, as happy as can be. Now, leave us alone.’ Of course, I didn’t say that out loud.

As I started to get back into the game, a strange thought passed through my head. It actually made me feel a little safer to have Danny’s arm wrapped around me. It was as if he was protecting me from the world. Did I need his protection? Probably not. It wasn’t the middle ages, and even though I was a girl, I should have felt quite safe in a small town like Ovid without Danny. But for some reason, it just felt right for us to be sitting together like that.

My mind returned to the game. Ovid managed to hold on to its slim lead until the beginning of the fourth quarter when a runner for the visiting team managed to squeak through a hole in our line, stutter-step his way past the secondary, and stroll into the end zone after a forty yard sprint. The crowd groaned loudly, but across the way, the visiting fans just sat emotionless as their team took the lead. No one but me seemed to notice.

The rest of the game was a nail biter. Ovid managed a drive to the middle of the field, but the drive stalled out, forcing us to punt. The visitors came right back, their own drive stalling at our forty yard line. Danny and I were as excited as we would have been had we been suited up for the game.

Then, Ovid got the ball back with two minutes left. Our quarterback was brilliant in the two-minute drill. He confidently marched the team down the field, taking advantage of short passes under the coverage whenever he could, and running once for a gain of twenty-five yards, scrambling off the turf to call our last time out.

There was only time for one more play, and all Ovid fans were on their feet. The ball was still at the thirty-yard line. It had to be a pass. Whoever George had been before, he was our last hope now. Danny hugged me tightly, as if I was some sort of good luck charm.

The visitors knew it had to be a pass, so they called a blitz, then backed away into coverage. It fooled our offensive line, allowing one of their defenders to scramble almost untouched into the backfield. George scrambled himself, evading the defender while never taking his eyes off the potential receivers down the field. There was no time left on the clock when he let the ball fly.

The ball arced through the air as if on a wire, threading the needle between two defenders who nearly collided trying to snag the ball. The hands that finally wrapped around the ball were extended from a black and gold Ovid jersey. With no time left, Ovid had won the game.

The Ovid crowd erupted in joy. Our section was jumping up and down, and I suddenly found myself hugging Danny tightly while he hugged me back. We were yelling joyfully into each other's face, our eyes locked as our lips nearly touched. We each issued a gasp and broke our hold on each other at once. It was just the excitement of the moment, I told myself as I looked away. I let Jessica give me a sisterly hug and tried to stop my heart from pounding so loudly. It was just an accident, I rationalized. I didn't mean to come so close to him, and he didn't mean to come so close to me. Yes, just an accident.

We didn't speak to each other as we drove the streets of Ovid after the game. At halftime, Jack and Jessica had pestered Danny at me into meeting them at an after-game party at the local Ovid Club. Danny let himself go on automatic to drive to the Ovid Club, so he was busily humming a tune to keep his mind off his driving. Normally, we might have talked, but I think we were afraid to say anything to each other. That would require each of us to look into the other's face, reminding of us of what had almost happened at the game.

Danny didn't lay a hand on me on the way back to the car, which was fine with me. So okay, people might talk, wondering if we were mad at each other. We weren't, though, I realized. We weren't angry at all; we were frightened. Or at least I was. I had nearly crushed my lips to his and kissed him. In fact, a wave of something akin to disappointment had rushed through my body when I didn't. I thought I saw the same disappointment in Danny's eyes.

"We made it," Danny said, pulling the car into a parking lot next to a painted cinder block building. I supposed it was like an Elk's Club in most American small towns. It looked like one anyway. We got out of the car and quietly walked in together.

A party was already under way. Black and gold paper streamers and balloons decorated the large party room. As we walked in, several of our high school 'friends' rushed over to us, gushing with excitement left over from the game. I had attended many parties like this one before. Where I had come from, a local Elk's Club would sponsor the party. It was a good way to let high school kids blow off a little steam after the game without getting into trouble.

In other words, the party was chaperoned, the punch was non-alcoholic, the music was popular but no metal, and the lights were kept just high enough that there were no dark corners for a couple to disappear into. It was strictly the PG-rated party. Still, when I had been in high school, after-game parties had been fun. Of course, then I had been one of the conquering heroes, a game standout then, enjoying the accolades of my friends. That honor was now reserved for others.

The hero of the game, our quarterback, came in moments after we did. A cheer went up as George James entered the room, flanked by some of the other players. While he seemed to enjoy the praise, I noticed something about him that only someone who had been accustomed to such accolades himself might have noticed. Namely, George seemed a little surprised by it all, as if he had never had it happen to him before. He must remember who he was, I thought, but who could he have been? All of the players on our Bearcat team had to have experienced something like this before, I thought.

My eyes met George's then, and at once we seemed to realize that we were kindred spirits. He gave me a little smile which I returned. No one else seemed to notice. Even Danny had been distracted by Jack and failed to notice. Wordlessly, George and I drifted away from the crowd to a reasonably private place.

"Nice game, George," I told him with a smile.

He grinned. "Thanks, but that isn't what you wanted to talk about, is it?"

I shook my head. But what if I was wrong? What if I had misread the look. Oh my god, I thought. What if he thought I was hot for him? I had to dive right in. If he didn't remember, the worst that would happen would be that he would think I was a ditz. "You remember, don't you?"

He looked relieved as he nodded. "Yes, and so do you."

"You were great out there tonight," I went on. "Were you one of our quarterbacks?"

He chuckled, "Not quite. I was the Team Manager."

"J... Jill?" I gasped.

"None other."

"But you're a guy," I blurted out. Now how stupid was that? I thought to myself. If the powers of Ovid could change me from a six-three defensive end into an attractive young girl, why couldn't they change an attractive young girl into a starting quarterback? Besides, Jill had always been able to throw the ball pretty well—for a girl.

“And you’re not,” she—he—countered. There was a sly grin on his face.

“Well, you got me there,” I conceded. “I was Jace Stromberg.”

George looked suddenly stricken. Jill and I had been good friends.

“Jace, I’m sorry,” he said. “Somebody told me you had been Don Moore.” Don Moore had been one of Wild Bill’s good friends. Jill had never liked him.

“I don’t know who Don is now,” I told him. I then briefly went through the new identities I was aware of.

George nodded solemnly. He then updated me on a couple of transformations I wasn’t aware of. “But they don’t remember who they were,” he concluded. “As luck would have it, the only one who remembers who I’ve talked to before you is Wild Bill. As you know, he’s Glen McReady.”

“I know,” I replied, practically giggling as I told him about the comment in the stands about Glen “throwing like a girl.”

George chuckled. “It’s true, he does. Apparently the way the story goes is that Glen’s father was a hotshot quarterback for Ovid back in the seventies. Of course, I don’t think Ovid was even here in the seventies. Then his brother was a quarterback who graduated a couple of years ago—or so the story goes. The coach had high hopes for Glen, but nothing came of it. Rumor is he’ll be dropped from the team next year.”

“He must be devastated,” I said.

George nodded. “He is. Believe me, Jace—sorry, Sam. You got a better deal than he did.”

I sighed, “I’m not so sure about that, George. I don’t think I’m cut out to be a girl.” I didn’t say it out loud, but I wondered what justice there was in Ovid that had turned Jill into a guy and me into a girl. It didn’t seem right. Why not make me the quarterback and Jill the attractive girl?

“Oh, I don’t know,” George said, eyeing me appreciatively. “You could stand a little more jewelry, but you look good. How did you manage with the makeup? It looks great on you. I always liked that shade of lipstick.”

It’s a good thing we weren’t being overheard. Most of the teens in the room would have been very upset to hear their star quarterback discussing jewelry and shades of lipstick. I told him about running on automatic which he hadn’t tried yet—at least not consciously. The way he evaded defenders during the game had to be part of the magic. Then it was time to change the subject.

“George, you said you didn’t think Ovid had been here since the seventies. Why?”

He shrugged. “I don’t know. Maybe it’s masculine intuition, huh? Seriously, though, the town just seems too new. I mean, even the old buildings don’t show that much wear. It’s almost like a town on a movie lot. Besides, except for our team, there don’t seem to be very many real people here. Most of them seem sort of transparent.”

“Yes, they’re called shades,” I told him.

George thought about that. “Shades, huh? Well, that sounds appropriate. Weren’t shades the spirits of the dead in Greek mythology?”

“Something like that,” I agreed.

Our conversation ended there. Danny had reappeared with a glass of punch for me, and while I had turned to take it from him, several of George’s teammates came up to drag him away. It was a shame. I had wanted to talk to George some more. He seemed to be coping fine, but of course, he had gotten to become male. As far as I was concerned, he had been promoted while I had been demoted.

Danny and I spent the remainder of the evening circulating and talking, just trying to learn whatever we could to help get us through our new lives. We were trying to blend in as much as possible. That didn’t extend to dancing, though. It seemed so odd to watch our former teammates, once male to the nth degree, now dancing as couples, embracing each other on the slow numbers in a ballet of teen love. It made me more than a little uncomfortable. Would I ever be dancing like that with someone like Danny? God, I hoped not.

But what if this was permanent, and it most likely was, I realized. I couldn't deny this new body forever. Already I felt myself stirring at Danny's touch. I had nearly kissed him less than a day after we had both been young men. I remembered being a teenaged boy, feeling the awakening of sexual energy in my body. It was intense. Now, I had been reduced in age and made female, and those same teen stirrings—or rather their female equivalents—had to be affecting my body. Would I become attracted to men? Somehow, although not yet a natural idea, it already seemed less repugnant than it would have only hours before.

I did a little mental experiment as Danny and I stood there silently watching the couples dance. I saw Jessica out on the dance floor, her arms wrapped possessively around Jack's neck. As Jace, I would have found Jessica very attractive with her long brown hair, blue eyes, and ample breasts. I might have even made a move on her. So as my experiment, I tried to imagine what it would be like to make a move on Jessica now. Let's say it was just the two of us, alone in my room... No, it just didn't work. As attractive as she was, she just didn't get the juices flowing. I never really like to watch girl-on-girl sex that much, and now that I was one, participating in it didn't seem much better.

Then, on a whim, I looked not at Jessica but at Jack. Did he do anything for me? Jack was as tall as I used to be. His face was thin, framed by light blond hair cut fairly short. He was a nice guy if a little on the gawky side. Did he do anything for me? I was relieved to note that he did not.

'How about Danny, though?' a little voice in my mind asked. I tried to ignore it, but it was persistent. At last, I cast a sidelong look at Danny. He was busy watching the dancers, so I was able to look at him without his notice. As Larry, I suppose he was a decent-looking guy. I had never been able to tell if another guy was good-looking or not. Now though, as Danny, I could see that he had become a very... handsome young man. 'Yes, he could be Brad Pitt's long-lost younger brother,' I thought. But was I attracted to him? I didn't think so, but the unsettling thing was that I wasn't sure. Something stirred when I looked at him.

Suddenly, he turned to me. I quickly looked back at the dancers, hoping he hadn't noticed the way I had been staring at him.

"I don't see Jennifer and Barry here," he commented.

Who in hell were Jennifer and Barry? Had something happened to Danny? Had he become like most of our teammates, lost in the world of Ovid?

"Who are Jennifer and Barry?" I asked cautiously.

He looked startled. "Oh, sorry. I was talking with Wild Bill—Glen now. He told me the blonde Darren became is Jennifer Tilton. She's the daughter of a bank president here in Ovid. She really fell into high society in Ovid."

Yes, but she had to be a girl to do it, I thought. It was obvious she would have preferred being in a poor family living in a packing crate if she could have kept her balls.

"And Dennis Mahoney is now Barry Hartman."

"Isn't Hartman the starting halfback for Ovid?" I asked.

Danny nodded. "One and the same."

Why was it Dennis got to remain male and play football and I didn't? I was starting to feel victimized. Then I realized I wasn't alone. Dusty, Horace, Bert and Austin had all been male, but no more. And what of all my other teammates? At least half of them were as female as I was. No, I had to put all thoughts of feeling sorry for myself away. Such thoughts would accomplish nothing.

Part 6

Danny and I had spent most of the party talking to others and had spent very little time together. Maybe it was my imagination, but I suspected Danny was as uncomfortable being around me as I was being around him. We had been thrust into the role of a dating couple, and there were some real pitfalls to that. It might have been easier if we had barely known each other. If, say Austin Blake had been turned into Danny, it might have been easier for me, I thought. I knew very little about Austin, so it wouldn't be as difficult as it was with Larry. Larry and I had roomed together, played football together, caroused together, and spilled out guts to each other. But we had both been male then. Now, I was a girl, and a girl who had done all the things with a guy that I had done with Larry would be close, indeed.

As the party began to wind down, I asked Danny to take me home. He had really gotten in to the party. Although no longer a football hero, he found out he was one of the more popular guys in the class. I think he was actually enjoying it, but I wasn't. I was tired, and the makeup on my face felt like it had been there a month. Also, my tight jeans were rubbing where I didn't want them to rub, and even though I was lucky enough to not have to wear heels like a few of the girls had, my feet hurt in those flimsy flats. A tired scowl got his attention. Moments later, we were on our way to my house. Again, we didn't say a lot to each other.

When Danny dropped me off at my house, "Well, good night," was all he managed to say.

"Good night," I returned softly, climbing out of the car before an uncomfortable moment got any worse. He waited until I had the door to my new home open before driving away. He would never have done that before. There wouldn't have been any reason to do so. But now, he had to treat me like a girl. I was surprised he hadn't tried to kiss me good night. Then, I was surprised at being a little disappointed that he hadn't tried.

My parents were in bed already, so I managed to get ready for bed in silence. Wrapped up in my thoughts, it was essentially automatic, which was just as well since I would probably have botched removing my makeup. I only took over long enough to find some pajamas instead of a nightie. Even the pajamas were feminine, but at least not as frilly as a nightie.

My thoughts were still on Danny. I would have to call him on Saturday and talk this out with him. I needed him. No, not that way. I mean, I needed him as a friend. He could help me through this mess since he knew me best of all my teammates. Also, as uncomfortable as I was being a girl around him, I knew it would be worse if I was a girl without a steady boyfriend. Every unattached guy in my class would be angling for a date with me. We had to find some level to deal with each other that we could both be comfortable with.

I still had some hope that Coach Jessup would be able to figure something out. Darren—or rather Jennifer, whether she liked it or not—had said Coach Jessup was trying to organize something. Maybe we could all go to the Judge and ask to be changed back. If all of us went together, maybe we could reason with him. It was at least a thread of hope, I thought as I began to drift off to sleep.

I awoke the next morning to the ringing of a phone. I had slept so soundly that it took me a moment to figure out where I was—or who I was for that matter. I grabbed the phone without thinking, muttering something which I hoped sounded like “hello.” I was surprised to hear my feminine voice.

“Hi, Sam, it’s Jessica,” the voice on the phone said cheerfully. “So are we going shopping today or what?”

Three questions tumbled through my befuddled brain: ‘Who was Sam?’ ‘Why would I want to go shopping?’ and ‘How could anybody be that cheerful in the morning?’ Then the answer to the first question lodged in my brain: I was Sam. It had been real and not a dream. I was really a fifteen year old girl now. As for the second question, I guess I was expected to like shopping because I was a girl now. As for the third question, I guess Jessica was just that cheerful because the powers of Ovid had made her so.

I sighed, “I don’t know, Jessica. I’ve got a lot of homework to do.” Actually, that was true. I had looked in my assignments notebook while still at school and had noticed that Sam had a history test coming up on Tuesday and a paper due in English on Wednesday. Plus I needed to review algebra since it had been several years since I had really taken an algebra course.

“Oh, come on,” she wheedled. “Trina and Kelly and Darla are all going. My mom is going to drive.”

Except for Darla, none of the names had any meaning for me, but apparently, they were supposed to be friends of mine. Well, why not? I thought. I really never liked to shop as a guy, but I knew a lot of girls who did. I supposed it would be instructive since Jessica thought she had always been a girl. I could learn from a pro. “Oh, all right,” I finally agreed, “but just for a little while.”

“Great! We’ll be there to pick you up at ten. We’re all wearing skirts so we can try stuff on.”

“Wait!” I called. “What time is it now?”

“Eight thirty, silly.” There was a click in my ear as she hung up. Well, that gave me an hour and a half to get ready and eat breakfast. No problem.

I showered and dressed quickly. Jessica had suggested a skirt, so I abided by her suggestion. It was actually a little more comfortable than the tight jeans anyway. It looked like a warm day, so I chose a khaki skirt and a dark-blue knit top. Sneakers with low cut crew socks seemed appropriate, and just because I was wearing a skirt, I saw no reason to wear pantyhose if I could avoid it. I made it to the breakfast table with time to spare.

My new mother was seated at the kitchen table, a cup of coffee in her hand as she read the morning Tulsa paper. “Have fun last night, dear?”

Oh sure, I thought, pouring myself a glass of orange juice. I spent the whole evening in a tight pair of jeans while my former best friend had his arm around me and nearly kissed me. Such fun. “Yeah, it was fun,” I said without enthusiasm.

‘Mom’ frowned but said nothing more about it. “So are you still going shopping with the girls today?”

“Yes,” I replied, sipping my juice while I peeked at the front page of mom’s paper. There was no mention of a missing football team, but I hadn't really expected to see one. It was as if the reality we had known had somehow been shifted, and the people we had been no longer existed. I could have confirmed this by calling my real family, but to be honest, I was afraid of what I would hear from them. Maybe I would try later, though.

"Oh, Danny called while you were in the shower."

"Oh?" Why was there a sudden sinking feeling in my stomach?

"He wants you to call him back."

"Okay," I said slowly as I checked the pantry until I found some Pop Tarts to munch on.

My new mother sighed. "Honey, is there something wrong between you and Danny?"

I looked at her, a little surprised. "What do you mean?" What I really meant was how can you tell?

"It's just that you and Danny have been so close since last summer," she explained. "You're always saying 'Danny said this' and 'Danny did that.' I guess I thought Danny was someone special, that's all."

"We're just friends," I replied, looking down at the newspaper again so I wouldn't have to look her in the eye. My face felt flushed, too. I hope I wasn't turning so red that she would notice.

"Well, I know you're friends," she agreed. "A girl your age isn't really old enough to get all that serious about a boy, but you seemed to like Danny so much."

"I do like him," I blurted out. "He's a friend. Can't we just be friends? I mean, why does everybody have to make such a big deal of it?" My eyes felt warm and moist. Was I starting to cry? That was too much. I was starting to cry over something as stupid as... as stupid as... Impulsively, I jumped up from the table and rushed upstairs.

I looked in the mirror in the bathroom. It wasn't too bad. There was a little redness around my eyes, and my mascara needed minor repairs. It was still fifteen minutes until Jessica picked me up, so I had a few minutes to fix the damage. I didn't even really need to go on automatic. It wasn't that hard. I didn't see my mother come up behind me.

"Are you okay?" she asked, causing me to actually jump a little.

"Yes, I'm fine," I managed.

"Samantha, Danny didn't do anything to upset you, did he?"

It was a question I should have asked myself. The fact of the matter was that Danny had really done nothing out of sorts. Like me, he was just trying to play a role. The problem was that our roles now involved an element neither of us would have considered even possible a day before. Here we were, two fast friends, suddenly thrust into a relationship neither of us had asked for. No, Danny had done nothing to upset me. It was me who had upset me. I didn't know how to be a girl in a relationship like the one everyone expected of us, so instead of facing up to it, I had fled. It wasn't really very smart of me.

"Well, did he?"

"No, mom," I replied. "I'm sorry. Look, Danny didn't do anything. I'm just a little... unsure," I replied, for lack of a better word.

She put her arm around me. Shade or not, she seemed solid enough.

"Look, honey, that's the way it is with boys."

"It... it is?" I asked, oddly comforted by her embrace.

"Sure," she said with a smile. "Look, you've never really dated all that much, and never as long as you've dated Danny. He seems like a wonderful boy, but the two of you are both a little new at this. Just take it slowly and see what happens. Just make sure you keep the relationship from getting out of hand—sexually, I mean."

"I would never let that happen!" I assured her, and I meant every word of it. The idea of somebody—anybody—getting in my pants was like something out of a nightmare. I would be a nun before I allowed that to happen—and I wasn't even Catholic! Or at least I never used to be. I wasn't sure what I was now.

I touched up my makeup as best I could while my new mother did her best to make sure I didn't have sex with Danny—or any other boy for that matter. I tried not to listen. The thought of having a guy stick his dick into me was about as repugnant as any thought I could think of. My sister back in the real world had once told me how young girls sit around at slumber parties, pooling their meagre knowledge on the act of sex. At first, they chorus “ew!” in disgust, but eventually, they reconcile themselves to the idea. Well sorry, but I couldn't see reconciling myself to doing that with a guy—ever.

Suddenly there was the honk of a horn in the driveway. “Gotta go,” I said, relieved that Jessica had arrived early so I could leave before I got more warnings on avoiding sex. I hoped my makeup looked all right. It would just have to do.

“Samantha, don't forget your purse!” my mother called out. Damn, it was going to be a pain remembering that all the time.

As Jace, I had ridden in cars driven by drunken teammates as we drifted along the roads of Northwest Missouri. But nothing had prepared me for riding down the streets of Ovid while the driver—a girl who had just turned sixteen—paid more attention to the distractions caused by other girls in the car than she did to the traffic on the roads. I thanked God that Ovid was a small town, and it only took about five minutes until we were parking in front of a three-story building whose sign declared it to be ‘March's Department Store.’ Well, I supposed since Ovid was probably too small for a mall; hanging around a department store on a Saturday was the next best thing.

We all piled out of the car and headed into the store. At least I knew Jessica and Darla. Trish and Kelly were new to me, though. Both were shades; Trish was a willowy brunette while Kelly had long blonde hair and a figure that although still developing at fifteen was well on its way to being voluptuous. I was happy to let Jessica lead the way since I had no idea how the store was laid out. Darla and I hung back while the other girls attacked the clothing racks like ants at a picnic.

Something was bothering Darla, I could tell. When we had been guys, we hadn't been very close. In fact, I barely knew Austin—yet here we were, a new friendship being forged by a common magical experience. Of course, it wasn't surprising to see Darla be bothered. I was bothered, too. But I had misinterpreted what was upsetting Darla. She motioned me over to another rack of dresses and pretended to be looking at them, fingering them critically.

"What do you think of this?" she asked, pulling a short yellow dress with a small floral pattern on it.

"I think it's a dress," I said a little sardonically.

Darla got a little closer to me. "Sam, I've got a problem," she began in a low voice.

"I'm listening," I assured her, pretending to examine the rack of dresses next to hers. So what else was new? I thought. It seemed as if we all had a problem.

"I understand Coach Jessup is now Ms. Drew, the Social Sciences teacher."

"I've heard that, too," I agreed. I couldn't confirm it. I hadn't experienced any of my morning classes yet, so I hadn't even met the new Ms. Drew.

Darla sighed. "And I've heard Ms. Drew is trying to organize something that might get us changed back."

"Look, Darla," I began, "I wouldn't get my hopes up too much because..."

"I don't want to change back," she interrupted suddenly.

I turned to face her, shocked. She looked embarrassed, her face crimson. She was having difficulty looking me in the eye. "I don't want to be Austin again," she said softly. "I want to be Darla. I've... I've always wanted to be... like this."

"You're gay?" I asked, barely above a whisper. It couldn't be! I hadn't known Austin well, but he was a regular guy—a team player. Besides, I had seen him with his girlfriend before. They had been hanging all over each other.

A look approximating disgust crossed Darla's face. "You were always one of the smartest guys on the team," she mumbled. "I thought you'd understand. I said I always wanted to be a girl. I didn't say I was gay. I'm not gay."

"Look, Darla," I said, recovering, "I'm sorry if I offended you. I guess I just assumed..."

"That if I wanted to be a girl, I must be gay?" she finished for me.

"Well... yes."

She shook her head slowly. "I guess I shouldn't be surprised. A lot of people would think that. No, I never wanted to make love to a man while I was male. I mean, not really. It's sort of confusing."

"I'm trying to understand," I assured her.

More sure of herself, she explained, "Think of how you feel right now. You probably feel like you're a man trapped in the body of a girl."

"Of course," I agreed. That was exactly how I felt.

"Well, I was just the opposite," she continued. "I always felt like I was a girl trapped in the body of a boy. It was like there had been some huge cosmic mistake. Or maybe it wasn't a mistake. Maybe it was God's sense of humor. Anyhow, there I was. As a child, I always envied the girls their lives. I wanted to be one of them—to wear what they wore and think what they thought. When I was about thirteen, I even slipped into my sister's room when she was away and tried on her clothes." She turned red again.

I put my hand on her arm and gave her a small smile. I was developing an odd respect for Darla. It had to be hard for her to be telling me all of this. And I was trying to understand. Sure, every guy wonders at some point or another what it must be like to be a girl. Of course, for most of us, it's a passing thought—just like we wonder what it must be like to be a fireman or Chinese or a fifty-year-old man. That wasn't where Darla was coming from, though.

Encouraged, she went on, "I guess I was never cut out to be a transvestite. At thirteen, I was already pretty good sized. I mean, I was playing JV football by then. So I realized I was condemned to be male for the rest of my life. I did the best I could with it. The problem was I couldn't look at a lingerie ad without wishing I looked like that, and I couldn't make love to a girl without wondering what it felt like for her. Damn it, Sam, I was pretty fucked up.

"Then we came here. It was like a dream come true. One minute there I was, Austin Blake—a man who didn't want to be a man. Then, the next minute, I was Darla Hastings. I mean, I wasn't a real beauty like you or some of the others, but I was attractive. I think I would have settled for being unattractive just to be a girl, so this was more than I could have ever hoped for."

She stopped and looked at me seriously. "You don't hate me, do you, Sam?"

I felt a pang of emotion in my throat as I looked in her sad but hopeful eyes. How could I hate someone who just wanted to be happy with who they were? "No, I don't hate you, Darla."

She sighed. "I'm glad. Look, I'll help everybody try to get back to their old lives, but I want to stay here. I want to be Darla. If Coach Jessup is successful, I just want to be left behind."

"I understand," I told her. "But why not just opt out of anything we do to get changed back?"

"I want to support the team," she said seriously. "All of you guys have been like family to me the last couple of years. I wouldn't do anything to let you down. In fact, if it's all or nothing, I'd even change back with you."

I realized in that moment that this poor confused former guy standing in front of me in the body of a girl was one of the most self-sacrificing, heroic people I had ever known. If she had told any of us of her odd desire back before we had come to Ovid, she would have been ridiculed. She—then he—would never have lived it down. But Darla had proven herself the bravest of us all. We would think ourselves brave because we were willing to face the Judge as a group, demanding our old lives back. Darla would be there with us—not because she wanted to be, but because it was what the team wanted.

“Don’t worry, Darla,” I told her, giving her a sisterly hug. “I’m sure it will all work out.”

I had surprised myself with that little hug. It wasn’t instinctive for me, but somehow, it just felt like the right thing to do. I think it made me feel as good as it made her feel.

She smiled at me with a tear in her eye. I only hoped that my promise wasn’t an empty one. If the Judge was powerful enough to change us as he had, what would he do when we crossed him?

The other girls had joined us by then, so I wasn’t able to talk with her about it further. I’m not sure what I would have said to her that hadn’t already been said anyway. As I looked at the dresses, I began to examine my own thoughts. Darla had told me to think of the problem from my own perspective. I was now man trapped in the body of a girl. In the topsy-turvy world of Ovid, our positions had been somewhat reversed. Darla was now the person she wanted to be, and it was me who was the oddball. I was now a man mentally trapped in the body of a girl. I could continue to act like a guy, but to what purpose? I would be subject to the same ridicule Austin would have experienced if the situation was reversed.

But how could I really act like a girl? Austin had acted like the guy he didn’t think he was. I was sure he had even made love in that form. Could I do that? Could I act like a girl? Oh, I didn’t mean just the little automatic things like applying makeup and getting dressed that the magic of Ovid seemed to be able to help me do. What I meant was, could I really think like a girl? And if I did that just to fit in, wasn’t there a danger that I might start to think like that for real?

“That would look very nice on you,” a melodic feminine voice said behind me.

I jumped, unaware that I was being observed. I had been fingering a silky dark green dress just to try to look like a shopper. I hadn’t really been looking at the dress, lost as I was deep in my own thoughts.

I turned to see perhaps the most beautiful woman I could ever have imagined. Her hair was the color of spun gold, styled mid length. Her skin was like alabaster, perfect and flawless. Her eyes were the deepest, prettiest blue I had ever seen and her figure seen through a rose-colored sheath dress was perfection itself. A small nametag tastefully identified her as Vera March.

“Oh, I’m... I’m just looking,” I told her. For once, I was almost happy I was a girl. If I had still been a guy, I think I would have been too tongue-tied to even talk to her.

She smiled and went on as if I hadn’t spoken. “This is the new style for fall. You’re very fortunate you have such attractive legs because the skirt is a little short. Why don’t you try it on over there?” She nodded in the direction of the fitting rooms where Jessica had just come from, dressed in a short white dress which she was showing to the other girls.

“Oh, I don’t think it’s for me,” I protested. I didn’t want to be on display for the other girls in this short little thing. “I’m really not into this sort of this.” Yeah, like being a girl.

“Just try it on,” Vera March insisted. Her voice was soft and sweet, but there was something in it that had force. I found myself taking it off the rack and heading for the fitting rooms without further protest.

I had to admit, it did feel good—unlike anything else I had ever had on my body. Maybe it was the soft, hairless skin I now possessed, but whatever the reason, it felt almost luxurious.

“Sam, come out! We all want to see it!” Jessica called from beyond the curtain. There was no mirror in the fitting room, and I had to admit I was a little curious as to what it did look like on me. Reluctantly, I stepped out of the fitting room and faced my friends.

As one, they oohed as they looked at me. It was actually Darla who finally blurted, “Oh Sam, that looks absolutely fabulous on you.”

“It’s a little short,” I muttered, feeling as if my butt was exposed.

“Oh, don’t be a prude, Sam,” Jessica giggled. “It looks great on you.

You should buy it.”

I think there must be a single moment in everyone’s life when he or she becomes aware of who they really are. For most of us, that comes when we’re so young that we don’t remember it. For me, though, it was that moment when I looked into the mirror and saw myself in that dark green dress. I had spent over twenty-one years being aware that I was a male, strong, not bad looking, intelligent, but most of all, male. Since the day before, that image had been confounded. I was still intelligent, but all of the other attributes had been altered. I was now weaker and very good-looking in a feminine sort of way. Somehow, though, I had been trying to deny that I was, in fact, female. Oh yes, I had no doubt that I had been thrust into the role of a young woman, but it was more like a role in a play. Deep down, I was still Jace Stromberg.

Now, though, as I looked into that mirror, aware of how that short green dress molded itself to the feminine curves of my body and accented the reddish highlights in my hair and the creamy smoothness of my skin, it was—for that moment at least—hard to imagine that I had ever been male. Were those green-gray eyes really mine? Were my breasts really that high and that form? Did my feminine hands actually look that graceful when smoothing down the dress?

I found myself wishing I had worn pantyhose after all. The short crew socks looked absurd when viewed with the dress, and heels—I needed heels. I...

“It’s beautiful on you.” It was the voice of Vera March as she stood behind me but out of my sight in the mirror. It was like a siren song, luring me into the depths of my new femininity.

But wasn’t there hope that I needn’t stay this way? If we all stuck together as a team, perhaps we could still convince the Judge to change us back. In numbers, there is strength. I could not give into this image. I was still Jason Stromberg—strong, intelligent and male. Yes, above all, I was male. I had to be male. This dress, as beautiful as it was on my curved body, was a white flag of surrender—surrender to a life I didn't want. I must resist. I must resist.

"Shall we put it on your mother's account?"

I turned to Vera March. "What? Ye—no. No, I don't think so." Was that disappointment in her eyes? Or was it amusement?

There was a collective "aw!" from the other girls.

"You should get it," Darla urged sincerely. "With heels and the right jewelry, you'd look sensational."

"Don't remind me," I muttered, fleeing to the fitting room.

So while the other girls each bought something, I contented myself with pretending to look. Vera March made no further attempt to foist the dress off on me, for which I was grateful. Her persuasive tone, coupled with her unquestionable beauty, somehow made me want to accept what had happened to me. She was real, too, but perhaps not a transformee. No, she was like Officer Mercer and the Judge, poised and imbued with a magical essence that spoke of something beyond human understanding.

Yes, they were gods, I thought to myself as we walked down the main street of Ovid together. They had managed to change our football team into a collection of high school students, most of whom could not even remember who they had been. Here we were, our little group of five girls walking down the streets of Ovid, stopping to admire a pretty pair of shoes or a sexy dress in the windows we passed. Yet only three of us remembered that only a day before, we had been young men, fit and ready for a battle on the gridiron this very afternoon—a battle that would now never take place.

I had a sudden flash of inspiration. The Judge—Jupiter? Perhaps. Like the King of the Roman Gods, he wielded imperious power, creating a town and all its denizens from—what?—whatever was available. At his side, Officer Mercer, an officer of the court who seemed to be almost anywhere he needed to be—like Mercury? And Vera March, beautiful beyond imagining. Wasn't it Venus who fit that role in the stories of the Romans?

“Don’t you think so, Sam?”

It was Jessica’s voice. “What?” I responded.

Jessica sighed. “Honestly, Sam, you’ve been on another planet the last couple of days. I was asking you about the shoes.” She pointed at a pair of black pumps with a—what?—two-inch heel.

“Oh, yes, they’re nice,” I managed.

The other girls tittered—even Darla.

“I had just remarked that they would go great with that green dress you tried on,” she explained.

“Sure,” I agreed with a shrug. The funny thing is she was right. I found myself wondering what I would look like in the green dress I had tried on, with these pumps on my feet and... What was happening to me?

As we continued up Main Street, I knew what was happening to me. It was probably happening to all of us. When you’re forced to play a role, it becomes more and more who you are. Wake up some morning and find out you are a girl instead of a man and you’ll start acting like a girl just to fit in. The next thing you know, you’ll start thinking like a girl. What happens next? You’ll be a girl. Already, my life as Jace Stromberg was starting to feel like a life that had happened to someone else. It was hard to imagine what it felt like to block out tall, powerful receivers with my body. It was hard to remember what it felt like to be taller than most other people.

Part 7

Our next stop was a trip into the past—Porter’s Drug Store. It was the granddaddy of the modern Walgreen’s, a store with a pharmacy in back and rows of greeting cards, magazines, candy, gifts and other sundries packed tightly into limited display space. Unlike a modern Walgreen’s, though, Porter’s was equipped with a genuine soda fountain, complete with stools and a row of booths. It looked like something out of Grease. My new friends and I would not have looked out of place had we wandered in wearing Bobby socks, poodle skirts, and ponytails to the sounds of Elvis on a jukebox.

The five of us slid into a single booth. I was on the outside of the side with three girls, a feat that we could never have accomplished in our old bodies. Even with our expanded asses, we managed to fit reasonably well. Then, we deviated from the fifties atmosphere by ordering Diet Cokes instead of the sodas Porter's still offered.

I tried to keep my mind on the conversation, but it wasn't easy. The major topic of the day seemed to be the clothing we had all looked at, followed closely by boys and a party the following Saturday to celebrate Ovid's homecoming.

"Do you and Danny want to double with Jack and me?" Jessica asked.

There it was again. They all assumed that Danny and I were a couple. I wanted to scream out that Danny was not my boyfriend and I didn't care if I never saw him again—even if he was an old friend. I didn't, though. Instead, I gave a tepid "Sure" in response to her question. It was sufficient.

Darla seemed to be honestly enjoying the conversation. For her, this must have been heaven. At last, she had the body she had always wanted. She was animated and exuberant as she talked about the guy she was going to the homecoming dance with. As miserable as I felt for myself, I felt happy for her. At least some good had come out of our transformations.

I wondered if I would ever be anything like these other girls. Would I someday be avidly discussing shades of lipstick and agreeing that George James had great buns? Maybe, but it didn't seem likely.

"Speaking of George James," Kelly whispered as she looked over my shoulder, "it's a hunk alert."

The three of us sitting with our backs to the front of the store turned as one to see George walking toward us, flanked by Jack and Danny. A flurry of emotions coursed through me at that moment. I was at once envious of George. Why couldn't I have been turned into the high school starting quarterback? Why had Jill been chosen for that role? Then I became curious about Jack. What was it like to lose yourself so completely into an entirely new identity? But most overwhelming were the feelings I had when I looked at Danny. He was—or had been—my best friend. I was envious of him as well—still male, self-assured, handsome. And there was the other emotion I was finding so difficult to contend with. He was handsome, and somehow I recognized that. When I saw him, my heart fluttered and I was drawn to him like a moth to a flame. There was no use in denying it. My body was attracted to his body. I knew it, and I knew I had to fight it.

The next thing I knew, they were standing next to us, each of them tall, good-looking, and exuding a masculine aura that I would never have noticed before my transformation. There was the usual social ritual that occurs when a group of girls and a group of guys meet. There were greetings followed by posturing. Each of the guys was anxious to show how cool he was. The odd thing was how George had picked up on it so quickly. Just a day before, he had been a girl himself. Yet here he was, chest out, stomach in, looking for all the world as if he had been a high school sports hero all his life.

Was I reacting as if I had been a girl forever? I didn't think so, but if I really thought about it, I was pretending to ignore the guys, stealing glances at them, looking a little flustered when they noticed, and even fighting back a giggle or two at something the guys said or did. True, I was the most reserved of the girls, but a casual observer wouldn't have noticed anything in my actions out of the ordinary. Somehow, that both bothered me and pleased me at the same time.

I tried hard to ignore Danny. After all, I had not answered his call that morning, and I had dreaded the next time I would have to face him. That time had happened much sooner than I had imagined. For what it was worth, he seemed a little uncomfortable, too.

As the conversation continued, Danny managed to catch my eye. He motioned nervously for me to join him. As I slid out of the booth to talk with him, I don't really think any of the rest of the group really noticed.

It was unfortunate that the location we picked to talk was so close to the cosmetics counter. Staring at a display of lipstick beside us, it was a reminder to me of what I had become. I used lipstick now, whether I liked it or not. All of the cosmetics so prominently displayed were examples of what had been thrust upon me, so it was with some rancor that I snapped at Danny with, "What do you want?"

He was a little taken aback, but he stood his ground. "Look, Sam, I tried to call you this morning."

"I know."

"Did I do something wrong last night?"

Did he? Actually, he didn't. He was the proverbial perfect gentleman around me. True, he had put his arm around me, but not in a threatening way. And our lips had nearly met, but that had been as much my fault as his. "No," I said slowly, my voice less threatening.

"I thought we were friends," he pressed on.

"Well," I had to admit, "we are."

"Then as a friend," Danny continued, "let me help you out. This has got to be hard for you."

"You have no idea how hard," I sighed, fighting back a tear.

"No, I don't," he admitted. "I can't imagine what it must be like. Being Danny is weird enough."

"Oh, Lar—I mean Danny," I said, my voice suddenly quaking. I was afraid I couldn't hold it together much longer. What was happening to me?

"Hey, let's go outside," he suggested. "I'll walk you home."

Walk? Oh sure, I remembered. Ovid wasn't that big. We could walk practically anywhere if we had to. I thought I needed a walk. I needed to... to...think.

Danny waved at the others who all gave him a knowing nod. They had all seen scenes like this before and realized that a boy and a girl needed time alone to work out their relationship. Of course, that wasn't what was really happening here. Or was it? Come to think of it, that was exactly what was happening. Danny and I had a relationship, even if it wasn't the relationship everyone else thought it was. And we did need to work it out.

It was a warm Saturday morning, and I actually felt better as we got out of the business district and walked together down streets lined with stately oaks whose leaves were starting to reach the height of their fall colors. It reminded me of home. I missed my family there in that moment. I remembered what things had been like back when Joan was the age I was now and I was in the eighth grade. Johnny was still in elementary school. We had been a happy family then since it was before mom and dad started arguing all the time.

I felt a need to call them; I knew I wouldn't, though. I was pretty sure they wouldn't remember me. Whatever power had changed me had probably erased all trace of Jace Stromberg. How did I know that? Well, when the morning paper had said nothing about our disappearance, I was pretty sure the Judge had wiped out all trace of our existence.

The question was: could we convince him to change us back? What incentive did he have to do so? For some reason, he wanted us this way.

"You look like you're lost in thought," Danny observed.

"I suppose I am," I replied. I told him my theories about the Judge.

"I suspect you're right," he agreed as we walked slowly. "I had reached pretty much the same conclusions. And by the way, there's a Ms. Miner who's Superintendent of Schools in Ovid. She's probably Minerva."

"I wonder how many of the old gods are really in Ovid," I said. "If we try to fight them, the odds could be heavily against us."

Danny shook his head. "I don't think we should fight them."

"That's easy for you to say," I pointed out. "You're still male. Besides, you're a good looking guy. The girls will be falling all over you when they figure out we're not an item. And you've got a good family and you're bright. Things are coming up roses for you."

“And you,” he pointed out.

“Me?” I laughed at him. “Haven’t you noticed? I’m a girl! I can’t exactly play football anymore and chasing girls is sort of out of the question.”

“So that’s what’s bothering you,” Danny said softly.

“Of course it’s bothering me! Did you think I want to run around in skirts and heels for the rest of my life? To wear makeup and have my hair done? To have periods and babies? God, Danny, what did you think? That I wanted to be a girl?”

We had stopped and were facing each other. I was practically yelling at him, and I could feel my face flushing as my voice got louder. I expected him to yell back at me. I wanted him to yell back at me. I wanted him to tell me I had turned into a stupid bitch who would have to learn to like being a girl and that he was just the guy to show her why. In other words, I wanted him to be such a prick that I would be justified in walking away. I wanted him to say all the things a stupid prick would say. But he didn’t.

Danny looked me in the eye, a sad expression on his face. “You’re right. I’m sorry. I wasn’t thinking. This has to be very hard on you.”

“Well it is!” I snapped, but I was having difficulty maintaining my anger. Why did he have to be so understanding? Why did he have to be so nice? Why did he have to be so... be so... handsome?

“Look, Sam,” he began softly, “I don’t pretend to have any idea what you’re going through, but you’re right. For me, I’m just looking at living my old life over again. I guess I don’t play football in this reality, but that was probably a dead end for me anyway. Now, I can concentrate on other things and get on with my life. Who knows? Maybe I’ll win a scholastic scholarship this time instead of an athletic one.

“But for you, everything has changed. I can’t even begin to imagine what it must be like to have a... I mean, to be a girl. But I want to help you any way I can.”

“Help me, sure,” I snorted. “I suppose you want to show me how to use all that new equipment of mine.”

“God damn it, Sam!” Danny raised his voice, startling me. “The Jace Stromberg I knew didn’t sit around wallowing in self pity. No, I don’t want to help you use that new equipment of yours.” He was silent for a moment, then continued, “No, that’s not true. You’ve become a very good looking girl—the kind of girl Larry Gunn would have been all over.”

I felt an odd mixture of emotions. Part of me wanted to punch him out for that remark, but part of me was strangely interested in what he had to say.

“But you’re my friend—probably my best friend—and I couldn’t... wouldn’t... do that to you,” he said softly. “Sam, I want us to be friends. I know that won’t be easy. Practically everyone thinks you and I are a couple. I know we aren’t. We’re friends, or at least we should be.”

I suddenly remembered the old movie When Harry Met Sally. It had explored the concept of friendship between men and women. In it, the main characters had managed to become friends, I thought brightly. Then I remembered that they had ended up in bed together.

But I needed a friend. I needed for Danny to be my friend. “Okay,” I murmured. “Friends.”

He brightened, and I added, “But just friends.”

“Just friends,” he repeated, smiling.

We were silent for a moment, until I asked, “So okay, ‘friend,’ what do we do next?”

He grinned. “Well, I walk you home and we wait until Monday to see if Coach Jessup is able to organize anything.”

“What do you think, Danny?” I asked.

“About what?”

“About Coach Jessup,” I said. “I keep hearing he—or I guess it’s she now—is going to try to organize some way to get us changed back. Do you think she can do it?”

Danny thought carefully before responding. "No, I don't. Not really."

I felt the same way, but I was disappointed when I heard Danny say it.

"I'm sorry, Sam," he went on. "I hope I'm wrong and that he can figure out something. But we can't even figure out why these gods have done this to us. I mean, if the old classical gods have some reason for creating this town and changing us all into permanent residents, I don't think they're going to change us back just because we don't like it. The Greeks may have come up with democracy, but I don't think the Judge and his folks buy into it."

"I feel the same way," I sighed. "I guess that's why this is so hard for me. If I could have been transformed into this form for a day or two, it might have been kind of fun. I mean, a lot of guys wonder what it would be like to be a girl. But, Danny, I'm afraid I'm going to be a girl for the rest of my life, and... and I don't know what to do about it."

I was practically in tears. I was becoming so emotional, I didn't know what to do. Danny looked for a moment as if he was going to move toward me. If he had, I don't know what would have happened. A part of me wanted him to do it. I needed someone to tell me it was all going to work out while holding onto me. But wouldn't that just be giving in?

"Are... are you okay?" he asked softly.

"I... I think so," I sniffled. With effort, I managed to suppress disappointment that he hadn't held me.

"Then let's get you home," he said.

We managed to keep the conversation a little lighter the rest of the way. George was sixteen and had a car, so he had picked Danny and Jack up that morning. Since he had picked up Danny first, they had had a chance to compare notes before seeing Jack.

Apparently our old friend Wild Bill wasn't one bit happy with the role he had been given. His new persona of Glen MacReady wasn't all that he would have wished for. Wild Bill had been talented at football but had been a dork. Glen was a dork without football talent. If the Judge was trying to punish him, he couldn't have done a better job, and I said so to Danny.

"True," Danny agreed, "but what is George being punished for?"

"George?" I asked. "What about George? He came out of this great. He's good looking, a great football player, and he seems to be bright."

"Yes, but he's also male."

"So?"

Danny sighed, "That's why he wanted to get together with me today. He isn't too sure about being male. He would rather be female."

"But why?" I asked. "He's got everything now."

"Except his sex," Danny pointed out. "Think of it this way, Sam. You're attractive, personable, and someone told me you currently have one of the top five grade points in our class. Some people might say you've got everything."

"Yeah, but I'm a..." My voice trailed off. He was right, of course. Of my friends who remembered their old lives, I was probably an object of envy to some of them. Jill, it seemed, would prefer to be me since I was a girl. Darla was just happy to be female at last, but I would imagine she would prefer to be Sam. Maybe some of the others would rather be me, too.

"So did you hear anything from any of our teammates?" Danny asked.

"No," I said slowly, unwilling to betray Darla's confidence. "I've been in a group of girls all morning, and most of them don't remember anything."

Our conversation had brought me to my front door. "Uh, do you want to come in?" I asked, just a little nervously.

"Oh, no," Danny said self-consciously. "I...uh...have some studying to do. I'm apparently pretty high in class standings, too, and I think I'd like to keep it that way."

"Okay," I said turning away, just a tad disappointed.

"Hey, wait!"

I turned back to him. "Yes?"

"I noticed there was a new Van Damme movie playing tonight at seven, and since you like his flicks, I thought..." He looked at the expression on my face and hastened to add, "I mean, it wouldn't be a date or anything. I mean, you and I used to go to the movies together before. I just thought..."

"Sure," I said impulsively, almost regretting it as I said it. No matter what we chose to call it, I suppose it was still a date.

"You mean it?"

"I mean it," I admitted as much to myself as to Danny. "Pick me up at six thirty."

He grinned. "See you then."

I closed the door behind me with a sigh. Why had I said yes? Oh, I suppose I could pretend that I really wanted to see the movie, but I really didn't care. It's just that it seemed to mean a lot to Danny, and he was my friend.

"Well, so how is Danny?" a young boy's voice teased. So I was about to meet my kid brother, Josh, at last, I realized. He was lying on a couch in the living room, a comic book open on his lap. There was no denying him as my brother. He was almost a younger, male version of me, auburn hair and all. I had been right about the family picture being recent. He appeared to be about twelve.

"He's fine," I said airily, refusing to rise to the bait. As Jace, I had teased my own sister unmercifully when I had been Josh's age. I knew all the tricks, but he didn't know that.

"So did he kiss you?"

"Why would you want to know?"

He hadn't expected that question, so he just snorted and went back to his comic. He was a shade, but he acted just like I had acted when I was his age. I'd be able to get along fine with Josh. I knew as much about being a twelve-year-old boy as he did.

I greeted my parents, both of whom were busy with household chores, and retreated to my room for the rest of the day. I was intrigued with Danny's revelation that I was one of the top students in the class, and I resolved to stay near the top. I think it was the competitive instincts I had developed playing football. I might not be able to break up a thirty-yard pass pattern now, but I could ace my next algebra exam.

Fortunately, Sam took excellent notes. A small notebook written in a distinctly feminine hand that was now mine outlined all my assignments for the next week. There was to be a history quiz on Tuesday. No problem. As a history major in college, I could probably ace the quiz without looking at the book. I decided to study for the quiz later. It would almost be like taking a break.

My algebra assignment didn't look too bad, but I hadn't taken a match course in quite a while. I would have to bear down to keep the A I apparently had there. Chemistry would be a particular problem. I had done okay in chemistry in high school, but it had been a tough course. Come to think of it, it was when I was taking chemistry that I had made the decision to concentrate on sports.

I put the notebook down, lost for a moment in thought. There are turning points in everyone's life that don't seem too earthshaking at the time but have lasting effects on one's life. I had been a male version of Samantha when I had been her age in high school. My sophomore year, I was one of the top five in a very large class, destined for great things. I had planned to follow in my father's footsteps and be a doctor. What had changed?

Well, for one thing, I had been good in sports. It was a talent derived as much by my size and intelligence as by any inherited instinct. My own father had set sports aside in high school to concentrate on his future medical career. I had done just the opposite. Why?

Then I remembered. It was near the end of my sophomore year that my mother and father started having trouble. She complained that he was never around for family activities and that he never showed any affection for anyone. He complained that she had no idea of the pressures he faced daily as a surgeon. The trouble spilled over that next fall. My sister Joan had been the mediator in many of their disputes, but her mind was on college then, often off with her friends through the summer. Although I had tried to act as mediator in my sister's absence, I wasn't as adroit at it as she had been.

I think I began to feel I might be on the same road as my father. I could do well in school, get into a top college, go on to medical school, and be a doctor just like my father, but to what end? To find myself trapped in an unhappy marriage years later, unable to separate my home life from my professional life? It didn't seem all that attractive. So I had began to set my studies aside and concentrate on athletics. As luck would have it, I was good enough to excel at football. Oh, I still did reasonably well in school. I was, after all, pretty bright. But I had eschewed my true potential.

Why?

The truth was, I didn't want to be like my father. Yes, I could finally admit that to myself. It had taken the loss of my balls to make me realize it, but I had ignored my true potential just to avoid being the cold, aloof surgeon that my father had been. That was why I had opted for something like history. That was why I had begun to drift into a life that I now realized would have never been satisfying to me. In fact, I had already resolved in my final moments as Jace to be willing to drift into a most unsatisfying life.

I had been given a second chance, I thought suddenly. Here I was, only a sophomore but with an excellent grade point. I wouldn't have football to distract me now, so I would have the extra time I needed to stay near the top of my class. Then what? Well, maybe a good college and then on to medical school. Doctor Samantha Wallace. That actually sounded pretty good. It had taken the loss of my masculinity to tell me the truth: I really wanted to be a doctor; I just didn't want to be like my father.

It was a far happier, more resolute Samantha who answered the door at six thirty. I had spent the entire afternoon poring over a chemistry text. When I concentrated on it, it was actually pretty easy. I had taken breaks only long enough to eat and touch up my makeup to get ready to go to the movies with Danny. Since I had plowed directly into my studies, I didn't even feel the need to change for our date. I was looking in the mirror and smiling as the doorbell rang, thinking of how I wasn't one-hundred percent girl in my thoughts yet. If I had been a girl all my life, I would have felt the need to change clothes just for the fun of it.

As I opened the door, Danny gave me a funny look.

"What's wrong?" I asked.

"Oh, nothing," he told me. "It's just that this morning, you seemed... different."

"I'm a whole new me," I said with a cryptic smile, grabbing a sweater against the early fall chill.

As we walked out of the movie, Danny asked, "Well, what did you think of it?"

"It was good," I said without much conviction. To be honest, I had been a little disappointed with it. I usually went to a Van Damme movie with a bunch of guys, and we would really get into the action. Maybe it was my sudden lack of testosterone, but I had actually been a little bored with the movie. It was all action with only a hint of romance. I had also experienced an uncomfortable feeling when I caught myself musing that Van Damme had nice buns.

That had set me off on another train of thought. Was I becoming attracted to men? I had only been a girl for a little over a day, but it seemed as if I spent very little time looking at girls' breasts, asses, and legs and more time looking at guys. Even when I looked at girls, it was more to analyze what they were wearing or how they had done their hair or makeup. Well, I wanted to be a doctor, and my doctor father had been very clinical when he had finally gotten around to explaining the birds and the bees to me. I realized that the basis of sexual attraction went well beyond the intellectual. Oh sure, there were aspects of attraction that went beyond hormones and pheromones, but those aspects allowed us to pick a specific member of the opposite gender.

Walking out of the movie with Danny, I came to the realization that, like it or not, I was becoming attracted to him. That didn't mean I was ready to hop into bed with him or even grope with him in the front seat of his car, but I was finding that I enjoyed being with him in a way that transcended our long-standing friendship.

"Want to get something to drink?" he asked.

"Sure." I found I really wanted to go someplace with Danny—someplace where we could talk and get to know each other better. That sounded odd to me since I had known him well for several years, but I was a different person now, and I needed to know aspects of him that I had never known before. Besides, just because he had remained male didn't mean that there hadn't been changes to him mentally as well. As I was beginning to understand, much of who we are is determined by the body we wear.

Rusty's Burger Barn seemed to be the hangout of choice for every Ovid High student. It seemed as if half the people we had come to know in Ovid were there. Teresa and Geena were there with their football-playing boyfriends. True to their word at the party, they seemed to have the guys eating out of their hands. I think they were actually enjoying themselves. Their new roles in Ovid were almost like a private joke that only they could share.

George James was there too, trying to keep his full attention on an attractive young blonde girl while being constantly distracted by teammates and well-wishers. Ah, the life of a football hero.

Part 8

Darla was there, dressed in the manner she had always wanted for herself, I was sure. Her brown hair was pinned up, revealing shell-like ears with long, dangling earrings. She wore a tight pink sweater and displayed a substantial amount of nylon-covered leg beyond her matching skirt. The guy she was with wasn't noticing that, though. He was too busy trying to imagine what her small but pert breasts must look like under the sweater. She was having the time of her life. I was actually happy for her.

Even Jennifer and Barry were there, sharing a table away from the crowd. Neither looked particularly pleased to be there, and Jennifer actually would turn to face the crowd occasionally with an almost angry scowl. Then she would turn back and engage Barry in an animated conversation. I could almost imagine them to be Lenin and Trotsky, sitting in the back of some aging European café while they plotted the overthrow of the rest of the patrons. I hoped they weren't plotting to cause trouble, but I was pretty sure that was what they were doing.

'Cause trouble?' I caught myself thinking as we sat and ordered Cokes and an order of fries to munch on. Just a few hours before, I had found myself hoping they would succeed. What had changed? Didn't I want to be Jace again? Well yes, I suppose I did in a theoretical sort of way. If someone had offered me the chance to be Samuel Wallace instead of Samantha, keeping my new family and my class ranking and all that the ranking implied about my future, I would have jumped at the chance. Oh sure, I would miss my old family, but not all that much. We were never the closest of families. If I missed anyone, it would probably be my sister, Joan. But I seldom saw her anymore. She was engaged and living back east.

As for the rest of my family, my younger brother was a spoiled brat. With all the marital problems my parents had, he had learned to play them off against each other. My new younger brother Josh, was preferable. And as for parents, I supposed I still loved them and I would miss them, but they seemed intent upon breaking up their marriage. I had expected a call from them at any time telling me they had finally split the sheets.

Still, I planned to work with my teammates to try to return to our old lives. It sounded almost perverse to me to think that, but I was a team player. Besides, maybe it wasn't too late for Jace to figure out a way to get into medical school. My grades were very good. I had the top grade point on the team. Maybe some medical school—possibly out of the country—would give me a chance.

"I'm really glad you decided to go to the movies with me tonight," Danny told me. "I was afraid you... well, you know."

I found myself putting my hand on his. "Let's not worry about that anymore," I said softly so that others around us wouldn't hear. "I think we're going to be stuck this way, and I just decided if I had to be Samantha Wallace, I'd better start acting like her."

Danny gave me a little smile. "I'm pleased." Then he looked a little stricken. "I mean I'm pleased for you. I didn't mean how it affects us or anything."

"Hey, we're friends, remember?"

He relaxed a little, "Oh sure."

We changed the conversation to topics of school and our friends, new and old. Other couples came up to talk to us, Jack and Jessica actually joining us for a while. Then, about eleven, we decided to head home.

Danny walked me to the door this time. That felt funny to me, but I was actually glad he did. We looked at each other for a moment after I got the door open, as if uncertain as to what to do next. Finally, I said, "Well, goodnight, friend."

He gave me a little smile but kept his hands to himself. "Goodnight, friend."

Then it happened before I could stop it. It was an impulse that came so far from left field that I hadn't even had the chance to consider what it might mean. I arched up onto my toes and gave him a little sisterly kiss on the cheek. He looked as if he had been shot, and I thought for one terrible moment that I had done something wrong. What if our roles had been reversed and a female Larry Gunn had suddenly kissed me on the cheek? Would I have fled screaming into the night? I mean, just a couple of days before we had both been young men. Now we were... friends.

I felt my face begin to flush. I thought I had just made a fool of myself. Danny just stared at me as if he were unable to move. Without another word, I fled into the house, closing the door softly behind me. I was a hodgepodge of emotions. I was embarrassed for what I had done. If we ever got back to our old lives, how would I ever be able to face Larry again? I was disgusted with myself. I was a guy, damn it! Or at least I had been one for most of my life. But I was also very confused. A small part of me—the part that had suddenly risen to the top of my consciousness—was actually a little pleased with what I had done. I mean, if I ended up stuck as a girl—and I was fairly certain our efforts to get our old lives back would fail—then I would have to get used to seeing boys in a far different light. I had taken an important first step in that direction with that small, innocent kiss.

“Is that you, Sam?”

It was my new mother’s voice, shaking me out of my reverie and making me realize I was just standing there hiding behind the door, listening to Danny’s receding footsteps. “Yes, it’s me,” I replied.

“Well, I’m glad you’re home early,” she said from the doorway of the darkened bedroom where I could hear my new father softly snoring.

“We have to be at church early tomorrow. Your father and I are greeting. Are you planning on going to Sunday School?”

“Uh... I don’t think so.”

“Then you can just ride to services with your father and me,” she decided.

Church? Well, why not? I hadn’t gone much in college, but my family had been fairly strong Methodists. I hoped I hadn’t become Catholic or something. I had no idea how they conducted services. All I knew was that they did a lot of kneeling and crossed themselves a lot. Maybe in Ovid, they worshiped the Greek and Roman gods. I actually snickered to myself, thinking about how odd a congregation of Midwestern Americans would look standing around in the Temple of Jupiter sacrificing a goat—or whatever you sacrificed to Jupiter.

Frivolous thoughts about church at least distracted me from thinking about Danny. Still trying to visualize what a group of Americans would be like worshiping Jupiter, I got ready for bed and fell asleep almost at once.

Dressing as a girl was getting more natural for me, I realized the next morning, as I got ready for church. It seemed almost natural to put on a pastel blue slip dress patterned with tiny white flowers. And the nylons and pale blue pumps matched well. I actually found the two-inch heel they sported not too hard to walk in at all. A dainty gold necklace with matching earrings and thin gold bracelets made nice accents, and I thought I looked quite nice as I finished off my makeup in the bathroom mirror.

“Are you about ready?” the frustrated voice of my father boomed from the entryway.

“Almost,” I called back, inspecting my lipstick. This was the first time I had applied it completely by myself, depending before on my automatic help. I didn’t want to look like a clown. I thought I had done quite a nice job. I had relied on a little automatic help for the eye shadow and the highlights on my cheeks, but I still considered my performance an accomplishment.

“We’re going to be late!” he hollered again. “Why does it take you so long?”

Why indeed! I had often wondered the same thing as I had watched my real mother and sister get ready. Now I knew the answer. Maybe my new father should try doing everything I had to do to look beautiful, to look presentable.

“She’s a teenage girl,” I heard my new mother explain, as if that answered it all.

And it did, too. I was learning how to be a girl. I still wasn’t comfortable with it, and I would still have preferred to be male, but as long as I had to be a girl, I wanted to be a normal one. Each new thing that I learned—whether it was how to apply eye shadow or how to accessorize an outfit—made me feel a little more comfortable with myself.

“Ready,” I announced, grabbing my blue purse and trying not to be caught by my father’s frustrated stare or my brother’s impish grin. In spite of his muttering, we made it to church on time.

I got the feeling as I stood in the back of the sanctuary while they greeted parishioners that people were staring at me. I suppose they were, but not, I realized, because I looked out of place. Guys my age greeted me with a friendly “Hi, Sam!” Their fathers cast sidelong glances so they wouldn’t be seen staring at jail bait. I watched with a mixture of embarrassment and amusement as these good church-going men slipped a look at my long, graceful legs. Their wives smiled at me as if I was a neophyte member of their sorority—a girl they had known most of their lives who was rapidly blossoming into a woman just like them.

Then Danny came in and I felt an embarrassing flush cross my face. I didn’t realize that Danny would be going to the same church. He was a Catholic. No, I corrected myself, Larry was a Catholic. Danny had apparently experienced a change of religion just like me. I was no longer a Methodist, but instead a member of the First Baptist Church of Ovid.

“Hi, Sam,” Danny said a little shyly as he came up in front of me.

I looked down a little, trying not to stare directly into his eyes. “Hi, Danny.” I suddenly felt like a schoolgirl. Then I realized I really was a schoolgirl. ‘Danny is just a friend,’ I reminded myself. I’m not really a girl; I just look like one. ‘Hey, old buddy, how’s it hanging? Got any lately? How about those Chiefs? You wanna go get a couple of beers?’ Oh, what I would have given to be able to say any of those things just like I used to say them!

Instead, I was appropriately demure. I tried to look around the room, but I was greeted with amused glances from the adults. They didn’t see two guys who were college friends who played football, drank beer, and chased girls together. Instead, they saw a young man dressed in a tweed sport coat, colorful tie and khaki slacks talking to a sweet young thing in her Sunday best with the obvious objective of courting her. I found that a little disturbing. What I found even more disturbing was that I sort of wanted to be courted. I mean... Oh, I really don’t know what I meant.

“Uh... are you going to be studying for that history test today?” Danny ventured.

"I suppose so," I replied. I really hadn't decided what to study. I would need to catch up in everything. I hadn't planned to study much for the history test, since as a history major, I should have been able to do well on any high school history exam. Still, I supposed it wouldn't hurt to review...

"Do you mind if I come over for a little while this afternoon?" he asked. "I never was terribly good at history. Maybe you could give me a little review. I could do the same for you in algebra."

That sold it. I really did need a little help in algebra, and Larry had a minor in math. "Okay."

His face brightened. "About two?"

I smiled back. "Sure."

Danny joined his parents and I joined Josh and my parents for the services. I was a little relieved to see that a Baptist service was not too different from a Methodist one. I had to stifle a giggle or two, though, watching Danny a couple of pews away. He had to resist the urge to cross himself and kneel a couple of times.

We weren't the only ones from the team in church that morning. Jennifer Tilton was there in a dress, and from the scowl on her face, I would say that her new parents had probably had to threaten her life before she agreed to wear it. Barry Hartman was there as well, and I couldn't help but notice how he kept sneaking glances at Jennifer. It seemed to me that he was oddly attracted to his former friend. I would imagine that Jennifer would have gladly killed him if she had suspected it for an instant.

After church, Jennifer made her way over to me. "My, don't you look pretty today," she said sweetly, but her eyes told a different story.

"Very funny," I replied quietly. "Same to you."

She snorted. "Don't remind me! My dear sweet mother informed me in no uncertain terms that either I dressed like this today or I would be grounded for a month. Grounded! I haven't been grounded since I was in eighth grade. I mean when I was Darren.”

“Yeah, it’s tough to be fifteen again,” I agreed.

“Look, Jace,” Jennifer began, “I get the feeling some of our guys are getting a little too comfortable with their new roles. You aren’t, are you?”

“Me?” I said a little nervously. “Of course not.” It was a lie, though. I had just realized that I had been a little uncomfortable when she had called me ‘Jace.’

“Good,” she said with a rare smile. “I thought I could depend on you. How about Larry?”

“Larry?” Oh, Danny. “Sure, he’s with us.”

“So is Dennis,” she told me. “That gives us a pretty good nucleus. I’ll see you tomorrow.”

She walked off, trying to recapture some of her old male swagger. It was a waste of time, though. Her hips swayed with a definite girlish charm. No amount of attempted swagger could take that away.

As I rode home with my parents, I wondered if Jennifer was right. Of course, most of our team had no idea they had even been changed, but were the rest of us becoming comfortable with our new identities? Worse yet, was I? I had to admit to myself that each passing hour made my role as Sam become more and more real. When I had first seen my new body, I had been frightened—almost panicked. Then, I began to look at it a little more objectively as if I were my old self, admiring a pretty girl. Now though, in just two short days, I seemed to be integrating my soul as it were with this body. I didn’t want to lose all of Jace, but he was starting to become only a memory—a boy who had grown to manhood and then moved away. When I looked at Sam’s pretty face in the mirror, I saw me. When I moved, I moved with the knowledge that my body was female, jutting out here and indenting there. When I looked at Danny...

“Would you help me with lunch, dear?”

“Huh? Oh sure,” I muttered, still lost in thought.

“You want to throw the football until lunch?” Josh asked our father.

“Sure,” he replied with a smile.

Now was that fair? They would throw the football while I worked in the kitchen. Then I realized it made sense. I was bonding with my mother while ‘the boys’ were bonding. Still, as I got changed before helping my mother, I found myself wishing I could throw the football too. I wondered if I threw like a girl. Probably, I realized with a sigh as I started making a salad under my mother’s direction.

At least my brother got saddled with doing the dishes after lunch. All-in-all, it was fair. I found I actually enjoyed cooking. I always had enjoyed it when I thought about it. What I hated was cleaning up.

As I retired to my room, I thought about how smoothly I had accepted my new family. I really didn’t notice their slight transparency anymore. It was almost the way you ignore people’s blemishes and even disfigurements as you get to know them as individuals. I was becoming comfortable as well. The sway of my breasts and ass and the tickle of my long auburn hair and slight tug of the earrings I wore no longer seemed unnatural. If I let myself go in that automatic mode, it was very easy to conform to feminine tasks. In the shower that morning, I had even shaved under my arms and my legs without a second thought.

‘Was I becoming like Darla? No,’ I thought. If given the opportunity, I would still return to my old life. But on the other hand, being Sam wasn’t so bad after all. I could live with it if I had to. I would even probably enjoy it. I had become reconciled to being Samantha Wallace.

Danny dropped in at two to study. We occupied the kitchen, tackling history first. Like me, Larry had always been a pretty good student, so he had no problem catching up in history. Likewise, I picked up on algebra pretty quickly. I hadn’t taken a math class since my sophomore year of college, but I had aced that course. That meant I understood the principles. I just had to refresh myself on the mechanics of the subject.

After a couple of hours of serious study, we took a break on the patio in back of the house. We sat in lounge chairs sipping on sodas and enjoying the unusually warm fall sun. At least it was unusual for us. Northern Missouri was starting to get a little chilly by that time of year, but Oklahoma, a bit further south, seemed to be enjoying late summer, although it tended to cool off some in the evening. We were alone on the patio, the rest of my family glued to the television where the Dallas Cowboys were struggling through a poor season.

“Did you want to watch the game?” Danny asked, nodding toward the house where the cheers of the game could be faintly heard through the open windows.

I thought about it. “Not really. I guess it would remind me too much of what we’ve had to give up.”

“Playing football?” Danny asked with a grin. “We can still throw a ball around if you want.”

Did I want to? I had been envious earlier when Josh and dad were throwing the ball around, but now that I had the opportunity to do so, I realized I really didn’t want to. Besides, I might break a nail. Not that they were that long, but...

“Do you?”

I sighed. “I guess not.”

Danny propped up on one arm and looked at me. “I can’t get over how much you’ve changed.”

I looked down at my bare legs. I was wearing a pair of denim cutoffs and a beige T-top with a scalloped neck. There were tan sandals on my feet. I had worn outfits not too different as Jace, but they had never looked like this on me. I was all girl, that was for certain.

“Yeah, it’s really strange to be in this body,” I agreed.

“I don’t mean just that,” he clarified. He looked a little sheepish. “Sorry if this bothers you, but I meant the way you act and...”

I sat up. “What’s wrong with the way I act?”

“Nothing,” he said soothingly. “Nothing at all, for a... a...”

“Girl,” I finished for him.

He gave me a disarming smile. “Well... yes.”

I think he expected me to be angry. I expected to be, too, but I wasn’t. Instead, I was curious. “What do you mean?” I asked softly.

“Well,” he began, “I don’t know, Sam. I guess the... well, just look at how you’re sitting.”

I was sitting on the edge of the lounge chair, my legs crossed as I looked intently at Danny. “What’s the matter with the way I’m sitting?”

“It’s... well... look at your legs. They’re crossed at the knees. You would never have sat that way as Jace.”

“I probably couldn’t sit this way as Jace,” I pointed out. “I would have crushed my... well, you know.”

“Sure,” he agreed. “Your balls. That’s another thing. You found it hard to say balls. It isn’t ladylike, is it?”

“This is the nineties,” I countered. “I can say... well, whatever I want.”

“But you don’t want to say it, do you?”

I was silent. He was right. I had been a normal guy. I didn’t use a lot of bad language, but an occasional four-letter word slipped out. Now though, it just didn’t seem right.

“I don’t know how else to say it, Sam,” he pressed, more confident now. “You act exactly like a girl. The way you walk, the way you talk—it’s as if you had been a girl your entire life.”

“I know,” I admitted after a moment’s silence. “I don’t know what it means. Danny, you don’t suppose I’m losing my identity like most of the rest of the team, do you? I mean, what if we all end up forgetting who we are? Maybe some of us just take longer to forget.”

He must have seen the terror on my face, for he gently wrapped one of my trembling hands in his larger one and said, “I don’t think so, Sam. I still remember everything about my old life. Don’t you?”

“Well,” I replied with a little giggle, “I don’t seem to remember you holding my hand before.”

He started to draw back, a pained look on his face, until I quickly added, “Not that I mind. I mean... well, I... I... think I like you holding my hand.”

There. I had said it. I had stepped over the edge. It had been coming almost from the hour of my transformation. Every time I saw Danny, every time I talked to him, I began to see him differently than I had ever seen another guy before. His smile, his gentle, intelligent eyes, his self-confident gait, his... masculinity, all spoke to me in a way I could never have imagined only a few days before. At first, it had frightened me and I had been determined to avoid him at all costs. Now, though, I knew I wanted him near me, to touch me, to... to...

“I just made some lemonade,” my mother called from the kitchen. “Do you two want any?”

I found my extended hand suddenly free and at my side as I felt my face flush. We went into the kitchen together, and I kept wondering what would have happened if she hadn’t called. More importantly, what had I wanted to happen? The next day, we would all be meeting as a team to decide a course of action that could give us back our original identities, but is that what I really wanted? I was becoming almost like Darla. Although I had never wanted to be a girl like she had, I was becoming increasingly reluctant to change back even if I could. Here in Ovid, I had the opportunity to start over, to be a top student. I had a new family which wasn’t slowly drifting apart as my old one had been. And I had Danny. Yes, I finally admitted to myself, I was attracted to him. And I knew without a doubt that he was attracted to me.

After having lemonade with my family, Danny excused himself and my father started to cook some steaks on the patio grill while I helped my mother with a potato salad. The Cowboys had lost, but that had been expected. So I spent the rest of the evening just getting to know my family better.

Life was beginning to feel normal to me. I was the female version of the older brother in a real-life Leave it to Beaver family. A couple of times, I almost called Josh 'Beave.' My new identity was constantly reinforced, not only by my family but by the half dozen phone calls from various friends from school. Some, I hadn't even met yet, so I kept a copy of my high school yearbook by my phone. A girl named Myra called first. I identified her as an attractive blonde in my class named Myra Smithwick. She had been out of school Friday, so I had to help her catch up on all the gossip. I was amazed at how much I actually knew and was able to tell her.

Jessica called next, just to tell me about her afternoon with Jack. I wondered again which of my teammates they had been, but realized it was now of little importance. We agreed to meet for lunch the next day at school.

The last call of the night came just before nine. It was Danny. He sounded strangely down in the mouth, worrying me. Was he having the same second thoughts I had experienced Friday night? Did he find it hard to think of me as a girl? Was he trying to ditch me? Finally, I blurted out, "Danny, what's wrong?"

"Jennifer called, or I guess I should say Darren since she refuses to think of herself as Jennifer."

"And?"

"And there's going to be a meeting tomorrow after school. A team meeting," he said.

I was a little relieved. "But we knew Coach Jessup—or rather Ms. Drew—was planning a meeting."

"I know," he agreed, "but I..."

"But you what, Danny?" I asked.

"I... don't want to lose you, Sam."

I was silent. I didn't want to lose him either, I realized. Whatever power in Ovid had transformed us had done too good a job. Danny and I were becoming a couple, just as practically everyone else in Ovid thought we were.

“Sam?” His voice was frightened. I think he was afraid I had hung up on him.

“Yes, Danny?”

“I shouldn’t have said that,” he said as an apology.

“It’s okay, Danny,” I told him softly. “I guess I don’t want to lose you either.”

His voice brightened. “Do you mean that?”

“Would I say it if I didn’t?” I returned.

“Can I pick you up for school tomorrow?”

The answer, of course, was ‘yes.’ I was as giddy as a schoolgirl when I went to bed that night, but of course as I have remarked before, that was exactly what I was. The difference was that with each moment, I was becoming more pleased with that.

Danny picked me up the next morning at a quarter after seven. Although neither of us had discussed it in advance, I think we had each chosen to play out our first full day back in high school as a normal day. He was Danny and I was Sam and that was all there was to it. We knew we faced a team meeting after school—or at least a meeting with the members of the team who were aware of their transformations. But until then, we would be what we appeared to be.

Part 9

It seemed oddly comfortable being back in high school. To be honest, my high school days had been my happiest. My parents were not having as many problems when I started high school, and in my first two years of high school, I had been able to balance athletics and academics to the point that I excelled in both. It wasn’t until my junior year that I began to concentrate on football to the detriment of my studies. Of course, that’s when I took chemistry and my parents started having more problems.

I had gleaned a lot about my role as Sam over the weekend. I knew I was supposed to be both bright and popular—a winning combination if ever there was one. And of course, it didn't hurt to be attractive. Danny was my male counterpart, so we were a natural couple.

I noticed that most of the guys I knew who had become girls had thrown themselves into the part. Only Dusty—now Geena—had worn a skirt to school, but her long, coffee-brown legs looked terrific extending out from her short skirt. Like me, Teresa and Darla had chosen to wear shorts on the warm fall day—denim cutoffs with dark tees and open vests. Only Jennifer, in what appeared to be a hopeless attempt to hide her femininity, wore a sweatshirt and baggy khaki pants with brown hiking shoes instead of the cooler sandals the rest of us wore. She would be dying in the afternoon heat, but that was her business.

I found I enjoyed my day in school. Classes were fun, in spite of the fact that for me it was simply a review of what I had learned several years before. It felt good to be an outstanding student, and my class day ended with a feeling of pride and accomplishment. So it was with trepidation that Danny and I entered Ms. Drew's classroom after school.

We were among the first to enter. Ms. Drew was already standing at the front of the classroom. Our Coach Jessup had become a very attractive woman of perhaps thirty-five. She had almost black hair trimmed quite short. I suddenly realized she was the woman on the bus who appeared to be an Indian. I had almost not recognized her since in addition to shorter hair, she had removed all the makeup and jewelry she had worn right after her transformation. Her outfit was rather mannish, consisting of a plain white blouse which could easily have been mistaken for a man's dress shirt. She wore dark brown slacks and nondescript brown loafers. In spite of her best efforts to appear masculine, she failed, for Ms. Drew had a very feminine figure which her attire did little to disguise.

Jennifer and Barry were standing with her, going over what appeared to be a list. They all looked up and nodded at Danny and me as we entered. Jennifer had been outspoken from the start, but Barry had said practically nothing, content to shadow his old friend Jennifer—or Darren as she preferred to still be called. I was becoming more certain that Barry was developing an attachment to Jennifer. If he was, I knew he would have to keep quiet about it. If she suspected for a heartbeat that he had any interest in her as a young woman, she would probably never speak to him again. I remembered that as Dennis, Barry had developed a reputation for patience. It would serve him well now, I mused.

The rest of our little cadre trickled in by ones and twos. The next was a blonde I didn't recognize. She was dressed much like I was and was very pretty in an athletic sort of way, and I suddenly realized she was one of Ovid High's cheerleaders. She smiled at me when she walked in and took a seat a couple of rows away. Geena and Teresa walked in together. I had heard them giggling together in the hall, but they had put on their serious faces when they walked into the room. George and Glen walked in together. I was pleased to see they appeared to be more friends than rivals. George seemed to be talking to Glen about how to get more power out of his throws, and to his credit, Glen, unlike when he was Wild Bill, was listening attentively.

"Who are we missing?" Ms. Drew asked, looking up suddenly from the list.

"Just Austin," Jennifer told her. I wondered if Darla was even going to show up. She had no desire to return to an existence as Austin. I needn't have been concerned, for she scurried into the classroom and sat quietly not far from me.

"Okay, then we're all here," Ms. Drew said, much as she would have spoken at a team meeting a few days before. "Now as nearly as we can tell, we are the only ones from the team who remember who we are. Does anybody know of anyone else?" After a moment of silence, she continued, "Then we can get started. The purpose of this meeting is to try to figure out a way to get the Judge to change us back. Now, I'm a little concerned about some of the stories I've heard about you guys. It seems some of you are getting a little too comfortable in their new identities. I thought you guys had balls."

“We used to,” Teresa muttered a little too loudly, causing several of us—all girls—to titter.

Ms. Drew frowned. “You guys think that’s funny?” The room was quiet. “Think about how funny it’s going to be when you have your first period, or when some guy knocks you up. I want to really hear you guys laugh while you’re giving birth to some little bastard.” Her stare was Coach Jessup all the way. Each of us looked down.

“All right then,” she continued. “Remember, we’re not just doing this for ourselves. We’re doing it for the whole team. Now, are you all with me?”

The responses were quiet—muffled “yeahs” and “sures”—but no one said no.

It wasn’t enough, though. I think she sensed a lack of commitment on our part. She looked around the room, finally zeroing in on Darla.

“How about you, Blake? I didn’t hear anything from you. Maybe you like having a pussy?”

“I heard her, coach,” I lied. “She’s with us.”

Darla turned to give me a thankful look.

“I want to hear it from her,” Ms. Drew growled.

“I’m with you,” Darla said quietly.

“Louder!” Ms. Drew shouted.

“I’m with you!” Darla yelled back, although in her soft, sweet voice, it seemed to lack sincerity.

And we all were with her. I knew Darla didn’t want to be changed into Austin, but she was a team player. We all were. No matter what our own personal desires might be, Coach Jessup had emerged from Ms. Drew to remind us of our responsibilities to the team.

“Take over, McDougal,” she said to Jennifer.

But before she could start, a new person stepped into the room. I recognized her as the school nurse, a Mrs. Rawlins. She was about forty with short dark hair and Mediterranean features. She was fairly attractive for her age, and like us, she was real. "May I join you?" she asked.

"This is a private meeting," Ms. Drew replied coldly.

"I know," the nurse agreed. "But like you, I remember who I was. And I've been here several weeks. I might be able to help."

Ms. Drew grunted, "All right."

So Jennifer began, "I've put together a list of people here in Ovid who rumor has it remember who they were. It isn't a very long list, and it's not complete. We didn't even have you on the list," she said, speaking directly to Mrs. Rawlins. "But the more people we can face the Judge with, the more weight our argument will have." It was almost comical to see that pretty little blonde strutting in front of the room in a baggy sweatshirt and cargo pants trying to act like a little general. "Now Jace, I'm going to need your help."

I was startled. First, I was becoming used to my new name, and second, because I hadn't planned to take a very active role in the plot. Before I could reply, she explained, "You've always been one of the most persuasive guys on the team, and since Danny is able to drive, the two of you can check out this list."

"But what do I do when I find someone like us?" I asked.

Jennifer shrugged. "Just tell them to join us in confronting the Judge. When he finds out we won't play his silly game, he'll have to change us back and let us go."

"It may not be that simple." That was my thought, but it was Mrs. Rawlins who said it. We all turned to look at her. "You all don't understand what you're facing here. Have any of you tried to call home?"

Teresa and the blonde cheerleader raised their hands. Mrs. Rawlins looked at Teresa. "What did you find out?"

Teresa sighed, "My mother said she had never heard of me. She didn't have a son named Bert and never had."

“I found out the same thing,” the blonde said. “I called my dad and my older brother both. They had never heard of Horace White.”

So that’s what had happened to Horace. From black football player to white cheerleader, and he seemed to be handling it well.

“None of us exist anymore,” the nurse went on. “We don’t have any lives to get back to. You were all members of a football team from what I’ve heard. We get newspapers here in Ovid from other cities. Did you see anything about a missing football team?”

“According to the Tulsa paper, Muskogee State played someone else last weekend,” George explained.

“Think of the power that did that,” Mrs. Rawlins told us. “You know who they are, don’t you?”

To my surprise, not everyone did, so I answered, “They’re Roman gods.”

“Yes they are,” she agreed. “Jupiter, Mercury, Minerva, Venus, and who knows what other gods. I was an Oklahoma State Patrol officer—a male officer. I was chasing a drug dealer who had escaped from a sting operation. He crashed into my car while trying to get away. That was just outside Ovid. Officer Mercer brought us both here. You can see what happened to me, but what happened to the drug dealer should frighten you all to death.”

She paused, noting that she had our full attention before going on.

“The drug dealer was laughing his ass off at what had been done to me. Then, with a wave of his hand, the Judge and everyone else in the courtroom found themselves standing in an open area in Sooner Park. The Judge uttered another chant and I watched in horror as the drug dealer changed. His flesh and clothing became bark and his fingers and arms stretched out into tree limbs with leaves growing from them. He let out a horrible howl—the last sounds his throat would ever make. In seconds, he was a large oak tree. And the most terrible thing—and don’t ask me how I know this—is that I think he still knows who he was.”

I felt a shudder run down my back. I think we all did, but it was Ms. Drew who answered. “I never said this wouldn’t take guts. Apparently you don’t have any.”

It was a cruel statement, and I expected Mrs. Rawlins to do anything except what she did do—she laughed.

“What’s so funny?” Ms. Drew growled.

“Have you ever been shot?” she asked in her own turn.

“No.”

Mrs. Rawlins got out of her seat and looked Ms. Drew in the eye. “Well I have—twice, in fact. The first time in the leg and the second time in the chest. Yet I came back for more. Our drug dealer friend fired off two rounds at me the day I was changed. There’s guts and there’s stupidity. I thought you’d be smart enough to see the difference.” She stormed out the door, pausing only long enough to tell us, “If you all follow him, there’s no telling what the Judge will do to you. He gave all of you good, decent lives. Don’t screw them up.”

I don’t know how many in that room took to heart what she had said, but I know I did. The problem was that we were still a team. I wasn’t going to be the first person in the room to let my teammates down. Apparently, we all felt the same way because nobody left—not even Darla.

We agreed that Friday would be the day we would confront the Judge. Barry had checked the courthouse schedule, and we knew the Judge would be in that day. Our little field trip would be unauthorized, but if it went as planned, we would be returned to our old lives and never have to worry about Ovid again.

As a final order of business, we discussed how we would get out of Ovid. Flying was out of the question. Our plane was damaged beyond reasonable repair and our pilot was apparently an unknowing teller in an Ovid bank. “I saw her when she changed and again when I was in the bank yesterday,” Marsha—the blonde who had been Horace White—told us. No one seemed to know what had happened to the co-pilot.

"It doesn't matter," Ms. Drew decided. "We'll worry about that later."

Sure, I thought, if any of us had a later.

So for the next three days, I led a double life. During the day, I was just Samantha Wallace, high school girl. I chummed around with Jessica and some of the other girls. I even found out that one of my best friends was a shade—Myra Smithwick who had called me Sunday night. Apparently we had been friends for years.

After school, though, Danny and I would hop in his car and begin contacting each of the transformees on the list Jennifer had compiled. I found I was wasting my time, though. Jennifer, Barry and Ms. Drew had put together a list of fifteen people who remembered their past lives. Mrs. Rawlins wasn't one of the fifteen, that meant there were at least sixteen transformees besides our team—and I had to contact all of them. Since I had family commitments and studies, fifteen was a pretty healthy number to reach in person before Friday. But we did it.

Danny and I would both go to the door and introduce ourselves, but I would do most of the talking. Ten of the transformees had experienced a sex change—seven from male to female and three from female to male. The others—three men and two women—had remained the same sex. Even if the transformee retained his or her sex, there were usually other drastic changes. Three had been white but were now black, and all had become either younger or older. The most drastic change was a former forty-year-old white man who was now a pretty little black ten-year-old girl.

In spite of the changes that had been made in their lives, all had one thing in common: none of them wanted to change back.

"I don't understand it," I said, shaking my head as we left the last of our prospects—a former twenty-five-year-old man who was now a thirty-year-old Indian woman with two young children.

"Maybe they're frightened of the Judge," Danny suggested as he opened the car door for me.

“I don’t think so,” I replied when we were both in the car. “They don’t seem frightened. They seem... content. Yes, that’s it. They’re content with their lives.”

I couldn’t really blame them. I was becoming more content with my own life with each passing day. I could never have dreamed that I would actually enjoy being a girl, but I was. That isn’t to say I wouldn’t have preferred to have my old life back. I was pretty happy there, too, and if I was fortunate enough to be changed back, I... I what?

“What’s wrong?” Danny asked before he started the car.

“I was just thinking,” I said softly. “I was thinking about what I would do if I got my old life back.”

Danny stiffened. “What would you do?”

“I don’t know,” I replied honestly. “I think I had a good life, but this one’s better. Sometimes I miss my family—especially my sister—but I’ve grown attached to my family here. I was a good student before, but now I’m an outstanding student. I never would have made good enough grades as Jace to get into medical school, but now I think I can. And...”

My voice trailed off. I had gotten so excited that I had nearly said that as Jace, I had no steady girl friend, preferring to play the field. Now, though, there was Danny. We had been together a good portion of every day since our transformations. As guys, we had been good friends, confiding in each other as good friends often do. Now it was different. I looked at Danny in a far different way than I had ever looked at Larry. I couldn’t imagine losing the bond we had developed in the last few days.

I turned to Danny. He was looking at me with confusion, uncertain as to what I was thinking. Then, without warning, the confusion changed to anticipation as we drew closer to each other. At last I felt his lips touching mine. I felt a warm tingle throughout my body as his strong arm slipped around my back. The kiss, experimental and chaste at first became warmer and more forceful. I closed my eyes, suddenly light-headed and weak. It felt as if we were one being. As I put my own arms around Danny, I found myself hoping the moment would never end.

At last, it did end though, with Danny looking into my eyes as I released a soft sigh. "You don't know how much I've wanted to do that," Danny said softly.

"Oh, Danny!" I exclaimed. "Is this wrong. I mean, I'm not really a girl."

"You're as much a girl as you want to be," he argued. "When I look at you, all I see is Samantha Wallace. And she is the most beautiful girl I've ever known."

That was it. I cried. I just broke down and cried. "Oh, Danny, what are we doing? I don't want to change back. I didn't want to admit it, even to myself. I'm as bad as Darla. What are we going to do?"

He shrugged. "What do you want to do? I suppose we don't have to go with the others to see the Judge tomorrow."

"Yes we do," I countered. "We owe it to the team. This may be the right thing for us, but think about some of the others. They're miserable here. We have to help them."

"Still a team player, eh?" Danny said with a smile.

I smiled back. "I'm afraid so."

Danny dropped me off at my house. Not right away, though. We spent a little time together parked out in Sooner Park. When I got to my room, I was still a virgin. I was only fifteen and I didn't want to be thought of the way as a guy I had thought of fifteen-year-old girls in high school who weren't. The funny thing is I didn't want to be a virgin. I wanted Danny in the worst way, but I knew now wasn't the time. Hopefully, we'd both know when the time was right.

My phone was ringing when I walked dreamily into my room. The voice on the other end brought me back to earth quickly enough.

"Jace? This is Darren."

Jace? Darren? Oh yeah.

She didn't wait for me to reply. "So how many others are going to be joining us tomorrow?"

"None," I replied as calmly as I could. I was a little embarrassed about my failure, in spite of the fact that I understood why no one wanted to join us. Everyone else was either happy, frightened of the Judge, or both. Why give up a perfectly good new life when the penalty might be dropping acorns in Sooner Park?

"None? Did you talk to everyone on the list?"

"Yes," I told her, annoyed that she would bother to question my work. "I think the longer we're here, the less likely it is that anyone wants to change back."

"Are you sure you're not describing yourself?" Jennifer—I refused to think of her as Darren—said coldly.

"I promised the team I would do my best and I did," I replied through gritted teeth. "I explained what we were going to do tomorrow and that it would probably be the only chance they would ever get to get their old lives back. But do you know what they all—all—told me?" I didn't wait for an answer. "They told me they liked their new lives, and even if they were not telling the truth—and I believe they are telling the truth—none of them want to cross the Judge."

"Pussies!"

I fought back the quip that some of them were, yes. "Look, maybe it's time we recognized that we're fighting against something too big for us."

"What are you saying, honey?" she asked sarcastically.

"I'm just saying that we're not in a position to demand anything. I think we need to be careful tomorrow."

"I think we can demand a lot," she countered. "If this Judge realizes we won't play his stupid little game, we can upset everything in Ovid. Just think—what if we contacted everyone right after he transformed them and told them to fight back. Eventually, the whole town would be against him."

‘Or there might be a lot more oak trees in Sooner Park,’ I thought to myself. “Let’s just be careful,” I warned. There was no reply. Jennifer hung up on me.

Why was that girl fighting this so much? There were a lot of positive things about Ovid. At first, I too, felt as she did, but I was starting to like being Sam. It didn’t seem queer to wear skirts and makeup. It seemed normal for this body. And it didn’t seem queer to like guys, especially guys like Danny. Sure, my football days were over, and I was weaker and didn’t have that bulge in my crotch anymore. But I had a chance to give my new life some direction. A career in medicine beckoned again—an opportunity I had thought was gone. I wasn’t looking forward to eventual periods or giving birth, but I suspected a lot of girls felt that way.

The real question, though, was not why Jennifer was fighting this, I realized. The real question was that if I felt the way I did, why was I helping her? ‘I wasn’t helping her,’ I told myself. ‘I was helping the team.’ I wasn’t about to be the only one of my teammates who remembered who wasn’t there Friday morning. I only hoped as I climbed into bed that I was doing the right thing.

It was almost like old times Friday morning. It was a team rally before the big game, even if most of the team wasn’t there. No one finked out. We were all there. We gathered in the high school parking lot before classes. Everyone was dressed about like we had been the previous Friday after our conversions. The boys wore sport coats and ties while the girls were in skirts—except for Ms. Drew and Jennifer who wore dressy pants. The main difference is that many of us who were now girls—me included—wore heels. We would miss the first hour, but if everything went as planned, we would be back in our old lives before that became a problem. There was no school bus to take us. Ms. Drew, George and Danny had cars, so we agreed to caravan to the courts.

I felt as if I was being driven to my own execution. If Teresa and Darla hadn’t been in the back seat with us, I think I would have snuggled against Danny for comfort. Why had I agreed to do this? Would my dark green dress look good with oak leaves? Yes, I had gone back to March's and bought the dress. It really did look good on me.

I had not remembered until I walked into Courtroom A, the trappings of power evident there. When I had first been ushered into the room as Jace, I had been too relieved to have survived to really look around. And when I had left, my body changed beyond recognition, I had been too frightened and confused to appreciate my surroundings. Now though, I was alert as I observed the room with its walnut wainscoting and finely finished bench complete with an emblem in gold that showed what appeared to be an eagle in a fierce pose, but an eagle more powerful and fearsome than I had ever imagined possible. I nearly cringed.

Officer Mercer stood before the Judge, a leash in his hand. At the end of the leash was a small white poodle, a pink bow in its hair.

"Good day to you, Mr. Madison," the Judge intoned with what I had come to recognize from the speech patterns of myself and my friends as an Oklahoma twang. I wondered who he had been talking to; then I realized he had been speaking to the dog.

"Come, Fifi," Officer Mercer said with a gentle tug on the leash. The frightened dog looked around the room furtively before being led from the courtroom, forced to run on its short legs just to keep up with the officer's long strides. I felt bile rising in my throat. I might be joining Fifi in the annual Ovid Dog Show if there was one.

"Well," the Judge drawled, as if noticing our little band for the first time, "I thought your tour of City Hall was last Friday."

Without preamble, Ms. Drew stepped in front of the bench. "I think you know why we're here."

I winced when she failed to add "Your Honor." The Judge with a frown noticed, too.

"I would advise you to be careful, Ms. Drew," the Judge said. His voice was calm and even, but I nearly cringed at the barely hidden menace in his tone.

“I am not Ms. Drew,” she said defiantly. “I am Chip Jessup, assistant football coach at Northwest Missouri State.”

“I will grant that is who you were,” the Judge agreed, “but when you came to Ovid, that identity became meaningless. This is who you are now. You have no choice. You must either accept it or suffer the consequences.”

“We demand that you change us back!” she said stridently. “You had no right to do this to us.”

The Judge turned with piercing eyes to the rest of us. “Does she speak for all of you?”

We’re a team, I kept telling myself. I won’t be the one to break ranks. I looked at my former teammates. Who would be the first to deny it? I cast what I hoped was a subtle look at Darla. She wanted so badly to be the girl she had become, but she said nothing. She did look very uncomfortable, though, but almost all of us did. In fact, I noticed that only Ms. Drew and Jennifer showed any true revolutionary spirit when facing the Judge. Could it be, I wondered, that the rest of us had begun to settle into our new identities? Surely some of the other former young men who were now younger girls were unhappy with their new roles. And the former Wild Bill, his potential football career squashed—surely he must want to return to his former life, I thought. Yet they all looked as uncomfortable as Darla—and I—felt.

“Very well,” the Judge said with obvious disdain in his voice. “I think I will grant your request.”

Part 10

I felt a sinking feeling in the pit of my stomach. A week earlier, I would have been overjoyed at the thought of returning to my old life. But now... well, now it was like a sentence of death. The hopes and dreams I had slowly developed over the last week would be dust in my hands. There would be no second chance at excelling in school, no shot at medical school, no family unblemished by marital strife, no... no Danny.

I was suddenly sitting down, my now uncomfortably large masculine body strapped into a narrow seat. Larry was sitting next to me, a look of shock on his face that must have been close to the one on my own. I heard cries from some of the others. I heard Darren's voice yell an exuberant "Yes!" Then I heard Austin howl almost in agony.

Then it happened. There was the loud pop again from the rear of the plane, followed by a collective gasp from the team. At first, the only thing that happened was that the roar of the engines was not as loud. That had not happened before, I realized. Then, the plane began to pitch wildly, throwing me forward against the seat in front of me. I felt an unexpected pain in my nose as it struck the seat. I think it was broken. Then, we pitched back, and I was thrown back into my own seat.

"Strap in!" the pilot's voice suddenly came through the public address system. Her voice held an edge of terror. "And brace for an emergency landing."

There would be no landing, I realized. The plane pitched forward again, only this time, it was a slow, almost steady maneuver, pointing the nose of the plane precipitously downward. I managed to look at Larry. Like me, he realized what was happening. There would be no miraculously safe landing in Ovid this time. There would be no second chances. In a matter of moments, we would be a grisly mass of bone and muscle, burned beyond all recognition amid the twisted wreckage of what had once been an airliner.

I wanted to cry, but Jace Stromberg hadn't cried since he was ten. I wanted to hold Larry's hand and pretend he was Danny, but Jace Stromberg wasn't a queer. He would never hold his best friend's hand.

I heard the rush of air screaming past the wounded plane and felt myself pressed further back in my seat as we plunged toward the ground. I couldn't look out the window, but I could imagine the ground coming closer and closer until...

There was darkness for a moment, and then it was light. We were back in the Ovid courtroom once more. I looked down at myself, relieved to see a pair of breasts jutting forward bound by a dark green dress. I sighed in relief as a strand of long auburn hair slipped over my shoulder and into my line of vision. Then, through the stillness, I heard other sighs and even soft crying. Not all of the crying was coming from the girls. I couldn't help myself. I didn't care what anybody thought anymore. I pressed myself into Danny and felt joy as his strong arms wrapped around me.

"So now you know," the Judge said to us, more than a little triumph in his sonorous voice. In his hands, he held a newspaper. Although I couldn't see the masthead, I could read the headline which was much larger. TEAM DIES IN CRASH! It screamed. There was a picture of twisted wreckage, and I had no doubt that it had once been our plane.

"This is what would have happened. By now, your families would be consumed with grief. None of you would have survived."

Ms. Drew wasn't finished yet. Angrily, she countered, "But if you could do this to us, you could have saved the plane. I mean, you did save the plane, but you could have left us as we were."

"There are some cultures," the Judge explained patiently, "who believe that once you have saved someone's life, you are responsible for them."

"But not this way!" Ms. Drew insisted. "We don't want to be like this," she emphasized by pointing at her own body.

"Don't you?" he asked, his voice suddenly soft. Then, he looked right at Darla. "How about you, Ms. Hastings? I insist that you tell the truth. Do you want to be Darla Hastings?"

It was a difficult moment for her, I knew. She faced potential ridicule from people who had once been her teammates. Still, the Judge's question demanded a truthful answer, and she was up to the task.

"Yes..." she began softly. Then, more confidently, "Yes... I want to be Darla Hastings."

There was a snort from Jennifer, but the rest of us stood silently. Then, Teresa and Geena both smiled at her and each put an arm gently around her waist.

"I see you are not alone," the Judge remarked. Then, turning to Glen, he said, "I took from you a promising future in football. Surely you must want a different fate."

To my surprise, Glen smiled. "No, I'm happy here. And you didn't take away my chance at the pros. I just won't be a quarterback."

"No?"

"No. I've already talked to the coach. Apparently my new father played quarterback in high school and wanted me to do the same. I don't have the talent for it now. But George has worked with me all week, and I found I can catch anything he throws at me. The coach has agreed to try me at wide receiver. I'll have to work at it, but I think I can make it all the way to the pros in that position."

The Judge smiled. It was the answer he had sought. Then turning Ms. Drew, he observed, "It would seem that not all of your team objects to its fate."

For once, Ms. Drew was speechless.

"Then I think I must take some actions as a result of this incident," the Judge told us. "Henceforth, all residents of Ovid will be unable to speak of the magical nature of Ovid, except privately. That is to say, you may speak to one other person, but no longer may you discuss this business of Ovid in open forum. I think it would also be wise if I limited your ability to discuss my nature and the nature of my associates. Darla, you all know who I am. Would you speak my real name, please?"

"Yes, Your Honor," she said formally. "You are Ju... J..."

"Thank you, my dear," he told her, smiling. "I think that settles most of our business here today. However, I must still deal with the ringleaders. Ms. Drew, you and Ms. Tilton, Mr. Hartman, and Ms. Wallace will remain. The rest of you can go."

Danny looked as stricken at not being singled out as I was at being named. "Your Honor," he pleaded. "I would like to remain as well."

The Judge frowned. "Mr. Mitchell, this is not something that concerns you. You were only Ms. Wallace's driver. Believe me when I tell you that you do not want to be part of what is about to happen."

I felt bile rising in my throat again. Why had I allowed this to happen? I had actually become happy with my new life. Now, I would stand in judgement. I looked at Danny and felt moisture forming in my eyes.

"I'm not leaving," Danny insisted, looking at me with concern. "I..."

What he was about to say was suddenly cut off, for Danny and all of my teammates whose names the Judge had not called suddenly vanished from the room without a trace. I thought of running, but then I saw the door barred by the ever-present Officer Mercer.

"Now, to business," the Judge said with a wicked little smile. There we were, the four of us standing in judgement before a being whose identity we could no longer discuss among ourselves, but whose powers were obvious.

As I looked at my fellow defendants—for that is what we were whether we realized it or not—I saw I was not the only one who feared what was about to happen. While Ms. Drew remained in a defiant pose, Jennifer emulating her, Barry looked as nervous as I felt. I was sure now that I had been right about Barry. He wasn't one of the ringleaders of our little attempted rebellion any more than I was. He was merely a young man in love. It was a testimony to his love of Jennifer that he stood accused with us. And as I had noted before, Jennifer remained oblivious to it.

"Where to begin?" the Judge asked himself. He looked back and forth, staring for a moment at each of us before stopping at Jennifer. "And you, Ms. Tilton. Let's start with you. You appear to be Ms. Drew's closest conspirator. Why is that?"

It wasn't the question she had anticipated. Finally, she responded, "Coach Jessup is our leader. Since Coach Wallace doesn't remember who he was, Coach Jessup is in charge."

"I see," the Judge drawled. "So do you admire Coach Jessup, or are you just being a good little soldier following orders?”

“I admire him!” Jennifer insisted.

The Judge turned to Ms. Drew. “So she admires you. How commendable. Do you think she would admire you if she knew about Susan?”

Ms. Drew turned suddenly pale. “Susan... Susan has nothing to do with this.”

Who was Susan?

“Quite the contrary. I even gave you ‘Susan’ as a middle name. I thought it was appropriate. Alicia Sue Drew. Alicia for your mother and Susan for your ex-wife.”

“That’s all in the past,” Ms. Drew mumbled. She refused to look the Judge in the eye.

“That isn’t what Kimberly would say,” the Judge said harshly.

Ms. Drew, the reader of our little hopeless revolt was suddenly speechless.

The Judge turned to Jennifer. “Ms. Tilton, let me tell you a few things about your leader here. When he was young, he watched his mother Alicia, suffer beating after beating from his father. He was a big man while she... well, she was about the size of our Ms. Drew here. Fortunately for her, his father died when he was twelve. So the beatings stopped, but not the abuse. Chip was well named. He was a chip off the old block. He took over where his father had left off. Not physically so much, but mentally. He terrorized his mother and two younger sisters until he went away to school.

“The interesting thing is that he could be charming if he put his mind to it. He was certainly charming when he met and courted Susan. She became his wife. Then, the pattern of abuse learned so well from his father resurfaced. Only Susan wasn’t like his mother. She tolerated the verbal abuse for a few months, but the first time he got physical—breaking two ribs I might add—she left him. His more recent girlfriend, Kimberly, has been relatively lucky. She has just been slapped around a bit—so far.”

Jennifer was dumbfounded. Her hero was not who she thought he was. “Is this true?” she asked softly.

The fire was back in Ms. Drew’s eyes. “It wasn’t like that. Mother was weak. All women are weak. They’re just made that way. And it would have worked for Susan and me if she had just listened to me. And Kimberly is different. She and I had a good thing going. She’s learning her place. Men are strong, so it’s their job to be in charge. A family isn’t a democracy any more than a football team is. Darren, what would the team be like if we had to vote on everything? A family is the same way.”

Jennifer looked at Ms. Drew as if she had suddenly sprouted horns and a pointed red tail. I knew a little about her former family. They were good people—a loving family. I didn’t know what Jennifer’s family was like. I had heard her new father was an important man in Ovid—a bank president—but that was all I knew. I imagined Jennifer would have no use for a wife beater.

“It seems you have lost a disciple, Ms. Drew,” the Judge observed.

“I... I...” She fell silent. She wasn’t stupid. I think she realized in that moment just how foolish her own defense had sounded.

“Still,” the Judge continued, “I feel I have been remiss in my sentencing of you. A change is certainly in order.” He spoke again the strange words he had spoken when we were transformed, and in seconds, she shrank before our eyes. I had been so busy worrying about my own transformation before that I had not had the chance to closely observe the process. It was like watching a computerized morph. Her body seemed to collapse in on itself until she was as small as a three-year-old child. In fact, she was a three-year-old child, tiny, pretty, and undeniably female in a frilly pink dress. She retained all of her Indian features, though. She looked down at herself and uttered a sorrowful wail.

“You are still Alicia Sue Drew,” the Judge told her. “Your mother, Judy Drew is a young divorcee left to raise her daughter by herself. She is a strong woman and a good mother. I think this will give you the opportunity to learn just how strong a woman can be. You will learn by example this time.”

As if on cue, Vera March stepped in from the direction of the Judge’s chambers. The Judge smiled at her and said, “Vera, would you be kind enough to see that our newest Ms. Drew gets over to day-care? Her mother will be picking her up after school.”

Vera March smiled, taking the little girl’s unresisting hand. “Of course, Your Honor.”

“And now to the two of you,” the Judge said, turning his attention to Jennifer and Barry. I saw Barry’s hand move slightly, as if he wanted to take Jennifer’s hand, but it went back down again as he thought better of it. The gesture was not lost on the Judge.

“Do the two of you have anything to say for yourselves?” he asked.

This time, it was Barry who spoke. “Your Honor, we’re sorry. We didn’t realize what was going on here.”

And you still don’t, I thought. None of us really did. The Judge had neatly deflected Ms. Drew’s contention that, given his powers, he could have easily saved us without transforming us. But I wasn’t about to ask for an explanation now. My turn in the docket was still coming.

Jennifer, for once, said nothing. She realized she had already said too much. Maybe there was hope for her yet.

The Judge looked at them evenly for a few moments. “Very well. I think you’ve learned a lesson today. However, our Ms. Drew could never have organized your group without your participation, so at least a mild punishment is in order.”

I watched in horror as they, too, began to shrink, but this time, the process stopped before the change was as radical. Both were a little shorter, and I noticed that Jennifer’s breasts had shrunk in size as well. Barry was dressed as before, in a sport coat, but the coat was slightly smaller now and his shoulders less broad. Jennifer had been given a change of wardrobe. She now wore a short plum-colored skirt and a white blouse ruffled with lace. She had flats on her feet and white hose. She looked very young and innocent, but with the promise of considerable beauty when she was a little older.

"You have both lost two years," the Judge explained. "Now, you are in the eighth grade. That will give each of you a little chance to grow up."

It would also mean they would be too young to drive and in a different school from the rest of us for the remainder of the year, I realized.

"Officer Mercer!"

"Yes, Your Honor?"

"Would you be so good as to drive these two youngsters home?" the Judge asked, although it was, of course, an order.

"Of course, Your Honor."

He waited until they were gone before turning to me.

"And now, Ms. Wallace, we come to you."

My heart was beating faster and my palms were wet. To say I was terrified was an understatement. For some reason, I had been saved for last. I was the last course in the Judge's little banquet of transformation. I was the coffee and sweets whose aftertaste he would take away from the table. It wasn't a happy thought.

"Ms. Wallace, I am perhaps most disappointed in you."

The words were like a death sentence.

"Your Honor..." I began, barely able to speak. Now I knew how Dorothy felt standing before the Wizard of Oz.

"Don't bother with explanations," he said with a dismissive wave of his hands. "When it comes to humans. I am often disappointed. Just tell me one thing: whatever possessed you to follow a blind fool like Jessup?"

"Follow?" I said stupidly. "But he was our coach."

The Judge stared at me. "I expected you to be their leader. I even gave you the last name of Wallace, like your coach. You have the required talent. You are intelligent, eloquent, and persuasive. With you to lead them, this incident would never have happened.”

“Me? But I wasn’t the coach,” I protested. My fear was suddenly replaced by anger I barely repressed. If I was to be in charge, why was I a student? Shouldn’t I have been the teacher? I began to realize that the Judge, for all his power, did not understand some things about humans.

He confirmed that when he asked, “What difference did that make?”

“It made all the difference in the world,” I explained. I tried to think of something he might understand. “Look, Your Honor, if you and some of your fellow... beings suddenly transformed into mortals, who would be in charge?”

“We have done so,” the Judge admitted, “and I, of course, I was in charge.”

“Why?”

I had almost gone too far. “That is none of your concern, young lady!” he blustered.

“I’m sorry, Your Honor,” I said, soothing him with as respectful a tone as I could muster, “but I just wanted to point out that you would still be in charge because all of your... associates would know who you really were.”

The Judge seemed to relax a little, and some of the building fire in his eyes receded. “I see.” Then, the anger rising again, he asked, “You would equate the power of an assistant coach with my power?”

“Of course not,” I hastened to clarify, “but he was still an authority figure to us. A team learns to follow a coach like soldiers follow a general. If you don’t follow orders, you won’t be part of the team.”

“But humans question their orders all the time,” he pointed out.

“Yes,” I agreed, “but not when the good of the team is at stake.”

He was silent for a moment. In that short time, I knew my fate was being determined. At last he spoke. “Ms. Wallace, you have been a girl for a week. What would you say if I offered you the opportunity to be male once more?”

I nearly gasped. Had he made the offer only a few days earlier, I would have jumped at the opportunity. Now, though, I wasn’t so sure. Samantha Wallace had a future that Jason Stromberg did not. And, if I was to be completely honest with myself, I had become comfortable being her.

“I would... respectfully decline the offer,” I admitted.

He nodded. Apparently, I had given him the answer he had wanted. “Do you love Mr. Mitchell?”

Did I love Danny? “Oh, yes!” I answered, the lack of hesitation surprising even me.

“Then you may go, Ms. Wallace.”

At first, I couldn’t believe what I had just heard. I stood dumbstruck.

The Judge had been looking down when he had ordered me to go, but now he looked up at me. “Is there something wrong with your hearing, Ms. Wallace? I said you could go.”

I still couldn’t believe my good fortune. I turned quickly, almost stumbling as I had forgotten that I was wearing heels, and rushed from the courtroom. As I opened the door, I thought I heard a soft call from the Judge. “Live well, Samantha,” was what I thought I heard, but I wasn’t sure.

“Sam!”

It was Danny. I threw myself into his arms, unable to hold back tears of joy.

“What happened?” he asked softly as he held me, his face in my hair.

“The Judge ch...” I wanted to tell Danny all about it, but my voice caught. The, for the first time, I looked around. The rest of my teammates—my friends—were there, too, standing to one side but still in earshot. I would be able to tell them later, but only one at a time.

The Judge's new rules would make it impossible to challenge him as we had ever again.

"I'll tell you later," I whispered.

"Come on, lovebirds," George called out. "We're late for school."

We were. And I had so many things to do. There were tests to study for and papers to write. I had to excel or I'd never be a doctor. Then, there was the party that weekend I had to get ready for, and I didn't have a thing to wear...

"So the Judge is not omnipotent!" Susan said with a little smile as the room came back into focus.

"Oh, he's omnipotent," Diana laughed. "He just isn't omnipresent."

"What's the difference?" I asked, taking a needed sip of my Diet Coke.

"Omnipotent means supremely powerful," Susan explained.

"And omnipresent means being in all places at the same time," Diana finished for her. "Humans still have the ability to confound us at times. It's that 'free will' you humans are always babbling about." Then, with a sly grin, she added, "Of course that's what makes you all so entertaining, too."

"Well, here's to the Judge," Susan said, raising her glass. "May he remain omnipotent but never omnipresent, especially when Steven and I are in bed together."

We giggled as we joined her in her toast.

"I just have one question," I said. "If you can show these stories in our minds just like I can, why did the Judge need me? You weren't even in the courtroom when they were transformed."

"Wasn't I?" she asked coyly. "To answer your question, though, I don't like being pinned down in Ovid. Sam's case was special because there were so many transformees all at once. I wanted to be a part of that exercise. It was one of the few I ever observed.”

“Wait a minute,” Susan mused. “You were one of the students, weren’t you?”

As an answer, Diana’s form suddenly blurred. In a few seconds, an attractive young brunette of perhaps fifteen or sixteen stood before us. “Hi, Sam,” she said with a giggle. “Do you want to go shopping with me?”

“Jessica!” Susan and I exclaimed in unison.

“That’s right,” she laughed. “I was Jessica for most of that week. It gave me a chance to observe all the team. Then, the day before they all confronted the job, the Judge changed a newcomer to Ovid into Jessica. Since she didn’t remember who she was before, Sam never noticed.”

Then as quickly as she had become Jessica, she returned to her previous form. “Now,” Diana said primly, “both of you looked as if you had something interesting to tell me.”

“We didn’t say that!” I protested.

Diana gave me a mock frown. “Honey, I’m a goddess. Now both of you—what gives?”

I nodded at Susan. “If you have something, you go first.”

Susan shook her head. “Oh, no. You go first.”

“Ladies!” Diana cried in frustration. “Why don’t you go together?”

“Well, all right,” I agreed, and seeing Susan nod, we looked at each other. “One... Two... Three!”

“I’m pregnant!” I declared, taking a moment to realize that I hadn’t said it alone. Susan and I looked at each other with disbelief.

Diana roared with laughter.

Ovid IX: The Private Eye

©1999 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

I felt as if I was running a nursery. Court had been in session all morning, and Ovid now had four new children—real children, that is—who needed to be integrated into their new lives. It wouldn't have been so bad if they had all been part of one trial, but the four children were the result of three separate trials. Where four separate men had once been, there were now four children, ranging in ages from six to twelve. Two were boys and the other two were girls. Only one of the girls remembered who she had been before, and she wasn't very happy. They never are at first.

I certainly wasn't happy that fall day nearly a year before when I exchanged my life as a college student—a male college student—for the life of a wife, mother, and administrative assistant to Ovid's most powerful individual—the Judge. Of course, now I wouldn't trade back for anything. Even on tough mornings like this one, I really enjoyed my job. And I enjoyed being Cindy Patton, wife and mother of two—well two and a fraction—children. No matter that those two children had been fraternity brothers of mine. So was my husband for that matter. None of them remembered their previous lives, though. But the one growing inside me now would be a whole new person.

I experienced a warm glow just thinking about that as I sat down at my desk. Funny, but as a male, I never thought much about having children, and of course I never thought I'd be bearing one. Now, though, it seemed the most natural thing in the world. It had to be the hormones.

I looked down at myself. Nothing showed yet. But the doctor had assured me that I was most certainly pregnant. Of course, it wasn't all joy. At times, I was quite frightened about being pregnant. But I was assured by other women that it was natural. Besides, they reminded me, I had already had twins. If only they knew the truth—that I had never actually borne the twins in spite of what most people in Ovid remembered.

“Can we put a roadblock outside of town?” a woman’s voice muttered from behind me. “I don’t want one more speeder to defend for a month.”

Susan Jager plopped down in the chair in front of my desk. As the official Public Defender for those who appeared before the Judge, she had reason to be more tired than I did. The best she could hope for with her clients appearing before the Judge was a promise of a happy new life. In my experience, no one had ever left the Judge’s court as the same person who had entered. And in addition to the caseload the Judge gave her, she had her own clients as well. Besides, pregnant women get tired easily, and Susan was as pregnant as I was. A fine pair we made—two former men now on our way to being natural mothers.

“It wouldn’t do any good,” I laughed. “If Officer Mercer put up a roadblock, we’d probably just have another plane fall out of the sky.”

She sighed, “True. Is it my turn to buy lunch?”

“No, it’s mine!” a cheerful voice called out from nowhere. Then, with a pop, a willowy redhead was sitting on my desk, her short green skirt a perfect match for her bright green eyes.

“Hello, Diana,” I said calmly. I had seen too many similar entrances from the goddess Diana to be surprised at her dramatic entrance.

“Just Di today,” she explained with an Irish lilt in her voice. “Di Mooney. I thought I’d buy the two of you lunch before popping off to the old sod.”

“Business in Ireland?” Susan asked.

“Funny business,” she said with a grin. “His name is Sean. After the last few days, I need a vacation.”

I suspected most of the gods felt the same way. It had been a tense few days in Ovid. Now, though, the mood was much more relaxed after the events of the weekend. The Judge had been in a fine mood all week and planned to be gone for the next few days. Our session that morning—Tuesday—had been the last planned for the week. Most of the other deities had taken some time off as well, from what I had heard.

“And you just wanted to buy us lunch before you left,” I said. I knew, of course, that it wasn’t the only reason for her largesse.

“Well...” she began, pursing her beautiful lips, “I suppose I would like to hear the whole story before I go.”

“So would I for that matter,” Susan chimed in. “Vera over at March’s said something about it yesterday. I guess I missed all the excitement last weekend.”

“Yes, she was here for the story yesterday morning,” I explained. “In fact, just about every deity in town has been in for this story.” That was unusual, too. Most of the gods didn’t bother to come to me for the tales. I suppose after a few thousand years, tales of the Judge’s transformations were a little dull. Of course, Diana never seemed to tire of them.

“Shouldn’t we have lunch first?” I suggested coyly. “After all, Susan and I are both eating for two now.”

“Only if you’ll settle for fast food,” Diana answered, equally coy.

“But we go to the Greenhouse if you hear the story first?” I bargained.

“Sure.”

I smiled, relaxing into my trance-like state. “Okay, girls, here we go...”

There were times, I thought with a heavy sigh as I stared at my incoming basket, that I wished the life of a private detective was a little more like it was in the old Sam Spade movies. I tried to imagine myself in a wilted suit, my tie loose as I sat with my feet on the desk, tempted by the open bottle of bourbon in my lower desk drawer. Maybe there could be some brassy jazz playing in the background, drowning out the din of afternoon Los Angeles traffic two floors down on a warm summer day.

The only thing in the real world that matched my fantasy was that it was a warm summer day. In fact, it was hot and humid, but that was outside. In my office, it was cool and dry as the sound of the air conditioning hummed over the background music which sounded like the elevator music version of something ELO did back in the early eighties. Outside my window was Chicago, not Los Angeles, and even if the window hadn't been sealed shut, I don't know how much of the traffic noise I could hear on Wacker Drive some twenty stories down.

As for my attire, I wore a navy double-breasted blazer and charcoal gray slacks, and everything was neatly pressed and stylish, as befitted an associate of Charles McKenzie and Associates, one of Chicago's premier private detective agencies. And there was certainly no bottle of bourbon in my desk drawer. If there were, I would probably have been fired in a heartbeat. That was okay, though, I was strictly a beer drinker, and never at work.

Actually, I wasn't really the Same Spade type anyhow. One of the reasons I had gone with the McKenzie offer when I left the Chicago police force was that they specialized in business clients rather than the more tawdry divorce work of some of the other firms. Oh, we did a little divorce work, but most of our clients were the various law firms that populated the Loop—some of them in our building—and insurance companies.

Actually, our largest insurance client owned the building we were in. It was at One Wacker Drive. Although not as prestigious as some other buildings, it was a good address. It looked good on the business card. And from Charles McKenzie's office, you could see most of the major buildings in the Loop. Even my humble office looked down on the Chicago River with a nice view of Marina Towers. And if I wanted that jazz music, House of Blues was just a few blocks away.

My only real complaint with the job was the paperwork. It was almost as bad as working as a cop. It seemed as if I sat behind the desk covering my butt (and the firm's butt) with paper at least two hours for every hour I spent in the field.

“Jeff, do you have a minute?”

I looked up suddenly at the sound of Charles McKenzie’s voice. I hadn’t even heard him at the door. “Sure, Mac,” I replied, happy for any excuse to avoid paperwork. Besides, Mac was a good boss. He treated his associates more like human beings than many of the PI firms did—or so I had heard. That didn’t mean Mac was a soft touch. He could be hard as nails when he needed to be. Like most of us in the firm, he had come up through the ranks as a cop. More than one person had been fooled by his silver hair and fatherly appearance.

Mac eased into my office, followed by another man who I didn’t know. The stranger was about as tall as Mac and me—six-one or so—and looked to be just a shade into his forties. He was balding slightly and had the suntanned look of a man who spent time out of doors. His suit was dark and expensive, and looked rather lawyerly. If I had been a betting man, I would have bet that he was indeed a lawyer, and a successful one at that. I wouldn’t have been surprised to find that his tan came from sailing his own boat on Lake Michigan.

“Jeff Riley, meet Franklin Ridgeway,” Mac said formally. I rose and took Ridgeway’s hand. “Mr. Ridgeway is an attorney.”

“The Franklin Ridgeway of Block, Patterson and Ridgeway?” I asked, knowing the answer. Surely there could only be one Franklin Ridgeway. The man whose hand I was shaking was one of the most prominent attorneys in Chicago. He had been involved in a number of high profile cases, and almost always on the winning side. He represented some of the top companies in Chicago.

“That’s right,” he acknowledged with a firm grip. We looked each other straight in the eye as we shook hands. Looking into his dark brown eyes was almost like looking into an abyss. They say the eyes are the windows to the soul. If that’s the case, I thought Franklin Ridgeway’s soul had to be darker than the pit of Hell. But, of course, he was a lawyer.

I motioned to the two chairs before my desk. When we were seated, Mac began, “Mr. Ridgeway has an assignment he would like us to undertake.”

“I see,” I said as noncommittally as possible. I had assumed that was the case. He didn’t just come up to see the view from my window. The fact that the great Franklin Ridgeway had made the pilgrimage all the way over to our office from his lakefront offices meant that this assignment was going to be a doozy.

“Mr. Riley...”

“Jeff,” I interjected.

Ridgeway smiled. “Yes, Jeff then. I represent a group of investors with large international interests.”

“Who are they?” I asked bluntly. I saw Mac grimace. ‘Sorry, Mac,’ I thought, ‘but I like to know who’s holding the leash.’

Ridgeway didn’t miss a beat. He didn’t even blink. “I’m afraid the identity of my clients must remain confidential. I have been authorized to assure you though that they are not involved in any illegal activities, nor will they ask you to do so. I have a sworn affidavit on their behalf that verifies this.”

I settled back in my chair, striking what I hoped was a sceptical pose. “So what do your clients want?”

“One of their associates embezzled a large amount of money from them last year.”

“How large is large?” I asked.

“Thirty million dollars,” he replied without hesitation.

I nodded. “That certainly is a large amount of money.”

“And they want it back.”

“I’m sure they do,” I agreed. “But there’s more, isn’t there? Thirty million is enough to get Federal and state authorities on the case, even if he’s had a year to hide. Why involve a private investigator?”

“I told you he was sharp,” Mac said to Ridgeway with a proud smile.

“Yes,” Ridgeway agreed without real conviction. “I’m sure that’s why my clients specified Mr. Riley—Jeff—for this job.”

I was suddenly curious. “Your clients specified me specifically? Why? Do I know them?”

“No,” Ridgeway explained, shifting a little uncomfortably, as if he had been charged with explaining something he didn’t fully understand himself. “My clients are most insistent that you handle this matter for them. They didn’t explain why. I, of course, checked you out on my own. You had a promising career with the Police Department. You were a homicide detective.”

It wasn’t a question, but I said, “That’s right.”

“And yet you gave it all up when...”

“Right again,” I said, cutting him off. There were some subjects not open for discussion. That was one of them. He picked up on it and moved on.

“My clients have reason to believe that their associate fled and is currently residing in Oklahoma.”

I’m sure I gave a surprised look. Embezzlers with thirty million to throw around generally leave for some other part of the world—someplace where extradition is difficult if not impossible. Then they cover their tracks, bribe a few local officials, hire a private guard or two and live off the interest. Let me see, thirty million at eight percent a year is over two million. Most good embezzlers can live on that.

“Why Oklahoma?” I asked, genuinely curious for the first time.

“I honestly don’t know,” Ridgeway replied. When a lawyer says ‘honestly,’ look out. But for some reason, I believed him. He seemed as genuinely puzzled as I was. This case was beginning to sound interesting.

“Okay,” I said, “let’s say the embezzler is in Oklahoma. It’s a big place—too big for one private detective to find him. Why not just tell the authorities? At last check, there were plenty of law enforcement officers in Oklahoma.”

Ridgeway was becoming uncomfortable. Obviously, he had dangled big bucks in front of Mac, and so as the hired underling, I was supposed to smile and take orders. In the three years I had been in Mac's company, I had never been that sort of person. Mac knew it, but obviously Ridgeway didn't.

"Look, Jeff," Ridgeway began with a sigh, "I don't pretend to understand why my clients do the things they do. All I can tell you is that they are very successful, and they are legitimate. They seem to have insights that have made them wealthy beyond anything you can imagine. And yet they still manage to keep their names out of the newspapers. Now, there's something in Oklahoma that they want handled, and they want you to handle it. Besides, the police haven't found him in a year, according to my clients."

"So I'm supposed to go charging off to Oklahoma and bring back their embezzler," I surmised. Who did they think I was? The Lone Ranger?

Ridgeway shook his head. "No, you don't have to bring him back. They just want you to finger him."

"I thought you said he was an associate of theirs," I pointed out. "Surely they know what he looks like."

"He looks like this," Ridgeway said, opening a file and passing a photo to me. It wasn't a terribly good photo. It showed three men displaying the results of a day's fishing. The man in the middle, the tallest, was circled. He looked a little like Tom Sellick with curly dark hair and a moustache, well trimmed, and an easy smile. I noticed he had the most fish, too. "But he may not look like that now."

So he had invested in a makeover, I thought. Try a little plastic surgery here and there. Maybe shave off the moustache or grow a beard. Wear contacts to change his eye color. Still, he couldn't change his height. He looked to be about six-two or so. He shouldn't be that hard to find.

There was still something I wasn't being told, but I could live with that. It was part of the challenge. Like most good detectives, I liked a good puzzle. Back in my homicide days, I had quite a reputation for putting together vague clues and coming up with a murderer. After a few successes, I seemed to get all the really hard cases. I even managed to solve a majority of them. Of course, there was an eventual cost, one that drove me from the force, but there was nothing I could do about that now.

So when I left the force, what else could I do but become a private cop? The Rileys had been cops ever since they had immigrated to Chicago back in the last century. It was in my blood. I just couldn't be a homicide detective after...

"All you have to do is find him. Others will bring him back," Ridgeway was explaining.

So okay, I was curious. In fact, I was more than curious. I was mystified. Our investigations did not come cheaply, and however much was being offered, it was enough to have Mac excited. My services had been specifically requested, and I couldn't for the life of me imagine why. And all of this just to identify—identify; not detain—an embezzler who didn't even have sense enough to leave the country.

"When do I start?" I asked, watching with faint amusement as both Mac and Ridgeway seemed to relax a little.

Ridgeway pulled a packet out of his folder. "You start today. There's an American flight to Tulsa from O'Hare later this afternoon. We've made hotel reservations for you tonight in Tulsa. Then, tomorrow, you drive along the last known route of our embezzling friend. There's a map in the packet of where you need to concentrate your search. My clients seem to be certain he's somewhere in the area on that map."

"How long do I have?" I asked, accepting the packet. I took a moment to look at the map. It was a detail of an area east of Tulsa and north of Muskogee. I had never been in that part of the country, but I at least recognized the names of those towns. My only real knowledge of that part of the country came from watching Twister.

"As long as you need," he replied, rising to his feet. "A phone number is in the packet. You are to call it when you've identified our target."

“Is it your phone number?” I asked.

That earned me a small smile. “No.”

Mac ushered him out while I inspected the packet. When Mac returned, he was still all smiles. “Great work, Jeff. You really impressed him, and Ridgeway doesn’t impress easily.”

“Neither do I,” I told him as he plopped back down into the chair he had vacated a short time before. “Something about this smells, Mac.”

He began to laugh. “I wouldn’t worry about it. Ridgeway might be a snake, but his record is clean.”

“He reminds me of Al Pacino in the Devil’s Advocate,” I muttered. “I’m surprised his suit doesn’t smell of brimstone. I tell you, Mac, something about this isn’t right.”

He got a little more serious as his body tensed. “What do you mean?”

“Well, for starters, why hire us? This isn’t the type of case we would normally take on.”

“No,” Mac agreed, “but now I have the talent on staff to track someone down—you. After all, you are the cop who tracked down Louie Capella.”

I shifted uncomfortably. It was a matter I didn’t like to be reminded of. The look in Mac’s eyes told me he already regretted mentioning it to me. Still, I answered him. “Louie Capella was hiding out right here in Chicago. He and I grew up here. Finding him was like playing hide and seek in my old neighborhood. I knew all the good hiding places. The only thing I know about Oklahoma is that it’s north of Texas.”

“Eastern Oklahoma is a lot like downstate Illinois,” Mac explained. “It’s mostly low hills and farm land. The further east you go, the more hills and trees you see.”

“So how far east in Oklahoma am I supposed to go?” I asked, slumping down in my chair with resignation.

“About as far east as you can go it appears,” Mac answered with a smile. He knew I was intrigued with the case. He had seen me like this before.

“One question though, Mac: why Oklahoma?”

Mac frowned. “What do you mean?”

I leaned forward and said, “Look, suppose you stole thirty million dollars from somebody. Where would you go?”

Mac thought for a moment. The idea actually seemed to bring a little smile to his face. Well, we all have our little fantasies. “I don’t know,” he finally admitted. “I’d probably try for South America. There are plenty of places to go there to avoid extradition.”

“Exactly,” I agreed. “There are some other places in the Middle East, and there’s always Cuba and North Korea, but they aren’t exactly hospitable to Americans—even Americans with money. South America is where I would head, too. The point is I would get out of the country as quickly as possible.”

“Maybe this guy isn’t that bright,” Mac suggested.

I sneered and leaned back in my chair. “Come on, Mac. He was smart enough to steal thirty million dollars. Guys that smart don’t stick around, especially for a year. You’re acting as if he’s some kind of a moron who robs a convenience store, then leaves his wallet on the counter for the police to find.”

Mac looked a little uncomfortable. He saw where this was leading.

“You don’t think there is any thirty million dollars.”

“What did they offer, Mac? A ten percent finder’s fee?”

Mac squirmed in his chair. “Eight percent,” he murmured softly.

“You should have held out for ten,” I told him. “Even at that, I hope there’s a minimum fee if no money is recovered, because I think that’s all we’re going to get.”

“There is,” Mac told me, “but why are you so sure there’s no money here?”

“Because the only way Ridgeway’s clients would be coming to us instead of pressing the authorities is if the money was dirty,” I explained confidently. “Ridgeway is too good a lawyer to get mixed up in dirty money. He doesn’t need to. His client list looks like the Who’s Who of Chicago. He may even know that there isn’t any money to be found. In fact, I suspect that’s the case. A year has gone by, so our friend has had plenty of time to hide the money. His clients aren’t after the money; they’re after the man. And whatever he did, it isn’t something they can count on the authorities to be concerned about.”

“Even if you’re right, we still get a good fee,” Mac pointed out. “I still expect you to go to Oklahoma.”

“Oh, I’ll go,” I said with a chuckle. “If for no other reason, I’m curious.”

“Well,” Mac said with a sigh as he rose to his feet, “be careful.”

“I always am,” I replied. “Don’t worry about that.”

After running home to pack, then fighting afternoon Chicago traffic, I barely made it to O’Hare in time to catch my plane. I was pleasantly surprised to see they had ponied up the first class fare, so I was to ride to the outback in style. A nice cold beer in hand as we reached cruising altitude, I managed to settle back and read the file on my embezzler—if that was what he was. Peter Allison had quite a résumé. He had picked up an MBA at Harvard after a liberal arts education at one of the name Eastern private schools and embarked on a career in mutual fund management. He hit the bricks running, and in his first two years, he became the most successful fund manager at Janus. He had opted three years ago to leave Janus and go to work for a private investment fund. I found it interesting that there was virtually no information about the private firm he went to work for. Apparently, his new employers valued their privacy above everything else.

Since many of the cases I had worked on since joining McKenzie had involved high finance, I was aware that this was fairly common. A hotshot fund manager would often opt to go to work for a private fund, usually getting a little piece of the action. A little piece could be worth several million in the bull market of the nineties that seemed to have no end.

So now our pal Allison was sitting on top of the world. He had no family and, unfortunately, there was very little in the file about his personal habits. I had a picture of a man who lived for his work, though. He made money. It was both his occupation and his hobby from all accounts.

The picture I was getting was not the picture of an embezzler. People embezzle because they can't make enough to fund their dirty little habits legitimately. Drugs, gambling, women (or men) are the common reasons for embezzling. Allison didn't seem to fit that profile. By all accounts, the guy made more money—both for himself and his clients—than he could ever need. Maybe he just snapped. Maybe the pressure got to be too much for him. But no, that would describe a man who would chuck it all and head for the beaches in Brazil. That isn't what Allison had done.

And that brought me back to my earlier question: why Oklahoma? According to the file, Allison was a born and bred Bostonian. He had solid if not affluent New England credentials and absolutely nothing to connect him to Oklahoma.

Well, I thought to myself, I had always liked tough cases, particularly when it involved tracking someone down. I had certainly gotten what I liked. What was the old saying? Be careful what you wish for—you might get it? I had been handed a case where nothing made sense. Then I had to track down a man with only the knowledge that he had apparently taken an escape route into the farm country of Oklahoma. To make it worse, he had apparently disguised himself, possibly by plastic surgery. If I got this guy, I was going to treat myself to a case of imported beer and a vacation. Maybe I'd do some fishing. I hadn't done that since... well, in a long time.

As the plane dropped down through the thick summer air, I got my first real glimpse of Oklahoma. Spread out below was a panorama of hills and trees I had not expected. Oh sure, there was plenty of farmland too, but I was used to the flat expanses of land around Chicago. This reminded me more of some of the hilly, forested areas in Wisconsin where I used to fish with...

With Mary.

I closed my eyes in resignation. As much as I tried to push memories of Mary—and Trisha—out of my head, I couldn't do it. I could still hear Mary on that last fateful fishing trip. I had three whole days off and we had decided to enjoy them on a fishing trip in Wisconsin. I could still hear Mary squealing with delight as a slight tug on her line became a whir of line being let out as a big one ran with it. I could still hear little Trisha laughing with glee as Mary nearly fell overboard trying to reel the monster in. I could still hear our mutual groan as the line snapped, freeing our mysterious fish to fight another day...

I was brought back to the present as the wheels of the plane touched down in Tulsa. I looked around, hoping no one had seen the tears in my eyes.

Tulsa was hot. Sure, Chicago was hot in the summer—often hot and muggy. But Tulsa brought new meaning to the word 'hot.' As I stepped out on the curb to catch a shuttle to get to my rental car, I felt as if I had stepped into an oven. I had been smart enough to dress casually, but even without a tie, I felt like I was being cooked by the blistering Southwestern sun. The humidity was high too, causing me to marvel at how so many presumed natives were bustling about in coats and ties as if it were a cool spring day. I guess it's whatever you get used to, I mused.

It was even hot the next morning when I started my pursuit of the contradictory Mr. Allison. I checked out a white Ford Taurus at Hertz and tried to get the lay of the land from the girl behind the rental desk. She shook her head when I showed her the map of the area I was heading for. "I'm from that part of the state," she told me with her soft Oklahoma twang. "There's not a whole lot out that way. It's mostly farms, small towns and such." Then she looked at me with her big brown eyes and asked, "You got some business out that way?"

"Yeah," I said in my best Phillip Marlowe voice, "I gotta meet a guy out there—about business."

She looked at me a little oddly. Oh well. She was only about twenty or so. Odds were she'd never even heard of Phillip Marlowe—or Humphrey Bogart for that matter. What was this world coming to?

An hour later, I was east of Tulsa off the interstate and cruising the back roads of Oklahoma. According to the map, my fugitive could be anywhere along this part of my route. The problem was there wasn't anywhere to look, unless he was hiding under a pile of hay or in the middle of a cornfield. I hadn't seen anything but farmland for the last twenty miles. My plan had been to check with local police departments—to see if anyone fitting Allison's description had moved in over the last few months. A single city-type guy would stand out in a small town—even with plastic surgery. But there were no towns in sight, and many of the farmhouses I had seen were deserted. Apparently, like Illinois, the small family farm was disappearing as farmers cultivated more and more acres with less and less people.

It was odd. I hadn't even seen a single billboard or a road sign. I assumed I was still on the right road, for I hadn't seen any junctions indicating I had left my highway. The road was a good one—two lanes freshly black topped with a freshly painted yellow line down the center to warn against passing on the winding, hilly course.

Maybe hiding in a place like this wasn't such a bad idea, I thought. There were hills and lakes galore, and not a lot of people. If you could find a cabin buried in the woods over by one of those lakes, you might be able to hide out in plain sight for quite a while. I doubted if any of the local residents would be very helpful to someone from the big city disrupting their privacy with a search for somebody who was just minding his own business. This might turn out to be tougher than I thought, I realized.

Just when I thought I was hopelessly lost, I saw a road sign. It wasn't one of those green and white ones you see on the interstates. It was just a small sign white with black letters that proclaimed that Ovid was three miles away, presumably straight ahead.

I pulled off the road in front of the sign, searching for the Oklahoma map I had purchased at the airport to supplement the sketchy map the car rental companies give you. It was a current, highly detailed map, but I could find no Ovid in the index. I knew roughly where I had to be, but none of the roads in that area seemed to lead to a town called Ovid. Well, it was probably just a wide spot in the road, I thought to myself. I had seen places—towns up in the woods of Wisconsin—that were nothing more than a gas station that also served as a post office and grocery store. That was probably all there was to Ovid. Still, it was a starting place. I'd pull off there, get some gas and grab a Coke, and ask about my missing man. It was nearly noon, so maybe I'd get lucky and there'd be a little café there where I could get some lunch.

When I had travelled half the distance to Ovid, I realized that it was more than a wide spot in the road. In the distance, I could see evidence of a fair-sized town. I could see trees and houses, and church steeples rising out of the artificial forest all towns create. The road was widening, becoming four lanes in width as small roadside businesses began to come into view. Apparently, the mapmakers at Gousha had screwed up. I would have bet they had gotten a few nasty notes from the Ovid Chamber of Commerce.

But where the mapmakers had failed Ovid, the weatherman had smiled upon the town. It had been hot and muggy with a serious build-up of ugly clouds as I had left Tulsa, but those clouds seemed impotent in the little valley that held Ovid. It was almost as if they were barred from entry into the valley as they roiled and blustered just beyond the low hills near Ovid, leaving the small town basking in the bright light of a summer day.

I might have been born and raised in the city, but I wasn't completely unfamiliar with small towns. Between my law-enforcement career and a passion for fishing which had often taken me to small towns in Illinois and Wisconsin, I knew small towns fairly well. Ovid was more prosperous than most of them. Everything seemed neat, clean and freshly painted, as if the town was getting ready for some big event.

Most small towns in the Midwest were in decline. Farming took an ever smaller percentage of the workforce, drying up markets for merchants in smaller communities. I had visited many small towns where half the businesses had been boarded up, or where buildings had burned down right in the middle of the business district and weeds or empty parking lots had taken their place. Not so in Ovid. As I made my way into the heart of the town, I saw a prosperous business district. Shop windows were full of goods, parking spaces were filled with newer cars and trucks, and the people walked about with a sense of purpose.

But upon closer observation, there was something odd about the people. Some of them—most, in fact—appeared strangely transparent. No, that wasn't the right word. I couldn't see through them. It was almost as if the mind couldn't quite reconcile their existence with reality, if that makes any sense at all. It had to be a trick of the light, I thought to myself. After driving through the cloudy Oklahoma morning, perhaps the brightness of the Ovid day was playing tricks on my eyes.

With a little luck, I found what I was really looking for—the police station. First as a police officer and later as a private detective, I had learned that it was wise not to snoop in another jurisdiction without informing the authorities that I was there. It smoothed potentially ruffled feathers and often gave the local police a feeling that you were, if not part of their team, at least rooting for their side.

The Ovid Police Department made its home in City Hall. No big surprise there. In a smaller community, it was common for all city departments to be located in the same building. City Hall was fairly impressive for a small town, though. It was a two-story building faced with granite and sporting small but well-done Doric columns. The US flag hung next to the Oklahoma flags, rippling in the gentle summer breeze. There were well-tended flowers in front of the entrance. Once again, Ovid showed signs of remarkable prosperity.

As I stepped from the car, I was pleased to note that the breeze was actually a pleasant one. Oh sure, it was still hot out—as hot as I had expected. But it didn't seem quite as muggy in Ovid. Perhaps the breeze had lowered the humidity a tad. In any case, it was comfortable.

I liked Ovid—that was my first thought as I stepped out of the car. The oak trees near City Hall were green and full and looked as if they had been there forever. The grass was green and soothing, smelling of a recent cutting. I could hear birds in the trees, gently singing to each other. What a change from the Loop! I found myself wondering where the best fishing spots might be.

“Can I help you?”

The voice was calm and pleasant, and completely unexpected. I turned suddenly, looking into the face of a police officer. He was tall and slender without being thin. His eyes were shielded by mirrored sunglasses, and the rest of his face was impassive in a way that only a police officer can manage. His gray-blue shirt was neatly pressed, as were his dark slacks. His nametag read ‘Mercer,’ and his gun belt looked almost even with his belt, but there was a sag at the holster allowing him to draw quickly if he need to. In short, he looked like a police-recruiting poster.

He was standing next to a police car. I hadn’t noticed it when I had pulled into the parking lot, but then again, I had been focused on the building. Still, I mentally kicked myself. I was usually more observant. How had I missed the car?

“I was just on my way in to your department,” I told the officer. I extended my hand. “I’m Jeff Riley. I’m a private investigator from Chicago.”

The moment of truth had arrived. How would this police officer treat me? As a contemporary? As a slime ball? It all depended upon the officer. He looked like a pro. Pros were usually willing to take you at face value. This one was no exception. Slowly but deliberately, he extended his hand.

What is the perfect handshake? I couldn’t have answered that question before I shook hands with Officer Mercer. His handshake was firm and warm, and there was something about it that made it sincere as well. He favored me with a small, tight smile. “Pleased to meet you, Mr. Riley. I’m Officer Mercer. Now, what can I do for you?”

I reached in my shirt pocket and produced a picture of my fugitive. “I was hired to find this man,” I explained, handing him the picture.

“A bad one, is he?” Officer Mercer asked casually.

“Not real bad,” I replied. “Supposedly, he embezzled a large amount of money. The people who say he took it hired me to find him.”

I could feel Officer Mercer’s eyes bearing down on me. “You sound like you don’t think he took the money.”

I shrugged as casually as I could. “As I told you. I’m a private investigator. The agent who hired me has a reputation of being honest. But I’m not a police officer.”

“Any more,” Officer Mercer finished for me.

“That’s right.” No surprise there. It’s easy to spot a cop. I would have pegged Officer Mercer as a cop even if I had seen him in swim trunks at the beach.

He studied the picture. “A man like this would stand out in a crowd,” he observed.

“Yes he would,” I agreed. “He would have been through here some time during the last year. Have you seen him?”

“I don’t know anyone who looks like this,” Officer Mercer said carefully.

“It’s possible he doesn’t look like that,” I told him. He looked up at me suddenly with a quizzical expression. “He may be disguised,” I clarified, and Officer Mercer nodded.

“You’re welcome to check around,” he said at last, handing the picture back to me.

“That’s neighborly of you,” I nodded with a smile. “I’ll try not to step on any toes.”

“That would be a good idea,” he agreed. With that, he nodded, and walked into the City Hall building.

It was as much as I could reasonably hope for. I didn’t expect him to recognize the picture. That was have been too easy. But he had given me the opportunity to check around. That meant I could talk to motel clerks, gas station employees, and waitresses along the highway. If just one of them had spotted my guy and had any idea where he had been heading for, I might have a chance of finding him. That was the way it usually worked. It was always tedious, checking with everyone who might have seen your man, but it was all part of the job.

My first stop was a motel. I could kill two birds with one stone. I'd be busy the rest of the day checking with Ovid's residents, so I might as well spend the evening. The best looking motel out on the business strip was a place called the Ovid Inn. It wasn't fancy, but I hadn't expected a Hilton.

The lobby of the Ovid Inn was as plain and simple as the rest of the place. The fanciest item in it was a sign resting on the worn registration desk that said 'Z Proctor, Proprietor.' Z Proctor was a thin fellow with even thinner hair, gray matching a small moustache. I was a little disappointed. I had hoped for one of the little weasely guys Bogart always ended up intimidating.

"Need a room?" he asked with the soft twang I had noticed from nearly everyone in Oklahoma.

"Sure do," I replied, hoping I sounded sufficiently folksy.

He seemed to be sizing me up. "Some of the beds are pretty short. I'm not sure I got one long enough for you."

"I'll make do," I assured him, pulling out a credit card and laying it on the counter.

He shrugged. "Okay, take number twenty-seven." He slid the key across the counter, scooping up my credit card all in one swift motion that would have made a magician blink twice. "You let me know if the bed's too short, though. I'll see what I can do."

"There is one thing you can do for me," I said as casually as I could.

The guy brightened. Apparently he lived to serve. "What would that be?"

I pulled the picture out of my pocket. "Ever see this guy?"

He studied the picture for a moment before saying slowly, "No, don't think so. Looks mighty tall. Friend of yours?"

"Let's just say we have mutual business associates," I replied, putting the picture away.

"Can't help you there," he said, shaking his head. "But you let me know about that bed, all right?"

Actually, I thought as I inspected the room, the bed was a little short, but it would do. The room was nothing special. I was neat and clean with cheap pine furniture and artwork that looked as if it had been left over from a starving artist's sale. It would do, though. I'd only be in Ovid for a day or so, unless I got a lead that checked out.

I checked the TV schedule to see if there were any decent detective movies on. No such luck, though. I always enjoyed them even though they were so simplistic. I mean, I realize they only have a couple of hours to tell a story, but most detective work isn't as clear cut as they show it in the movies. The detective always seems to stumble on just the right clue at just the right moment. Then, he takes a straight and obvious trail back to the killer. There are no loose ends, no hotshot lawyers to get him off on a technicality at the trial, and no bleeding heart politicians to rake him over the coals for doing his job.

I might spend weeks in this little backwater area of Oklahoma. I might show my picture of the runner a thousand times and not get one good lead. Or the next guy I talked to might lead me right to him. Oh well, I was on the clock. The agency would be paid for my work even if I turned up nothing. Our mysterious clients would have been better off going to the authorities.

I took a quick shower and got into a clean shirt and slacks. Even though the weather wasn't as hot and sticky in Ovid as it had been in Tulsa, I needed the shower and the change. It was time to sample Ovid's nightlife. No, I wasn't a partying kind of guy. I just wanted to check out places my fugitive might have patronized. Maybe he stopped for a burger, or maybe he tried one of the local bars looking for a little female companionship. Either way, he might have left a trail.

Odds were good he would have stayed on the main highway strip. That cut down the number of places I needed to check. I was hungry anyhow, so I stopped off at Rusty's Burger Barn just as the sun was going down. It was your typical small town fast food joint. I guess Ovid wasn't important enough to rate a McDonald's. Instead of golden arches and a nine gazillion served sign, the neon sign in the window of Rusty's just said 'Rusty's Best Burgers.'

I stepped in the brightly-lit building and looked around. It was neat and clean and about fifteen years out of date, just like every other small town burger joint I had ever seen. There were a few customers eating, but I got the idea Ovid was the sort of place where you went home and had dinner with the family.

There was one thing that troubled me, though. Looking around, I noticed that many of the patrons had that same oddly transparent look I had noticed when I had first arrived in Ovid. I had chalked it up to a trick of the sunlight, but there was no sun now. I don't mean I could see through those people; I couldn't—not really. But there was this odd feeling that if I really concentrated hard, I could see objects behind them. I resolved to have my eyes checked when I got back to Chicago.

"Be right with you," a perky young waitress called as I slid into a booth. She was young and brunette. I guessed her age at about nineteen or so. She was a little transparent as well, but seemed perfectly normal. It had to be my eyes.

I ordered a Rusty Burger and fries from Maxine—that was what her nametag said her name was. And I showed her the picture when she brought my food.

"I'm not sure," she said uncertainly.

My heart quickened. 'Not sure' was better than 'no.'

Then, I was doomed to disappointment as she shrugged and laughed, "We get a lot of people just passing through. I sometimes remember the cute ones, and he's cute. I don't think I remember him though. I know he's not a regular."

I had the same results everywhere I tried. There was no luck at any of the cafés or convenience stores or gas stations up and down the strip. At last, I was down to one last place: Randy Andy's. Bars didn't seem to do a thriving business in Ovid. Oh, there were a couple of little ones I had checked, but they were practically deserted. If this were Chicago, every little neighborhood bar would be doing a brisk evening business with factory workers and other working stiffs melting the heat of the day with a cold brew. Not so in Ovid, though.

Randy Andy's was the only bar on the strip big enough to show up on radar. If my fugitive was the sort of guy who might be looking for the ladies, it was the most obvious place. I had saved it until last because it was the most promising. That might seem contradictory, but I was a stranger in town. If I showed up at Randy Andy's early, I'd be met with suspicion by a group of patrons who were mostly sober and reserved. Late at night, only the serious drinkers would be left. Everybody was their friend as long as they agreed to buy a round of drinks.

There was nothing special about Randy Andy's. In fact, it was a lot quieter than I had expected. It looked as if there had been a crowd earlier from the debris a sweet young redhead was cleaning up. She didn't seem too happy about it either. A couple of guys were playing pool in back. They had an appreciative audience: two so-so looking twins who seemed more interested in the balls in their pants than the ones on the table. Other than that, there were a couple of what looked like regulars at the bar, hunched over their drinks while the ferret-like bartender pretended to wipe off the bar.

There were a couple of parties in the booths. They were all wearing bowling shirts and looked as if they had just come in to share a pitcher or two after their match. They were being served by a nice-looking waitress. She was even better looking than the redhead. She had long, dark hair and a body that was enough to make my mouth water, complete with full breasts and long, shapely legs. There was a tattoo of an eagle on one ankle, and it seemed to be in flight as she turned on her heels with a practiced move of a woman who is well aware that her every move is enough to make a grown man cry.

I had slipped into one of the booths and caught her eye. She smiled and headed my way, her short, tight red dress doing little to contain her curves. "What'll it be?" she asked in a sultry, sexy voice.

"Whatever's on tap," I replied. She nodded and turned to get my beer. I might order several just to get a view of her wonderful ass wiggling back to the bar.

When she returned with my beer, I said, "Do you have a moment?"

Her eyes drilled into me. I could see what she was thinking: just another perv who wants to make time with the waitress.

"It's nothing like that," I told her. "I just need some information."

Her eyes narrowed. "Like what's my name?"

"It's Sly," I replied, surprising her. "I heard the bartender call you that when you got my beer," I then explained.

"Look, I'm the only experienced waitress here tonight and the Borland twins and their dates," she motioned to the group at the pool table with a nod of her head, "are getting a little low on beer."

"I don't think beer is on their minds right now," I commented.

Sly turned and looked at them. The mating dance was nearly done. One of the guys had just run the table and was getting a congratulatory hand in his pants as a reward. The loser was being consoled in a similar manner. She grinned. "Maybe you're right. Okay, it's a little slow right now anyway. Besides, Misty can handle orders for a while," she said, nodding at the redhead. She sat down across from me. "Now what did you want to know?"

I wanted to know a lot of things, like if she was in a relationship, but I had a job to do. I pulled out the picture, wondering how many times I'd have to show it. "Have you seen this guy?"

She looked at the picture. I could see in a moment that she had seen him before. I couldn't believe how lucky I was. The first day and I might have a lead. I kept quiet. I could see she was deciding how to answer me. Finally, she said slowly, "I don't think so."

Her voice lied, but her eyes told the truth. What was she hiding? “Are you sure?” I asked.

She looked up at me suddenly. “Look, who are you? You’re with them, aren’t you? You know I want nothing to do with you or your people. Haven’t I made that clear to you? I’m happy here. I’ve got a life. I don’t just do this; I write books—children’s books. And...”

“Wait a minute,” I said, holding up my hand. “Slow down. Who are ‘them?’ I don’t know what you’re talking about. I’ve already talked to your police, so I’m not doing anything wrong here.”

If I thought she had looked surprised before, I was wrong. Now she looked surprised, her eyes and mouth wide. “You’ve talked to the police? To Officer Mercer?”

“Of course,” I confirmed. “I’m looking for a man who stole from my client. Here.” I pulled out my ID and showed it to her. She looked at my PI license and then at me. “Now, have you seen this guy?”

She thought for another moment before answering, “Yes. He was in here maybe a week or so ago.”

A week ago? But Ridgeway had said the money was taken last year. And he had indicated that the embezzler had changed his appearance. Now, this woman was telling me that he had been in the bar only a week ago with his original face.

I looked into her beautiful eyes. “Are you sure about that?”

“Of course I’m sure,” she replied angrily. “You think just because I’m a waitress in a bar that I’m some kind of a ditz?”

“Of course not,” I assured her carefully. Of course, from experience, most waitresses I had met in bars like Randy Andy’s weren’t exactly rocket scientists, but I wasn’t about to tell her that. Besides, she was right, I had to admit. I had been thinking of her as the average cocktail waitress, and that was a mistake. Even in the short time I had talked to her, I should have realized there was more to her than met the eye. Hadn’t she said that she wrote books—children’s books? I was a little rusty at this sort of an interview. I wouldn’t have made the mistake of stereotyping her if I were still with Homicide. "It's just that I was given to understand that he might have disguised himself before then."

She studied me with a practiced eye before saying, "You know, Mr. Riley, your client may have withheld a lot of information from you."

I shifted uncomfortably. I had been thinking the same thing.

"Let me give you a piece of advice," she continued. "First, are you happy with your life?"

What a strange question. Was I? No, not really. I hadn't been happy since...

"Are you?" she pressed.

"It's all right," I answered a little defensively.

"That probably means no," she observed sagely. "But you need to know that Ovid is... different. If you stay around very long, you'll find that out. But if you are happy with your life, you need to go out to your car right now and drive out of this town and don't look back."

"Is that a threat?" I asked. "Is this guy still here in town? Is he dangerous or something?"

"He's probably here," she replied. "I don't know where, but I do know he's probably still here. And I doubt if he's dangerous. The Judge wouldn't allow that. But you'll find out all about that if you stay here."

"The Judge?" I asked. "Who is the Judge?"

"Hey, Sly, Jean and Tina are thirsty," one of the pool players called. "So are we. You can make nice with that guy later. Bring us another round."

She looked over at the foursome with an expression of mild disgust. "I have to go," she told me. "That's all I can say for now. As for the Judge, he's... well, he's the Judge."

As she got up, I touched her arm. "One more question for you, Sly," I said, not really sure why I was saying it.

"Make it quick."

“Are you happy?”

A slow smile crept across her face. “Yes, Mr. Riley, I’m happy. In fact, I’ve never been happier in my life.”

I finished the beer and left. At least I knew my runner had lit in Ovid. Now, I had to be careful. It was like when I was fishing. Once you saw there was a fish near the hook, you always had to be careful not to jerk the line. I had to become more circumspect in my questioning. Too many questions would startle my prey. As I drove back to the motel, I mapped out a plan of action. I’d go back to the police the next day. That Officer Mercer had said he hadn’t seen my fugitive, but maybe someone else in the department had seen him. Or maybe Officer Mercer was covering for him. A very small amount of that thirty million dollars might look like a lot of money in a policeman’s pocket. Oklahoma cops might make a lot more money than South American cops, but they could be bribed, too. Maybe my Mr. Allison hadn’t been so stupid after all. He managed to find a hiding place where he didn’t have to speak Spanish.

I admitted to myself that it was highly unlikely that Officer Mercer was on the take. He looked like the sort of officer who would rather die than break the rules. Still, if you’re going to be a detective, you have to consider all the possibilities. Of course, what happened next was a possibility I would never have considered.

I got out of the car still thinking about what to do next when I heard him. I had let down my guard, and before I knew what was happening, it was too late. His foot scuffed on the blacktop of the parking lot, but as I turned around to confront him, I was stopped by the feel of a gun placed in my back.

“Well, well, this is gonna be easier than I thought,” a gravelly voice muttered softly. I recognized it in an instant. It was Little Georgie Monello, top hit man for the Capella family. I was in big trouble. It was times like this that I wished I still carried a gun.

“Still not packing, huh?” Georgie asked me, almost as if he were reading my thoughts as he did a perfunctory pat down.

“Never needed one before,” I muttered, still facing away from him with my hands up. “How you been, Georgie?”

“Better than you,” he remarked. “Now get back in your car, and make it slow. I’ll be right behind you.”

I know in the movies, the baddie always slides into the seat next to his victim. Why? I guess it makes a better camera shot. Georgie wasn’t posing for any pictures. He knew how to do his job. If he stayed behind me, I’d never know if he wasn’t alert. He could blow me away in a heartbeat.

“Where to?” I asked.

“Someplace quiet,” he answered. “Head south—out of town.”

Ever since I had taken out Louie Capella, I had known I would be on the Capella hit list. It didn’t matter, though. I didn’t have much to live for. But I hadn’t expected this. Augie Capella had taken over when Louie bought it. He was Louie’s cousin, not his brother, so his blood didn’t run as hot when it came to revenge. Some folks said he was just cautious; other said he was a coward. Whatever the reason, his guys had stayed away from me.

But that was in Chicago, I realized mentally kicking myself. Sure, it made sense now, I thought as the town of Ovid disappeared in the darkness behind us. In Chicago, I still had friends on the force. If Augie wasted me there, they’d be all over him like stink on shit. Not so in Oklahoma. And I doubted if the local authorities in Ovid had had much experience dealing with organized crime. I’d be just one more unsolved murder, and by the time the Chicago authorities looked into the case—if they bothered to do so—the trail would be cold and any evidence compromised.

“How did you find me, Georgie?” I asked as calmly as I could. I didn’t expect to live through the evening, but I didn’t want to go to my grave without a few answers.

“Somebody ratted on you,” he laughed. It wasn’t a pleasant laugh.

“We’ve been waiting for this chance. That’s the thing about Augie. He’s real patient. He’s not like Louie.”

“No,” I agreed, unable to resist the barb. “That’s because Louie’s dead.”

“You can give him my regards in a few minutes,” Georgie growled.

That was no surprise. I didn’t think he was taking me out to the country for a little moonlight stroll. No, Georgie was here to finish what Louie had started. I was a dead man.

“This’ll do,” Georgie said when we had driven down to the edge of a river along a deserted farm road. “Stop and get out—slowly.”

If there had been a chance, I would have taken it. Georgie was a pro, though. God only knew how many guys he had taken out, but he had always been smart enough to cover his tracks.

“Turn around,” he ordered. I did. He was a good fifteen feet from me, an ugly silenced pistol in his gloved hand. Like I said, Georgie was a pro.

“Throw me a bone,” I said, stalling for time. “Who ratted me out?”

Georgie just grinned. “That’s not my department. Besides, I wouldn’t tell you if I knew. So long, Riley.”

He was going to pull the trigger, I realized with a sinking feeling. Well, as I said, he was a pro. There was no way he was going to prolong this. This was just a job. I wasn’t a human being; I was an assignment. I braced myself for the inevitable pain. Knowing Georgie, he’d shoot wherever it hurt the most.

“Freeze!” a somehow familiar voice boomed from a short distance away.

Georgie didn’t freeze. He turned quicker than I could have ever imagined, ready to fire at the voice. As I said, Georgie was a pro. But Georgie wasn’t fast enough. I caught the muzzle flash of a weapon in the darkness. Georgie screamed as his gun went flying from his hand. There was no blood. The stranger had shot the gun right out of his hand, hitting only the weapon.

I know, that happens in the movies all the time. In real life, though, shooting a gun out of someone's hand is just about the most difficult—and stupidest—thing I could ever imagine doing. Every rookie officer is told to shoot for the money. Go for the torso. It's the biggest target. A shot anywhere will at least slow the assailant down, so go for the biggest target. Even if you did manage to shoot the gun out of someone's hand, doing it cleanly, hitting only the gun, would take superhuman skill—or blind luck. For some reason, I was betting on skill. Why? Because the shooter fired only once, as if he knew exactly where the shot was going to go.

Georgie was alternately cursing and crying, rubbing his stinging hand with his good one. He made no move to pick his weapon up from the ground. I think he realized that the only way that shot had been lucky was because his assailant hadn't nailed him right between the eyes—which he richly deserved.

I wasn't surprised to see Officer Mercer walking toward us. What I was surprised to see was that his cruiser was only a hundred feet or so down the road behind us. I hadn't even hear him drive up. Had he followed us, his lights off? I didn't think so. I had looked back in the mirror a number of times, and the white cruiser would have been visible behind us even on a moonless night like that night. He had to be sitting there, waiting. Didn't he?

"Are you all right?" he asked me in his calm voice.

I nodded. "Thanks to you. Where did you pick us up? I didn't even see you behind us."

He didn't bother to answer me, but I wasn't offended. He had his eyes on Georgie. With his gun, he motioned Georgie to the caged back seat of his cruiser. "Follow me in," he told me.

The drive back into Ovid was much more pleasant than the drive out. And it gave me time to think. I had been ratted out by somebody, but who? Well, it had to be either my firm or their client. No one else knew where I was. But why would my client rat me out? Or why would my firm do it?

Maybe the whole thing had been a setup. Maybe Augie Capella was Ridgeway's mysterious client. That would make sense. It would mean there was no missing thirty million dollars. It would mean it was all just a ruse to get me out of town. But no, that didn't sound right. Ridgeway was clever enough to think of that, but he had a reputation of being clean. I couldn't see him dirtying his hands to set up an ambush for an ex-cop. Besides, he had no known connections to the Capellas, or any other organized crime figures for that matter. And frankly, Augie wasn't smart enough to come up with a plot like that. None of his lieutenants were bright enough to think of it either. My late mother's vegetable garden had a higher IQ than Augie's entire gang.

So maybe it was somebody in my own firm, I thought grimly. Maybe there was a secretary who owed a lot of money. Selling me out might be their ticket to solvency. But no, I doubted that. Mac was too careful in his hiring practices. And most of his people had been with him for years. He paid them well and they gave him loyalty in return.

Maybe Officer Mercer could get Georgie to tell him more than he'd told me. But I doubted it. If Georgie had known who had sold me out, he would have told me. After all, he had a gun trained on me. Georgie would have found it fitting to tell me who had betrayed me just before he pulled the trigger. Talk about adding insult to injury.

To my surprise, Georgie was a good boy when he got out of the car at City Hall. He seemed almost in a trance as he shuffled ahead of Officer Mercer. No one was on duty in the police station that occupied a small wing of the City Hall building. As Officer Mercer locked the cell door, I asked him, "Do you mind if I ask him a few questions?"

He shook his head. "Not now. I had to sedate him. He'll be asleep in a minute."

"Oh," I said, not bothering to hide my disappointment. "Did he say anything in the car?"

Officer Mercer just shrugged. "Nothing important. The Judge will see him in court at nine tomorrow. You need to be there, too."

I smiled. "I wouldn't miss it for the world." Then I put out my hand to him. As he shook it, I said, "Thanks again. You saved my life."

"Yes," he replied. It's difficult to be ironic with just one word, but somehow he managed. I got the odd feeling that there was something he wasn't telling me. Well, it would have to wait for morning.

I wanted to be done with Georgie as quickly as possible. Then I could get back to my assignment. By tomorrow afternoon, word of this would be all over town. If Allison put two and two together, he'd be out of town before I could find him. But in spite of that, I wanted to be in that courtroom. There was nothing I wanted more than to see Little Georgie go down.

I had packed one sport coat and tie just in case I had to appear in court somewhere on the trip. It happens to private investigators with some regularity. So it was a well-groomed Jeff Riley who stepped into the Ovid courtroom at a quarter until nine the next morning. No trial was in session, and the only two people in the room were two very attractive young women. One was blonde and the other brunette. Both wore conservative outfits—women's suits with silky blouses. The blonde wore dark blue and the brunette a pinstriped gray, but neither outfit did anything to detract from their looks.

The brunette turned to face me. "Hi," she said to me with a slight smile as she extended a feminine hand. I took it. For a woman, she had a firm handshake. I liked that. "I'm Susan Jager. I'll be your attorney today, Mr. Riley."

"My attorney?" I repeated stupidly. "I wasn't aware I needed an attorney."

"Oh!" she replied carefully. "It seems Officer Mercer charged you with disturbing the peace last night. Don't worry, it's just a minor charge. I'm sure we can clear it up in no time."

"I thought I was to be here for Little Georgie's arraignment."

She looked puzzled. "Little Georgie? Oh, you mean Mr. Monello. You're correct. The Judge will see him first. Just have a seat with me at the defense table. The Judge will be here any minute and he doesn't like people moving around in the room once court has begun."

The blonde had already wordlessly taken a seat in the visitor's gallery. As instructed, I plopped down next to Susan just in time to see Officer Mercer enter the room and intone, "All rise."

As we rose, I saw Little Georgie enter the room and stand before the bench. He seemed to still be in a trance as he shuffled toward the bench without so much as a single guard. When he was in place and we were on our feet, Officer Mercer continued, "The Municipal Court of the City of Ovid, Oklahoma, is now in session, the Honorable Judge presiding."

That was different, I thought. Back home, he would have announced the name of the judge instead of just the title. There was no nameplate on the bench either. It seemed I was about to appear before a nameless magistrate.

The Judge was reasonably impressive in his crisp black robe. If there were recruiting posters for judges, this one could be on one, I thought. He looked to be middle-aged with just a touch of gray in his neatly-trimmed brown hair and beard. He was fit although not thin, and his gold-rimmed glasses did nothing to soften a pair of steel blue eyes that seemed to miss nothing in the room. "You may be seated," he ordered in a voice obviously used to the responsibilities of command.

Suddenly, Little Georgie seemed to come out of his trance. He looked around suspiciously, muttering, "What the fuck?"

"Mr. Monello!" the Judge boomed, causing the little man to jump. "I will not tolerate such language in my courtroom. Is that understood?"

This wasn't the first time Georgie had appeared before a judge. He knew the drill. It didn't do any good to be defiant. If you looked abject enough, a judge might cut you a little slack. Georgie looked down respectfully and replied, "Yes, Your Honor." He continued to look furtively about the room, though, as if unsure how he had managed to wind up in a courtroom.

“George Monello,” the Judge began, “you have been charged with illegal possession of a firearm, kidnapping, attempted murder, and resisting arrest in our jurisdiction. How do you plead?”

“Uh... Your Honor, this is all a misunderstanding,” Georgie began nervously. “And is that dame over there my lawyer? I need a lawyer before I plead.”

“That is Mr. Riley’s attorney,” the Judge explained patiently. “You are not entitled to defense counsel.”

Georgie’s mouth dropped open. “Not entitled? What kind of a court is this anyway?”

“It is the Municipal Court of the City of Ovid,” the Judge replied, making it sound as if he had just announced that it was the Supreme Court of the United States. “I think you will find it is a fair court, quite unlike the ones you have been in before. Here, the rights and concerns of the victims take precedence. It is unlikely that the fourteen murders you have committed for your employers would have been dealt with so lightly here.”

Georgie’s face became the color of ash. “I... I’ve never been convicted of anything. I was only up on three murder raps and beat ’em all.”

“Yes,” the Judge agreed, “but there were others as well. What about the murders of Mr. Riley’s wife and little daughter?”

Now it was my turn to have my mouth fall open in stunned silence. I had never suspected that it was Georgie who had killed them. When I caught up with Louie Capella, he told me it was Ozzie who did it. And Ozzie had been shot by a rival gang just a week before I found Louie. That son of a bitch! He had lied to me, just to get one last laugh at me before...

“No, Mr. Monello, you will find that justice in Ovid is both swift and appropriate. Since you like death so much, you will be forever associated with it. You are guilty of more than most men could ever imagine, and for your crimes, you will pay now.” He began to chant in something that sounded almost like the Latin I remembered hearing when some of the priests still used it liberally, but it wasn't their form of Latin. This was a rich, almost musical tongue, and there was power in the words.

"No... I..." Georgie managed to say before his voice was replaced by a raspy cry. It was as if he had suddenly forgotten how to speak. His eyes were wide and frightened, and his entire body seemed to be shifting.

I looked in helpless fascination as Georgie's form began to shimmer and finally change. He was becoming smaller, and his skin was becoming darker until it was as black as coal. His clothing simply ceased to exist as his arms began to flap aimlessly, suddenly expanding and covered with a coating of feathers. His unintelligible screams of shock and rage became a shrill "caw" as his head became smaller and his lips pushed forward into a dull, dark beak. What had been a man only moments before was now a large and very frightened crow.

Without a word, Officer Mercer stepped over to the new bird, clutching him carefully and carrying him out of the courtroom.

I looked around at my attorney. She seemed unperturbed by what had just happened, concentrating instead on a thin file in front of her. The blonde in the visitor's gallery also seemed unconcerned, as if this sort of thing happened every day. I couldn't deny that justice had been served. Little Georgie was bad news. If anything, the Judge had let him off lightly. Being a bird was more than he deserved. I hoped he was road kill before the end of the day.

The Judge seemed to be reading my mind. "You think Mr. Monello deserved worse?"

"He's still alive," I replied, rising to face the Judge. "That's more than can be said for his victims." Including my family.

"Yes," the Judge agreed, "but his life will be unpleasant and short. He remembers who and what he was. Now, though, he is just a crow—an eater of carrion no less. He is not a particularly large one at that. His unfamiliarity with his new existence will probably assure him a very short life and a particularly nasty end. Crows have many predators, you know.”

I imagined he was right about that.

“Now, Mr. Riley, since you have been good enough to stand before the bench, it is your turn.”

“Your Honor,” I began uncomfortably, “I’m not aware of any crime I have committed here. I had Officer Mercer’s permission to conduct my investigation in Ovid.”

Was I frightened? Of course I was. I had just watched a man change into a bird. What was my fate to be? I was standing before a... being (for I was certain he was not really a man) with powers I had never imagined existed. People weren’t changed into crows in the real world, and the real world was all I knew.

“Yes, you did have permission,” he agreed. “But did you have permission to commit murder?”

“Murder?”

“Do you deny that you have murdered men?”

I gulped uncomfortably as I vainly tried to gather my wits. It was my attorney who jumped to my rescue. “Your Honor,” she pleaded, “may I have a moment with my client?”

The Judge nodded without comment. Susan Jager motioned me to the defense table and leaned over to me as I sat down. “Mr. Riley, the answers you give now will determine your fate forever.”

“You mean he might change me into a bird, too?” I ventured nervously.

She nodded. “Or worse. Look, I’ve represented many people before many courts. You seem to be a decent man. Most judges will give you points for being honest. The Judge here is no exception. Tell the truth. Odds are he knows it anyhow. Now, did you kill anyone?”

“Yes,” I said with a sigh, “but I was exonerated by a police review board. They ruled it was self-defense.”

Her pretty blue eyes seemed to bore all the way to my soul as she asked, "Was it self-defense?"

After a moment's reflection, I replied, "No."

She closed her eyes and sighed. "Just tell the truth, Mr. Riley. There may be a chance for you if you do."

"Are you ready to continue?" the Judge asked impatiently.

"Yes, Your Honor," she said, motioning for me to stand once more before the Judge.

"Well, Mr. Riley," the Judge said, "are you ready to answer the question? Have you murdered men?"

"Yes," I admitted, my voice shaking.

"Your Honor," my attorney chimed in, "perhaps we should see the circumstances of these 'murders'."

The Judge was thoughtful. "That might be in order. I, too, am curious as to the circumstances. Let us proceed."

I felt no movement, but suddenly the world had changed. I was no longer in a courtroom. Instead, I was standing near the edge of a lake in a flat, open area surrounded by trees. I looked down at myself. I was wearing a light flannel shirt against the growing chill of the spring air, and jeans. I was dressed the same way I had been dressed the day... Oh no!

"Boat all ready?" a musical, feminine voice asked.

I turned. It was Mary. Oh God, it was Mary! I wanted to cry and enfold her in my arms and tell her how much I had missed her, but I couldn't. I was reliving that terrible day and there was nothing I could do differently. I realized that when I said, "Yeah, I think so. Watch it while I back the car down."

"No, I'll get it," she offered.

As she turned and headed toward our aging Pontiac, I could see Trish already in the back seat. "Hi, Daddy!" she called, the happy smile of a six-year-old on her face as she pushed her bright blonde hair back. I wanted more desperately than anything else in the world to scream at her to get out of that car. I wanted to reach out and grab Mary before she opened the car door. But I couldn't. I was nothing more than an observer in my own body.

"Hi, Pumpkin!" I called back happily, but knowing in my trapped mind that these would be the last words she ever heard me say to her.

I know in reality that what happened next took only a few seconds—a minute at the most. I watched in silent horror as Mary strode purposefully to the car stepped in, closed the door, and started the engine. One second, she was there, ready to back the car down to hitch the boat trailer up. The next second, the world exploded into a ball of flame as my ears hurt, both from the sound of the explosion and the intensity of my scream.

Thankfully, that world melted away. The light of day was exchanged for the dim artificial light of a rundown warehouse. Shark Petrillo, bodyguard to Louie Capella lay motionless in a pool of his own blood. His boss, Louie himself stood quaking only a few feet away.

"Time to pay, Louie," I said quietly, my Police Special lined up right between his eyes.

"You... you're not going to shoot me in cold blood, are you?"

"Like you killed my family?"

"I told you, it was a mistake," Louie whined. "You were supposed to be driving. You always backed the car up yourself. It was Ozzie's fault. Your family wasn't supposed to get hurt."

"Well, they did," I growled. "They got hurt real bad. They got hurt all the way dead. I'm gonna give you more of a chance than you gave them." My eyes dropped to Shark's gun, lying practically at Louie's feet where Shark had dropped it when I nailed him.

Louie's eyes were wide. "You can't be serious. I could never get to it before you shot me."

"Do it or I'll shoot you where you stand," I said resolutely.

It took him a few seconds to work up the courage, but Louie complied. He knew from the look in my eyes that I meant every word I had said. He dropped for the gun. I even let him get his hands on it. I wanted it to look like self-defense. I didn't plan to be off the force and have what little life I had left ruined by a murder rap. The second he gripped the gun, I emptied the rest of my clip in him. I watched in grim satisfaction as he shook with each impact. My thoughts were on Mary and Trish when his body finally stopped moving...

There was silence. I looked up into the stern face of the Judge. How had he done that? It was as if I had been hurled back in time to repeat the worst moments of my life, and now I was to pay for my indulgences.

"And did you continue your career as a police officer?" the Judge asked me, not without sympathy.

I shook my head. "No, not for very long anyway. After the Review Board, I resigned."

"Why?"

I was silent for a moment; then replied, "I swore to uphold the law. I began to realize that I had broken that oath."

"But when you killed Mr. Capella, you were killing a murderer," the Judge reasoned. "Surely you realized that."

"I did," I admitted, "but let's just say it wasn't my style. I found a part of myself I never wanted to see again. I was afraid if I took the law into my own hands once, I might do it again. That's why I no longer even carry a gun."

"An interesting story, Mr. Riley. However, this crime is not what you are charged with today," the Judge explained. He turned to Officer Mercer. "What is Mr. Riley charged with today?"

"Disturbing the peace," Officer Mercer replied.

If I hadn't been so frightened, I would have laughed. Disturbing the peace? Was that all he could come up with? I didn't laugh, though. Whatever charge he would have come up with would have been merely an excuse for whatever they intended to do with me. I wondered how road kill tasted. Georgie already knew by now, and it seemed my turn was coming.

“Your Honor,” Susan said, coming to her feet, “I would suggest that given the circumstances, the charges against my client be dropped and he be set free—with of course his memories of these proceedings erased.”

The Judge studied me carefully for a moment. I could feel his eyes staring at me. It was as if they were penetrating to the center of my very being. Who was this Judge? Who could have such powers?

“You’ve been charged with disturbing the peace,” the Judge intoned, trying to make the charge sound significant as he broke the silence. “I find you guilty.”

I braced myself. The Judge was muttering in Latin again. Whatever he had planned for me was about to happen. There was a tingling sensation that seemed to go through my entire body. With effort, I looked down at myself. I was becoming smaller and the skin on my hands was becoming darker. I waited in fear for my arms to become wings and for feathers to sprout from my skin, but it didn’t happen. Instead, my skin changed to a dark brown, and my hands were smaller and my fingernails were suddenly long and painted a dark red. I felt something tickling my neck and used my changed fingers to reach back and pull forward a strand of long, soft hair the color of night.

I gasped as two mounds pushed forward from my chest and the weight between my legs was suddenly replaced by an unnatural emptiness. I could feel my entire body rearranging itself. The process was not painful or even unpleasant, but it was strange and unsettling. Even my clothes were not immune to the change. I felt my ankles suddenly moved about, as if my heels were now higher than my toes. A look down told me that I now wore women’s pumps, brown with about a two-inch heel. They were plainly visible now since my pants had altered to form a short tan skirt. Where the skirt ended, long dark brown legs encased in nylon were visible. My sport coat was still a coat, but it was tan like my skirt and feminine in cut. My tie was gone, changed into something that felt like a necklace over a white silky blouse.

“Oh god!” I nearly screamed, surprised to hear a voice that was husky but obviously feminine.

“Ms. Patton,” the Judge said, gesturing to the blonde in the gallery, “would you please show Ms. Hazleton to her new office?”

I was shaking when the blonde gently took my arm. “Come with me,” she urged, barely above a whisper. “I’ll explain what I can in a few minutes.”

I followed her nervously, unsure of how to walk in the heels. Ms. Patton seemed to understand the problem and walked slowly, waiting for me at the entrance to the courtroom.

No! This couldn’t happen. I had to regain my true body. I turned quickly to face the Judge again, but to my surprise, he was gone. The courtroom was now empty, except for my attorney. “Susan, I...” I began, really hearing for the first time my new voice. It was a little husky with a soft southern accent. It was the voice of a black woman.

Susan gave me a thin smile. “Go on with Cindy. We’ll talk later.”

There seemed to be no other course of action to take. I turned back to my guide and didn’t resist as she gently took me by the arm. She did it not only to guide me in the right direction but to steady me in my new heels as well.

I felt as if I was walking in a dream—a nightmare, really. I was a woman. I could feel the sway of my hips with each step, the jiggle of my breasts, and the bouncing of my longer hair. And it felt as if I was walking on tiptoe, carefully placing each step almost in front of the other due to the natural motion in my hips. The air was cool on my exposed legs. How could this possibly be happening?

There was another factor as well, I thought as we walked down the corridor. I was black. Now, I’ve never considered myself to be prejudiced. I mean, working with the Chicago Police, some of the finest officers I knew were black. I had had black supervisors and black partners and I knew them to be police officers first and whatever else they were second. But like most whites on the force, I had associated on my own time mostly with other whites. Mary and I had lived in a mostly white neighborhood, and all of our good friends were white.

Now, I was not only a woman, but I was a black woman. I didn't know how to be black or how to be a woman. My only chance was to get changed back into myself, but even at this early point in my transformation, I suspected that the chances of getting that done were slim at best. Whatever power had done this to me hadn't done it just to change me back again whenever I chose.

"It's difficult at first," my guide—Susan had called her Cindy—told me, almost as if she had read my mind. "But you'll get used to it."

"I don't want to get used to it," I mumbled as I watched city employees rushing to and fro down the halls on various errands. Some, like Cindy and me, were real. Others—most really—had that faint transparent appearance.

"Take my advice," Cindy said quietly as she led me into an unoccupied office, "just try to be who you've become. You'll find it's not bad at all. And this is who you'll be for the rest of your life."

She was pointing to a brass nameplate on a large secretarial desk. The name on the nameplate was 'Wanda Hazleton.'

"Wanda?"

"Yes," Cindy told me. "You're now Wanda Hazleton. Look, you're lucky. Most people wander around for hours after their transformation just trying to find out who they are and where they're supposed to go. You're getting the royal treatment."

"Most people?" I asked. "Are there others like me?"

Cindy laughed, "Honey, we're all like you. Everyone you see in Ovid—except the shades of course—used to be someone else. That's how Ovid works. You're the administrative assistant for Mr. Hanes, the City Manager. That's why the Judge wanted me to bring you down here myself. Mr. Hanes is a little... difficult to work with. He's a very private person."

That surprised me. City managers were usually very public people. Their job demanded it. I was familiar with the City Manger form of government. Some of the Chicago suburbs used them. It was a form of government very popular in smaller cities and towns where the mayor and council held part time positions and weren't really professionals when it came to administering a city. The city council would make the rules, but the city manager would advise them and then carry out the day-to-day operation of the town.

"Now, just stay here at your desk," Cindy instructed me. "Mr. Hanes will be out to see you when he's ready. Never disturb him when his door is closed like now. Use the time to get used to who you are. And don't worry about having to pee. You'll know how to do it when the time comes. All you have to do is relax and let your mind go. You'll find your body knows what to do. I'm down in the court wing if you need anything. My phone extension is on your Rolodex there. If you're free, I'll take you to lunch in a couple of hours."

And then I was alone. I was Wanda Hazleton whoever that was. Even with Cindy's help, I didn't really know who I was or where I lived. I sat down at the desk. Come to think of it, most women I knew kept a purse hidden in a desk drawer. Yes, there it was, down in a large bottom drawer. It was brown and matched my shoes and it looked big enough to live out of for a week.

I pulled it up on the desk, catching the strap on one of the fingers of my left hand. I looked to see what it had caught on and gasped. It was a wedding ring! Of course, it wasn't the kind of ring I had worn when I was married to Mary. Instead of a large gold band, this ring was small and delicate, but a large diamond rose up from the band, catching on the strap of the purse. Oh dear god, no! Wasn't it bad enough that I had become a different race and a different sex? I had to be married, too?

I dived quickly into the purse. I had to know more about this Wanda person I had suddenly become. After digging through a pile of cosmetics whose purpose I didn't really want to know, I found a brown wallet. I flipped it open, struggling to find a driver's license. There it was, the picture of my new face imprinted on it. Or at least, I assumed it was my picture. I hadn't seen my face yet. I groaned when I saw the face. It was not particularly attractive, featuring a wide, prominent nose and thick lips. I looked fat. I looked down at myself. My new breasts were certainly large, but I didn't appear fat.

Then I found another picture. It was a city ID, but the picture was much better. With a sigh of relief, I realized that driver's license pictures in Oklahoma were as poor as the ones in Illinois. My ID picture showed a better view of my new face. I was smiling, and my lips were certainly larger than they had been when I was a man, but they weren't unattractively large. My nose was still a little wide, but not terribly so. The picture that I was now looking at was of an attractive young black woman, no more than thirty. I checked the age on the driver's license. Sure enough—twenty-eight. So I had lost a few years, but only a few.

There was a picture in the wallet as well. There were three people in the photo, and I realized with trepidation that this was my family. I looked young and attractive in the picture, and the black man standing next to me looked intelligent and... handsome. There was a little girl in the photo as well. She was about six, it appeared, with dark skin like both of her parents and a radiant smile. Her hair was in long, black pigtails, the color of carved ebony.

I jumped suddenly as the door to Mr. Hanes' office opened without anyone there. "Come in," a deep voice said from within.

I quickly stuffed the evidence of my new identity back in the purse and jumped to my feet, nearly stumbling from lack of experience in heels. I saw the name on the door: 'P. Hanes.' I wondered what the 'P' stood for.

"Shut the door behind you," the voice said. I was peering into an office which was intentionally dark. Oh, there was some light coming in through the closed blinds, but it did little to offset the effect of dark wood panels and a deep red carpet. A large desk was lit by a single lamp which threw minimal light over its surface. Even the chairs were dark, covered as they were with a deep red leather which seemed to reflect little light. When I shut the door, the room became even darker.

“Sit.”

It was a command. Quickly, and I hoped properly for a woman, I sat. I peered at the man sitting behind the desk. The dim light over the desk did nothing to reveal the appearance of the man. He was tall—that much I could tell. But beyond that, he was nothing but an ominous shape in the shadows.

“You are new here,” he began. “I would prefer a shade for an assistant, but my brother has decided otherwise. At least he has allowed me to dispense with the ruse and tell you who we really are. There is no other way for you to do this job properly.”

I had no idea what he was talking about. A shade? Cindy had said something about shades, too. And what about his brother? It had to be the Judge. As for the ruse, I had already come to the conclusion that Ovid wasn’t what it seemed to be. I sat quietly, though. If I was to learn, it would come from listening.

“Ovid is the creation of what you would call the mythological gods of ancient Greece and Rome.”

“You’re joking,” I commented, my new tongue operating at a rate far faster than my brain.

He leaned forward, his appearance suddenly revealed. I saw before me a large but very thin man, dressed in a dark suit that looked to be well tailored and expensive. His shirt was a crisp white, accented by a tie the color of dark blood. It was cut from fine silk. But it was the face that I was drawn to. Thin, framed by hair as dark as my own, his face was as white as mine was black. A patrician nose sat over thin, pale lips. But the eyes... I remembered when I had met Ridgeway how I had thought his eyes were the darkest I had ever seen. That was no longer the case. Mr. Hanes’ eyes were blacker still. It was as if no light could escape them, mini-black holes embedded in that lean face.

“I never joke, Ms. Hazleton,” he told me, his voice soft but menacing, and I believed him at once. I suddenly realized it might be absolutely dangerous not to believe him.

When I bit my tongue to stifle any reply, he leaned back into the darkness. “As I was saying, my associates and I are what you would call gods. We have formed this town for reasons which do not concern you. You must accept that as you must accept your new identity. You are now and will be for the remainder of your life Wanda Hazleton.”

He stopped as if waiting for me to speak. Hesitantly, I asked, “But why did you change me into... into this?”

“I did not,” he replied. “My brother, the Judge, did. He has his own reasons—his own work—and I have mine. If you would know why you are the person you have become, you must ask him. I am your supervisor. What I can tell you is what I expect of you.”

He went on to explain that I was to be his interface with the mayor and the council. He would give them instructions and they would carry them out. It seemed the reverse of the municipal political systems I had known, but it made it obvious who was in charge. I would, in turn, report back to him. I wouldn’t need to see him. In fact, he warned me I might not see him for days or even weeks at a time. My computer would be used to file reports which he would see on his own system, whatever and wherever that might be.

“Are there any questions?” he asked with a faint attempt at civility.

“I’m not to disturb you at any time,” I ventured.

“That is correct.”

“But what if I need you for something important?”

“Then I will know,” he said cryptically. Then he stood, indicating that our interview was over.

I returned to my desk somewhat shaken. Gods? They were gods? That meant the Judge, Officer Mercer and Mr. Hanes were all... gods? I remembered reading a little mythology as a kid. Then there was a movie I saw on TV one night called Clash of the Titans. I thought the gods all wore togas and sat around on a mountaintop somewhere. I could only remember a few of them. I would have to get a book on mythology to know who the players were. After all, Greek and Roman gods weren't discussed back when I was at the Police Academy.

True to her word, Cindy came by for lunch. It was a relief from the boredom. I had found very little of interest in the files and nothing other than a few basic office memos on my computer. Apparently being the administrative assistant to Mr. Hanes wasn't a terribly demanding job.

"So how are you doing?" she asked as she entered.

"Oh, just great," I said dryly. "I've already squatted to pee, practically fallen off these stupid heels twice, bent but didn't break a nail, took fifteen minutes to try to brush my hair right, and had a short chat with my charming boss."

Cindy looked up at the closed door leading to Mr. Hanes' office. "He doesn't socialize much," she admitted, understating the obvious. "As far as all the other things are concerned, don't worry. You'll get used to them. We all do."

I looked at her with curiosity. "Are you saying you used to be a man?"

She grinned. "That's right. Look at me now though—happily married, mother of two and pregnant again."

If my ass hadn't been wider than before, I think I would have fallen out of my chair. "Married? Pre... pregnant?"

She sat down across from my desk. "That's right. I know it doesn't show yet, but I'm just a few weeks into it. It's an interesting experience. It's really my first time. My other two kids are like us. They used to be men, too."

"Are they... girls now?" I asked, fascinated with how easily she had accepted what had been done to her.

"One is," she said brightly, pulling a photo out of her purse. "They're twins."

I peered at the picture. It showed a happy family—a handsome white man, Cindy, and two adorab... cute kids. They were about twelve or so I estimated, blonde like their mother. They were dressed in swimsuits, and all of them looked very happy.

“This shot was taken at Sunset Beach last month,” she explained. “That’s a nice lake not far from here. You’ll find out all about that, I’m sure. And the guy is my husband, Jerry.”

I looked down at the diamond ring on my own left hand. “Uh... Cindy, what’s it like to be... married?”

Her maternal smile became a wicked grin. “You’ll find out about that, too. Just don’t fight it. Fighting it doesn’t do any good in Ovid. Learn to enjoy being Wanda. I don’t know of too many people who don’t find that their new lives are an improvement. Except, of course, for guys like your friend, the crow.”

“So this is the Judge’s idea of a reward?” I asked.

She shook her head. “No, it’s not really a reward. But it’s not a punishment either. Nobody really knows why the Judge does things the way he does them. I’ve seen men become women and women become men for no obvious reason.”

“Mr. Hanes said it was the work of... the work of...” I couldn’t quite say it, as hard as I tried. Every time I tried to say “gods” in context, it was as if I lost my ability to speak.

“He told you?” Cindy gasped.

“He said I needed to know—for my job. He didn’t tell me who they were, though.”

“Well, as you’ve just found out, that’s a subject we can’t really talk about,” she explained. “In fact, the conversation we’ve been having already can only be between two people. If someone else walked in the room, we’d have to stop any talk of transformation.”

“Why?”

She shrugged. “It’s just part of the rules. There are things we can’t talk about and things we just don't know. It would drive you crazy to try to figure them all out. Sometimes, they even change a little. After a while, you just learn to live your life and enjoy it. Our... benefactors don't usually interfere."

"Then what's the purpose of all of this?" I asked, becoming truly fascinated. My anxieties had almost been overcome by my curiosity.

She grinned at me. "Does there have to be a purpose? What was the purpose of your life before?"

She had me there. Without Mary and Trisha, there hadn't been a great deal of purpose to my life. I had no close family. My dad was gone and my mom was in a nursing home back in Illinois, barely alive. She couldn't even remember her own name. I had a couple of brothers in the Chicago area, but we had little in common and rarely saw each other. So basically, I worked to eat and ate to have enough strength to work. I didn't even fish much anymore.

When I failed to answer, Cindy looked a little concerned. I think she realized the question had struck a nerve. I let her off the hook by saying, "Maybe we'd better go to lunch. I don't know when Mr. Hanes will need me."

We walked together to a little place near City Hall. It was called the Greenhouse, and when we were seated in a booth in a quiet part of the restaurant, I sighed thankfully. "I didn't think I was going to make it," I said. "How do you walk in these things?"

Cindy laughed. "You'll..."

"I know," I interrupted with a little laugh of mine own. "I'll get used to them."

"Yes, you will," she agreed as the menus were delivered. "And don't worry. You did fine walking over here. It's not so much the heels as not being used to the balance of your body."

She was right about that. Men's bodies are compact. The only protrusions which might swing about are fairly small and don't interfere with balance. Women on the other hand have fairly large masses of flesh which change the way they walk. I had always wondered if women were putting on a little act as they swung their asses back and forth. I now knew it was more a function of pelvic shape and more fatty tissue on the rear. I must have presented an interesting view to male onlookers as I sashayed to lunch. There was something else I'd have to get used to—being ogled by men. On the way to the Greenhouse, I had noted several appreciative male stares.

I followed Cindy's lead and ordered a salad and iced tea. It didn't seem like much of a meal, but I knew my stomach was much smaller and it was satisfying. Besides, if I was stuck in this body for the rest of my life, I didn't want to end up looking like Aunt Jemima.

The conversation was light. Any eavesdropper would have not heard anything except two women who worked in the same building talking about the things all women talk about. Cindy explained that her job was much like my own, working as an administrative assistant to the Judge. I suspected her boss was much more approachable than my own. Mr. Hanes had said something about the Judge being his brother. If so, there was little family resemblance.

I listened carefully as Cindy did most of the talking. I found she was subtly coaching me in how to be a woman. She would talk about cosmetics and how to use them, clothes, and general lifestyle in Ovid. I was actually grateful for her help. In a few hours, I would be on my own, living with a husband I had never met and trying to act like a normal wife. Well, as normal a wife as I could be without jumping into the sack with my hubby. Eventually, that might be unavoidable, but I had no interest in trying out my new equipment. Taking a piss had been a nearly traumatic experience.

Lunch out of the way, we headed back to the office. I found that if I didn't think about it, I could walk just fine. By the time I was alone back in my office, I had begun to feel I could do anything in heels short of running a footrace. My period of self-congratulation was short lived though, for the door to Mr. Hanes' office opened before I could even sit down.

"Come in, Ms. Hazleton." The voice didn't sound pleased.

“Where were you?” he demanded without preamble.

“At lunch,” I replied, trying to sound nonchalant. Secretly, I was quaking in my high heels.

“Lunch?”

I fought the impulse to make a flippant remark. “Yes. Cindy—Ms. Patton—took me to lunch.”

“I see,” he replied. I could tell he didn’t approve much of the Judge’s lenient lunch hour policies. In truth, we had been gone nearly an hour and a half. But fortunately, the subject appeared closed. He handed me some handwritten notes. “Here are the instructions for the Mayor. Type them and give them to him before you leave today.”

“Yes, sir.” I was a rotten typist, but I’d do what I could. As I left the office, hearing the door slam behind me, I looked at the notes. They were scrawled in some foreign language that looked a little like Latin. Oh great. What was I supposed to do, inscribe them on marble tablets?

Cindy had said something to me about letting myself go. Maybe that would work. I gave it a shot, it still wasn’t easy. I had to carefully look at each word, but I was relieved to find that I didn’t have to look at the keys on the keyboard after a few tries. My fingers seemed to know where the right keys were when I just stopped thinking about them and typed. I looked at the screen to check my work. To my surprise, the typed words looked nothing like I had seen on the paper. I felt crestfallen for a moment, concerned that I had screwed up everything. Then I looked again at the words:

MEMO TO: Mayor R. Gooding

FROM: P. Hanes

SUBJ: Projected Budget Changes

I gasped. I had typed nothing like that. But of course, the Mayor wouldn’t be able to read Latin unless he was one of the gods. I knew he was not as I had caught a glimpse of him earlier and saw him to be a shade. I continued to type, quickly and accurately. It was almost as if I had been doing it all my life, and yet Mary always used to tell me my typing looked as if I had been wearing mittens while I did it.

As I finished my typing, I thought about the job that had brought me to Ovid. This time yesterday, I was doing the job I had come to enjoy. I was Mike Hammer out on the streets of Manhattan, working on a case while a soft jazz band played in the background. Of course, everything was in black and white, but that was the way it was supposed to be. Now, here I was, a black woman. I couldn't think of any detectives who were black women. The closest I could come up with was Mannix's secretary on the old TV show I used to watch late at night.

Maybe I could still do the job, though. After all, I still remembered all the moves. I wondered if Mac would believe me if I called him and told him what had happened. Well, why not? What did I have to lose? I didn't expect him to believe me, but it was worth a shot. I picked up the phone and dialled Mac's office.

"Charles McKenzie and Associates," the receptionist, Jennifer, chirped professionally. "How may I direct your call?"

Now, Jennifer was pretty good at screening out unwanted calls. Obviously, she wouldn't recognize my voice. So I had to make something up. "I've been talking to one of your associates, Jeff Riley, and he recommended I call Mr. McKen..."

"I'm sorry, who did you say recommended us?" Jennifer broke in.

"Jeff Riley," I said, a little less confidently. What was wrong? Jennifer and I were good friends. She knew me—or rather Jeff—well.

"I'm sorry, ma'am, but there's no Jeff Riley here."

I didn't go on. Slowly, I put the receiver down. No Jeff Riley? It seemed they had not only changed me; they had erased all trace of my identity. What did that mean? Did they just cloud their minds and make them forget I had ever existed? Or had they really removed me from existence entirely? Just how powerful were these gods?

I picked up the phone again. This time, I'd call one of my brothers. It was one thing to erase my memory from someone like Jennifer, but what about my family? My brother, Mike would certainly remember me. I got through to him with no trouble. He sold insurance, so he'd always be available on the phone.

"I'm trying to run down an old high school friend," I lied. I had used the ploy while a detective many times. "His name is Jeff Riley, and I was told you might be his brother."

"I'm sorry," Mike's familiar voice drawled, "I've only got one brother, and his name isn't Jeff."

"Thanks anyway," I mumbled softly.

"My pleasure," he replied. "I hope you find him."

"I hope so, too," I said, hanging up. There was a tear in my eye as I realized it was probably the last time I would ever speak to Mike. What had happened? How could he forget his own brother?

Then, I realized that if Jeff Riley had never existed, then he had never been there to marry Mary O'Hara. That meant the mob would have had no reason to kill her. But of course, it also meant that Trisha would never have been born either. I felt sick. It was bad enough that my daughter had been needlessly murdered but it was quite another thing if I were to find she had never existed.

Forgetting my nails were now longer, I nearly broke one punching in a number I hadn't used in a long time.

"O'Hara residence," Mary's mother answered in her sweet high voice.

It was time for the lie again. "Mrs. O'Hara, my name is... Wanda—Wanda Hazleton. I think I may have gone to school with your daughter."

"You knew my Mary?" she asked. My heart sank. She didn't say "know"; she said "knew."

"Yes, I did," I managed. "I've lost touch with her. Is she still living there in Chicago?"

"Oh, Wanda," my former mother-in-law began sadly, "I'm sorry, but Mary's dead."

“Dead? Oh, no!”

“Yes,” she went on. I hated doing this to her. I could almost see the tears in her eyes. “She and her husband and their little daughter, Patty, were killed in a car accident. It’s been three years now...”

As her voice trailed off, I quickly said, “Mrs. O’Hara, I’m so sorry. I didn’t know. I’m sorry to bother you.”

“That’s all right, dear. Were you a good friend of hers?”

We talked for a few minutes more as I lied about memories of Mary. They were stories Mary had told me about high school. I had just added Wanda’s presence to them to give them a more plausible sound. When I hung up, I realized that Mary’s mother and I had had little to say to each other after Mary’s death. She had always blamed me in a way for her daughter’s death. I had blamed myself as well. But apparently some higher fate had decided she would die no matter what. It was a sobering thought.

I wondered about Mary’s family in this new reality. She had still had a daughter; while we had called Patricia just Trisha, Mary and her husband had called her Patty. The genes might have been different, but I was sure it was the same soul—or whatever the true spirit of a person was.

So reality had been rewritten. Apparently there was no thirty-five-year-old private detective named Jeff Riley, and so Mary O’Hara had married someone else, giving birth to a daughter. Then tragically, Mary and her daughter had still died, but this time, it was in a car accident, and not the result of an explosive device meant for me. That had been how Little Georgie had done it. He had wired an explosive to our car’s ignition, thinking I would be the one to back our car down to the landing to attach the boat trailer after fishing. Instead, it had been Mary and Trisha in the car that day. I had watched helplessly as the car exploded. One minute, Trisha had been there, waving happily from the car. Then, in the next instant, I had been thrown to the ground as several pounds of explosives reduced the car to charred remains after a devastating fireball.

Had reality really been rewritten, or was it only a memory that had been changed? Did their gravestones still say Riley on them? Did Mary's mother simply look at them and see another last name? I'd never know, I realized. But in a strange way, I felt better about it. I could accept that others remembered Mary and Trisha's deaths as a tragic accident rather than as a wanton murder I had been unable to stop.

It also meant that no one remembered the mission I had been sent to Oklahoma to accomplish. I didn't work for Mac and I never had. Ridgeway had never sent me off to find an embezzler. At least I had partially solved the mystery. I wondered what fate the embezzler had suffered before the Judge. Maybe he hadn't even come to Ovid after all.

But wait a minute, I suddenly thought. Ridgeway had said something about Allison not looking like the picture we had of him. Did he mean a disguise or did he mean the Judge had changed him? And if the Judge had changed him, why did anyone remember him? Peter Allison should have ceased to exist in the outside world, just as Jeff Riley had ceased to exist. So there were two possible answers. Either Peter Allison was not in Ovid or there was more going on than I realized. Given what had already happened to me that day, I was leaning toward the second answer.

"How you doing, babe?" The voice was low and pleasant, but it caused me to jump. I had been so engrossed in thought that I hadn't seen anyone come in. I looked up to see a black man who appeared to be about thirty. He wore a neat light blue polo shirt and dark blue trousers.

"Can I help you?" I said, still startled.

"You sure can," he laughed, assuming I was joking with him. Then he leaned over my desk and before I could stop him, he pulled my head around and planted a big kiss on my lips. I was too shocked to resist, and if I have to be completely honest, it wasn't an entirely unpleasant experience. It somehow felt right to my body which began to tingle softly as our lips met.

This is my husband! I realized at once. It was the man in the picture of my family. I had been too startled to recognize him. This was the man I would be expected to... to...

"Rough day, babe?" he asked as he pulled back from the kiss.

"You can't imagine," I muttered. My husband! What was I going to do now? It was one thing to go through the motions of being Wanda Hazleton at work. Other than learning how to pee sitting down and keeping my skirt modestly in place, it wasn't that different from a day in my office back in Chicago. Oh sure, I felt different and I looked different, but it was easy to lose myself in whatever I was doing and not think about what had happened to me. Now, though, I would be expected to be 'the little woman.' I'd probably be expected to cook a meal and pick up after this man whose name I didn't even know and be affectionate... Affectionate! Oh my god, what if he wanted me to go to bed with him?

"Are you okay?" he asked with touching concern. I felt his hand softly on my shoulder.

"I'm fine," I lied, trying in that moment to collect myself. He was a good-looking man, I thought, realizing for the first time that with my change in sex, I was able for the first time in my life to appreciate a man's looks. He was tall and broad-shouldered. I was a little surprised at how big he was. Then I realized that as Jeff I had been about the same size as he. It was just from my new perspective, he looked very large. No wonder women were intimidated by men. Here I was, in the company of a man who presumably loved me; yet I felt intimidated by his size. He was real and not a shade, and he looked very solid. I had no doubt that if he wished, I would be physically powerless around him.

"I'll tell you what. I'll do the cooking tonight, how's that?" He gave me a gentle smile to go with the offer. Then he offered his hand to me.

Reflexively, I took his hand and stood up. "That would be great." I wasn't much of a cook, so it would give me a little time to figure out how to boil water without creating a culinary disaster. Well, I really wasn't that bad, but I was sure Wanda's family had higher standards when it came to cooking than I had had as a man living alone. Then, before he released my hand, he pulled me to his body and the kissing started all over again.

I won't lie; it wasn't unpleasant. If I had been in my old body, I'm sure I would have been disgusted. Maybe I should have been anyway, but I wasn't. I was in a woman's body, and that body had urges which were outside the mental experience of Jeff Riley. Again, I took Cindy's advice and just let it happen. To my amazement, it actually felt good.

As we broke our kiss, the man smiled and said, "Come on, Carrie is probably driving Cindy crazy by now."

Carrie? Of course, the little girl in the picture in my purse.

My purse!

I barely remembered my purse, slipping the unfamiliar strap over my shoulder as I hurried to follow my new husband down the hall. In Cindy's office, I found a very attractive little girl of perhaps eight playing a card game on Cindy's computer as Cindy looked on in amusement. The little girl was that same coffee-color as me with straight black hair braided in long pigtails. She wore a feminine white T-shirt and jean shorts, and when she swung her slender legs, I could see white sandals flash by. She was not a shade; she was real. I wondered who she had been. Did she remember?

"Come on, Carrie, your mom's ready to go," my husband said.

"Oh, just one more game?" she wheedled, but she was already signing out of the game as if she knew what the answer would be.

"Not now," the man said. "Your mom's tired and you've got to help me make dinner."

I saw Cindy smile knowingly. Damn her; she was really enjoying this.

We walked out to a mid-sized Buick, fairly new, with Carrie telling me all about her day. I was confused at first, listening to stories about her day at day-care, but after a few minutes, it began to remind me of my conversations with Trisha and I soon found that I could follow along, contributing where it seemed right.

Home turned out to be a modest ranch-style house on a pleasant tree-lined street. It was a mixed neighborhood, I noticed with both black and white families in evidence. I was pleasantly surprised. Back in Chicago, there were few such neighborhoods. Oh, there were well-to-do black families living in predominantly white neighborhoods in Chicago, but the more modest neighborhoods seemed to be either black or white.

My husband suggested I get out of my working clothes and into something more casual. I was happy to comply. Needless to say, I had never worn pantyhose before, and wearing them all day, I found them to be hot and a little sticky. I had balanced well enough on heels, but my feet longed for something less precarious. And as for the skirt, I was so tired of being modest all day that I could scream.

I dressed in a fashion similar to my new daughter. I had thought that at least I wouldn't look so feminine in shorts and a T-shirt. Silly me. Although my breasts were by no means huge, they certainly stuck out under the T-shirt, and there was nothing masculine about the long, black legs that showed prominently out of the short shorts. And I sighed in resignation as I noticed my toenails were now the same dark red as my fingernails. Well, I might not look like a man again, but at least I was more comfortable.

As I entered the kitchen, a little voice said, "Here, mommy," as she placed a frosty glass of iced tea in my hands.

"Thank you, Carrie," I said with what I hoped was a motherly smile. She really was a cute little thing. And like her father, she was real. Neither my new husband nor my new daughter seemed to have any memories of a previous life. I almost envied them. Wanda Hazleton seemed to have a pleasant, middle-class life. It was one many would envy. If I had no memories of being male and white, I would... I would what? I would settle back and enjoy this life? Why couldn't I do that now? I thought as I sipped the tea. The answer was simple: this wasn't me. I had been sent to Ovid as Jeff Riley, private investigator, on an assignment. Inside this pretty black head, I was still Jeff Riley and hoped to always be him. I still had a job to do.

Of course, I realized my clients hadn't been entirely honest with me. Had they known about Ovid and what was likely to happen to me? Little things that Ridgeway had said made me believe that was the case. Ridgeway may have not known exactly what was going on, but I was sure his clients must. Why else would they have told Ridgeway to tell me that Peter Allison's appearance had likely been changed? But had they expected this to happen to me? But of course, if Little Georgie hadn't tried to kill me, none of this might have happened. The mysterious Judge and his associates might have just let me wander through Ovid and depart again. It was only after I was assaulted that they made their move.

I didn't get much time to think to myself. Dinner, in the form of delicious steaks perfectly grilled was soon served. Paul—for I had finally found his name in the wallet he had left on the dresser in our bedroom—had done an excellent job. Corn on the cob, also grilled, accompanied the steaks, and little Carrie brought a bowl of salad to the table.

It had been a long time since I had enjoyed a dinner as much as that one. Usually, dinner for Jeff Riley was a quick sandwich late in the evening on the way home from the office. Other than an occasional meal with one of my brothers' families, I usually ate alone. It was a bittersweet experience, though. I found myself sadly remembering the similar meals with Mary and Trisha. That had been real. They were my real family. This was nothing more than an elaborate play.

Having been a family man once before, the routine of family life was not all that alien to me. We cleaned up the kitchen after dinner and went for a walk in the late summer evening, stopping here and there to talk to neighbors, both black and white. It was a valuable activity for me, for I began to learn the names of the neighbors and a little about them. Most of them were nice, but I noticed one white couple—the Bronsons—were a little standoffish. They were both shades, and the two of them muttered stiff greetings as we passed. I noticed a white couple walking half a block behind us were given a more pleasant greeting.

Paul just shook his head. "Some people just can't seem to get it right."

"What?"

"The race thing," he explained. "I even see it over at the College some days. I mean, they don't burn crosses in our yard anymore, but they still haven't figured out we've all got to get along."

Sad but true, I thought. "But it isn't just whites," I pointed out. I wondered what he did at the College—or for that matter, what college he was talking about.

"No, you're right," he admitted. "There's blacks who can't bring themselves to trust whites. Some of our people are still fighting their own version of the Civil War just as furiously as a Southern redneck."

I remembered a number of examples from my previous life. I had seen blacks that wouldn't even talk to a white police officer. I had been accused of being prejudiced by more than a few blacks just because I had arrested them for committing a crime. Maybe we're all just a little prejudiced. But it was more a function of unfamiliarity than fear or hatred. Now I was black. I had just experienced my first racial slight and I had to admit that I didn't like it. A few more incidents like that and I'd probably find myself just a little prejudiced against whites myself. And it wouldn't be because I was afraid or because I hated them. It would be because I couldn't be sure how they would react to me.

We got home just at dark. Carrie scooted to her room to get ready for bed. Soon, I would be alone with Paul, I realized. Would he expect me to have sex with him? If he did, could I do it? I was nearly beside myself with worry. What was it like? Did it hurt? Kissing Paul hadn't been that bad. Would I find that making love to him wasn't that bad either? That thought was almost the most disturbing one of all.

"G'night, Mommy," Carrie announced suddenly from the hall. "It's Daddy's turn to tuck me in."

"Good night, Pumpkin," I said reflexively, nearly biting my tongue when I realized I had used the same name for her I had used for Trisha. As Paul jumped up to put her to bed, I hoped he hadn't noticed the sudden tears in my eyes.

He was back in a few minutes. Here it comes, I thought. Carrie's in bed; now it's time for Mommy and Daddy to play. But Mommy didn't feel like playing. I tried not to tense up when I felt Paul's arm around my shoulder. He leaned down and I could smell the musky smell of his after-shave. Then, there was a warm but gentle kiss and the arm slipped away as he rose back up. "I think I'll turn in early, too," he announced. "I've got a department meeting at seven in the morning. Can you take Carrie over to day-care?"

"Uh... sure," I answered, unsure as to how I would find her day-care center. I was also just a little disappointed if that makes any sense at all. As much as I dreaded making love to Paul, I had steeled myself up to it. It was almost like the first time I ever got up enough nerve to dive off a diving board. I couldn't have been any older than Carrie and I was just ready to dive in the water when a thunderclap caused the pool to be closed. I remember at the time that one moment I had been frightened half to death and the next moment I was disappointed and frustrated. But come to think of it, I had made a fine dive the next day and had enjoyed swimming ever since. Would sex be the same way?

Paul's departure for bed gave me some much-needed time alone. On a bookshelf, I found a copy of Bullfinch's Mythology and decided to spend the rest of the evening trying to figure out who the players were. It didn't take very long. The Judge was obviously in charge—Jupiter. Officer Mercer was almost certainly Mercury. But who was Hanes? That took a few more minutes, but the clues had all been there.

When I was a kid and spent a summer reading stories of mythology, I had been weaned on the children's version of the myths. For whatever reason, publishers apparently thought the full adult myths were either too complicated or too frightening for children. Very little is said of Jupiter's brothers, and Hanes had referred to the Judge as his brother. According to the book, Jupiter had two brothers who had worked with him to overthrow the Titans. After the conflict, Jupiter took dominion over the lands, Neptune the sea, and Pluto the underworld. But Pluto wasn't so much a name as a description. It meant rich. It was apparently a reference to his dominion over the riches buried under the earth. Pluto had another name—a name seldom spoken. That name was Hades. Hanes—Hades. Hades, the Lord of the Underworld.

I shuddered. I had been raised a staunch Catholic; yet here I was, administrative assistant to a being who had probably evolved into our own Christian devil. I read on, but there was little written of Hades. He was feared rather than worshipped. His name was seldom spoken and then only in a whisper. He was cruel, unyielding, and pitiless. Many people think they have the boss from Hell. I really did.

So what was I going to do? I thought as I put the book back on the shelf. I was stuck, it appeared. I had no option but to live the life of Wanda Hazleton. Yet I wasn't ready to give in to that option yet. I had to sort some things out first.

So with that, I headed off for bed. Paul was already snoring away, and I realized that although I had avoided having sex, I would still be sleeping uncomfortably close to him. I left a light on in the bathroom and searched through the dresser in the dim light for something to wear to bed—hopefully something that revealed none of my new feminine charms. No such luck, though. Apparently, Wanda only bought sexy nightgowns. Everything was short and revealing. I looked over at Paul. Well, he was asleep. What he didn't know couldn't hurt me. I grabbed one that looked as if it might reach my knees and scrambled into the bathroom to put it on.

That was the first time I saw myself naked. I looked at myself in the mirror on the back of the bathroom door. I wasn't exactly Vanessa Williams, but I wasn't bad. My breasts seemed a little large, and the dark nipples a little pronounced. My hips were wide, but not unpleasantly so. As for my waist, considering the fact that I had apparently given birth to Carrie, I had recovered well. As for my face, I thought I looked a little like Anita Hill—younger of course but that same intelligent look that she had. I slipped the nightgown over my head and looked again. The gown was white and diaphanous. It did little to hide my dark skin. If Paul were to see me in this, I'd learn what sex as a woman was like very quickly, I thought.

With that thought in mind, I was careful not to wake him. I slipped carefully into bed and huddled on my side looking away from him. I expected an arm around me, hugging my breasts tightly any moment, but the moment never came. He just snored peacefully away. Eventually, I drifted off to sleep.

I was awakened by the sound of running water in the shower. The sun was still nothing more than a yellow glow along the horizon. I looked at the clock. Six o'clock. It took me a moment—but only a moment—to remember what had happened to me.

The water stopped as I heaved myself out of bed. Heaving myself was a good description for it, because my weaker muscles and large breasts made the act of getting up very different. It wasn't just the void between my legs that reminded me that I was now a woman. It was a hundred different sensations. There was the feel of long hair flowing down my back, and flesh pooling at the hips, and the breasts shifting. Everything felt just a little different.

The bathroom door opened. Paul had a towel draped loosely around his waist but it did little to hide his body. He was in great shape, I thought. He had the look of a natural athlete. Like most blacks, he had fairly light chest hair, but he had some. I caught myself looking down at the gap in the towel, wondering...

"Good morning, babe!" he greeted me with a wide grin. "I hear Carrie. She's up and about. I'll get her set up with some breakfast before I go." Without warning, the towel dropped to the ground as he pulled a pair of boxers from a drawer. I got immediately nervous again. That was supposed to fit into my... my...

"You okay, babe?"

"Uh... sure, I'm fine." I looked away quickly, hoping he hadn't noticed. When I looked back, he had on a pair of boxers. I sighed in faint relief.

I made my way into the bathroom, sitting on the toilet. I had to get myself together. I was a woman now as the sudden flow of urine from the void between my legs seemed to emphasize. I couldn't have a stroke every time I saw Paul with his pants down. This just wasn't working out at all. Now I knew how a virgin bride feels on her wedding night.

I peeked out of the bathroom door when I finished, but Paul had already headed for the kitchen. I quickly located the drawer where Wanda kept her bras and panties and, remembering to select a matching set as I had seen Mary do, I retreated to the shower.

I had to overcome a powerful urge to explore my body in the shower. I even rationalized it by thinking that if I got myself off in the shower, I'd be more willing to spread my legs for Paul. I couldn't bring myself to do it though. I had a lot to do that day, and I didn't want any of it influenced by my first female orgasm. I got out of the shower and dried quickly, noticing how my more delicate skin seemed to be happier when I patted it rather than briskly rubbing it as I had when I was a man.

I selected an outfit similar to the one I had worn the day before, although this time, the suit was a bright red. Well, if I had to work for the devil, I might as well wear the team colors I told myself grimly.

Paul was just getting ready to leave when I got to the kitchen. His eyes went wide when he saw me. "Babe, you look great!"

I found myself flushing with pride. I had used Cindy's advice and just let my body do whatever it needed to do to get ready. My makeup had come out fine and I had managed to select all the right accessories for my outfit. If I had to remain Wanda for the rest of my life, at least I'd be able to look nice.

He gave me a hug and a chaste kiss, as if respectfully trying not to smear my makeup. "See you tonight. Carrie wants to stay over at Tanya's tonight. Maybe you and I can go someplace nice."

“Sure.” The only place nice I wanted to go was Chicago. After he was gone, I looked at Carrie. She was just finishing her cereal and toast, washing them down with a large glass of milk. It looked nauseating to me. Apparently Wanda wasn’t much of a breakfast person. I opted for a cold glass of orange juice which seemed to be all my body needed to get started.

I had the Buick for the day; Paul had taken another car—a new black Volkswagen. Whatever he did at the college must pay reasonably well, I thought. I belted Carrie in, realizing as I did that I had no idea where to take her.

“Let’s play a game,” I told her as I backed out of the garage.

“Sure, Mommy!”

“Let’s pretend I don’t know how to take you to day-care...”

Her face brightened. “Then I can play here all day?”

“No, Pumpkin,” I laughed, wondering not for the first time who she had been before Ovid. “I want you to show me how to get there.”

“Oh, that’s easy,” she laughed.

And it was. Ovid wasn’t a very large town. It turned out day care was in an African Methodist Church only a few blocks from the house. Of course, nothing seemed very far away in Ovid. After Chicago, most towns are small towns.

I walked her up to the door where she immediately found her friend Tanya, another pretty little black girl although a shade. Her mother, also a shade was standing with her. Together, we figured out the logistics for Carrie’s sleepover and I agreed to meet them at our house at five to get Carrie packed up.

The day-care, I noticed, consisted of all black children. I had never heard of the African Methodist Church, but it didn’t take a rocket scientist to figure out that it was a predominantly black branch of the Methodist Church. I found myself wondering if it had been formed by blacks to remain apart from white Methodists or if white Methodists had encouraged its formation to keep the blacks away. I had as much to learn about being black as I did about being a woman.

“Hi there.”

It was a woman’s voice. I turned and saw a woman, white with hair so red it seemed to be on fire. She wore a gray dress, short and revealing, and heels as high as mine in that same gray. Her jewelry was silver and expensive; her makeup perfect and understated. There was a smile on her lips, but it was countered by the dark look in her deep brown eyes. I felt as if I should know her from somewhere.

“It’s fascinating, isn’t it?” she said as she watched several children from the day-care center at play. “Here we are, two women, watching these children. If someone saw us, they’d think nothing of it. After all, we’re women—mothers and caregivers. Yet if we were two men standing here watching these children, someone would probably call the cops, assuming we were child molesters at the worst or fathers kidnapping their own children at the best.”

“That’s a little exaggerated, don’t you think?” I challenged her as I walked closer to her.

She shrugged. “Maybe, but maybe not. That’s what being human is all about, isn’t it? You can never be too sure how to tell the good guys from the bad guys.”

“So which are you?” I asked as I tried to fold my arms over my breasts.

“Me?” she grinned. “I’m one of the good guys, of course. Can’t you tell?”

“Do I know you?” I asked.

“We’ve met before,” she admitted, “but I didn’t look like this then. We met at your office in Chicago.”

The eyes. It was the eyes that gave her away. “Franklin Ridgeway?” I asked. “But it can’t be. He was...”

“A man?” she asked with a laugh. “Well, so were you then. But so you will understand, I was just using his image when we met. The real Franklin Ridgeway has no idea he was successfully impersonated.”

I thought about my impressions of Ridgeway. I had been completely wrong. He hadn’t been a lawyer whose clients were withholding vital information from him. That had merely been an act to keep me from asking all the questions I wanted to ask. Whoever this woman was, she had powers not unlike those I had seen from the gods.

“Who are you? What are you?”

“Just call me... Erin,” she said enigmatically.

I grabbed her arm. Despite her soft appearance, it was almost like clutching a piece of granite. I released her arm and asked, “So what’s this all about? Just what is going on? I feel as if I’m being set up.”

“You were set up,” she admitted, “but we had no choice. This was the only way to insert you into Ovid.”

“Insert me?”

She nodded. “Yes. The Judge is very powerful as I’m sure you’ve come to realize. No one stays in Ovid without his concurrence. If we had sent you in here with full knowledge of what you were facing—even if you believed us—the Judge would have known at once. So we had to make you interesting to him.”

It dawned on me suddenly. “He left me alone until Little Georgie showed up. You were the one who ratted on me, weren’t you? You told him where I’d be!”

“You’re upset,” she observed. “You shouldn’t be, you know. You never would have gotten Little Georgie on your own. You had no idea he was really the one who killed your family. No court could have proved it—except the courts of Ovid, of course. We gave him to you, and the Judge allowed you to observe his punishment. A crow no less! How fitting for the little bastard.”

“So was any of the story you told me in Chicago true?” I asked.

“A good deal of it was,” she assured me. “Your mission is a real one.”

“But why should I carry it out now? I’m stuck here. I’ve changed somewhat, or hadn't you noticed?"

She laughed again. "It doesn't have to be permanent. We can change you back, and we'll do so gladly as soon as you finish your mission. We want you to find Peter Allison for us."

"Just a minute," I said defiantly, trying to disguise my elation at the thought of being able to return to my male life. "I want to know who I'm working for. Just who are you and who are you working with? And if you have such powers, why can't you find him yourself?"

"So many questions," she sighed. "Very well, I'll tell you as much as I dare tell you. The Judge and his minions can track you, though. They have ways of intercepting your very thoughts, although they seldom do so until you've acclimated to your new identity. I haven't much time to tell you, either. I don't want to make you late to work. That might look suspicious and the Judge has a very good record of tracking our people down in Ovid. Now I have to be a little careful of what I say so as not to alert the Judge. To begin with, are you aware that in Roman and Greek myths, there was a civil war among the gods?"

"Yes," I replied. "I was reading about it last night."

"Have you ever wondered what happened to the losers in that war?"

"I assume they were killed," I told her. "I couldn't find any other reference to them."

"You can't kill a god, silly," she laughed. "Otherwise, it wouldn't be a god. By definition, gods are immortal."

"So you represent the losing side," I concluded sarcastically.

She paid no attention to the sarcasm. "They call us the 'Others.' They don't even dignify us with our true names."

"So why should I help you?" I asked. "Maybe I like it here. Maybe I don't want to be changed back."

She smiled and traced a finger along the back of my hand. "Nice try, but I don't believe that. Neither do you. You aren't this woman. You aren't black. You're an Irishman who wants to be a gumshoe in the pulp magazine sense of the word. Besides, we're on your side."

"My side?"

"Humanity," she explained. "Their side wants to control you—to make you into little puppets like the people you see around you here in Ovid. That's why they changed you. They couldn't manipulate Jeff Riley, but they can control Wanda Hazleton every time you let down your guard. We offer you free choice—free will. Humanity has outgrown the need for us. If you help us find the man who stole from us, you can have your real life back—and you'll be helping the human race."

"And why are you being so benevolent to humanity?" I asked. "And don't tell me it's because you admire us so much."

"I wouldn't insult your intelligence on that point," she snorted. "No, you're right. We oppose them for other reasons—reasons of our own. But that is no less reason for us not to help humanity. Your slavery to them gives them strength. If they have no influence over you, they are weakened. That's reason enough to help humanity."

I had to admit there was something to her argument. It was the Judge who had changed my life—not Erin and her people, if I could call them people. I sighed. "Assuming I agree, what do you want me to do? I can't exactly go around town like Jeff Riley asking questions."

"No," she agreed, "you can't. But we know who you're working for. He is the one who controls all the written records on the population of Ovid. He's sort of like the Olympian version of the KGB. You can find out where Allison is."

"But I wouldn't know where to start," I protested. "There must be hundreds of people who've been changed here."

"Peter Allison disappeared only a few days ago," she admitted. "We told you it was longer so you would not wonder why we didn't wait for the authorities to find him. As you probably know by now, once you have a new identity in Ovid, your identity in the real world ceases to exist. There are exceptions, but not many. As far as the authorities are concerned, there is no Peter Allison. Whoever he is, he has been here not more than a week. And he undoubtedly remembers who he was. That narrows it down to a handful of possibilities—no more than four or five.”

“And Hanes has the records?”

She nodded. “Yes, but only the records of current identities. Only the Judge has the records of prior identities and that blonde bitch who works for him would never let you see them. It will be up to you to determine who Peter Allison has become.”

“And if I do?” I demanded. I was a little annoyed with her description of Cindy as a ‘blonde bitch.’ I considered her a friend.

“Then all of this will be just an unpleasant memory. I can even make you forget it if you prefer. And, you will have a nice bonus. We can arrange many things for our friends. This time, we plan to be on the winning side.”

“I’ll think about it,” I told her. “If I need to, how can I contact you?”

“Call me at this number,” she replied, thrusting a business card into my hand. I looked at it quickly. Printed on it was simply a phone number. It was the same number she had given me when she had been Ridgeway. “If I haven’t heard from you by Monday morning, I’ll be right here. Think quickly, though,” she cautioned as I turned away. “Time is a factor.”

I put the card in my purse and turned away. I turned back to say something to her, but there was no one there. I had the uncomfortable feeling that I was the only player in the game without any chips. Should I do what she asked? If I wanted my real life back, it was probably the only option. If I found their embezzler today I could get back to reality before sundown. I need never again put on lipstick or pantyhose or prance around in heels. And most importantly, I need never know what it was like to have a man’s dick between my legs.

On the other hand, I was up against very powerful beings. I knew from watching Little Georgie’s transformation that there were far worse things than being changed into an attractive black woman. If I guessed wrong, or if I was caught, the consequences could be devastating—even fatal.

But it wouldn't hurt to do a little poking around, I thought as I drove to City Hall. I might not have any chips now, but maybe I could find a way to buy my way into the game.

I wasn't sure who showed up for work in my office that day. It might have been Wanda Hazleton, wife, mother, and administrative assistant to one of the most powerful beings in Ovid. Or, on the other hand, it might have been Jeff Riley, private investigator in extreme drag, doing his assignment. I was sure I wanted to be Jeff Riley again. I wasn't sure why. He didn't have the best of lives. But I had been him for thirty some-odd years and I was rather used to him. But at what cost? Who would I be working for?

Erin had to be telling me the truth—or at least most of it—this time. They really wanted Peter Allison. There was no doubt about that. Had he really taken thirty million dollars from them? I didn't know, but whatever he had done, he had pissed off some powerful folks in the process. Of course, maybe he had made some other powerful friends at the same time. And he almost had to be in Ovid. I was certain Erin and her associates had made sure of that. Whatever powers the Judge and his gang had seemed to be mirrored by the Others.

And who were the Others? I had read about the civil war of the gods, but what had happened to the losers? Erin had said they weren't dead. I wasn't sure any of the off-the-shelf books on mythology in the public library would have much to say on the matter. It could be that such information had never been recorded.

Did I dare do any of my research perched outside Hades' door? For some reason, I didn't think he was in. There was a 'feeling' I had noticed the day before whenever he was in his office—or at least I assumed it was while he was in his office. I didn't feel that feeling now. Maybe Cindy would know.

"Good morning!" she said cheerfully when she saw me at her door. It was hard to believe that such a vivacious, attractive blonde woman had ever been a man. But I suppose it would be hard for others to imagine that a certain attractive black woman had ever been a man either. “How was your first night?”

“Quiet,” I said with a meaning she understood.

“That’ll change,” she replied with a wagging arch of her eyebrows.

“Cindy,” I began, trying to ignore her innuendo, “what can you tell me about Mr. Hanes?”

Her look became serious. “Not much. We all try to avoid him as much as possible. Most of the... powerful people around here are nice—even the Judge. But Mr. Hanes is... distant.”

“That’s putting it politely,” I observed.

“Yes, well, he seldom comes out of his office, and no one has ever seen him leave the building—at least not by the front entrance.”

“So how does he get out?”

To my surprise, she laughed. “Think about it, Wanda. Did you know that if you walk outside and look at where his office should be, all you’ll see is a patch of grass with a few bushes on it? By all rights, there should be nothing beyond the wall behind your chair. Trying to find the answer to questions like that will drive you up a wall. Believe me, when I first got here, I looked for all sorts of answers. Most of the ones I found just led to more questions.”

“I’d better get back to my desk,” I told her, sensing suddenly that my boss had arrived. “One more quick question. What makes you think the... powerful people are the good guys?”

She looked at me oddly for a moment. “I just... feel it, I guess. Call it women’s intuition if you want to.”

I was right: Mr. Hanes was in his office, and he barked for me to come in the moment I got back to my desk.

“Where were you?” he demanded. It seemed to be his standard greeting for me.

“I was in Cindy’s office,” I explained with a calm voice that belied how I really felt.

“I want you here during working hours,” he said curtly.

“What if I have to go to the bathroom?” I asked, but the sarcasm was lost on him.

“If you must,” he allowed, his lip curled as if the very thought of having to defecate was repugnant to him. Did the gods have to go to the bathroom? That was something I’d probably never know.

“Now here,” he said, handing me a small stack of papers. “See that these are typed and distributed before you go home.”

I took the papers from him and departed, hoping that I could get it all done in time to get Carrie packed up for her sleepover. There was a fair amount of work, even when I let myself go into automatic mode to type. Fortunately, one of the other girls down the hall ordered out for lunch, so I was able to work straight through. I could feel my boss in his office. It was just an uncomfortable feeling as if someone was looking over my shoulder. By mid-afternoon, the feeling was gone, but I continued typing away. I had to get Carrie ready.

I was learning the hard way what many women could have probably told me. When you’re a working mother, you are a slave to everyone else’s schedule, and no one understands why you weren’t able to handle their tasks first. Had it been this way for Mary? Probably, it was. Mary had always been there for Trisha it seemed, even when I couldn’t be there. I was a cop after all. My work was important. Had Mary been angry with me because she had to pick up the slack for me with Trisha? Was I angry with Paul for the same reason?

No, I was angry with Paul because I knew that sooner or later—probably sooner if he was like most men—I’d have to spread my legs for him. Now that would be the perfect ending to a perfect day. After being chewed out by my boss, working my little black butt off, and running around for Carrie, I had an evening of being poked and prodded to look forward to.

And then there was Erin. Could she really change me back as promised? It was a little hard to trust someone who had gotten me into this fix to start with. How could I accomplish it anyhow? Erin had said Hanes had the records of current identities. And I could sense when he was gone. I could always sneak in his office and look for them. Did I dare?

Carefully, I opened his office door. Although I expected him to be gone, I still breathed a sigh of relief when I saw that I was right. I had an excuse to be there. I had just finished all of his reports, so I could always say that I was dropping finished copies off for him.

Okay, now that I was in his office, how would I find the information I was looking for? Presumably, many of the files were in Latin. Then I remembered that the Romans used a calendar somewhat similar to our own. Perhaps there was a date file. I checked a row of filing cabinets along the far wall. Yes, there were files in date sequence. Hurriedly, I pulled open a file drawer. In the drawer were files arranged by subject within date. Unfortunately, as I had expected, they were in Latin.

I knew a little Latin. Most good Catholic boys did. Also, being a cop meant that I knew many legal terms derived from the Latin. I wasn't sure what the Latin for 'law' was, but any file starting with 'juris' was probably a close match. To my dismay, there was more than one for the time period I sought. A quick look at most of them showed what looked like normal civil proceedings. Then, my search was rewarded. A small, thin file listed several names. I took the sheet for later study, hoping that even if by chance it was missed, it would be chalked up to a clerical error. I'd make a copy of it as quickly as I could.

I slipped the sheet of paper into the waistband of my skirt, thankful that I had chosen to wear a suit rather than a dress. The thought of stuffing the paper down the front of a dress into my unfamiliar cleavage was too trite to consider.

Now, any reasonable person—and I like to think that usually includes me—would have hurried out of that office as fast as their high-heeled shoes could have carried them. But at the heart of it all, I was a private detective—a snoop. My curiosity got the best of me. If this office wasn't really 'there' as Cindy had warned me, where was it?

I looked at the carefully-drawn blinds, seeing the thin rays of sunlight that found their way into the room. Carefully, I pulled the blinds back. The pattern of light on the carpet changed, but it was as if the light came from some other source, for it most certainly did not come through the window. I would never have expected to find what I found beyond the window. The best way to describe it was that I found... nothing.

I remembered suddenly an experience I had had as a child. My parents had taken my brothers and me to the Southwest on a camping vacation. We had stopped at Carlsbad Caverns and taken the tour. There, deep below the surface, they had turned out the lights to show us how unbelievably dark the caverns truly were. Not even the tiniest particle of light had registered on my eyes that day. It was like that now. Through the window was darkness—a blackness that allowed no light to exist. With a gasp, I dropped the blinds back into place.

"Have you satisfied your curiosity?" Mr. Hanes' voice asked ominously from behind me. I hadn't heard him come in, and I was so shocked by what I had found behind the blinds that my sixth sense regarding his presence had failed me.

"I..." I tried to begin, but I could think of nothing to say.

"Don't worry," he said softly, surprising me with his lack of anger, "I expected you to do that eventually. It's beautiful, isn't it?"

I didn't answer, but I don't think he expected me to.

"Not what you expected, is it?" he asked, pulling up the blinds so I could see the darkness again. "I know. You were expecting red fires and demons with pitchforks and the screaming of souls being punished, weren't you? You were expecting your childishly simple Hell. I'm sorry to disappoint you. My domain is far more complex than you could ever imagine. I have decided that my view should be of one of its more intriguing regions. It's called Tartarus. Have you ever heard of it?"

Silently, I shook my head. I was looking at the darkness still unable to speak.

“It’s a very special region,” he explained, sounding like a proud homeowner explaining the important features of his dwelling. I suppose that’s what he was actually doing. His voice was soft, almost loving in tone. “It lies below the Underworld, although ‘below’ is a relative term, I suppose. You could dig to the center of the Earth and still not reach it, for it is really in another space and time.”

I could sense something out there in the void—something large and ominous. It was like the feeling I remembered when I was a little boy visiting an aunt who had an old, dark house. It was as if there was something alive in the darkness of her house, and it was as if there was something alive in the darkness of Tartarus.

“You can feel them, can’t you?” he asked soothingly. “They call out to us all, but some are more sensitive to their entreaties. Listen to them for a moment. Hear what they are saying.”

I strained to hear, but could not make out the words. I could somehow sense their tone, though. There were many voices, some deep and resonant, others high and feminine like my own. One moment, they seemed to be crying out in pain, begging for mercy—then the next moment, they threatened, causing shivers up and down my back.

“They must remain here for eternity,” he explained.

“Who are they?” I asked, barely able to find my voice. I hated myself for doing it, but I found I had actually backed into Mr. Hanes and found comfort in his touch. I could never remember being more frightened of anything in my life.

“They are the Old Ones,” he told me.

“I seem to remember a little of my mythology,” I said slowly. “They were called... Titans?”

“Yes,” he agreed, “they are the Titans. There are others with them as well—others whose names humans have never spoken. They cannot die; they can only be contained.” With that, he shut the blinds, and the feeling of dread that had been building inside me ebbed at last. He turned me to face him and looked piercingly into my eyes. "So now you understand why you must come in this office only when I am here. They made you curious. They caused you to open the blinds. Had I not been here, you would have been made to listen to their pleas, and you might have tried to help them."

He picked up the reports that I had placed on his desk. "These are acceptable," he declared. "That is all I have for you today. You may go home."

He didn't have to tell me twice. I rushed for the door.

"And Wanda..."

I turned toward him. "Yes?"

"Remember—always—what you have seen here today."

I would, I thought as I closed the door behind me. I now knew what Erin was trying to tell me when she had spoken with me that morning. Had she known what I would see that day? Yet according to her, it was the good guys who had been locked away, while Hanes and the Judge represented the other side. I had to admit, although I had been fearful in Mr. Hanes' office, I had not sensed evil. Whatever was beyond that room was neither good nor evil: it just... was.

But what did that mean to me? According to Erin, the Judge and his ilk sought to control humanity. Did they? I couldn't be sure. I did know one thing, though: if I came down on the side of the Others, I might regain my manhood. They were offering me the chance to recover my real life. If I did nothing, it was the same as supporting the Judge, and I would remain Wanda Hazleton for the rest of my life. My fingers touched the paper I had tucked into my skirt. It wouldn't hurt to check the names out, I thought. Then I could decide what to do.

I didn't dare look at the list until I was safely in my car. There were five names on the list. Four of them meant nothing to me, but the fifth was familiar. It was a 'Misty Stafford.' Sly had called the redhead at the bar 'Misty,' and now that I thought about it, she hadn't looked too happy—almost as if she wasn't used to being a waitress in a bar. It was worth a shot. I had an hour or so before I had to get Carrie, so I decided to start with Misty.

I began to reconsider my decision the minute I walked into Randy Andy's. When I had last been there, I was just another guy in a bar on a slow night. Now, it was Friday afternoon, and the bar was obviously gearing up for a big night. The problem was that like most bars, there were a lot more men than women. Here I was, a pretty black woman in a skirt and heels, and to my dismay, it seemed as if all eyes turned on me. Now I knew what a turkey felt like the day before Thanksgiving.

"Look at that!"

"Mmmm... tasty!"

"Look, Stan, dark meat!"

Those were just the comments I managed to hear clearly, the last from two guys a couple of bar stools away from where I had nervously sidled up to the bar to talk to the only familiar person in the room—Sly. She was picking up an order at the bar from a weasel-faced bartender. She looked at the two clowns at the bar, and said to the one who had made the last comment, "Look, Larry, if it's meat you want, why don't you go into the men's room and slap yours around for a while?"

Larry looked suddenly embarrassed while his friend, Stan, laughed loudly.

Sly looked at me. "Do you need something, Honey?"

So I was a honey now. Great. "Sly, I need to talk to Misty."

"She's not here today," Sly told me. "That's the only reason I'm here."

I almost forgot about the wolves staring at me. "Not here? Why not?" Had she run? Was she my man—woman?

Sly laughed, "She turned her ankle. Let's just say she hasn't worn heels much."

Did Sly know? I had to find out. “Maybe she’s used to wearing different shoes—and other things,” I ventured.

Sly looked at me carefully. “Do I know you?”

“I was here a couple of nights ago asking questions,” I said.

To my embarrassment, she laughed even harder. “Oh, this is too good. Look, we’re busy, but I can talk for a minute. Let me deliver these drinks and I’ll meet you in the storage room. It’s back beyond the restrooms.”

I was relieved to get away from the bar. Two more guys tried to put the moves on me as I made my way to the storage room. I was beginning to understand why few women hung out alone in bars. I had never really appreciated the freedom being male conferred on me, but I was learning. This would be my only foray into a bar by myself.

“I don’t have much time,” Sly said, closing the door behind her. She took a moment to look at me carefully. Then she smiled. “Well, Mr. Riley, I warned you about Ovid. I see you’ve met the Judge.”

“It’s Wanda now,” I replied, suddenly a little uncomfortable being called Mr. Riley. “Wanda Hazleton.”

“Married, too, I see,” Sly noted, nodding at the ring on my finger. “Well, welcome to Ovid. What can I do for you?”

“I still need information,” I sighed.

“Why? Odds are your client doesn’t even remember hiring you.”

“Let’s just call it an obsession,” I said. “I need to know. Misty was just changed, right?”

Her eyes narrowed. “Yes, but how did you know that?”

“I came across a list,” I told her. “It has the names of everyone changed in the last week. But I don’t know anything except the names. I thought the Misty here at the bar might be the one I’m after.”

“I doubt it,” Sly mused, shaking her head. “The word is she was a guy but nothing like the guy you’re looking for. She remembers who she was, but she clams up when I try to talk to her about it. She was a supposedly liquor salesman—a big fat guy, balding and about fifty. I might be able to help you with the list, though. And there's always the phone book, you know."

"But they were just changed," I pointed out.

"So were you, but I'll bet you're in the phone book."

I felt like a fool. Of course she was right. I was new to Ovid, but as far as most people were concerned, I had been here for a long time. So had my suspects. I showed Sly my list. She actually knew two of them. Both were men who came in for a beer every now and then.

"I doubt if it's them," Sly told me. "I've talked to them. Neither one of them remembers who he was before."

"You're sure?"

She shrugged. "I suppose they could be lying, but I doubt it. You'll see what I mean after you've been here for a while. The newcomers always seem a little uncomfortable for a few days if they remember who they were."

Like me, I thought. She seemed to read my thoughts. "Just like you."

"It shows, huh?"

"Yes, it shows," she laughed with an encouraging squeeze of my arm. "You're still trying to be the tough private detective. I'm sorry, honey, but it doesn't work. Take my advice: try to play what you are. If you look like an attractive black woman, try to act like one. Odds are good you'll learn more about your suspects that way than trying to be Sam Spade." She colored suddenly. "Look, I'm sorry. I meant 'spade' like in the Bogart movies. I didn't mean..."

It was actually my turn to laugh. "No offense taken. I guess I've been a black woman for such a short time that I didn't think to take offense."

"Well, okay," she said, mollified. Then, after a silent moment, she added, "Look, Wanda, I know you probably don't want to hear this, but take it from me. What has happened to you may be the best thing you could ever hope for.”

“Being turned into a woman? A black one at that?”

“When I got here and got changed, I was really pissed,” she went on. “I mean, I had what I thought was a good life. I’ll tell you about it some time. But now, I wouldn’t trade my life here for that old one for anything. Ovid is a great place to be. You can start over, have a family...”

I winced a little at that. Were Paul and Carrie really my family? Or were they just cardboard cut-outs representing a life that might be pleasant enough but wasn’t really mine?

“I’ll give it some thought,” I promised.

I had spent all my free time with Sly. Now, it was time to go play mom. I rushed over and picked up Carrie who regaled me all the way home with her eventful day. “And I made this for you,” she said proudly as she handed me a card while we were stopped at a light. I looked at it. It was a greeting card drawn on a computer. “To the Best Mom in the whole World!” it said in bright red letters in front of a colorful rainbow.

“That’s very pretty, honey,” I told her, finding I really was touched. I could remember when Trisha had done one similar to it.

“I mean it, too,” she said seriously.

“I know you do,” I replied, equally seriously. Then, slowly, I said, “I love you, too.” It almost hurt to say it. Did I mean it? I wasn’t sure, but I knew she expected me to say it. Trisha was the same way, and Carrie was so much like Trisha in so many ways...

I got Carrie ready to go and waved as she rode away with her little friend. I had no time to think about anything else though, because Paul was in the driveway within five minutes of Carrie’s departure.

He had a hand behind his back and a big smile on his face. Then, with a flourish, he whipped his hand out, producing a bouquet of a dozen pink roses. “In celebration of our evening alone,” he explained with a lecherous grin.

Now, I had been a husband before, and I knew where this was all supposed to lead. First, it was flowers. Then would come dinner and drinks at a nice restaurant. Then, it would be time to pay the piper. I would be expected to happily spread my legs for this man. I wasn't ready for that. I wasn't sure I would ever be ready for it.

But I had a part to play, I realized. Sly was right. I couldn't go around acting like the man I used to be. To nearly everyone—Paul included—I was Wanda Hazleton, wife and mother. I had no choice but to be Wanda—for now at least. So I forced a smile and accepted the flowers, sniffing them as I had often seen Mary do. “They're beautiful.”

The smile became still wider. “I have seven-thirty reservations at Winston's. Why don't you slip into that little black number I like and I'll put on a coat and tie?”

What choice did I have? It was obvious when I looked in the closet which dress he was talking about. It was the proverbial little black dress, short, revealing and decidedly feminine. With a sigh, I pulled it off the hangar. It was time to turn on the old cruise control and get ready for my first date.

It was a good thing I did. Jeff wouldn't have had a clue how to put together all the pieces of the outfit Wanda ended up wearing that night. I observed myself getting ready, resisting the temptation to interfere as I deftly selected a necklace and earrings as well as matching bracelets. For stockings, I shocked myself when I selected a garter belt to go with my black bra and panties. Whoa, Bessie! What was I doing to myself? It was bad enough that I'd probably have to go for a roll in the hay with Paul after dinner. This outfit was guaranteed to get me raped!

I nearly stopped myself right then and there, but in a curious way, I was fascinated with the whole thing. I had a major decision to make shortly. I needed to decide if I was going to work for Erin and her side or not. If I did, I could get my old life back. But what did working for them mean? Was my old life important enough—or desirable enough—to risk angering the gods? And then there was Sly. She had obviously gone through the same process I was enduring. She even claimed to have a good life before her transformation. Yet she was happy now—as a waitress in a bar no less. Would I be?

I had to give being Wanda a fair chance. If I didn't, I'd never know if I was making the right decision or not. The only way I could do that was to play out the evening as a happy wife. I don't know which I feared more—that I wouldn't like sex as a woman or that I would.

The evening was what I expected—and more. Paul was a gentleman of the first order. He escorted me as if I were a princess, opening doors for me and taking my arm. I was really grateful for that since the heels I was perched on were the highest I had worn yet.

I felt exposed at first as we stepped into Winston's, a surprisingly well-appointed restaurant for such a small town. Here I was dressed to the nines. I had spent what seemed like an eternity with my makeup and my clothes until everything looked just right, and there was enough man left in me to know that I had done an excellent job on myself, for I was very attractive. But I was also wearing a dress that prominently displayed my breasts, and the skirts I had worn before exposed considerably less leg. My arms were bare and I could actually feel a little draft on my back. I was suddenly thankful for long hair, which covered at least a portion of it.

We smiled and spoke to several couples already dining. I was a little relieved to notice that we were accepted members of the community. I had been a little concerned that our race would make us unwelcome in some quarters of Ovid. Fortunately, that didn't seem to be the case.

We were seated in a somewhat secluded part of the room where we were able to have a little privacy—or as much privacy as a couple ever has in a restaurant. I found it to be immensely enjoyable. Paul was an intelligent man. I managed to figure out during dinner that he taught sociology at Capta College, a small liberal arts school in Ovid. Yet in spite of a doctorate in the field, he never talked down to me, respecting my opinion on subjects as the evening progressed.

I had to admit to myself that I hadn't had as much fun talking to someone since my days with Mary. I'm convinced that the true secret to a successful marriage is the ability to talk to your partner as an intellectual equal. The ability to carry on a conversation with one's partner is a relationship. Anything else is just sex.

Mostly, we talked about mundane things: family, friends, our jobs. Of course, I hadn't had the chance to make friends yet except for Cindy and, I suppose, Sly. As for my job, well, I was certainly prohibited from telling him I worked for Hades. So we talked about his job mostly. Capta College sounded like a nice little college, and it was obvious that Paul was very happy there.

"Which reminds me," he said as we finished the last of our dessert and coffee, "I have a luncheon with the President of the College tomorrow. It won't take long though if you and Carrie still want to go out to Sunset Beach."

"Sure," I answered agreeably. Of course, I had never mentioned Sunset Beach, but it sounded all right to me. I was pretty mellow from the wine we had shared at dinner. I wasn't used to wine or mixed drinks, being primarily a beer drinker, and I had drunk just a little too much. My smaller size made the effect of the alcohol greater, and I have to admit I probably drank more than I should to dampen the fear of what I was sure was still to come that evening.

I was as prepared for sex as I could manage to be. I have to admit that in a perverse sort of way I was actually looking forward to it. It represented an obstacle I would have to overcome if I remained Wanda Hazleton. And many women seemed to enjoy sex—Mary did. Maybe it wouldn't be so bad after all.

Paul's arm was around me as we walked out together. Given the wine I had consumed, I appreciated the extra support. But more than that, I found my body was responding to his closeness. My nipples and my crotch both seemed to tingle mildly. I seemed to crave his warmth and his strength.

So it came as no surprise to me that we didn't even bother to turn on the lights when we got home. We were in each other's embrace the minute we stepped in the house. The tingling I had felt before was becoming more and more insistent. I began to feel warm, and it wasn't just the closeness of our two bodies.

I'm not sure what was going through my mind at that moment. I know I wasn't on cruise control because I was willing myself to touch him all over as he was touching me, our hands conducting a symphony of flesh as we peeled each other's clothing away. I do know that whatever rational thoughts I was having were being pushed aside by the sudden needs of my new body. I was experiencing a feeling of emptiness which had to be abated, and the solution was obvious.

I slipped down onto the bed. The covers had been pulled back, but I didn't remember doing it. I felt my large, fleshy ass sinking down into the mattress and my long hair spreading across the pillow. Paul was careful not to put all of his weight on me, wordlessly slipping over me. I felt something rubbing against me, tentatively at first but soon harder. There was a friction against my flesh and I knew instinctively that he had begun to stimulate my clitoris.

I felt as if my body was turning to liquid, starting between my legs. Each movement seemed to produce more fluid from my body until I felt something solid invading the inner sanctum of my body. The feeling of emptiness was subsiding, but another feeling was beginning. It was a feeling unlike anything I had ever known before, and it seemed to be felt in several parts of my new body at once, rising until... until... Oh God! Is this what it's like?

We slept in Saturday morning, and with good reason. I almost lost count of how many times we made love together that night. We would awaken still naked in each other's arms, and the need would rise again. It wasn't an orgy; it was gentle. Following my initial insistent foray into sex as a woman, our subsequent efforts were more relaxed and protracted. How could I have ever dreaded something so pleasurable? I wondered the next morning. I even considered waking Paul for one more round before we got up.

This didn't mean that I had completely given up my interest in returning to my previous life. Far from it. But it did mean that if I chose to remain in this new life, it would have its own compensations. But I wasn't sure I could continue to work for Mr. Hanes. It was like working for the devil, and the Catholic boy who still wandered around inside my head was unhappy with that prospect.

I slid out of bed, careful not to wake Paul who continued to snore contentedly. I still couldn't tell the good guys from the bad guys, I realized as I took my morning shower. There seemed to be nothing sinister about Ovid. It was the perfect small town—the sort of place where neighbors helped each other out and children grew up healthy and happy. Even Mr. Hanes wasn't really so bad. He might resemble the Catholic devil with his power over the underworld, but there seemed to be nothing evil about him. Not once had I seen him rush gleefully into the office with the contract for someone's hapless soul.

And yet Erin claimed she was one of the good guys, I thought as I soaped my soft curvaceous body. She made it sound as if the gods sought to control and dominate humanity. But it was her side who had made me a cat's-paw. A black cat's-paw, I thought with grim humor.

I looked down at my body as I rinsed. The black skin, prominent breasts, and furry mound between my legs seemed almost normal to me now. I had washed myself off without a thought, and now, I was preparing to wash my long hair as if I had done it a thousand times before. If I did what the Judge expected of me and acted like a good little girl, this would be my life forever.

And was it so bad? No, it wasn't. It wasn't a life I would have chosen for myself, but it wasn't a bad life. In fact, everything felt suddenly... right. When I looked at my body, I saw a person. I saw myself. This was going to make the decisions that followed all the harder.

The rest of the morning was a portrait of domesticity. I made breakfast for Paul and me. We read the papers and did a few chores. Carrie had called right after I got out of the shower and asked for permission to stay at her friends until early afternoon. Then she had talked me into taking them both to some place called Sunset Beach in the afternoon. A beach in Oklahoma? I knew it was there. Cindy had shown me the pictures, but it seemed as out of place as a small town run by the gods.

As soon as Paul left for his lunch meeting, I grabbed the phone book. I needed to check out the last two names on my list. I had reached the conclusion that even if I decided not to cooperate with Erin and her side, I wanted to know who Peter Allison had become. It was a mystery and I was still a detective—sort of. I wouldn't be happy until I knew who Peter Allison had become. Although I was becoming more and more convinced that once I knew, I would keep the information to myself. I just couldn't bring myself to trust Erin's 'employers.' And, if I admitted it to myself, a couple more nights like the last one and I'd have absolutely no desire to change back.

Jim DeLong turned out to be a sixteen-year-old boy with his own phone. A very awkward short conversation with revealed that he knew nothing of who he had been before. The little prick even tried to make a date with me sight unseen. That left me with one name on the list. It would come down to the last name. I decided to see Lisa James in person.

Lisa was home, although it wasn't much of a home. Her home was a rundown little house in one of the less prosperous parts of Ovid. As I approached the small house, I couldn't help but think even a coat of paint would make things look better and might make visitors forget the weed-infested, junk-filled yard. There was the smell of something cooking as I approached the door—something cheap and pungent. I could hear the screams and yells of what seemed to be a house full of children.

Lisa James looked as if she had seen better days. With a little makeup, her hair washed and set, and a decent outfit, she would have been attractive, but she exhibited none of those things when she answered the door, a filthy baby in only a diaper crying in her arms. Her hair was vaguely blonde and stringy. She wore a tank top and cut-offs that displayed a reasonably good figure, but if she continued to eat whatever she was cooking, the figure wouldn't be good for long. Her lack of makeup made her look older, but I estimated her age at no more than thirty. Two other children, neither more than five, ran unsupervised through her tattered, untidy living room. All the children were shades.

“Yes?” she said in a tired voice.

“Ms. James?”

“Yeah,” she replied with suspicion. “You from the county?” Her voice had a nasal twang that made my own Oklahoma drawl sound absolutely Fifth Avenue.

“The county?”

“Welfare,” she explained.

I was momentarily taken aback until I realized what she meant. I suppose it was a reasonable assumption. Why else would a black woman in even a casual skirt and blouse like I was wearing show up on the doorstep of someone like Lisa James on a Saturday morning.

“Uh... no,” I managed to respond. “I’m just doing an investigation. I’d like to talk to you about... about...” For some reason, I couldn’t get it out. It was as if my voice had frozen.

Lisa seemed to understand. She deftly handed the baby to one of the other children. I think the child was a girl, but it was hard to tell. “You take your little brother Jed in and change him.”

“Ma!”

“None of your back talk,” she said sternly. “Now git!”

Oh, there was no way this was Peter Allison, I thought to myself as the two children hurried out of the room, awkwardly carrying the crying baby.

“There,” she said when they were gone. “Now we can talk about it. It’s them rules, you know. We can’t talk about the changes with more than two of us in earshot.” She sat on a worn couch as primly as she could. She only succeeded in looking tired.

“Then you remember who you were?” I asked, sitting in what appeared to be the least dirty chair.

“Oh, I remember,” she laughed mirthlessly. “I just wish I didn’t.”

“I’m looking for Peter Allison,” I told her. “Were you...?”

She nodded slowly. “Hell of a note, ain’t it? They did this to me. They took all the money I had and made me into this. I thought I’d be able to buy myself a good life here with what I brought them. Fat chance, huh? They took all the money—every dime! And what did they do for me? They give me these three little rug rats, an eighth grade education, and a husband that ain’t been seen since little Jed was still in the pouch—or so I’m told. To make it all worse, I can’t talk except like this. Ain’t that a kick in the pants?”

“I’m... I’m sorry,” I offered.

“T’warnt your fault,” she muttered. “Sides, looks like you ain’t got it the best either. I’ll bet you weren’t no black gal afore you got here.”

“No... no, I wasn’t,” I admitted. But I thought to myself how fortunate I was to be Wanda Hazleton after seeing what had happened to Peter Allison. In fact, even without seeing what had happened to Allison, I was beginning to feel I had been given an incredible gift when I became Wanda Hazleton.

“They’re after me, ain’t they?” Lisa asked.

“They?”

“Don’t be coy,” she growled. “The Others. They sent you. If you ain’t from welfare and ain’t one o’ them that run this place, you gotta be workin’ for the Others. I know who they are. Well, you just tell ’em to come and get me. I’ll be glad to see ’em. With any luck, they’ll just kill me and be done with it. It’s gotta be a damned sight better than this.”

I rose unsteadily to my feet and pulled my purse up on my shoulder. It had nothing to do with the heels I wore. I was horrified with what had happened to Peter Allison. I think it was the realization that it could have just as easily been me standing there in all that squalor with that life. For the first time since my conversion, I was absolutely thankful to be Wanda Hazleton. Mumbling a quick thank you, I rushed out of the house.

So I had my man—or rather my woman—I thought as I got into shorts and a T-shirt for the afternoon at the beach. Now what was I going to do about it? I had realized I could be happy as Wanda Hazleton, but I hadn't made up my mind completely. Should I turn Allison over to the Others? It seemed as if I would almost be doing her a favor. Besides, what would it hurt? The money was gone, so that wasn't an issue. I could be Jeff Riley again...

But what would the Others do with Peter—or rather, Lisa? It seemed as if as bad as her life was, it was probably better than what the Others would do to her. If they were being honest with me, they could change her into something far worse than a welfare mother. And I would be responsible.

I had a little time to consider what I was to do. Obviously, the former Peter Allison wasn't going anywhere. He'd keep until I decided what I was going to do. Of course, Erin was going to be most displeased when she found that the money she sought was already gone. I extracted the card she had given me from my purse and looked at the number. It would be so simple to dial the number and complete my assignment. Then I could go home. So what was stopping me?

My thoughts were interrupted when I heard the door slam and the running of little feet. "Mommy, aren't you taking us to the beach?" Carrie asked when she and her friend Tanya saw me.

"Sure, I told you I would," I replied.

"Then why aren't you in your bathing suit?"

Bathing suit? It was bad enough to display what I had already displayed in public, but now I was expected to show even more skin? I wasn't ready for that—not yet.

"Wear the yellow bikini!" Carrie insisted. "You look hot in that!"

"Carrie!" I cried, trying hard not to laugh.

"Yeah, wear the yellow bikini!" a deep voice laughed. It was Paul. I hadn't heard him come in. "After that boring luncheon, I need to see my woman in a yellow bikini."

I don't know why, but the more I thought about that, the more I was rather curious to see what I would look like in that yellow bikini. If both my provided husband and daughter thought I'd look great in it, I was beginning to warm to the idea.

Carrie was right, too—I did look hot. Standing in front of a full-length mirror, I had to admit that I was a very attractive woman. The bright yellow bikini was just the right accent for my dark skin. It fit me like a second skin, displaying my breasts and hips in a way I would have never imagined. I should have felt embarrassed. In fact, I thought I would be embarrassed. After all, the suit did little to disguise and much to emphasize my feminine shape. Instead, I felt... proud. Yes, that's it! I felt proud. I looked downright fantastic and I was actually proud of it.

I had made up my mind, I realized as I admired myself in the mirror. I was Wanda Hazleton, and Carrie was my daughter, and Paul was my husband—and my lover. Who knows? Maybe we could work at giving Carrie a little brother or sister.

So I enjoyed my day at the beach. Sunset Beach was actually an artificial beach built on a lake, but the late summer sun was warm and relaxing, and with the joyful cries of bathers splashing in the clear lake water, it took only a little imagination to pretend I was on a fashionable beach in a more exotic part of the world. I smiled at that, though. When, I thought about it, what could be more exotic than a town run by the gods?

"I see you're acclimating nicely," a voice said, bringing me out of my thoughts. I had been lying back against a plastic lounge, my eyes closed while Paul took the girls over for ice cream cones. When I opened my eyes, I saw Susan Jager looking down at me, a wide grin on her face. She was wearing a bikini similar to my own only in a burgundy shade that complemented her white skin and rich brown hair. "Nice outfit," she added.

I actually grinned back. "Yours, too."

"This is probably the last time I'll get to wear it," she laughed. "I'm pregnant, so by next spring I'll have to work to get back in shape to wear it again.”

“Were you...” I began. “I mean, before Ovid, what...”

“You mean was I a woman before Ovid?” she asked brightly. “No, I wasn’t. I was an attorney but a male one—and a very unhappy one, too, I might add.”

“So... how did you become... pregnant?” It was a stupid question, but I asked it with a purpose. I had had sex with Paul. Was I pregnant? Was that the way it worked? I mean, sure, I thought about it for the future, but I wasn’t ready to have a child just yet.

“I became pregnant in the usual way,” she laughed. Then, she stopped laughing. “Oh, I can see by the look on your face what’s worrying you. Well, don’t worry. There’s a three-month grace period for all newcomers. You can’t get pregnant until then. But take my advice, if you’re already worrying about it, I assume you’re sexually active.” She gave me a wicked little grin. “And with a guy like Paul, I don’t blame you, by the way. So as to the advice: go ahead and get started on birth control pills. Better safe than sorry.”

“Sure,” I agreed. At least it was a relief to know I wasn’t pregnant—at least yet. “Susan, are you happy now?”

“The happiest.”

“I guess you realize this is all a big shock for me,” I ventured.

She nodded, sitting down on the lounge chair beside me. “Wanda, this is a big shock for everyone. Most of the men who are transformed into women didn’t really want that change. The same is true of the women who become men. But the funny thing is, it usually works out for the best. The Judge finds us because we’re usually about to experience a meaningless death out there in the real world. If I had died as I was supposed to out there, I would never have known how happy I could be. I was divorced, in bad health, and made a good living getting guilty slime balls off the hook in court. Now I’m young, married, proud of what I do for a living, and about to become a mother. Give it a chance. You can be happy, too.”

“I plan to,” I told her honestly.

We had to break off the conversation, for Paul, Carrie and Tanya had just come back with ice cream. Although I had said I didn’t want one, Paul had brought me back a huge strawberry cone, and it did look good. I accepted it gratefully, but I had a most unmasculine thought about needing to watch my weight.

By the time we got home that night, Carrie was practically asleep. When we had dropped Tanya off at her house, Carrie was barely awake enough for us to tell her goodnight. Of course, she had had a long day playing at the beach, followed by wolfing down a full-sized Rusty Burger. She was tired and full and made no arguments when I got her ready for bed.

It felt so natural to be doing that. Many were the times that I had gotten Trisha ready for bed, watching her with a smile as she ambled about half-asleep. Color aside, Carrie could have been Trisha. She had the same bright sparkle in her eyes and the same love of life. I kissed her gently as I tucked her in.

“I love you, Mommy,” she said sleepily.

I smiled and replied softly, “I love you, too Pumpkin.” And I found I really did.

“She asleep?” Paul asked when I got back into the den. He was standing there, still in his swim trunks as he flipped back and forth between the various satellite sports channels. His T-shirt covered his chest, but I couldn’t help but think he looked pretty fit.

“Sure is,” I replied. I was still in my bikini, too with just a cover-up over it. We had needed little else in the warm Oklahoma evening.

Paul turned to me and pulled my cover-up down. “You really do look hot in that bikini,” he remarked.

“I look hot out of this bikini, too,” I said with a sultry smile.

I knew where this was leading, but unlike the previous evening, I was ready for it, too. Sex as a woman had been better than I had imagined, and I found myself oddly attracted to this man. Maybe it was the hormones, or maybe it was part of the magic of Ovid, but I didn't really care. I actually gave a little gasp of anticipation as Paul gently removed the bra of my suit. He wordlessly gave a gentle kiss to one of my nipples, and if he had asked, I would have made love to him right there in the den.

Fortunately, he didn't ask until nearly ten minutes later when I was lying back languidly on the bed.

It had been even better than the previous night, I reflected as I slipped out of bed the next morning. Oh, we hadn't done it as many times. We were tired, too. But I had been more relaxed. I had even worked up my nerve enough to experiment with oral sex. I was glad I had, too, for Paul reciprocated, proving to be a master at it.

How could I have considered giving this up? I thought as I showered. I had enjoyed life more in the last two days than in all the days as Jeff after Mary and Trisha had died. I was part of a family again. Granted, I wasn't crazy about my job, but I had a lot to be grateful for. I had a decent lifestyle, a loving spouse, a pretty young daughter, and most of all, I had a future. Where was my life as Jeff leading me? I hadn't really dated since Mary's death and had no plans to start. I had sacrificed my career with the police for revenge, and although I could have done nothing else, the sweetness of the revenge had turned to bitter ash in Jeff's mouth.

I found I was even starting to think of Jeff as another person. He was someone I had known a long time ago. He was a nice guy, but he had problems—problems I couldn't help him with. Jeff was gone. He wasn't even dead and buried; he had never existed.

The only unresolved thing in my mind was what to do about my assignment. Remaining as Wanda was a personal choice I had already made. But that didn't mean I couldn't complete my assignment. I could simply ask Erin to leave me as I was. The problem was that I still needed to figure out who the good guys were.

There were really three possibilities, I realized as I dressed for the day in a white casual knit top and denim cut-offs. The first possibility was that Erin had been telling me the truth. It was the simplest solution, really. It meant all I had to do was call the number, tell her where Peter Allison was, and go on with my life.

But what if the Judge and his crew were the good guys? What if they didn't seek to rule mankind, but that Erin and her cohorts did? Would the combined force of the classical gods and goddesses be stuck here in a small Oklahoma town if that was their ultimate goal? I had seen power wielded that I could have never imagined a few days ago. If they sought to rule with that power, why weren't they in Washington doing to Congress what they had done to Ovid?

There was a third possibility as well. It was just possible that there weren't any good guys or bad guys. How did the old song go? There ain't no good guys; there ain't no bad guys. There's just you and me and we just disagree. Maybe that song described the gods.

So should I call or not? The dilemma plagued me throughout most of the day. Of course, that meant I didn't call. I just enjoyed life right up until the moment it all fell apart.

Oh, it started innocently enough. Carrie had gone over to play with some neighborhood kids. I was even relieved to see they were both black and white kids. While Ovid seemed to have its bigots, the races in general mixed well. Paul was on the patio in back of the house, poring over some materials for a class he would be teaching for the fall term. I was going through the motions of doing what all working wives and mothers do on the weekends—laundry, cleaning, and all the other domestic chores. It was time for a break, so I fixed a pitcher of lemonade for Paul and me.

"Thanks, babe," he said with a smile as he accepted the icy glass. He took a sip and added, "I needed that."

"What's the class?" I asked, sitting next to him and nodding at the stack of books he had spread around him on the table.

"Comparative religion," he told me. When he saw my vague look, he explained, "You know, comparing the various religious beliefs around the world, like Loki to the Trickster or Wotan to Jupiter."

Jupiter. The name caught me by surprise. "I thought we couldn't say their names here," I commented. It was an idle comment. I hadn't really thought about the fact that Paul wouldn't know what I was talking about. I wondered how I would explain my comment.

But he was too wrapped up in his subject to notice. "We can, so long as it's in the mythological context instead of..." He broke off, and his dark face actually lost a little color as he realized what he had just said. I realized it at the same moment: he knew!

"Wanda, let me explain..." he began nervously.

"You know who you are!" I practically yelled. "You... you..." I wanted to say "took advantage of me", but it sounded so shop-worn. Some detective I was! Paul had fooled me into believing he was just one of the innocent souls transformed without memory of a previous life. "My god, how you must be laughing at me," I muttered through gritted teeth. "Was it fun, fooling the big city detective? Who are you, Paul? Are you one of them? One of Jup... Jup... the Judge's people? Or are you one of Erin's people just making sure I complete my assignment."

"Damn it, Wanda," Paul broke in, "will you let up for a minute? I'll tell you everything if you just give me a chance."

"A chance?" I yelled. "A chance? I gave you a chance. I thought you were... I mean, I even let you... screw me! You son of a bitch! You..."

"Wanda! Please listen to me! I'm Peter Allison!"

It was probably the one thing he could say that would make me shut up. "You're who?" I asked softly.

"Peter Allison," he repeated. "I'm the one you're looking for."

It didn't make any sense. I had already found Peter Allison, hadn't I? And besides, Paul wasn't even on the list.

"I'm Peter Allison," Paul said again. "Look, sit back down. I've got a story to tell you."

It was a hell of a story. I sat quietly, listening as Paul told me his story. Part of it I knew already, but I knew it out of context. Paul as Peter was really human like me and he really had been a fund manager. What I hadn't known was that his undergraduate degree had been in sociology. Rather than go on in that field, he had shifted to business, eventually ending up with the Harvard MBA. By the time he was forty, he had been married, divorced, and had become one of the most successful fund managers ever to work for Janus.

"I think I picked Janus because of the mythological symbolism. Classical mythology was always a hobby of mine," he explained with a little smile. When he saw my confusion, he explained, "Janus was one of the oldest of the Roman gods. He supposedly ruled areas around Rome and even invented money."

"I wonder if he really exists," I murmured, more to myself than to Paul.

"Probably," Paul replied. "Anyhow, I had my obligatory mid-life crisis. I had done everything I set out to accomplish at Janus, and I was bored. Then a woman named Erin contacted me about a job with a group of private investors. They had set aside a fairly modest fund—only five million—and wanted someone who could make it grow for them."

"Wasn't five million a little puny after what you had to play with at Janus," I asked a little sarcastically.

"It was," he agreed, "but that was the challenge. Look, Wanda, they told me about you. I know who you used to be. When you were in Homicide, did you ever get tired of the slam-dunk cases and find a tough one you really wanted to sink your teeth into?"

"Sure," I admitted. I was getting over being mad in spite of the fact that the Judge's side had obviously set me up, too. Paul may have been Peter Allison at one time, but like me, he was now a different person. I don't know if I would have liked Peter Allison, but in spite of all that had happened, I found I still liked Paul. He was as much of a cat's-paw as I was.

"That's how I felt about the private fund," he continued. "It was a challenge. It's easy to run a fifty million dollar fund. You're the eight hundred pound gorilla—you sit wherever you want. That's not the way it is when you have a small fund.”

I was finding it difficult to think of five million dollars as a small amount of money, but I saw his point. And as I knew from personal experience, Erin could be quite persuasive. I could see Paul—Peter then—being enticed by the thought of building up a fund from scratch. It must have been a terrific challenge for him. I told him so.

“Not really,” he said shaking his head with a little smile. “It took me less than a year to build it up to thirty million.”

“And then you decided to take it all for yourself,” I surmised a little sadly. He was Paul now, but he had embezzled thirty million. There was some real irony here. I was a former cop who had fallen for a crook.

“Wrong. I don’t have a dime of the money.”

He smiled at my open-mouthed stare.

“They were careless,” he explained. “They didn’t know about my interest in mythology. I would overhear names and events. Eventually, I started to put them together. It was by eavesdropping that I learned of something of their plans. And what I heard frightened me. Wanda, the funny thing is, these Others think they’re doing the right thing, but they aren’t. They’re so frightened of the Judge and his plans that they’re willing to form an alliance with a group they call the Old Ones. I don’t know who they are, but I can guess. The results wouldn’t be pretty, I’m afraid.”

I didn’t tell him that I knew where the Old Ones were. He seemed concerned enough about them without knowing that there was a direct conduit to them only a few blocks away.

“Then I heard them mention Ovid,” he went on. “I was desperate. I was working for beings who could bring about the downfall—even the end—of mankind. And I was giving them the money to carry out their plans. Then, I overheard them mention Ovid by name.”

“So you came here on your own with the money,” I surmised, too wrapped up in his story to sustain my anger. This was Paul, I kept telling myself—not Peter Allison. This was Paul, the man I... I...

He nodded. “Yes, but more importantly, I had my notes about their activities.”

“So tell me,” I prompted. “What makes you think the Judge and his ilk are the good guys?”

He actually laughed at that. “It really isn’t that simple. I can’t say too much without running into the blocks the Judge has on all of us. Personally though, I have more faith in the Judge than I do in the Others.”

“So you brought the money here?”

He shook his head. “The money is still invested. It’s in timed accounts. I’m sure they told you that before they sent you here. Losing the money hurts their cause, but what they really want to know is what I discovered from them and what I told the Judge. That information is potentially far more damaging to them than losing the money.”

It all made sense, except for one thing: why had the Judge changed me into the wife of the very man I sought? It didn’t make any sense unless...

“My god, Paul!”

His look of contrition turned to one of alarm. “What?”

“Do you know what a cat’s-paw is?”

He grinned. “Sure, I like mythology, remember? It refers to an old legend where a monkey uses the paw of a cat to get chestnuts out of a fire. It means a tool.”

“And that’s what we both are,” I told him quickly. “We’re in danger here.”

“Not if you cooperate,” a new voice said. But it was a familiar voice.

“Hello, Erin,” I said without turning.

It was, indeed, Erin, flanked by two large men. I had seen their type many times before. They were hired muscle. Ask them to add two plus two and they'd look at you in confusion, but ask them to break somebody's arm and they would respond at once.

"Hello, Wanda," Erin responded. "You've done a fine job for us. You are to be congratulated."

For what? I wondered. I had fingered the wrong person as being Allison. Then, I had gotten so comfortable in my new life that I hadn't called in. And all along, my target was sharing a bed with me. Well, what was the old saying? Something about keep your friends close and your enemies closer. I couldn't have gotten much closer to Paul.

"But how did you know about...?" I closed my eyes and sighed.

"You've had me bugged, haven't you?"

She smiled and reached into my purse which I had carelessly left on the couch. She extracted the card she had given me at day care a couple of days earlier.

"It's magical?" I asked.

"No," she laughed. "As I told you before, it's a little dangerous to use magic around here. It's state-of-the-art electronics. We have a listening post a few miles out of Ovid."

"But you didn't come when I thought I had found Peter yesterday," I pointed out.

Erin shook her head as she put the card in a pocket in her skirt. "No, it just didn't sound right. We decided to wait. It seemed unlikely that Peter would have been given such a life after he did so much to hurt our cause. And we were right. Here he is with a loving family and a prestigious job at the college. See how they use people, Wanda? You, his hunter, became a significant part of his reward."

I flushed in both anger and embarrassment. I had been used, true, but I had found something I thought I had lost in the process. But Erin didn't know that, did she?

"Now," Erin continued, "if the two of you will come with us, we can settle this whole affair like civilized people."

Now what did that mean? Was I to be returned to my old life? What would happen to Paul? What would happen to the human race?

“Come on, Wanda,” she prompted. “No harm will come to you. We will make good our promise to you. You will be Jeff Riley on a plane home to Chicago by morning.”

“But what about... Paul?” I couldn’t bring myself to call him Peter.

“He has betrayed us and caused great trouble for our cause,” she explained. “His fate doesn’t concern you. You shouldn’t care, you know. He deceived you. He took advantage of your womanhood.”

Paul looked at me sadly. “For what it’s worth, Wanda, I do love you.”

I said nothing. I didn’t want Erin to know that I had made my decision, and I wanted to remain Wanda—with Paul at my side.

“Wait!” I told Erin. She turned to face me, puzzled. “What about Officer Mercer? What if the Judge knows you’re here?”

“He can’t possibly know,” she laughed. “And Officer Mercer is quite occupied right now. A bus filled with children on their way to a Sunday School day camp is about to roll off the road and catch fire not ten miles from Ovid. He will be occupied with that for the rest of the day. So will the Judge I should imagine.”

Was that what the Others were all about? Would they actually risk the lives of a bus loaded with children to further their cause? If I had held any doubts before, they were gone now. I had picked the right side.

“Oh?”

Another familiar voice, but this was one I was happy to hear. It was Officer Mercer. I wondered in a sudden flash of cockeyed humor if I had made enough lemonade for everyone.

I should have been paying more attention. As the two heavies tried to take on Officer Mercer, Erin grabbed Paul and began to fade from view. I should have realized she didn’t plan to get him out of Ovid by conventional means.

“No!” I screamed, grabbing Paul’s fading form by the legs in what had to be a tackle my old high school football coach would have been proud of. Of course, I learned in that moment that wrapping your arms around a man's lower torso when you had breasts the size of mine was a little painful, but I held on. I felt Erin's grasp on Paul fail and I tumbled to the ground with him as she faded from view. I hit my head on the patio bricks and was out like a light.

"She'll be all right."

The voice seemed to be echoing around inside my head, pushing back the darkness as I awoke. I couldn't tell how much time had passed. All I knew was that I had the mother of all headaches.

"It was just a mild concussion," the voice, which I now realized was Officer Mercer, explained.

"Easily repaired," another voice, belonging to the Judge I realized, said.

The pain in my head and the bruises I incurred in my unladylike tackle faded to nothingness. I opened my eyes and sat up. Of the five men looking at me, only Paul looked concerned. Both Officer Mercer and the Judge were smiling confidently, and the two heavies stood against a wall with sullen but frightened looks on their faces. They seemed unable to move. Looking around, I realized I was in my own—or Wanda's own—living room.

"What happened?" I managed to say.

"Quite a lot, really," the Judge said with a slight chuckle. "Officer Mercer subdued our two friends over there while you kept Paul here from being captured by Eris."

"Eris?" I echoed.

The Judge nodded. "You apparently knew her as Erin. She's quite a dangerous character. She's considered to be essentially the very personification of strife. She and her brother Mars used to cut quite a swathe before he settled down to become a pillar of our little community."

I looked at Paul. "Are you all right?" I asked quietly.

"I'm fine, babe," he assured me, taking my hand in his and squeezing lightly. "You saved my life."

"She saved a lot more than that," the Judge told us. "Thanks to your husband, Wanda, we have severely damaged the network of the Others. We were able to uncover their plans to release the Old Ones and upset the careful balance of power we have maintained for centuries on end. Had they realized how much we now know of their plans, they might have been able to adapt more quickly. Thanks to you, though, we will be able to act on Paul's information within the next few days. We are in your debt."

"Thanks, I think," I said, still a little woozy.

"Now, to business," the Judge said. He muttered a few words in that archaic dialect of Latin, or whatever it was, and I watched in rapt fascination as the two heavies shrank, their clothes becoming a coating of fur. In moments, two small Pekinese dogs growled nervously as they brushed against each other. "Meet Yin and Yang," the Judge laughed. "They'll be going to a good home. As soon as Yin goes into heat, they'll be too busy to get into any more mischief."

Then the Judge turned to me. "You should feel privileged, Wanda. Very seldom have I given anyone the opportunity to change back, but since you were brought to us under false pretences and have helped us with a very knotty problem, it is only right that you be rewarded. I'm prepared to return you to your old life."

I gasped. If he had offered this to me two days earlier, I would have accepted in a fraction of a heartbeat. Now, though, I wasn't prepared to be Jeff Riley ever again. Paul had lied to me, but the stakes had been higher than I had imagined. I looked at him. There were tears in his eyes.

"Paul, I..."

"You do whatever you want, babe," he said sadly.

"Do you... do you really love me?"

His eyes squeezed in pain. "Oh yes I do. When they brought you to me, I never dreamed I'd end up loving you, but I do."

If you love something, set it free. I don't remember where I read it, but I know I did. Paul loved me enough to let me go back to my old life. But I couldn't do that. I was Wanda Hazleton. And just thinking about that made me want to be with him. Without a word, I stepped into his arms. I hugged him as if I never wanted to let him go, and felt the loving pressure of his arms around me.

"Well, Officer Mercer," the Judge said with a polite cough, "it seems we have a new resident in Ovid."

Then I had an idea. "Judge, what happened to the school bus?"

"We were fortunate," the Judge replied. "We had other associates who were watching for such a strategy. The children are fine. They won't be joining us."

"But even with that, Officer Mercer couldn't have prevented Paul from being kidnapped."

"That's true, my dear," the Judge admitted.

"If Ovid is growing, maybe it's about time to expand the police force," I ventured. "And I don't think Mr. Hanes has been too happy with my work."

The Judge smiled. "My esteemed brother is seldom happy with anything. Continue, my dear..."

...and I was suddenly back in my office with Diana and Susan.

"You stopped too soon!" Diana cried.

"But you know where she is now," I told her, "don't you?"

"I don't," Susan said.

"But of course I do," Diana replied with a wave of her hand. "I just like happy endings. You know, the kind where everything gets all tied up in a big bow."

"Well, I don't know about the bow, but I do know how to tie things up. I need to drop off some papers for the Judge before we go to lunch. Shall we?" I asked, rising to my feet.

Of course, only Susan didn't know, but I imagine she suspected. All of her clients had been brought directly to court that week, so she hadn't been on the Police Department side of the building since it happened. Her mouth still dropped open when she saw what Diana and I already knew. There, behind the front desk at the Police Department was a new officer. Although dressed like Officer Mercer, the officer wore a uniform that had obviously been tailored for a much more curvaceous form.

"Hi, Cindy," the lovely black woman said from her desk, a wide smile on her face.

"Hi, Wanda," I replied with a smile of my own. "How's the new job working out?"

"Great," she told us. Then she looked at Diana whom she had never seen before.

"It's all right," I told Wanda. "You can talk in front of Diana. In fact, you can say anything you like."

Wanda gave Diana the quick once-over as only a police officer can.

"One of them, eh?" she asked. There was no rancor in her voice. She actually seemed to find Diana's godhood amusing.

Diana just smiled.

"It's good to be back in police work again," Wanda told us. "Even if it is behind a desk. I don't know how Officer Mercer held everything together, even with his speed."

"Is everything okay with you and Paul?" Susan asked.

Wanda raised an eyebrow. "Looking for a little divorce work, counsellor?"

"Of course not!" Susan replied, her face reddening.

Wanda just laughed. "Only joking, Susan. But to answer your question, Paul was in the doghouse for a couple of days. It's funny, but I find I enjoy getting flowers and gifts from a repentant spouse. Like the new earrings?" She indicated the small glittering stones in her ear lobes. "They were yesterday's peace offering."

"Rubies," Diana observed. "They're very nice. Next time, though, be a real woman—hold out for diamonds."

Wanda, Susan and I all laughed, but I think I was the only one who realized Diana hadn't really been joking! Diana looked confused at first, but then she smiled, too.

"There's just one thing I'd like to know," Susan said as the three of us walked to the Greenhouse. "If Peter wasn't Lisa James, then who was she?"

"Be derved if I know," Diana said with a deadpan drawl that matched Lisa's perfectly. She then smiled at us. "We all have to do our part for the cause, you know."

I couldn't stop laughing at the look of surprise on Susan's face.

Ovid X: The Academician

©2000 The Professor

FictionMania BigCloset TopShelf

Even when I was male, I always looked forward to spring. I enjoyed watching as the days got longer and the air got warmer. Just watching signs of life returning to the trees and grass was enough to raise my spirits to the stars. As spring began this year, I had something else to look forward to that I would have never imagined when I was male: I would deliver my first baby.

Well, as far as the doctor was concerned, it wasn't my first. He remembered delivering my twins a few years before. But of course, I knew that I had never delivered them. They had been transformed into my children just as I had been transformed into their mother. That created something of a problem. The doctors and nurses all gave me the 'you've been through all this before' brush-off when I started looking a little nervous about the whole process. I couldn't very well tell them that I hadn't really given birth before, because like most people in Ovid, they had no idea that their entire existence was nothing more than a construct of the gods.

So there I was, as big as a house, waddling uncomfortably from place to place and trying not to be terrified by the whole process of giving birth. It had been so strange at first. Like most men who had never been exposed to the whole process before, I assumed that it was a little simpler than it really was. I didn't realize the radical changes my own body would make to accommodate the baby. In some ways, it was as eerie as my magical transformation from a young man into a woman.

I began to feel the first stirrings of life within me after only three months. It wasn't kicking exactly but it was something close to it. I could sense the presence of a life there that was not my own. Then I got to watch in fascination as my belly began to expand. It was thrilling at first; now it was just uncomfortable.

Seven months into the whole process, I began to feel that surely I couldn't get any bigger and surely the baby had to come any day now. No such luck. My body continued to swell up until I thought my skin couldn't stretch any more, and now my breasts were larger as well, even secreting a tiny bit of fluid occasionally. I began to sympathize with cows who needed to be milked.

If it hadn't been for Susan, I think I would have blown a fuse. Susan Jager was every bit as pregnant as I was, but the doctors treated her differently. As far as anyone in Ovid was concerned, this would be her first baby. They explained everything to her. They held her hand. They calmed her fears—fears which were every bit as great as my own. Since Susan was a former man too, I think I have enough anecdotal evidence to say that this whole pregnancy thing was made tougher for us because we had not grown up with the idea that we would have to deliver children.

When I was first transformed into a woman, I found it odd but not unpleasant. I managed to adapt to my new role fairly quickly, as most new residents of Ovid do. I'm convinced it's all part of the magic. In fact, after a few weeks, it became difficult to imagine being anyone but Cindy Patton. I had been given a pretty good life. I was attractive and I had a loving husband and two wonderful kids. Oh, the sex took a little getting used to, but by now I wouldn't have it any other way. I pity men who will never know the exhilaration of multiple orgasms. Add to all that the fact that my job was probably one of the most interesting in town—administrative assistant for the Judge—and I would have to admit I had the ideal life.

The only problem is that I got pregnant. There was nothing miraculous about that—if I discounted my initial transformation. My husband Jerry and I just decided it would be a good idea to have another child. Since we had twins, they would grow up and leave us at the same time. Why not have another one? We were young enough. And it seemed like a good idea at the time.

I guess natural girls just grow up with the idea that they'll give birth. For me though, it was a whole new concept. To be honest, I don't think I was handling it terribly well. Nobody knew about the little calendar I kept in my desk with a big red circle around my expected due date. It was getting close now, and I could hardly wait.

I felt an odd little surge between my legs and an uncomfortable kick. What would it be like, to spread my legs wide and feel intense but welcome pain as a new person forced its way out of my body? Did natural women really take it in stride? I supposed that they did. I would do my best too, but for the first time in a long time, I found myself regretting my new sex.

I waddled over to a filing cabinet to file some mundane cases that had been handled that morning. As I opened the file drawer, the files I had propped on top of the cabinet fell to the floor. Of course they spread out all over the floor. Why couldn't they at least have fallen in one place?

"Oh great!" I grumbled, wondering how I was going to pick them up in my condition. Then I heard the door open behind me. A visitor! I was so pleased. It meant I would have someone to pick up the files for me.

"Just in time!" I said happily, turning to see my friend Susan, looking equally pregnant and unable to pick up the files for me. "Oh no."

She smiled wickedly, "And I'm happy to see you, too."

I had forgotten our lunch date. Saddled with the extra weight of the baby, I was way behind in my work. Thank god the Judge had left for wherever he went in his off time after court. At least I would have the afternoon to try to catch up.

"I'm sorry," I told Susan, giving her a little hug. A little hug was all I could manage given our respective sizes. "I just dropped these files and I don't know if I can get them."

"I'll get them," a cheerful disembodied voice called out. With a pop of air, a well-dressed Oriental girl in perhaps her early twenties was suddenly standing in front of us.

"Diana!" Susan and I said together.

She shook her head, waist length black hair swirling about. "Today, I am Di Lee."

"I don't think I've ever heard a Chinese name of Di," I pointed out.

She shrugged. "Well, it sounds sort of Chinese, doesn't it?"

She had me there.

"I thought I'd buy lunch for the two of you today," she told us as she inspected our highly pregnant bodies.

"We'll gladly accept," I replied. "But I'm a little surprised to see you."

Her dark eyes widened, looking even more Oriental in the process.

"Why is that?"

"Well, there really haven't been any terribly exciting cases in Ovid for a while." It was true. Things had been somewhat slow since the flap with the Old Ones in the fall. The few new transformees we had run through the court at the end of the year were just the run of the mill types. There hadn't been a case of interest to Diana and the rest of the gods for some time. In fact, I hadn't even seen Diana for months except for a short visit around the holidays.

"There's one that interests me, though," she said with a little smile.

I thought I could guess which one it was. "You want to see the hooker who became a little boy, right?"

"Yuck! Certainly not."

"Then how about the gambler who became a junior high cheerleader?"

"Bor-ring."

I was getting frustrated. "The state patrol officer who became a secretary?"

"Wrong again."

I threw up my hands. "I give up then. Who do you want to see?"

She grinned. "I'll tell you at lunch."

“Wait,” I called as she turned to lead us out of the office. “What about the files on the floor?”

She looked at me, her eyelashes fluttering innocently. “What files?”

There were, of course, no spilled files on the floor.

It took longer than usual to walk over to The Greenhouse for lunch. Susan and I looked more like penguins than women as we waddled through the early spring day to our favorite restaurant. When we were settled at a fairly private table with Diet Cokes in hand, I asked Diana, “Okay who is it you want to see?”

“The archaeologist.”

I frowned. “That surprises me. What’s unusual about that case?” I hadn’t even reviewed that one myself, and for some reason, none of the gods had expressed any interest in it. Come to think of it, I realized, that by itself was a little suspicious.

“Nothing really,” she said coyly.

I could see I wasn’t going to get anything else out of her. Whatever it was though would become evident once we had viewed his story. The sooner we started, the sooner I would know what it was all about.

“Okay,” I sighed, feeling myself slipping into the trance that would begin the story. “Here we go...”

I could think of more pleasant places to be than the American Midwest in the winter. In fact, I couldn’t think of many more unpleasant places. I had left Columbia, Missouri that morning just ahead of a storm that promised to dump several inches of snow by nightfall. The edge of the storm, lumbering down along the I-70 corridor that bisected Missouri, gave me the incentive I needed to eschew that route in favor of a more serpentine but safer southern route. If only I could overcome my severe distaste for flying, I thought, as the first snowflakes of the day scudded along my windshield.

If I had both the money and the willpower to board another plane, I would gladly return to the Eastern Mediterranean where I had just spent the happiest months of my life. My time there in the soft, warm sea breezes had thinned my blood. Even with the car heater on at maximum, I found myself shivering as I watched the bleak winter landscape of Oklahoma rush by.

Bleak. Now there was a word that had many uses. It could describe the perennial assault of winter, and it could easily describe the reception that awaited me when I got back to UCLA where I held the title of Professor of Archaeology. I had planned on returning in triumph as my sabbatical year ended, but the events of the last few days had dashed those plans. It is said that man plans and the gods laugh. Truer words were never spoken.

Like many of my academic stature, I believed that while the university life I had chosen was nearly ideal, there were drawbacks. With the budget cuts in so many academic fields, more and more pressure was put upon us to be in the classroom. As a young graduate assistant, I took my turn in the classroom, toiling in front of lesser minds than my own, trying to teach them at least the fundamentals of a subject that should have been considered mankind's very birthright. Yet most students found the subject tedious.

At least I was actually thought by many to be a talented instructor, and I suppose I must admit I did derive some initial enjoyment from the experience. Be that as it may, I had my sights set on greater things. I admired my professors. They were men of high standing, always leading expeditions into the field, publishing books, and presenting papers. But teaching? Of course not. They were above such things. I aspired to be just like them, and who more deserving than I? For after all, I had a mission. My mission was to reach the veritable top of my field—to be responsible for discoveries too great to be ignored by even the dullest of minds.

It took me all of my youth, but I persevered. At last, I rose to the exalted rank of Professor of Archaeology at UCLA. I was halfway to my goal. The other half would be more difficult, for I had determined what my great discovery would be.

When I was a boy of only twelve, an aunt of mine gave me a Christmas present that was to have great influence on my life. It was a book on Greek and Roman mythology. The title of the book is not important—in fact, it was so elementary I am embarrassed to admit that I read it even at the tender age of twelve. But the book did fire my imagination. I began to read everything I could on the subject. Within weeks, I had devoured every book our local library had on the subject, and I was crying for more.

Fortunately, my parents indulged me. I was, after all, the youngest of my siblings. In fact, my next youngest brother was six years older than I and was just starting college, so in many ways, it was as if I was an only child. Both of my parents were well educated. My father had taught high school chemistry until the lure of higher wages in the corporate sector pulled him away. Mother had taught as well once at the elementary level, but had given it up when my father's income allowed her to stay at home and raise my siblings and me.

That combination of education and indulgence spurred them to take me the short distance from our home in Indianapolis to Bloomington, Indiana, the home of the University of Indiana. That school has one of the finest programs in mythology and folklore in the world. To say that its collection on the subject is phenomenal would be an understatement. I gasped when I saw the stacks, with shelf after shelf of obscure out-of-print books on every mythological subject imaginable. I was in love.

Yes, the love of my life was learning, and there was little room for other forms of love as a result. My parents died while I was still in graduate school. Busy on a dig in Crete, I could only shrug at their deaths in a plane crash and continue my work. I hadn't bothered to join my brother and sister at the funeral. Perhaps that was the beginning of my distancing myself from the rest of my family.

Married life proved equally unrewarding. I had married a fellow doctoral candidate at Harvard. We seemed well suited, but we soon found it was not to be. My commitment to my field was far more serious than hers, and we parted if not friends, at least as respected colleagues.

After obtaining my doctorate at Harvard, my career advanced quickly. At the age of twenty-four, my doctoral dissertation had caused quite a stir. I advanced a theory relating to a secret cabal which dominated Greek politics for decades before the Roman invasions. Fortunately for my career, I was able to defend my thesis, even parlaying it into a funded trip to Greece where I was able to prove substantial parts of my theory.

That landed me two things: first, an Associate Professorship at UCLA and second, an invitation to become a Fellow of the American Archeological Society. From then on, I never looked back.

Unfortunately, midway through my forties, I seemed to have reached a dead end. I was a full professor now with half a dozen learned books in print. The name Thomas W. Winslow was known throughout academia. The problem was that I was chained to a classroom.

I was, I suppose, a victim of the times. Once, universities were seats of learning from which scholars gleaned whatever details they saw fit. If youths came to them to be enlightened, it was up to the scholars to impart whatever they deemed important to these neophytes. Not now, though. Universities are institutions of the state. Even if private, universities must beg for every crumb from politicians and bureaucrats whose intellect is mediocre at best. We are all slaves to political correctness and the whims of the masses. Money is tight. What this meant to scholars like me is that the new goal of universities was to fill young heads with mush and push them out into the world with a degree in hand which proved their intellectual accomplishments no better than the degree the Wizard of Oz gave to the Tin Man. In short, it was my fate in life to spend so much time in the classroom that there was little time for research.

I remembered my own undergraduate days back in Indiana. The classrooms were then manned by instructors or assistant professors—unimportant men whose limitations condemned them to lesser roles than the research undertaken by full professors. Their worn tweed coats and their rheumy eyes spoke volumes about their lives. Was I to be condemned to a similar fate in spite of my apparent status?

But I still had hope. I had developed a theory about the very nature of the Roman gods which I was sure I could prove with proper financial backing. It was just a little over a year ago that my Department Chairman, Raymond Jensen delivered the good news.

“Congratulations, Tom,” he said, smiling as he laid the grant file on my desk. Ray was a decent sort. Of course, as the Department Chair, he was more politician than scholar, but at least he seemed to be genuinely interested in advancing the needs of his staff. “It’s everything you asked for.”

My grant proposal had been made to so many funding agencies that I had lost count. Excited, I opened the file. There it was—a grant large enough for me to travel the Eastern Mediterranean for a full year with a small staff. Then I noticed the name of the funding organization: “The Olympus Foundation?”

Ray sat down in front of my desk, chuckling, “Appropriate name, don’t you think?”

“I suppose it is,” I admitted. “Who are they?”

“They work with a couple of other major funds. It’s there in the grant. Apparently they have a charter to ‘advance the cause of civilization’, or some such nonsense. God only knows where some of these groups come up with their goals and objectives. This is a first for them, though. They’ll be funding all of this grant—not just a part of it as they usually do.”

I scanned the document. The Olympus Foundation had an impressive board. Although not always politically astute, I knew enough to recognize several of the names as leading political figures and...

“There’s an admiral on this list of directors—an Admiral Nepper,” I pointed out.

Ray shrugged. “So?”

“What interest does the military have in something like this? Is this some undercover operation?”

“What do you mean?”

I sighed, shaking my head. "Ray, I'll be travelling all over the Eastern Med. That includes Israel and maybe Lebanon and Syria. I suppose they want to have someone come along to represent the Foundation, eh? Maybe that someone will be CIA."

Ray looked at me quizzically. "Aren't you being a little paranoid? Read the grant. There's no requirement for one of their people to tag along. This is your show, Tom. This is a big coup for you and the University. Don't blow it."

I didn't blow it. I felt like Indiana Jones as I put together the expedition and girded my loins for the inevitable plane ride to the Med. The year had proven to be the greatest year of my life, and what I had found, I had managed to keep secret from even my own small staff. My theory had been entirely correct. Of course, I had couched my theory in more acceptable terms that would appeal to funding sources. As far as my staff and the Olympus Foundation was concerned, I had set out to prove the influences of Graeco-Roman theology on the early settlements and colonies in the Eastern Mediterranean. Actually, I had set out to prove much more—and I had succeeded.

Now, though, I was back. My year's sabbatical was at an end. Several more weeks of meticulously compiling my results awaited me, but I had been given a full class load as well that I would be expected to handle. I was returning to Hell with only scraps of time to put my findings together. And what I had found—if believed—would shake the very foundations of Western civilization.

And to my dismay, the University had scheduled a series of lectures for my return as well, to be delivered at several major universities under the auspices of the American Archaeological Society. I had tried to beg off, but the Olympus Foundation also insisted. Their grant had been generous, and if I ever wanted to apply to them again, I would not want to anger them. The piper did indeed call the tune. It was at one of these lectures just days ago at the University of Missouri in Columbia that my triumph began to unravel.

I was careful in my lecture to keep my most important findings hidden from the audience. One of the more Machiavellian aspects of academia is the propensity of scholars to snipe at each other's findings. To prevent this, it is often necessary to hold back information until results are reported in a formal paper. This was my plan, so I was careful to speak in only the most general terms. I was determined to surrender only small fragments of what I had learned, and none of those fragments would alert anyone to the more important elements of my discoveries.

I had not known that the University of Missouri has one of the top journalism schools in the country. Therefore, it is not uncommon for the media elite to send their own children there. It was one of those children—a journalism major no doubt—who asked the question which proved to be my undoing.

"Doctor Winslow," the pretty young blonde asked from her seat in the middle of the crowd, "you almost sound as if you believe the old Roman and Greek gods exist. Are they... say aliens or something?"

I took the question as one made in jest and answered it in a similar fashion. "I suppose anything is possible," I said with a smile which was calculated to let the audience know that I knew something they did not.

I thought nothing more about the incident, busying myself with backtracking to St Louis for a speech at Washington University there. Imagine my surprise when I returned from that speech to find that Ray Jensen had left an urgent message for me.

"Tom, are you out of your mind?" Those were his first words to me, taking me aback.

"What are you talking about, Ray?" I had never heard him so agitated.

"Then you don't know? You haven't seen the papers today?"

A complimentary copy of the St Louis Post Dispatch was on my bed, unread. As Ray ranted in my ear, I picked up the paper. The article I knew he was referring to wasn't hard to find. It actually made the front section:

NOTED PROFESSOR CLAIMS GREEK GODS CAME FROM SPACE

I spotted my name at once. Oh my god, I realized. It was a story from a wire service. That meant the story was all over the world.

“Ray, this isn’t true,” I said indignantly. I went on to explain what had actually been said.

“Tom,” Ray began through obviously gritted teeth, “that little blonde who asked the question is the daughter of Morton McKee.”

My blood froze. Everyone knew who Morton McKee was. He had parlayed a supermarket rag into a nationwide newspaper which was challenging USA Today. In spite of its tabloid style, The National Dispatch had gained nationwide attention, and McKee now ruled an empire which included newspapers, magazines, and even cable channels and god only knew what else.

Undoubtedly, my young blonde protagonist had been asking the question to get precisely the sort of response I had given her. I cursed myself for being so naïve. It was nothing but a coy little bit of repartee and yet it might do untold damage to my career.

“We have to refute the article,” I told Ray.

“What do you think we’re already doing?” Ray returned. “I’ve already gotten calls from the Chancellor and two of the Regents. And then there’s all the newspapers and broadcasting stations. We even got a call from Good Morning America. We’ve told them all you were quoted out of context. But Tom, you’ve been badly damaged by this.”

He was right. Any results I published would be overshadowed by this exaggerated example of yellow journalism. And as far as my confidential findings... well, no one would believe me now, even if I offered them proof. Unless something drastic was done, I would be remembered forever as the man who said the gods were from outer space.

“I’ll cut short my tour,” I offered. I hadn’t really wanted the speaking tour anyhow. It had been forced on me by the Olympus Foundation. They would surely understand that correcting this misconception was of paramount importance.

“That’s a good idea, Tom.”

So there I was, glumly crossing the Midwest on my way back to California. I was being forced to drive to my own execution—or so I felt. Oh, I knew what would happen. I would be allowed to publish my findings, but only after a committee of my peers, appointed by the Chancellor, had gone over it with the proverbial fine-toothed comb. What would be left would be a paper that was dull at best and so pedestrian that it would never justify the grant money spent to generate it. I would be for all practical purposes disgraced, hidden away in a classroom teaching ‘Beginning Archaeology’ to a class that didn’t want to be there any more than I did.

To add to my misery, the snow was becoming heavier, mixed with a cold rain that was freezing quickly to the pavement. I wasn’t used to that sort of weather. Sure, I had grown up in Indiana, but my years in California had thinned my blood and weakened my winter driving senses. I had forgotten how treacherous icy roads could be.

By concentrating, I was able to stay on the road, but I had to reduce my speed to the point that several cars with local license plates pulled around me at what I could only consider rash speeds. When the latest of these speeders roared around me, fishtailing ever so slightly on the slick road, I was relieved. There was no more traffic around.

My relief was ill founded. Inching around a blind curve, I was suddenly startled by the presence of a large delivery truck. Apparently, the driver was having problems of his own controlling his vehicle, and he had crossed the yellow centerline ever so slightly. The sudden presence of the truck so close to my own vehicle caused me to swerve toward the shoulder. Impulsively, I jerked the wheel back the other way. It was the wrong thing to do. In a heartbeat, my car had jumped off the road, heading for a small stand of trees. I closed my eyes, bracing for impact.

It never came. I opened my eyes slowly. There, to my left and behind me, was the stand of trees. At the last moment, my car had swerved a little to the right, narrowly missing the trees which would have most likely ended my life. I sighed in relief. I would live.

Yes, I would live. I would live to face my disgrace. Perhaps it would have been better, I thought to myself, if I had hit the trees. No, I realized. That would do no good. Had I hit them and been killed, my obituary would have talked about my supposed theory that the gods were aliens. UFO cults would probably spring up, believing that I had been killed by the aliens. Or maybe they would say I was killed by the government so I couldn't prove that Jupiter and his fellow gods had landed on a spaceship. No, I would live. Even disgrace was better than such a ludicrous legacy.

It was then that I noticed I was not alone. Up there on the road, a white car with dancing red and blue flashers had pulled to the side of the road about at the point where I had left the highway. A police officer of some sort was standing by the car, looking down at me. From where I was, I could see he was tall and slender, and when he began to move toward me, he was almost graceful. In spite of the cold, he wore no coat over his blue uniform shirt. He was hatless as well. I couldn't see his eyes though. In spite of the grayness of the day, he wore mirrored sunglasses. In short, he acted as if it were a mild spring day instead of a cold, dreary one.

He tapped on my car window. Nearly paralyzed from my near catastrophe, I suddenly realized I should have gotten out of the car to greet him. Fumbling, I managed to put down the car window.

"Having trouble?" he asked calmly.

"Yes... yes I am," I answered, very happy he was there to help me. I had been so startled by the mishap that I might have sat there stunned until I froze.

"Are you all right?"

"I think so," I responded. I got out of the damaged car as he opened the door for me. "I'm just a little shaken up."

"I'll take you back to town," he offered. With that, he turned and started back to get his police car without waiting for my response.

“What about my car?” I asked.

“It will be taken care of,” he replied tonelessly, never bothering to turn around.

I wasn’t sure if he’d even wait for me if I stayed next to my car. So I hurried up the embankment after him, nearly slipping to the ground more than once. Yet the officer had had no trouble climbing the hill. He had seemed to ignore the snow and ice completely.

An odd fellow, I thought as I approached the car. I looked down at the crest on the door. It was the typical blue shield with what appeared to be an eagle in flight in the center. Below it in black were the words ‘City of Ovid.’ I had never heard of Ovid, Oklahoma, but then again I had never heard of the past dozen or so towns I had driven through. Well, as long as it was big enough for me to arrange new transportation and be on my way, it would suffice. Did small towns have car rental agencies? I wasn’t exactly sure. If not, I would have to pay someone to get me to the nearest large town.

Our drive was conducted in silence. Not once did the strange officer—Officer Mercer, I noted from his nametag—speak. That was all right with me. I had no desire to strike up a long-winded conversation with some country constable. Of course, I had to admit, Officer Mercer didn’t look like the stereotype of a small town police officer that I held in my mind. In some ways, he even looked familiar. Although I could not see his eyes under the dark lenses, there was something vaguely recognizable about him, as if I had seen him or at least his picture before.

Ovid was a much larger town than I had imagined. If I had to guess, I would have placed it as larger than ten thousand but under twenty thousand residents. The phrase small town covers a lot of ground. In Wyoming or Montana, Ovid would have been considered a fairly large community, complete with a shopping mall and probably its own TV station. In the more populous Midwest, though, Ovid was just one more mundane small community—or so I thought at the time.

Two things struck me about Ovid—other than of course its unlikely name. I mean, who would have named a small farming community in Oklahoma after a Roman poet? The first thing was that in spite of apparent prosperity, certain establishments seemed to be missing. I had grown up in the Midwest, and I knew that I should have seen a McDonald's or a Burger King, or at the very least a Pizza Hut or Kentucky Fried Chicken. Instead, there were only local establishments. Oh, they looked prosperous enough. The largest of them, a 'Rusty's Burger Barn,' even sported a large neon sign which would have been impressive even for a national franchise. The same was true of service stations and convenience stores. They were there, but they sported names I had never seen before, so I could only assume that they were local names. Why had national firms bypassed this little town?

The other thing I noted were the people. They were uniformly neat and well dressed, denoting again a local prosperity. However, some of them seemed to have an almost ethereal appearance. It was if I could see through them if I concentrated hard enough. I dismissed this as merely tired eyes, adversely affected by the tense drive. Perhaps I had even bumped my head slightly when my car skidded off the road.

In any case, Ovid had the look of a town that was almost too good to be true. It was almost like a Hollywood version that exhibited all of the virtues of Small Town America. I could imagine it was a town of high school marching bands and ice cream socials where the biggest social event of the year was the Elks Club chilli supper.

I had visions of being stuck in this proverbial burg for a few days while I awaited a rental car from Tulsa or some other nearby town where indoor plumbing was in vogue. I couldn't imagine a worse fate than being stuck in a place like Ovid for a few days while my professional reputation continued to unravel. At least, I noted from the signs, there was a small college in the town. I had never heard of Capta College and wasn't surprised by that fact.

Officer Mercer pulled up in front of an official-looking building that declared itself to be 'City Hall' from the letters carved in the granite face. I braced myself for the inevitable forms which would have to be filled out to account for my accident. Sure enough, we were headed directly for the Police Department. I chastised myself for having an unreasonable fear of flying. If it were not for that, I would already be back in Los Angeles defending my besmirched reputation.

A very pretty black woman dressed in a uniform like Officer Mercer's smiled from her desk just inside the door. "Good morning, Officer Mercer."

"Good morning, Wanda," he replied with the first genuinely friendly tone I had heard from him. "You need to book Dr. Winslow here."

"Book me!" I cried out. I was too stunned to realize until later that I had never given him my name. "I've had an auto accident; I haven't robbed a bank! Why am I being treated this way?"

"The charge?" the woman—Wanda—asked as if I hadn't spoken.

"Reckless driving," came the reply.

This was too much. "I wasn't being reckless," I argued. "I was driving quite sensibly. Road conditions were responsible for my mishap. If you want to arrest someone, arrest your county maintenance department for improperly plowing and sanding the roads. I need to report this to the rental company and get on my way."

Officer Mercer looked at me through his mirrored lenses. "We will take care of your car." Then looking at Wanda, he asked, "Is the Judge ready to see him now?"

As if on cue, her phone rang. Listening for a moment, she replied, "Yes, he'll see Dr. Winslow now."

My eyes narrowed. "I get it now," I said, reaching for my wallet. "This is one of those speed traps. All right, so how much do I have to pay you to be on my way?"

"You need to see the Judge," Officer Mercer replied, surprising me as he gently but firmly took my arm and led me away.

It had to be a speed trap, I thought to myself. Many small towns in America had run speed traps through the years. It was like a big game. The police and judges would arrest speeders travelling just a few miles per hour over the legal limit. They would then fine them, but the money would never make its way into the town coffers. They would split the proceeds, never reporting the cases. Many states had cracked down on the process, and the Interstate Highway System had routed around many of the small communities, so the practice had fallen on hard times. Apparently, I thought, it was still thriving in Ovid.

I expected to be taken into the magistrate's chambers where the fine would be discretely handled with outsiders being none the wiser. That was, I was sure, how such clandestine matters were taken care of. So I was surprised to be delivered to an open courtroom, complete with spectators. Well, one spectator anyhow.

Seated in the gallery was a very attractive blonde woman. She was seated, so it was difficult to tell, but it appeared that she might be pregnant. I wondered why she was there. Maybe like me she was awaiting a trial. Well, no matter.

Of more importance was the woman who sat at the defense stand. She, too, was very attractive—a brunette of about average height it appeared. And when she stood to greet me, I could see that she was most definitely pregnant, the lines of her blue business suit interrupted to accommodate a loose silk blouse that covered her gravid condition.

She gave me a professional smile and offered her feminine hand. "I'm Susan Jager, Dr. Winslow," she announced as I took her hand. Her handshake was unusually firm for a woman, I noted. "I'm your attorney."

My eyebrows rose. "My attorney? I wasn't aware I would need one." I felt myself fully qualified to represent myself in such a trivial matter.

"The Judge prefers it," she explained. "The proceedings here are a little... unusual."

"Yes," I replied drolly, "I'm sure they are." I was sure this would mean the fine would be even larger. Apparently, Ovid's little speed trap would involve payment of an attorney to 'defend' me as well.

“We just have a few minutes before court is in session,” Susan Jager continued, ignoring my comments. “As I understand the case, you lost control of your vehicle and spun until your car came to a rest in a ditch near a stand of trees. Does that cover it?”

I nodded carefully.

She returned the nod. “Fine. Then we can plead guilty and move to have the punishment waived.”

“Of course,” I said in apparent agreement. In fact, I had no intention of pleading guilty in that kangaroo court. I could see the plan clearly. I would plead guilty with the hope of a suspended sentence only to have this so-called judge throw the book at me. I would be leaving myself wide open to a large fine.

“All rise!” Officer Mercer called out, apparently acting as bailiff. “The Municipal Court of the City of Ovid, Oklahoma, is now in session, the Honorable Judge presiding.”

I rose to my feet and stared directly into the face of the Judge. When I did, my blood froze. I had seen the face before. Well, not exactly the face, but the eyes... They were the eyes that had stared back at me from countless statues in my travels. They were the eyes that the finest sculptors of an earlier age had managed to somehow capture. They were the eyes of... No, it couldn't be! He was just a local magistrate. It was just a coincidence.

The Judge to most eyes would have appeared to be a man gracefully entering middle age. His hair and beard were both brown but with the promise of gray to come. His gold-rimmed glasses sat comfortably on a patrician nose, doing little to disguise the piercing blue eyes that spoke of both power and intelligence. His robe was pressed so neatly that its pleats looked sharp enough to cut through wood.

“Be seated,” he ordered. His voice was not the deep bass one might expect from a figure of such authority, but it was a voice that was obviously used to being obeyed, rich and confident with just the trace of an Oklahoman accent. He reviewed what I presumed to be charges placed before him. Then, after an almost inaudible “humph” he spoke.

“The Court will now hear the case of the City of Ovid versus Dr. Thomas Winslow. The defendant will rise.”

I did, almost without thinking. To my right, Susan Jager also rose.

“The defendant is charged with reckless driving. How does the defendant plead?” the Judge asked.

“Your Honor,” my appointed attorney began, but she got no further.

“I plead not guilty, Your Honor,” I interposed. I had thought about keeping my mouth shut, but I can now admit that my ego got in the way. There was no way this country justice could be who he appeared to be. No, I told myself, I had merely been fooled by seeing a man in a black robe who somehow looked like a figure whose mythological essence had been sometimes captured in stone. In spite of everything, I had discovered on my expedition to the Eastern Mediterranean, I could not believe that I had stumbled across the proof in such a manner. This had to be just a bizarre coincidence.

To my surprise, the Judge smiled. “I thought you might,” he said calmly.

I said nothing, but I could hear my attorney sigh in frustration.

“You have been accused of reckless driving,” he continued. In another venue, this might have returned the fantastic to the mundane, but not here. There was a building presence in the room—a presence that made me feel suddenly uncomfortable. I began to become concerned. “I will address you directly, Dr. Winslow, since you foolishly seem to be ignoring the advice of counsel.”

I gulped. I had erred—of that I was becoming certain.

“I suspect also that you more than any other man to face me in this room have at least an inkling of who I am and what we are doing here.”

Oh my god, I thought. Why did I have to be right?

“That being the case, I will dispense with some of the trappings others find familiar and proceed directly to the issues at hand.”

I felt a small disturbance in the air. Then, when I looked around, I saw my attorney frozen in place. The blonde woman in the gallery was also stationary. Yet whatever the Judge had done, it had no effect on Officer Mercer, the Judge, or me.

The door to the courtroom opened and closed softly. From the corner of my eye, I could see that another woman had joined us, but I couldn't see her clearly without taking my eyes completely off the Judge. This I was unwilling—or perhaps unable now—to do.

“Then you are... Zeus?” I ventured. If I was wrong, I would look like a complete fool. But I was sure I was right. It was in concert with what I had learned on my expedition.

“I prefer the name Jupiter,” he said calmly, his eyes narrowed as he stared at me. “Here I am referred to quite simply as ‘The Judge.’ You are an unusual man to believe in me so readily, Dr. Winslow.”

“I have good reason to believe in you,” I told him, sounding more calm than I felt. I was in the presence of a being far more powerful than most people could ever imagine. With a wave of his hand, he could blot me out of existence if he wished. I had walked into the courtroom convinced I was about to be railroaded into an excessive fine. How I now wished that that were so. Now, I had come to realize I had much more to lose.

“Yes,” the Judge agreed. “Your expedition. Did you think we wouldn't learn of it?”

My heart nearly stopped. I should have known this was no coincidence. I had learned more about the gods in that one expedition than scholars had gleaned from centuries of research, for I had learned that they were very real. And my entire expedition had been funded by...

“The Olympus Foundation,” I muttered softly.

I was rewarded with a grim smile. “Yes, Dr. Winslow, the Olympus Foundation. We fund it, of course. The members of the Board of Directors you met were, of course, part of our pantheon.”

“But why did you finance me?” I asked. “You knew I would find what you had done.”

He nodded. “Yes, we knew. But as an old friend of mine in England once said, you must keep your friends close and your enemies closer.”

Was that what I was? Was I the enemy of the gods?

“By financing your expedition, we would be able to know what you discovered,” he explained.

“But you didn’t even have anyone accompany me on the expedition,” I pointed out. “Wouldn’t that have been easier for you?”

“Oh yes,” he admitted, “but it really wasn’t necessary. We knew by the reports you gave to the Foundation what you would discover. It has always been in plain sight for those who are willing to believe. We knew you would wait to organize your findings. That’s why we arranged your little speaking tour. We knew that would delay your published results and give us time to discredit your findings.”

In spite of my fear, I could feel my anger rise. “The stories of gods being aliens. You devised them to discredit me?”

“Of course,” he laughed. “It was necessary to lure you here.”

I reviewed the chain of events in my mind. I returned to the United States only to be informed that my speaking tour began at once. Then, once they had me in the Midwest, I was asked an innocent question which was misconstrued into the sensationalist treatment of my speech. Were Morton McKee and his daughter gods? Maybe not, but at the very least, they had been influenced by the gods. So I had cut my tour short. Come to think of it, it was strange that no one at the Foundation had objected, but I was too upset at the time to notice. Then, the weather had forced me further south and straight into Ovid. I had little doubt that even the weather had been part of their plan.

“So what now?” I asked, resigned to my fate. I did not expect to live much longer.

“Now, we continue the trial,” the Judge replied. “Formalities must be observed, you understand.”

Again, I felt the subtle movement of air through the courtroom, and I could hear my attorney busily writing a note on her legal pad. She had no idea what had just happened. To her, no additional time had passed. I looked around at the blonde. She, too, was able to move again, and it was with only mild surprise that she looked at the new spectator in the room.

The new arrival had entered when time had stopped, so I had no doubt that she, too, was a god—or rather a goddess. She was very attractive and appeared to be forty or so with light brown hair fashionably but conservatively styled. She wore a business suit of winter white, and she sat with such poise and grace that one could almost expect her to be royalty. I suppose in a way, she was.

“The Court has no choice but to find you guilty of reckless driving, Dr. Winslow,” the Judge intoned formally. “Sentence will now be carried out.”

So I supposed in a way, I had been correct, I thought at that moment. It was a kangaroo court of sorts. The only thing was that the consequences would be much more severe. I firmly expected the next moments to be my last. After all, I knew things about the gods that no other living man knew—things which could actually change the way mankind looked at the universe. I braced myself for the fatal blow. Was I in fear of what was about to happen? I suppose I was, but in a way, it was gratifying to know that I had discovered something so important that the very gods themselves called for my death.

My body began to tingle as the Judge began to chant in an ancient form of Latin I had heretofore only read and never heard spoken. The words were powerful. They spoke of the very nature of reality and spoke of things I had never imagined could be. As the Judge stopped his chant, the tingling became even more intense. I looked down at myself. My chino slacks were rippling, as if they were being rewoven. In a moment that seemed to last forever, I saw that was indeed the case. They fused, the material becoming softer while the khaki color remained, and the fabric began to crawl up my legs until it reached just above my knee, tightening along the plane of my legs.

So fascinated had I become watching the material that it took a moment for my mind to realize that something had happened to my flesh as well. My legs were now smooth, hairless, and far slimmer than they had been. And they were covered in a thin mesh which made them look almost tan. Involuntarily, I arched onto my toes, feeling shoes form under my feet with a two-inch heel forming under them.

I was being attired as a woman, I realized with a gasp. Then as a wisp of long honey blonde hair tickled my ear and lengthened before my eyes, I realized it was more than just my clothing. I raised my hands, seeing suddenly thin wrists and delicate fingers with nails which were fairly short but rounded in a most feminine manner and coated in a faint pink polish.

My chest rose and fell quickly as I nearly hyperventilated, but each time it fell, it seemed to rest above the level to which it had fallen last. Breasts were developing, I realized, beneath my shirt which had suddenly become a soft white woman's blouse, silky and feminine and so nearly transparent that I could see the lines of a bra beneath it.

I couldn't see my face, but I could feel it reshaping and I could taste something sweet on my lips. As I blinked my eyes, I felt the presence of longer eyelashes and felt my sense of color shift slightly. Then, I felt the final stab of transformation as I experienced a void between my legs that even my widened hips could not conceal. Dear God, I was a woman!

I looked up at the Judge who was watching the transformation with the mild interest of a being who had undoubtedly viewed it many times before. I looked about the room, feeling my longer hair swinging against my face. Officer Mercer and the three women in the room also showed no surprise. This was obviously nothing out of the ordinary for them as well.

"What..." I began, nearly choking on the word uttered in my new alto voice. "What have you done to me?"

“I should think the answer would be rather obvious, Ms. Reynolds,” he replied.

“Who?”

“Ms. Reynolds,” he repeated. “That is your name now. You are Alicia Sue Reynolds—Ally to your friends. It’s all in your purse over there.”

He nodded at the defendant’s table. There, next to my bemused attorney was a tan leather purse, very close in color to the heels I now wore.

“You’ll have time to look through it later,” he said lightly. “Right now, you need to get to work.”

Work? This was all happening too fast. I didn’t have any work here. I needed to get back to Los Angeles and my job at UCLA. What was happening here? I wasn’t this—what was her name?—Alicia Sue Reynolds. I was...

“Ally, we need to go.”

I looked up, still half dazed, to face the woman who had just arrived in the courtroom. She was looking at me calmly—almost primly—as if there was nothing out of the ordinary. “Go? Go where?” I asked in confusion.

“You’ll see,” she replied with a friendly smile. “Come on now. You have no further business here.”

I picked up the purse and dutifully followed her out of the courtroom, feeling for the first time the odd sway of feminine hips. And I was walking in heels, I told myself, unsure how my body could do that without stumbling. It was as if my body knew what to do even if my mind didn’t.

The woman led me out into the chilly air to her car, a nondescript blue Buick. So this was the chariot of the gods, I thought with grim amusement. Numbly, I climbed in the front seat as if I had been a woman all my life, sitting first before moving my legs inside the car to avoid problems with my skirt.

“There’s a coat for you in the back seat,” she told me as she started the car. “It’s supposed to get colder today, so don’t forget it.”

I looked in the back seat at the tan women’s trench coat. Yes, I would need it, I realized, suddenly aware of how cold my exposed legs had been as we had walked to the car. And the silky crème-colored blouse I now wore had offered little protection from the cold, causing my expanded nipples to harden embarrassingly.

“Who... who are you?” I managed to ask in my high, sweet voice.

“I am Dr. Miner,” she replied as she pulled out of the parking lot. “I am superintendent of Schools for the Ovid School District.”

“Miner...” I mused. “Minerva?”

She looked at me with the smile a mother might give a bright child.

“Very good, my dear, but I should warn you that you will not be able to speak our names in such a fashion unless we permit it—which we seldom do. Don’t try that again. The results are somewhat unpleasant. Now, we haven’t much time, but I need to acquaint you with your new role here.”

“New role?” I asked. “I don’t want to be here. I have important work to do. I need to get back to Los Angeles. I need to be changed back.”

Yes, looking back on it, I was babbling. I was just making a fool of myself. But I had never been transformed into someone else before, so I was a little at a loss as to how to handle it.

“Dear, we really haven’t time for all of that,” she admonished me gently. “You of all people should understand that what has happened to you is permanent. You are Ally Reynolds and will be her for the rest of your life.”

“But my work...”

“Your work never happened,” she told me flatly. “Your books were never written. Your expeditions—including this last one—never occurred. In fact, no one—even your old family—has ever heard of Thomas Winslow. Do I make myself clear?”

If I thought I had been shocked to find myself transformed into a woman, it was nothing compared to what I felt as this... goddess informed me that I had never existed. My life's work—gone! It was almost too much to take. I felt a sudden urge to burst into tears, managing only at the last moment to stifle the urge with a hard gulp. I looked down at myself—or perhaps I should say the self that I had become. I was undeniably a woman, apparently from the delicate skin on the back of my hands a young one. There were objects hanging from my ears and the taste of lipstick and a nylon mesh embracing my slender legs. There was a bra restraining what appeared to be undeniably feminine breasts. And as for what was between my legs... I was most certainly not Thomas Winslow. I was someone else.

Dr. Miner saw the resignation in my face. “Good, now that that has been settled, I need to tell you what you will need to know to get started today. You’re really quite privileged, you know. Most of our newcomers are forced to make their own way discovering their new lives. Of course, most don’t remember their old lives at all, so it isn’t an issue for them.”

I remained silent and attentive. I had no other choice since I knew I was in way over my head. My ego was taking a very serious blow as I sat there in the car next to a woman who was in fact a goddess. When I had set out on my expedition, I had done so with the objective of securing my own place in history. I was about to prove something which would have seemed mere fantasy before my expedition. But I had never considered that the gods were still active and would not want anyone to tell their secret. I had paid for my carelessness with, for all practical purposes, my life. Thomas Winslow was no more. I knew that no amount of pleading or threatening would change that.

I looked down at myself. This was who I now was and would be for the rest of my life. I had no choice but to assume the role of Ally Reynolds. I would have to accept her life, whatever it was. So I decided to listen carefully and without comment.

“Ah, here we are!” Dr. Miner said lightly.

I looked up in time to see the car pull into a parking lot behind a sign that said Northside Elementary. Oh my god, I thought to myself as my new role in Ovid began to dawn on me. There really was a hell.

"That's right," Dr. Miner said with a mischievous smile as she parked. "You are to be a teacher. You'll have third grade. The regular teacher is out on maternity leave. She started labor a little early, so that opened the job for you. It's temporary, of course, but if you do a good job, I'm sure Principal Dale will find a full time position for you next year."

"But I... I... can't teach children!" I practically wailed. "I don't know what to do!" I had had enough difficulty teaching undergraduates and they were for all practical purposes adults. How was I to teach children?

"Oh nonsense," she replied. "Now come on. Principal Dale is waiting for us."

"But what about... about everything else?" I asked, not quite sure what to ask first about my new life.

"Oh, the rest will come to you; don't worry, Ally. Just follow me."

I followed her in stunned silence, making furtive looks into the various classrooms we passed along the way. I could hear the giggling of small children which nearly caused me to shudder. Then there were the clear, precisely enunciated tones of the teachers. Would I have to talk like that? Was this really to be my fate, standing before fresh-scrubbed young faces trying to fill their little heads with the fundamental knowledge that adults take for granted? That was even worse than discovering I was a woman.

"Now," Dr. Miner said quietly to me as we walked down the hallway, "a little background information is in order. You've been working as a substitute teacher around Ovid this last year. Before that, you lived and taught in Iowa, but a divorce from your husband and an ailing mother on a farm not far from Ovid brought you back here. Your mother died last fall, allowing you to move into a small apartment here in Ovid, but it happened too late for you to get a teaching contract for this year."

She could see the calculations going on behind my eyes. “No, Ally, there was no inheritance to speak of. And you have no family. You should be happy about that since family never meant much to you. You are here all alone now with no visible means of support. You need this teaching job to put food on the table. And by the way, consider yourself fortunate. Most of our newcomers don’t get this much of a briefing, but I thought you needed to know these things so you don’t make an ass of yourself. It would make securing a permanent teaching job far more difficult, don’t you think?”

I was a little hurt that she thought I would mishandle this new life. Unfortunately, she was probably correct. I was not pleased with the role I had been given and would probably have said or done something wrong which might have cost me a permanent job. I needed to be reminded that I had no other choices but to play the role I had been given. I was certain I would have to remind myself of that often. The gods had decided what my fate would be. Whom the gods would destroy, they would first make an elementary school teacher.

“Here we are!” Dr. Miner said brightly, motioning me into the administrative offices. A plump fiftyish woman with light brown hair going slowly gray stood and came around her desk. Instinctively, I put my right hand out to shake hers but quickly found both of my small feminine hands being held by her larger ones, pudgy fingers wrapped around mine. I was shocked to note that Principal Dale seemed somewhat insubstantial. By that I mean it was almost as if I could see through her but not quite. It’s difficult to explain. Suffice it to say I was surprised at the warmth and substantial feel of her hands.

“Oh Ally, thank god you’re here,” she said with a bright smile, eyes twinkling. “Dana is watching the class for you right now. We were caught by surprise when Kristi had to go into the hospital this morning. You know, the baby isn’t due for another two weeks, but the doctor is worried about how she’s carrying it.”

There was a look of stricken concern on my face. To be honest, it was concern for myself and how I would get through all of this, but Principal Dale thought I was concerned about this Kristi person. “Oh, don't worry, dear. She'll be just fine. It's not that uncommon, you know—or you will know some day.”

I hadn't thought of that. She was relating to me as if I was a woman—a woman who might someday get pregnant. Just when I was thinking it couldn't get any worse...

“Now Kristi left all of her lesson plans in her desk. I know you've never subbed for her before, so you'll probably want to review those plans tonight. These are very good kids, though. You'll have a fine class. You're lucky you didn't have to do this a couple of weeks ago when they got back from Christmas break. It took them a little time to settle down then.”

Yes, this was hell.

“Now, you'll probably want to freshen up a little before you go in,” she continued. She might as well have been telling me to check all of my gear before I went into combat. “You know where the teacher's restrooms are. I'll give you a few minutes and we can meet back here.”

I didn't know where the teacher's restrooms were, but she had motioned the direction with her head. First, I needed to talk to Dr. Miner, but when I turned, I saw she was gone. Come to think of it, she hadn't gone into Principal Dale's office with me. I suspected that as far as Principal Dale was concerned, I had shown up in her office alone.

I avoided the obvious error of going into the men's restroom. My new body gave me constant reminders of my new sex. I would never have been tempted to enter a men's room in a skirt and heels as the flesh on my chest and rear swayed softly and the long hair brushed against my ears and neck.

After struggling with my outfit, I managed to relieve myself. It didn't prove as difficult as I had thought that it might. I was quickly finding that if I just let myself go, I knew what to do, including wiping myself like a good girl. When I consciously pulled myself back from that trance-like state, I was standing in front of the mirror 'fixing' my lipstick.

That chore finished, I took stock of who I had become, seeing my face for the first time. I suddenly realized I looked a little like that woman who had played a teacher in Kindergarten Cop. What was her name? Oh yes, Penelope Ann Miller. Well, to be fair, I suppose I wasn't quite as attractive as her, but my hair was about the same color and length. My face wasn't quite as cute as hers, my nose being a little straighter and my eyes not quite as attractive, and my hair was a little longer, but on the whole, I wasn't a bad looking woman.

Strangely, that thought didn't bother me as much as it should have. I never had any strange hidden desires to be anyone other than the person I had been born as. Who I was had never been as important to me as succeeding in my chosen field. I supposed that had I been born black or female, or whatever else, I would still have been an archaeologist. To be honest, I wasn't really much of a sexual being at all. Our society tends to attempt to define men and women as heterosexual or homosexual, but it seldom categorizes them by degree.

By that, I mean I had always considered myself a heterosexual male, but I hadn't followed the normal heterosexual pattern of finding a woman to make my wife and live happily ever after. I had been male second and an archaeologist first. Given the choice of uncovering an artefact or bedding a woman, I would have been happier with the artefact. Of course, I was hardly a virgin, but months would go between my sexual encounters and that was all right with me.

So there I was, standing in front of that mirror, seeing myself well for the first time. I was obviously a woman. I could do nothing about that, I was certain. I would find a way to live with that if I had to. But my sense of loss came not from my change of sex but rather from my change of occupation. I was no longer an archaeologist. If I were, by some chance, able to gain an audience before my former colleagues, they would not see me as an archaeologist. My degree, I was certain, probably proclaimed me to be the graduate of some small teacher's college, and even if I were to quote from memory every ruler of every ancient Persian dynasty, I would hardly be considered worthy of their association. My sex would matter little to them, but my credentials would matter greatly.

No, I was an elementary teacher. I was deemed qualified only to impart fundamental skills such as basic arithmetic and English and science so fundamental that it was absolutely banal. I would have to stand before creatures barely out of diapers and try to mold them into human beings. I remembered the old proverb: whom the gods would destroy, they would first make mad. Well, if a classroom filled with thirty or so schoolchildren didn't drive me mad, what would?

Principal Dale was waiting patiently for me when I returned to her office. The only difference between her and an executioner as far as I was concerned was that she had a smile on her face. "Shall we go meet your class, Ally?"

"Okay." What else could I say? I was stuck as Ally Reynolds, elementary school teacher.

I knew in the next few moments how a condemned man must feel as he is led slowly down that long corridor to his foreordained place of execution. I tried to tell myself that if I had been able to teach Fundamentals of Archaeology at UCLA to a class full of bored students trying only to get an elective out of the way, I could handle a bunch of third graders. How old were third graders? Eight? Nine? What would I have to teach them? Were they even toilet trained at that age?

I wasn't sure I could handle the assignment, but I knew in my heart that I had no choice. This was the role I had been given by the gods—much to their amusement, I was certain. If I failed to do a good job, I was certain that my next assignment—if there was one—would be even more onerous. With a deep, heartfelt sigh, I followed Principal Dale into the classroom.

There were some basic math drills up on the blackboard, and a young boy was carefully writing the answer to one of them as the rest of the class watched. The boy was also somewhat transparent, as was the teacher who Principal Dale had explained was her Assistant Principal.

A furtive glance at the class showed most of the students to be like them. It was like watching a piece of film that had been double exposed. Yet I knew from my physical contact with the principal that these beings were as solid as I was.

As for the rest of the class, they appeared to be normal children. They were uniformly neat and appeared normal in all regards. I found myself wondering, though, just how many of the real ones were like me—transformed from another life to this strange new existence in Ovid. Had they all been children before, or was I looking at adults who had been regressed by the power of the Judge? My guess was that they were all transformed. No real person in Ovid was the individual they had come to the town as originally. And what had Dr. Miner said? She mentioned that most of the transformees didn't even remember who they had been before Ovid. That made me feel terribly isolated.

"Class!" Principal Dale called out in a gentle but authoritative voice which bespoke of many years in the classroom. "This is Ms. Winters' replacement for the next few weeks. This is Ms. Reynolds. Now let's all welcome Ms. Reynolds to Northside Elementary."

A loud, shrill chorus of "hi" and "hello Ms. Reynolds" assaulted my ears, and it was all I could do to keep from turning and running from the room. Drawing on reserves I didn't even know I had, I managed a nervous smile in return. After all, I couldn't allow myself to be intimidated by a room full of eight year olds, could I?

Principal Dale said quietly to me, "I'll leave Dana in here to teach the rest of this period. Then it will be time for recess and she can turn the class over to you."

Dana Johnson, the assistant principal, was a cheery woman. Her bright red hair and tall, slender figure were the opposite of Principal Dale's, but she had the same pleasant demeanor. I watched in silence as she conducted the class through the rest of their math period. As I watched her in action, I became even more concerned, for Dana was masterful in the way she controlled the class.

I began to realize that my fears were well grounded. Certainly, I had taught many students in my life, but they had been adults—or nearly so. Therefore, I had been able to treat them as adults. If the truth be told, that included pontificating before them, deriding them when their logic was faulty, and giving only begrudging praise when they were correct. I realize not all college professors teach in that fashion, but I was never comfortable teaching, so I was determined to make it uncomfortable for my students as well.

I realized I would not be able to do that now. If I pontificated, I would only confuse these children. If I derided them, they would probably cry. If I gave only begrudging praise, they would lose interest. I understood all of these things, but I didn't know how to correct them.

I tried to remember how it had been when I was in the third grade. It was difficult to remember that far back with any accuracy. My teacher had been a Mrs. Grundy. As I recall, she tolerated no guff in her classroom, but I didn't remember her as being a particularly harsh disciplinarian. How had she managed?

I decided I needed to watch Dana and see how she handled the children. She seemed very good at what she did, so she was undoubtedly a proper role model. By the time the period had ended and the children had been dismissed for recess, I was terrified. What I had seen was a woman who was much more than an instructor. She was a mother and a taskmaster at the same time, comforting and mollifying them one moment and demanding more from them the next. She seemed to know in an instant which role to assume, and the children responded to her exactly as she desired. I was hopelessly out of my element it seemed.

"They're a good class," Dana told me with a smile when we were alone in the classroom. "The class is a little large—there are thirty-two kids. With all the growth over at Vulman Industries it seems like there are new children enrolling every week."

I just nodded my head. Great. I had a larger-than-average class. Just what I needed.

"I know you've never taught here at Northside before," she went on,

“but I think you’ll find most of the kids are like the ones in our other elementary schools.”

“I’m sure they are,” I agreed, knowing there was no way Dana could understand what I really meant by that remark.

“We’ll have spelling right after recess,” she told me. “I’ll get out of here now and let you take over. Work with them on spelling until lunch. Then you and I can meet in the cafeteria and go over Kristi’s lesson plans. You’re lucky—Kristi is a good teacher, so all you’ll need to do is follow her lesson plans.”

Gee, I didn’t feel lucky.

The children filed back into the classroom in orderly fashion, taking their seats with a minimum of talking and giggling. It was time for me to take the stage. Nervously, I got to my feet. The unsteady stance I took was not entirely due to unfamiliarity with high heels. I steeled myself as well as I could for the ordeal that was sure to come.

“All right, class,” I began. “Before we start spelling, why don’t we all get to know each other a little better?” I was proud of myself for thinking of that. Not only did it sound right, it would occupy the first part of the class, and I had no idea how to teach spelling. “Let’s start over on this side.” I pointed to a cute little girl—one of the partially transparent children. She smiled and began to recite.

I really didn’t listen to all that they had to say. There were too many of them to remember what each recited. Besides, I had a seating chart which gave me their names and told me a little about them. I simply let each of them ramble on, nodding to them when they had finished, and indicating that the next child should speak. After all, the longer they spoke, the less time I had to worry about what—or how—I was going to teach them.

Some of the children were interesting, though. Generally, they were the real ones—or perhaps I should say the solid ones. First, there was Wendy Palmer. She was a very cute little girl dressed in a plaid skirt and black tights. With her long, curly blonde hair, her pert nose and round blue eyes, she was going to grow up to be a real beauty, I thought. She seemed embarrassed to recite her life history to the class, and when she did, it was as if she was talking about someone else—someone whose life history she had been required to learn. I suspected she was one of the transformees who remembered her previous life. I wondered who she had been.

Then there was Eric March. He was a handsome, confident little guy. He reminded me of that kid in the Dr. Pepper ad on TV who swaggers up to the teacher's desk with a can of Dr. Pepper. The little devil practically leered at me, causing me to look down a couple of times to make certain everything was modestly covered. He was the son of a couple who apparently owned what passed for a department store in Ovid. From his confidence and bearing, it was obvious he was hot stuff—and he knew it.

